

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

State Trials.

187. The Proceedings, Examination, and Trial of Colonel EUSEBIUS ANDREWE, more commonly written Andrewes, (a Barrister of Gray's-Inn) before the High Court of Justice, for High Treason : 2 CHARLES II. A. D. 1650. [Published by Francis Buckley, Gent. who was Assistant to Mr. Andrewe in the time of his Imprisonment, and an Eye-witness of all the bloody and execrable Proceedings.]

ON Monday the 24th of March, 1650, col. Andrewe was taken prisoner at Gravesend by major Parker, and conveyed to Westminster. The next day, he was convented before the Lord-President Bradshaw, sir Henry Mildmay, knt. and Thomas Scot, esq. three members of the Council of State, delegated by the Council for the taking of the Examination of him, and of sir Henry Chickley, knt. Dr. Henry Edwards, and Mr. Clark, casually found in the same Inn with Mr. Andrewe.

Those gentlemen examined him so punctually to every action and circumstance that had passed on his part since he took up arms, and especially since the surrender of Worcester, and his return from thence to London; and also concerning his several lodgings, names, acquaintances, removes, abodes in the country, correspondencies by letters, and interest in places and persons, as if they had kept a diary for him. Which considered, and that sir John Gell, bart. major Barnard. capt. Smith, capt. Benson, and capt. Ashley, (with whom he had the last and most questionable correspondence) were all in custody, he found himself to be betrayed, but could not at present guess by whom; but well saw that he had better be fair in his confession, than to deny what he saw by the perfectness of his examiners, would be proved against him, by the discovery of some of those formerly secured, and examined before his coming up.

In his Answer, he would have been circumstantial, but was kept close to the question :

at his departure he desired that he might set down his own Narrative, according to his own sense, which was granted him to prepare, and to send or bring to them as there was opportunity. And having totally, as much as in him lay, excused his fellow-prisoners as to any thing relating to his Delinquency, he was with them committed to the Gatehouse.

Wednesday following, he was re-convented and re-examined.

On Friday, he was again convented, and delivered in his Narrative to the Lord-President, and the House. But business happening, detaining the other two examiners, he was by the President returned.

On Saturday he was recalled, and then, as at all times before, used and treated with civility, and no little pressure to discover some great persons, his supposed confederates : the aim, as he conjectured, and that upon strong inference, and some expressions, was at sir Guy Palmes, sir John Curson, and sir Thomas Whitmore, &c. But he accounted it a great blessing in his unhappiness, that his misfortune was not fatal to any of his friends or familiars, who yet knew nothing of the reason of his imprisonment, more than for what they were beholden to common fame.

On Sunday he was called out of his bed, and by two messengers, his keeper, and his man, brought into a boat at King's-bridge, at Westminster, and thence carried to the Tower. The warrant, which at the Lieutenant's house was read, imported, that he was committed close prisoner for High-Treason, in endeavouring to subvert the present government, &c. to be kept till delivered by law.

The Narrative follows :

To the Right Honourable the Council of State;
The humble NARRATIVE * of col. Eusebius Andrewe, as to the Questions and Matters of Charge, whereupon he was examined before President Bradshaw, sir Henry Mildmay, and Thomas Scot, esq. in that behalf delegated by the Council the 27th of March, 1650.

May it please your Lordships; being unfortunately, and by a treacherous practice seduced into an action which renders me obnoxious to your lordships displeasure and justice, and thereupon convented and brought to examination, I assured your lordships delegates that I came with a resolution to deal candidly, and not to preserve my life by framing a lye, or denying a truth. The same purpose I still retain, casting myself wholly at your lordships feet; humbly praying leave, that while I answer to matter of fact, I may be permitted to cloath it with pertinent circumstances; that while the one lays me liable to your justice, the other may bring me within the capacity of your mercy; which in case it be afforded, I shall embrace with all humility and thankfulness. And if denied, I shall find cause within my bosom to justify God Almighty in his permission of my ruin; and I hope charity enough to forgive whosoever have, or shall be instrumental to it, and bear the gurdon of my folly, with a sober confidence of God's reserved favour.

My Engagement for his late majesty began soon after Hillary Term, 1642, and continued until the surrender of Worcester, in July 1645. I have omitted to make my Composition, not having a considerable, and not willing to own an inconsiderable estate. I have not taken the Protestation, Solemn League and Covenant, Negative Oath, nor subscribed the present Engagement.

John Barnard, sometime a major under me, and by reason of his good parts and sober demeanor, being in my good opinion, at my return to a private practice in my calling for my necessary support, frequently visited me, and imparted to me such occurrences as he met abroad in discourse, and did often intimate the discontent of the Reformades, the factions of the Levellers and Agitators, and the proceeding of a certain Committee, or select Council of Officers, of which col. Cook was chief, and himself their clerk, upon a printed charge against some for oppression, and against others for concealed Delinquency; to the penning, promoting or counselling in which I was originally a stranger, nor did ever interest myself therein further than the bearing his discourse; neither did ever mediate or immediately meddle with any of the persons or actions of the Refor-males, Levellers or Agitators upon any of his discourses.

About * Trinity-Term last, major Barnard obtruded to my acquaintance one capt. Holmes, who soon after brought with him one John Benson, (who pretended to have had command under sir John Gell, was anciently his servant, and until this time his dependant,) who uninvited frequently produced to me transcripts of Letters, (with the copying of which he pretended to be entrusted under Mr. Rushworth) which did appear to purport the occurrences in reference to the affairs of state, and their concernments at home and abroad, from their several agents; which I only read in his sight, and immediately delivered them back, he pretending that he was to carry them to Mr. Thomas Bushel to be transmitted over sea.

Capt. Holmes, and John Benson, in their discourses, did insinuate that their interest was great in the Reformades, and that by them great advantage would upon any importunity be done for the royal party, and magnified sir John Gell's interest in his country, his reluctance at what he had done in the Parliament's service, and his willingness to expiate his former fault with a beneficial service to the Prince. And major Barnard propounded, that a former design in the time of the war laid by me for the taking of the Isle of Ely, might by their help, and the conjuncture of some strength to be raised by sir John Gell, then to me a stranger, and by Holmes and Benson, pretended to be willing and able to raise considerable numbers, be revived and executed; and thereupon it was concluded, that I should with Benson try who in Cambridgeshire would engage in it, and then ride down to sir John Gell, to see if his strength and purpose were such as pretended; and this not to be executed but upon the contingency of successes in Ireland, and Scotland, was let fall as soon as conceived.

About the middle of December, captain Holmes brought me instructions, to draw a petition for sir John Gell, for the getting of his arrears, which I drew accordingly; and not long after, I was invited to give him a meeting, till then having not seen or corresponded with him, and received an invitation and instruction to arbitrate between him and his lady, with sir Thomas Priestwich. And amongst other discourses, sir John Gell did take notice of his irrequitall of his service, and his losses, and the misapplication of his, and other services, to an end they intended not, and that he desired to be so understood, and when opportunity should be, to be so represented to the Prince; and did intimate, that if ever he took up arms again, it should be for the Prince: and at several other subsequent meetings the discourses were general, and much to this purpose, but no particular design laid or contrived.

* This error in time, as some others both of substance and circumstance, are rectified upon better memory, by some following papers sent to the Lord President.

The time limited by the act for departure, &c. being near expired, and myself being purposed to withdraw into the country, until the summer voyage, into some of the Plantations, and to that purpose being in treaty with sir Edmund Plowden, about the conditions of New Albion plantation, of which he writes himself Count Palatine, and Proprietor; on Saturday, 16 Martii, I was unexpectedly visited by major Barnard and John Benson, and they enquiring my resolution concerning my leaving the town in obedience to the Act, I signified my purpose to go to New Albion or to Virginia: upon which they took an opportunity to make a proposal to me in effect, that they had a considerable design laid, and friends and money to set on foot and back it, and that I should have 200*l.* in hand, and power to draw money by bills of exchange, for what more should be necessary for my support, and management of what should concern the said design in Holland, if I would undertake to go over, and promote it to the Prince. And they did then in general terms signify, that it was an easy matter, especially the Cavaliers going out of the town, by correspondence in all counties, to surprize the horse of the army in their several quarters; and did intimate, that major Barnard had a design in draught, which as I remember he produced, and I believe was concerning such surprisal, but was not read, but referred to further time of consideration. My answer was, that if the money were ready, I would divert my former purpose from any plantation, and entertain the motion.

Sunday morning, they came again and informed me, that several persons of quality and fortune in Kent, Buckingham, and Dorset, were, or would then presently come up near the town, and would join in an Engagement, and advance money; and that sir J. Gell would also engage, and might with a word of his mouth bring in his friends, and sir Andrew Kniveton, sir Guy Palmes, and Mr. Fitzherbert, and a fourth person, whose name I remember not; and therefore desired me to draw an Engagement, (which I did in a loose paper, after the sense of them or one of them, the said Barnard or Benson, instructed) and to move sir John Gell to join in such an Engagement; but did press me to join in the same at that present, for the encouraging of their before-mentioned friends, amongst whom, I remember only these surnames, Boyes, Thatcher, and Baker, all to me absolute strangers.

That day I spake with sir John Gell, and acquainted him with their offer and proposal to me, and desire from him. He answered, that he would not meddle with acting in that design (which he took upon him to be acquainted withal), for which he was as then in no capacity, nor would be engaged under his hand and seal, to be bound to, by any future action for them; for that Benson was a fellow given to drink, and lavish of his tongue: but entrusted me, that if I went over upon this occasion, to possess the Prince with a good opinion of him, and that he would do nothing against him; and if he were at all in command, he would be so to his advantage, or to that effect.

I returned to them sir John Gell's answer, with which they were not, or seemed not altogether unsatisfied, and appointed on Monday at five of the clock, that the persons of the counties of Kent, Buckingham and Dorset, or some of each county from the rest, should give a meeting at the Three Cranes, at the Savoy-Gate, and be all satisfied in the design, and agree their respective portions of money to be paid in present, and raised for the future; desiring me to take care to move, that they might be also provided for, to be able to hold intelligence, and ride about from place to place to lay the design.

At the time I came; and major Barnard produced two letters, one subscribed by Smith, another by Thatcher, purporting that the Kentish gentlemen were come as far as Rochester, and would that night be within twelve miles of London, and lie there all day, and then in the evening, on Tuesday by eight of the clock, would at any place give meeting to himself, and his colonel; and that they had sent a special guide to bring Barnard to them that night, whither he was instantly desired to repair, and that they durst come no nearer, in fear of the watchfulness of col. Blunt, and that the 250*l.* were ready to be laid down to perform their undertaking: No man of any county giving any meeting according to the first appointment at the Cranes, but the said Barnard and Benson, and one who calls himself captain Ashley, only known in face to me, who pretended to be privy and knowing of the truth of all that their former discourse and these letters tended to: and Barnard pretending to go instantly to horse from Westminster, I brought him and Benson to the water-side, and in the walk they importuned me again to obtain sir John Gell's signature and seal to the Engagement, which Benson had then ready engrossed, and that I would go presently to Westminster with them about it; which I refused, and told them, that I was able to satisfy any man of quality, discretion, and secrecy, concerning sir John's readiness, though not actually engaged; and so left them.

That night about eight of the clock, one Smith came to me (till then) an absolute stranger, and captain Ashley came to me, and brought me a letter from major Barnard, highly reproving me and sir John Gell of backwardness, in with-holding our own hands from the Engagement, and that we intended our own honours upon their dangers, without giving them assurance of our secrecy and constancy; and that unless the Engagement were subscribed by sir John Gell, his Kentish friends would not proceed further. I was known to Mr. Smith, who took upon him to come as from them for satisfaction in that point. And in answer, I under a vow of secrecy told him, that I was satisfied concerning sir John Gell, and presumed, that if any gentleman of quality, in whose judgment the rest would abide, should address to sir John, that under an oath of secrecy he would satisfy him, but durst not trust Benson, and Barnard was to him a stranger. With this they departed, assuring me that they thought no more would be expected from sir John, and that they would, or one of them, away that night to the company; and that the next day being Tuesday, the money should be paid at the Palgrave's-head.

They broke their time, and my occasions prest me into London, being next day to be gone by the Act; and about 9 of the clock at night, I was sent for by captain Ashly and Benson, who delivered me a letter from Barnard, pressing me to subscribe the Engagement which Benson engrossed; and that being done, he would go with me the next day to Gravesend, and the gentlemen of Kent should meet there, and there the money to be paid.—The tide being fit for passage on Wednesday, Barnard came not, but Benson pretended him to be at Tottenham-court with the Buckinghamshire gentlemen, and that he was well horsed, and would come presently, and should follow; and so captain Ashley and myself, with no more than 50s. in my purse, presuming upon the money there, went to Gravesend, and expected till Thursday night, but found no Kentish men, and no one from London coming. Capt. Ashley went that night with the evening-tide for London, to enquire the reason: and on Friday morning early came major Barnard, and Mr. Smith with a letter from Benson, purporting that if sir John Gell would not co-engage under his hand and seal, with those whose names were subscribed, of which I only know Barnard, Smith, Benson, and Ashley, they would go over themselves, meaning himself and Barnard, to the Prince, and spoil both mine and Sir John's credit with him, and disappoint all that I intended in his favour: and that he had letters from sir John, which he could produce, should make him repent his refusal, or to such effect; and therefore desired me to write to sir John Gell, to let him see his danger; which I did, laying the case before him, and not pressing him, but leaving him to do as God should direct him, and his judgment lead him. With which letter Barnard and Smith went away, with assurance that whether sir John Gell engaged or not, I should hear next day from them, and if he did engage, they would come down and go for Rochester, where their former undertaking should be performed to me; and if he did not, I should be disengaged, and have my subscription and seal sent me, and the design should fall. I expected till Saturday night, and finding no answer, resolved on Monday to intend my privacy in the country, upon my first purpose for New Albion; and in the morning early was seized by a party of horse, and brought to London.

My Lords; In that Narrative you will see a believing nature wrought upon by treacherous men, such who cannot be true to any, whilst false to parties.—The pretended design vanished, as never being more than a phantasm, and not worth your regard, the real design effected, so far as they had power or opportunity; that is, to bring the game into the toil, and there leave them to be entangled and made a quarry. You will find me passively active, being prompted and enticed by their insinuation, and not once but hearkening to them. It lies in your lordship's power to cut me off, by extending which, you can arrive to no honour amongst men; and possibly, by an act of lenity, you may do an office acceptable to God.

'Cajus fiat voluntas, modo in ruinâ meâ.'

Whoever shall be present at my Trial, or into whose hands this Narrative shall fall, will easily conclude with me,

'Quos vult perdi Deus, hos dementat prius.'
EVA. ANDREWE."

On Tuesday the 1st of April, after his remove to the Tower, he was called to be further examined, and at his return writ back to them some particulars, (viz.) concerning captain Holmes, by want of memory not before signified. And in case the state should have suffered aught by the said Holmes, it might have made Mr. Andrewe incapable of lawful favour by reason of his tenacity concerning the said Holmes, who, for aught Mr. Andrewe knew, was guilty of his being betrayed; and if so, might as well intimate his knowledge of Holme's purposes, to the end that Mr. Andrewe's concealment of them might augment his crime: and also concerning Mr. Thomas Barnard, who being at large and unquestioned, Mr. Andrewe had cause to have the like jealousy of.

On Friday seven-night following, being the 11th of April, he was called again, and was confronted with sir John Gell, and avowed what he did indeed neither directly deny, nor was troubled that he did aver; freely telling the President, that howbeit he did not remember some things in point, yet he was confident that he would not do him, nor any man wrong; and then declared to the President, that he looked upon sir John Gell, as upon himself, as a betrayed man; but as concerning others, he knew not by whom, he had been free in his confessions, though to his own injury. He then acquainted their lordships, that he had something to rectify in his former examinations and Papers, upon better memory, in point of material circumstances. They directed him to put them into writing, and to send them, and they called for his hand to the former Examinations and Papers; which he gave them, and the same day writ to them as followeth:

May it please your Lordships; According to the favourable licence by your lordships to me given, I have digested into writing those matters of circumstance, wherein my Examinations and Narrative are in defect of my memory only uncertain and short; humbly praying, that they may be received and made a part of that relation, which I must abide by at my Trial; and that the former errors may be rectified, and defects supplied so far, as by this supplementary account upon my serious recollections given, may be done. And I shall then be confident, I shall appear not to have wilfully concealed, however guilty, or misrendered any thing pertinent, whether the same carry with it my condemnation, or excuse.

What passed between myself and Mr. Barnard, before my acquaintance with Holmes and Benson, and which is exprest in my Answers and Narrative, was in time before Easter-Term last, when there was an order for departure of persons in my condition, from this town: and I, in obedience thereunto, did leave this city on Saturday the 6th of May, and came to Mr. Osborn's house at Carlton-Hall in Suffolk, on Thursday following; from whence I stirred not at any time more than 5 miles, until the 6th of August, when I was sent for to make assurances between a kinswoman and her husband in point of jointure, by them to me mutually referred: in which business, and in other matters between another kinswoman, and a merchant of London, being under reference to arbitrement: as also in endeavouring to get some friend to contract in the behalf of my daughter, for the reversion of a lease holden of the dean and chapter of Ely, in which she is interested for a life in being, I continued in and near the city until the 3rd of September; in which time Barnard voluntarily brought to my acquaintance Holmes and Benson, upon the pretences in my Answers and Narrative set forth, to which I humbly refer.

The Note which mentions Benson's going with me to Cambridgeshire, and so to sir John Gell, which in my Answers I have expounded, was drawn from me by Barnard's importunity, and written at his request; but what use he made of it, (other than to lay it up, and reserve it for his present purpose,) I know not, nor had any account of it, but went away the 3rd of September, there being no conclusion of any thing to be done in substance, or circumstance positive. But Mr. Barnard, who knew how to direct to me, promised by letter to intimate further to me; from whom after that, I never received any letter or message to that, or any other purpose, until my return near Michaelmas-Term; when he told me, that the unsuccessfulness of things in Ireland had been the impediment.

As to the day, viz. the 18th of October, being the fair-day at Ely, it was only in discourse mentioned to be an opportune time, in case the Isle were (as indeed it was not) garrisoned. Neither any solemn, or serious design or conclusion, then-to-fore or then-after made or laid, other than in transient communication; nor any person engaged so much as by word or promise, until this fresh stratagem was set on foot by Barnard.

I drew sir John Gell's Petition before Christmas, and had several compliments from him by Holmes, (at least pretended) before I saw him, and I believe, after Twelf-tide I was invited to him, and entrusted by him in the composing the differences between him and his lady; in the last term I drew his Answer, and in the several times of our casual or occasional meetings, the discourses have amounted to what I have before signified, and in your presence and his avowed; and how more exactly to give your lordships an account in time, I cannot.

As to the matter of the Engagement, I abide by what I have formerly said, with this only, that at my engaging, which was late in the night, before my going out of town, in obedience to the Act, I was promised by Benson, that if sir John Gell, and their pretended friends of the country, did not co-engage, I should be disengaged; and in the hour of my going away, Barnard being not ready, according to promise, but by Benson pretended to be at Tottenham Court, with some Buckinghamshire men, and that he would undoubtedly follow: I told Benson, as I remember, in the presence of capt. Ashley, that whether he came or not, I must for the present remove to Gravesend, not having convenience of horse to go elsewhere so suddenly. And if there were performance on Barnard's part with me, I should be ready on mine; and if not, I desire to be disengaged, and left to pursue my private occasions into Surry. And I did really carry with me deeds of my clients, to have employed myself upon, in case of their failure with me.

I humbly beg your lordships' pardon for a favourable interpretation of this trouble, which is a duty to truth, and right to others and myself; which could not be omitted by, my lords, your lordships' humble prisoner and servant,

EUS. ANDREWS.

This, together with a Petition for allowance and liberty of friends' resorts, being the same day signed in the presence of the Lieutenant, were sealed up, and sent to the Lord President's own hand. This was his second Petition, which, with a former to the same effect (and not of moment to subscribe) did never receive any answer. At the same time he writ to sir Henry Mildmay, on the behalf of the gentlemen who were taken with him.

Mr. Andrewe, at several times, took upon him to aver to the Committee of State, that they had spies upon him for some years, and particularly Barnard; which the Lord President did not deny, but justified the state, by the practice of all states, to set watches upon persons of ill-affections to them.

This day the Lord Grey was with the other three of the State.

His third Petition, sent about Easter, being by sir Henry Mildmay and Mr. Scott put upon it, to submit himself, with promise of favour, if he sought the State in such manner; which for his relations' sake he did, but with some caution, in these words:

To the Right Honourable the Lord President, and Council; the humble Petition of Eusebius Andrewe,

Sheweth,

That your Petitioner is seriously sensible, and humbly acknowledgeth, that for his high delinquency against the State, he is become forfeited to their justice. That he hath not in the least prevaricated with your lordships, in the confession of his proper faults and follies, nor hath kept aught reserved concerning himself, or any person or thing, which may satisfy your lordships, and more secure the state, and is not hopeless to be looked upon as capable of your present favour and future mercy, which he now doth and shall always implore. That his present deserved condition is made more uncomfortable by his wants, and the exclusion of his friends and relations, without a supply, in which life itself becomes a punishment. Your Petitioner, casting himself at the feet of your lordships, humbly prays, That his being prosecuted before the High Court of Justice may be suspended. That, by your order, his past and future charge of necessities may be discharged, whilst he remains your prisoner. That his friends and kindred may have recourse to him, and that he may have the freedom of his pen. And in case your Petitioner shall be found in the least to misapply those favours, he shall adjudge himself worthy of a total deprivation of them, and of your future goodness towards him.

And your petitioner, &c.

This was less than was looked for, though as much as he could venture on; in which his desire for reprieve of his Trial was inserted, to prevent only his being the first, and exasperating them by giving others aim in the scrupling the court. This Petition was solicited thirty-three days, but no answer could be obtained; and his wants growing upon him daily, he put in the Lieutenant's hands this following Petition:

The Petition, (with Stile as formerly, &c.)
Sheweth,

That your Petitioner hath been 12 weeks close prisoner, his friends neither permitted to visit, nor daring to relieve him; his score for necessities swollen beyond his ability to discharge, his credit protested, and nothing more visible to him than his immediate perishing. That he hath not been wanting to pray your favours, having three petitions lodged with your lordships, constantly solicited, but unanswered. That he hath in his confessions spared nothing which can more conduce to the state's security, or his own condemnation. Your Petitioner therefore humbly prays, That, if at all he must, he may speedily receive his Trial, he being ready to submit to the will of God in the issue. That if mercy be reserved for him, which he hath and doth implore, your lordships would please to admit him to sue out his pardon, and to a free conversation in this Commonwealth, upon security given for his good demeanour. That in the mean time he may have the liberty of the Church and Tower, and the freedom of his friends' resort; and that order may be given for the debt incurred there, in the time of his close restraint, to be discharged.

And your petitioner, &c.

The Warrant of Commitment, which I could not get a Copy of till the 14th of July, is as followeth:

These are to will and require you, herewith to receive into your custody the body of Eusebius Andrewe, esq. and him you are safely to keep in close imprisonment in the Tower of London, in order to his further examination, he being committed unto you for High Treason, in plotting and endeavouring the subversion and alteration of the present government. Of this you are not to fail; and for so doing, this shall be your Warrant.

Given at the council of state sitting at Whitehall, this 30th day of May, 1650.

Signed in the name and by the order of the council of state appointed by authority of parliament,

JOHN BRADSHAW, President.

To the Lieutenant of the Tower of London.

This Warrant is vicious in itself, for two Reasons, which make a right Warrant of Commitment, Coke's 2nd part Instit. fol. 52, 590, 591, allowed by the Parliament: 1. That it is not done by due process of law. 2. That it hath not a conclusion, viz. 'And safely to keep' 'until he be delivered by due course of law.' But leaves it indefinite, and is rather a condemnation to perpetual, at least, to arbitrary imprisonment, which is worse. The close imprisonment is but in order to his further Examination, and he had been twice since examined, and signed his Examinations before Easter, and did not refuse to answer any question demanded of him.—The Warrant is dated from the Council of State sitting at Whitehall, the 30th of May; whereas he was brought to the Tower the 30th of March, being Sunday, by seven in the morning, at the opening of the gate (no Council sitting) and the Warrant signed on Saturday the 29th of March.

Having attended a month in expectation of an Answer to his last Petition, he petitioned the Parliament again.

To the High and Honourable the Parliament of England,

The humble Petition of EUSEBIUS ANDREWE, Esq. close Prisoner in the Tower of London,

Sheweth,

That your Petitioner hath been, by a confederate Pack of Setters, wrought into actions, which (abstracted from their circumstances) render him liable to your justice; and this done, not without their further hope, that your Petitioner, as they supposed, had interest to have drawn divers persons of quality and fortune into the same entanglement.—That failing of that part of their aim, the said Confederates did let-tray your Petitioner to the honourable Council of State, by whose Warrant he hath been sixteen weeks a strictly close Prisoner, without a fortune of his own, the access of friends, or means of subsistence allowed; and is to perish by his wants, before it be distinguished by a public Trial, whether he be a fitter object for the applying of your justice or your mercy.—That he is hereby disabled to be accountable to the service of God, the duty to his family and friends, and to those who give him credit for bread. And in case he should be called from such his close restraint to his Trial, must be destitute and deprived of all fair means of making his reasonable Defence; which, however, it may suit with policy, will not be consistent with religion and honour.

Your Petitioner having for relief in the premises, by all opportune Addresses, and by four Petitions importunately solicited and sought the said Council of State without Answer; in the deep sense of his pressing sufferings humbly appealeth to this High Court, casting himself wholly thereupon, and as humbly prayeth, 1. That you would prevent your justice by your mercy, and admit him to sue out his pardon, upon security given for his future good demeanour to the state in this Commonwealth. 2. That if that be too great a favour, you would grant him Licence to depart the Commonwealth, he engaging not to act, or contrive aught to the disservice of the state. 3. That if he be not thought capable of either, but that he must receive a public Trial, he may have a convenient time of preparation, after a qualifying of his imprisonment. 4. That in the mean time he may have the liberty of the Tower, and resort of his friends; and that by your order, his debt for livelihood, incurred in his close restraint, may be discharged.

In all which your Petitioner is ready to submit to the will of God, whose Providence hath put justice and mercy into your present dispensing. And shall ever pray.

Notwithstanding his Petitions and Letters, he was brought before the High Court of Justice (in August), of which John Bradshaw was President, and his own Narrative was urged against him as a Confession; and Attorney General Prideaux used him with very ill language. But he put into Court his Answers in writing, which were as follow:

The humble ANSWER of Eusebius Andrewe, Esq. in his Defence, to the Proceeding against him before the Honourable the High Court of Justice, presented the 16th day of August, 1650.

The said Respondent (with the favour of this honourable Court) reserving and praying to be allowed the benefit and liberty of making further Answer, offereth to this honourable Court;

First, That by the Statute or Charter, stiled Magna Charta, which is the fundamental law, and ought to be the standard of the laws of England, confirmed above thirty times, and yet unrepealed, it is in the 29th chapter thereof granted and enacted, '1. That no freeman shall be taken, or imprisoned, or be disseised of his freehold or liberties, or free custom, or be outlawed or exiled, or be any otherwise destroyed; nor will we pass upon him, nor condemn him, but by a lawful judgment of his peers, and by the laws of the land. 2. We shall sell to no man, nor defer to any man justice or right.'

Secondly, That by the statute of 42 of Edw. 3, chap. 1, 1. The Great Charter is commanded to be kept in all the points. And, 2. It is enacted, that if any Statute be made to the contrary, that shall be holden for none; which Statute is unrepealed.

The Respondent observeth, That by an Act of the 26th of March, 1650, entitled, 'An Act for establishing an High Court of Justice,'* power is given to this Court to try, condemn, and cause Execution of Death to be done upon the Freemen of England, according as the major number of any twelve of the members thereof shall judge to appertain to justice.

And thereupon the Respondent doth humbly infer and offereth for law, That the said Act is diametrically contrary unto, and utterly inconsistent with the said Great Charter, and is therefore by the said recited Statute to be holden for none.—That it can with no more reason, equity, or justice, hold the value and reputation of a law (the said Statute before recited being in force), than if, contrary to the second Clause in the 29th chap. of Magna Charta, it had been also enacted, that justice and right shall be deferred to all Freemen, and sold to all that will buy it.

Thirdly, That by the Petition of Right, 3 Car. after premising that, contrary to the Great Charter, trials and executions had been had and done against the subjects by Commissions Martial, &c. it was therefore prayed, and by the Commission enacted, That, 1. No Commissions of the like nature might be thenceforth issued, &c. And that done, 2. To prevent, lest any of the subjects should be put to death, contrary to the laws and franchise of the land.

The Respondent hereupon humbly observeth and affirmeth, That this Court is (though under a different stile) in nature, and in the Proceedings thereof, directly the same with the Commission Martial; the Freemen thereby being to be tried for life, and adjudged by the major number of the Commissioners sitting (as in Courts of Commissioners Martial was practised, and was agreeable to their constitution), and consequently against the Petition of Right; in which he, and all the freemen of England (if it be granted there be any such) hath, and have right and interest; and he humbly claims his Right accordingly.

Fourthly, That by the Remonstrance of the 15th of December, 1641, and the Declaration of the 17th of January, 1642, the benefit of the laws and ordinary Courts of Justice are the subjects birthrights.—By the Declarations of the 12th of July, and the 16th of October, 1642, the Preservation of the Laws, and the due Administration of Justice, are owned to be the justifying cause of the War; and the ends of the Parliament's Affairs managed by their swords and councils. And God's curse is by them imprecated, in case they should ever decline those ends.—By the Declaration of the 17th of April, 1646, promise was made not to interrupt the course of Justice in the ordinary Courts thereof.—By the Ordinance or Votes of Non-addresses, Jan. 1649, it is assured on the Parliament's behalf, That though they lay the king aside, yet they will govern by the Laws, and not interrupt the course of justice in the ordinary courts thereof.

And thereupon the Respondent humbly inferreth and affirmeth, That the Constitution of this Court is a breach of that public faith of the Parliament, exhibited and pledged in the Declarations and Votes to the Freemen of England. And upon the whole matter, the Respondent (saving as aforesaid) doth humbly affirm for law, and claim as his right, 1. That this Court, in defect of the validity of the Act, by which it is constituted, hath not power against him, or to press him to a further Answer. 2. That by virtue of Magna Charta, the Petition of Right, and the before-recited Remonstrance and Declarations, he ought not to be proceeded against by this Court, but by an ordinary Court of Justice, and to be tried by his peers.

And humbly prayeth, that this his present Answer and Salvo may be accepted and registered, and that he may be tried by his Peers accordingly. EUS. ANDREWE.

The farther and second ANSWER of Eus. Andrewes, esq. to the honourable the High Court of Justice, presented the 16th day of Aug. 1650.

The said Respondent, with the favour of this honourable Court, reserving and praying to be allowed the benefit and liberty of making further Answer, if it shall be adjudged necessary, in all humbleness for present answer, offereth to this honourable court.

That by the letter and genuine sense of the Act, entitled, 'An Act for establishing an 'High Court of Justice,' the said Court is not qualified to try a freeman of England, and such the Respondent averreth himself to be, for life in case of Treason.

First, For that, 1. The said court is not constituted a Court of Record, and (but upon Record) cannot at all have that account of their freemen, which kings were wont to have of their ministers of justice.* 2. The freemen; and

* In Walker's Hist. of Independency this head of objection is thus given:

"For that: 1. The said Court is not constituted a Court of Record; neither hath Commission returnable into a Court of Record.

such who are and may be concerned in him, can have no record to resort unto, by which to preserve the rights due to him and them respectively, viz. of

1. A Writ of Error, in case of erroneous Judgment, due by the precedents. (Pasch. 39 Ed. 3, John of Gaunt's Case, 4 Ed. 3, Rot. Par. Num. 13, Count de Arundel's Case, 42 Ed. 3, Rot. Par. No. 23, Sir John of Lee's Case.)

2. A Plea of Auterfoys acquit, in case of a new question for the same fact; the right to which, and the necessity of such record, appears by Wetherel and Darley's Case, 4 Rep. 35 Eliz. Vaux's Case, ibid. 33 Eliz.

3. A being enlarged upon Acquittal, as is the Freemen's due, by the stat. 14 Hen. 6. c. 1. and the Case thereupon grounded. (Dyer, fol. 120, and Abridg. fol. 33, The Year Book of Ed. 6. 10, fol. 19.)

4. A Writ of Conspiracy against those who have practised the betraying the life of the Respondent not to be brought before acquittal, and no acquittal but upon Record, as appeareth by the Poulterer's Case, 9 Rep. fol. 55.

This Court is to determine at a day, without account of their proceedings, have power to try, judge, and cause execution, but not to acquit or to give enlargement; so that the nocent are thereby punishable, the innocent not preservable; the injured and betrayed not vindicable; which are defects incompatible with a court of justice, and inconsistent with justice itself, and with the honours of a Christian nation and commonwealth.

Secondly. For that the Members of this Court are by the Act directed to be sworn, 1. Not in conspectu populi, for the Freemen's Satisfaction. 2. Not in words of indifferency, and obliging to equality. 3. In words of manifest partiality, viz. 'You shall swear that 'you shall well and truly, according to the 'best of your skill and knowledge, execute 'the several powers given unto you by this 'Act.'

The Respondent humbly offers, That 1. The Court in their capacity of Triers ought, in reason, to have been appointed by their constitution, to have been sworn as Triers in full Court, according to the practice in all equal ways of trial. 2. The Court as Commissioners of Oyer and Terminer, (being authorized by the Act to hear and determine) should in like reason be appointed by an Oath, such as is usual for persons so qualified, as provided by 18 Ed. 3, viz. 'You shall swear, that well 'and lawfully you shall serve our lord the king, 'and his people (mutatis mutandis) in the 'office of justice, &c. and that you deny to no

So that: 1. The State cannot upon the Record, and but upon Record cannot at all, have that account of their Freemen, which Kings were wont to have of their Subjects, and States exact elsewhere at the hands of their Ministers of Justice."

'man common right, &c.' Or some Oath equivalent at least to that of a Justice of Peace, Dalton, fol. 13. 'I A. B. do swear, that I will do equal right; and according to my best wit, cunning and power, after the Laws and Customs of the land, and the statutes thereof made, &c.' 3. The Court in the capacity of Triers should, in reason, be obliged by an Oath, of as equitable sense as that usually administered to jurors, viz. 'You shall well and truly try, and true deliverance make between our sovereign Lord the king, (mutatis mutandis) and the prisoner at the bar; So help you God.'

Whereas when this Court shall, as it is now constituted, have condemned the Freeman, the Respondent, or other, by applying their skill and knowledge, to their power, whether justly or not, the oath by them taken is not in the letter broken; as to be exactable by man, though God will probably have a better account. And therefore upon the whole matter premised, the Respondent (saving as before) offers for law and reason, that the honourable Court the High Court of Justice, is not, by the letter and proper sense of the words of the Act, by which it is constituted, qualified in respect of the pre-objected defects to pass upon him for his life, upon a charge of crimination of high treason,

And humbly prays, that this his second answer, and salvo, may be received; and registered; and that he may be tried, as in his former Answer he prayed. EUS. ANDREWE.

The farther and third ANSWER of Eusebius Andrewe, esq. to the Honourable the High Court of Justice, presented the 16th day of Aug. 1650.

The said Respondent, with the favour of this honourable Court, reserving and praying to be allowed the benefit and liberty of making further answer, (if it shall be adjudged necessary) in all humbleness for present Answer, offereth to this honourable Court.

That, First, It is his right (if he must admit this Court to be duly and legally established and constituted, as to their being a Court) to be tried by his peers, men of his own condition and neighbourhood.

Secondly, It is within the power of the Court by the letter and sense of the Act, or at least as being not repugnant to the act, to try him by such his peers, &c.

First, That it is his right to be so, and only so tried, appears by Magna Charta, c. 29. 25 Edw. 1, c. 1 and 2. 25 Edw. 3, c. 4. 25 Edw. 3, c. 2 and 4. 28 Edw. 3, c. 4. 37 Edw. 3, c. 18. 42 Edw. 3, c. 3.—By all which Statutes made in full Parliament, consisting of the head, and all the members actually, as well as virtually, this the Respondent's right is maintainable and demandable, and the contrary proceedings thereunto are to be held for none, and redressed, &c. to be held for void and error, &c. So that, if the Laws and Courts were not obstructed, (in the cases of some sort of freemen of England) the whole proceeding contrary to these laws, without a Jury of his Peers, were avoidable, and reservable by Writ of Error, as appears also by the precedents vouched by the Respondent in his second Answer.

Secondly, That it is in the Court's power to try the Freeman, and consequently the Respondent, by a jury of his equals; the Court is humbly desired to consider the words of qualification.

The Court is, 1. Required to hear and determine; and so if at all Commissioners, then Commissioners of Oyer and Terminer, and such Commissioners, in their natural constitution and practical execution, do proceed against the freemen according to law, by a jury of his equals, and not otherwise.

2. Authorized to proceed to trial, condemnation, and execution, &c. But not restrained to the manner of trial, limitative, as to trial by the Court's opinion as tryers, non exclusive as to trial per Pares; but is left in the manner, as in the judgment itself, to the opinion of the major number of twelve; and if they shall think fit to try by a jury, it will be no offence against the act, there being no clause or prohibition to the contrary.—And therefore the Respondent humbly claimeth his said right, as consisting with the said power.—And the more to induce the Court to grant him such his right, and the benefit thereof, the Respondent humbly representeth the manifest wrong, and multiplied disherison done to him, and in him to the Freemanry of England, in the following particulars of their like just right (depending upon such trial to be allowed) if denied him, by this honourable Court.

First, The benefit of Challenge to the Triers, thirty-five peremptorily, and for Treason sans number.—(Stampf. pl. Cor. fol. 150. Tit. Challenge, Poying's Case. 32 Hen. 6, Fitz. fol. 26. Allowed Hill. 1 Jacobi to sir W. Raleigh and Brooks.)

Secondly, The liberty of Seeing, hearing, and counter-questioning the witnesses, for clearing the evidence in matter of circumstance, as well as in matter of fact; which appears to be the Respondent's right by (Stampf. pl. Cor. fol. 163, 164, the statute of 1 and 2 Phil. and Mary, c. 10 and 11. 1 Edw. 6, c. 12.

The authority of (the Law's Oracle) Coke 2 part Inst. fol. 12, commenting upon the words in 25 Edw. 3, c. 2. Provablement Attaint, because the punishment was heavy, the proof to be punctual, and not upon presumptions or inferences, or strains of wit, but upon good and sufficient proofs: also by the statute of 1 Eliz. c. 6, 13 Eliz. c. 1.

Thirdly, The being convinced or acquitted by a full, free, and fully-consented verdict. For, 1. A verdict by a Jury passeth from all, or not at all. In the proceeding by voices, a sentence passeth by way of concurrence, with which the Star-Chamber, High-Commission, and Courts-Martial, were branded and condemned of Inequality. 2. A verdict passeth upon a Jury before discharged, upon their affairs of estate, or supplies of nature, to prevent corruption of money and power; but as this Court proceeds (if it will proceed by voices), a trial may be had this day, and a sentence may be given at leisure; when the will of those by whom the freeman is prosecuted, be first known.

And upon the whole matter,

The Respondent humbly claims the benefit and right of being tried (if before this honourable Court) per pares, men of his own condition, and of his neighbourhood, and that he may hear and see all the witnesses produced against him, viva voce et aperto vultu; and may have power, liberty, and time to produce witnesses in his defence.

And (saving as formerly) humbly prays that this his Answer, and Salvo, may be received and registered.

EUS. ANDREWE.

THE SEVERAL ARGUMENTS OF COL. ANDREWE AT HIS TRIAL.

The First Argument.

My Lords, and you Gentlemen, Members of this Honourable Court; I have (as becomes me) been attentive to the Charge which has been read against me. It appears in that dress it is put already, (though I presume it shall be clad in other apparel by Mr. Attorney) so specious, and so great as that my friends (if I have any here) begin to fear, the indifferent to doubt and the partial to desire, and join in my condemnation; myself (I hope I am not partial to myself) believe, that it will be no more than the mountain's labour, and when it shall come to be dissected, will prove to be inane aliquid; like the apples of Sodom, that however they take the first sense, the eye, as this the ear, do rather foul the fingers that touch them, than satisfy the appetite in its expectation upon them.

My lord, I am at an unusual bar, and engaged in a great cause of a far extendable concernment, my fee is life, and my duty is self-preservation; which in itself were less considerable, if by a precedent of my suffering, the consequence would not prove mischievously epidemical.—I do not wilfully refuse to plead to the Charge, but humbly crave leave to offer my reasons for the suspending of my Plea. And if I be importunate (yet within the bounds of civility) I beg your pardon, and that I may have a full, free, and an uninterrupted hearing.

My lord; When the Jews pressed Pilate to sentence Christ, they obtruded to him: that they had a law, and by that law he ought to die. What they thought reasonable to claim, when it served their turn to vent their malice, will be, I hope, warrantable for me to lay hold on in a better sense, for the vindication of Christ, who suffers when justice is a sufferer. We have a law too, and by that law, I ought not to plead, not to be tried, not to be judged. The laws of England were not unknown, but mispractised, when the barons fought king John into a consent to the (not new making, but) restoration of the ancient laws.

And Magna Charta [Coke 1st part Instit. fol. 80, 81.] itself is but a confirmation or restitution of the Common Law, and is become the standard by which laws are reducible, and is the foundation of all other acts of parliament. It hath been at no time dismembered; no part abrogated by any repeal. It hath been confirmed above thirty times, and commanded as often to be observed and put in execution. In the Act called Confirmatio Chartarum, [25 Ed. 1, c. 1.] it is directed to be allowed as the common law in judgment, in all points, by all the Judges and Dispensers of Law, or which have the law to guide. [Bracton 414, 491. Fleta lib. 2, c. 48, lib. 3, c. 3.]—It hath in former ages gained an honourable esteem in the old books: 'Charta Libertatum communis Libertas Angliæ, Charta de Libertatibus,' &c. these are the Appellations. [Mirror c. 2, 18. Briton fol. 177.]—It was a Noli me tangere, and for seeking a reversal or avoidance of it, Hubert de Burgh, was sentenced by the Barons, and the sentence confirmed by king Hen. 3. [17 Hen. 3, Rot. Cla. mem. 1, 2. Pro utrius. M. 1.]—The great Hugh Spencer, in the reign of Edw. 2, was banished, but for rashly counselling against the 'Encounter la forme de la grande Chartre.' [14 Edw. 2.]—And to draw downwards yet one king's reign, and to the point to which I would apply; I find in the 42nd of Edw. 3, this Great Charter was not only barely confirmed and commanded to be kept in all the points, for these are the words; but to prevent any alteration of it, it is enacted, That if any statute be made to the contrary, that shall be holden for none.—By this Magna Charta it is granted, and enacted too; if my Lord Coke say true, who saith it is a Statute as well as a Charter, being made by assent and authority of Parliament; That no Freeman shall be taken or imprisoned, or he disseised of his freehold or liberties, or free customs, or be out-lawed or exiled, or any otherwise destroyed; nor will we pass upon him, nor condemn him, but by lawful Judgment of his Peers, and by the Law of the Land. We shall sell to no man, nor defer to any man either justice or right. If this be truth and law, which I have in these particulars premised to you; then, my lords, give me leave to take notice, That by that Act by which you are constituted a Court of Justice, you are authorised to try the Freeman of England; not per pares, upon or for offences against articles, and the punishment to reach to life, as the major part of any twelve of the Commissioners shall judge to appertain to justice.

Laying these together, a posting rider may read, that these laws are diametrically, and consequently inconsistent. The latter hath its doom inherent by its innate contrariety to the former, and is a building, a superstructure so unsuitable to the foundation, that if it had not a double-edged support, it need no help to be demolished but would fall, I know not whether to say, sua mole, or sua peneclitate.

The constitutors of this law are gladiis

exact; and therefore as I am not in opportune place to speak to them, so there is something of danger to speak too freely to them; but my Lord, your lordship, as you are in this place, are (I am sure ought to be) like the escutcheons of princes, with their adopted supporters, Knowledge and Conscience; and if you are, I am confident you will doubt of your commission or warrant to proceed against me, and compel me to preserve an inch of life, by giving away mine and my countrymen's liberty, in condescending to a plea and trial, in this contralegal way, and by power of this act.

The Second Argument.

My lord; I shall further beg leave to call to your memory the petition of Right; which was made the business of the Parliament, at the time when it was preferred, and received the royal assent; must never be forgotten by those who hold in esteem the care of Parliaments, and gracious concessions of kings. In the Proem, or leading part of that Petition, the Statute of Magna Charta is instanced as to this particular, Trial for life by proper courts, with other the laws and statutes, (some of which I have cited, and the rest shall upon another point in their place) and as it is complained, that proceedings had been by Commissioners Martial, when and where, if by the laws and statutes of the land they had deserved death, by the same laws and statutes also they might, and by no other laws ought to have been judged; so it is prayed, and accordingly enacted, that no commissions of like nature may be henceforth issued to any person or persons whatsoever to be executed, &c. and this to prevent, lest by colour of them, any of the subjects should be destroyed or put to death, contrary to the laws and franchise of the land.

My lord; 1. The Commissioners Martial were not evil in respect of the persons commissioned, being as this power is to you, so those always given to persons of quality and learning: but the evils of them were their proceedings by their own will and opinion, being themselves the Judges and the Jury; offices incompatible and inconsistent with the people's liberties, by the former laws become their rights. When your lordships shall read the Act by which you now sit, I am confident you will grant this power to be of the same nature, though not under the same name; and consequently in that petition complained of, in supposition that such might be, and enacted against in Terminis, that none such should be.

2. For that you are called by the Act, Commissioners, and yet have no commission, but the Act itself; whereas you should, in regard you are not a Court of Record in yourselves, have Commissions returnable at a day, into some Court of Record, where your proceedings might be extant and visible: and as you are now constituted, you have a day prefixed to determine in; but that being come, you are to vanish, and your vestigia will be as imperceptible to the times and men to come, as the trace of a swallow in the air; which is inconsistent with the honour and justice of any kingdom, or any Christian Commonwealth.

For that you have only by this Act, a bare and single power to adjudge, and cause execution to be done, in case you shall judge it to appertain to justice; but you have no power, if you think it appertain to justice, to acquit, and upon acquittal to discharge the person tried, as is the law expressly in my lord Dyer [Read's Case, Dyer, fol. 120, 10 Edw. 4, fol. 19.] and in the Year-book of Edw. 4, grounded upon the statute of Hen. 6, 14 of his reign, cap. 1. That Justices of Nisi prius (who are commissary Justices) shall have power of all the cases of Felony and of Treason, to give their judgment, as well where a man is acquitted of Felony, and of treason, as where he is thereof attainted, at the day and place where the inquisition, inquest, and jury shall be taken; and then from thenceforth to award execution to be made by force of the same judgments, which in an acquitted man's case can only be an enlargement.

But, my Lord, you have only power, if you can, to reach my life, if in your opinion deserving it: but not to reach me out of prison; so that if you kill me not here with the sword of justice, you must leave me in worse hands, to be buried alive in restraint and want. Which all is against the laws of nature and nations, and particularly of this land, that are all so balanced and poised, as that they have equal regard to the delivery and freeing the innocent, as to the condemnation of the nocent.

And Isidore in his Etymologies says of a law, thus; 'Erit autem lex honesta, justa, possibilis secundum naturam et consuetudinem patriæ; loco, temporisque conveniens necessaria, et utilis; manifesta quoque, ne aliquid incautum per obscuritatem captionis contineat; nullò privato commodo, sed pro communi civium utilitate conscripta.' And as laws should be, so should courts and the dispensers of laws be.

But, my Lord, if this court must be granted to be a court, yourselves can make no more of it than a Court, ex parte, and set up to serve a particular end, with the privation of the common utility and liberty, however ushered in with a preamble of another stile, of preservation of peace, and prevention of war: but Thucydides will tell you, my lord, in his fourth book, That

'Turpius est his qui impia tenent insidiare honesto prætextu, quam insidiosâ malevolentia uti; nam violentia videtur aliquid juris habere, propter potentiam à fortunâ datam, sed fraus tantum ab injustitia oritur.'

The Third Argument.

But, my Lord, if your lordship be in your judgment and conscience satisfied, that the Act itself, in and as to its constitution, is good and valuable, and empowereth you sufficiently to proceed against me some way; then 'Argumenti ergo duto, sed non juris ergo cesso,' that it is a Law, or an act, and that all those Ordinances are out of doors; yet I pray your lordship's leave that I may make evident to your lordship, that you are not hereby constituted a Court capable, in defect of the very letter of the act, to pass upon any man, and consequently not upon me, in matter of life, or where life may be the concernment.

1. For Reason, you are not constituted a Court of Record,* which is absolutely necessary, having life and forfeiture of lands in your charge.

First, For the State, that they may have an account, (not in their Council-Chamber, but upon Record) what is become of the matter in issue, and of the person put upon his Trial.

2. For the Freeman of England, that in case he be acquitted of the crime wherewith he shall stand charged before this Court, he might at all times resort to the Record, upon any new question for the same fact, in any other Court holding Pleas of that nature, by which Record to plead his auterfoys acquit, and to make his Defence, as also to preserve his estate, 'Si non legalement acquitte en le Poulterer's Case 9, R. Benegist demant acquittal nul req. 'si non de record,' as also my benefit, a writ of Conspiracy.

To come nearer our own times, the like cause to complain, and the same redress is given in the Act [17 Car. 1.] for abolishing of the Star-Chamber; upon the grounds and reasons drawn from these laws; the Innovations and invadings, upon which (as being fundamentals) was a great part of the substance of the grand Remonstrance, committed to the whole world against the late king by the press: the Charge† against the earl of Strafford, and the Archbishop of Canterbury.—The interest of the subject in these Laws was cried up to be so precious, as that it had influence even to the absolving of all old Oaths and the imposing of new, and to bring to adventure estate, and life, and soul, rather than to be usurped, or in the least intrenched upon.—Four several Declarations‡ of the present parliament have entitled the subject to them, and to the benefit of the ordinary Courts of Justice, as their birth-right. They have owned the preservation of them to be the cause of the war, and the ends of their affairs managed by their swords or councils; and God's curse is by them imprecated, in case they should ever decline the ends.

My lord; We have the Parliament's word and promise,§ not to interrupt the course of justice in the ordinary Courts. And in the Ordinance of Non-Addresses to the late king, they say, 'Though they lay the king aside, yet they will govern by the laws, and not interrupt the course of justice in the ordinary courts thereof.'

My lord; I am entitled to all these Laws, and these Promises and Declarations: and if this Court proceed against me, those notwithstanding, (the ordinary Courts of Justice being open and unobstructed) I am robbed, and divested of them all, and in me the Freemanry of England are all despoiled, at the parliament's will (according to this precedent) despoilable, and may with Mr. Stampford, in his Pleas of the Crown, take up this saying, it will serve for a lamentation, 'Misera servitus, est, ubi jus est vagum aut incognitum.'

Attorney-general Prideaux. Take heed you scandal not the Court.

The Fourth Argument.

Thomas Aquinas (who, though a Papist, is not the less worthy to be vouched, where not Religion, but policy, is the thing in question) saith, That 'lex est regula et mensura actuum agendorum vel omittendorum,' not 'Actorum and Omissorum.' And St. Paul says, Rom. vii. 7. 'Concupiscentiam nesciebam, nisi lex diceret non concupisces.'

My lord; your authority is in two several places to proceed against, as Traitors, such who have broken articles before they were made, viz. Whosoever hath, or shall plot, contrive, or endeavour, &c.

Whosoever Officer, &c. hath, or shall desert their trust, &c. shall die without mercy.

And thus, my Lord, the end of laws and law-making is perverted; which are not merely to punish offenders, but to prevent offences, which amongst Christian men was never otherwise done, but by way of promonition; by laws first interdictory, and then subpenatory.

The earl of Strafford did (and very reasonably) take it unkindly, and so expressed himself upon his Trial, that a neglected law should lie moulding amongst old parchments 200 years unused and unexercised, and be at last brought out to measure his last past actions by; or to use his own words, "To lie like a coal raked up in the ashes, to be at pleasure blown into a flame, and to make him and his family the first fuel to feed it." Truly if he had seen these Articles (as he felt after somewhat like them), he would have cried out, and but modestly enough, that it is not mending of the fault, but the destruction of the person, which is manifestly designed in these Articles of Retrospection.

Disusage of law, is some excuse for him who falls into a transgression; but the non-existence of a law is a justification of the greatest offence.

And, my lord, as you are to look backward to actions done before the law made, so you are to take cognizance of offenders against two former Acts, which make the crimes therein certain in the matters of fact, fault and punishment; and if they be laws, they must be deemed part of the laws of the land, and desirable and dispensable by the ordinary courts of the land, in cases criminal : for extraordinary courts of that kind, have long since (even by the Parliament, of which this is the surviving part) been denied.

And although it is true, that when some particular fact is committed by some one or more particular persons against the laws criminal, it often falls (and properly enough) that especial Commissions of Oyer and Terminer are for some urgent and expedient reason issued to try the matter and men ; yet those commissions do not restrain the commissioners to proceed only against those persons, and upon those particular crimes, which the common fame hath rendered hac vice, to be triable ; but run in general terms, and with general enablement to try all manner of Treasons, Felonies, &c.

And the Reason is, 1. For that it might possibly fall out, that a grand Jury will not find the bill against John a Stile ; and if not, the commissioners are sent down without their errand, if only directed to try J. S.

2. It may fall out, that where there are Treasons or Felonies committed by J. S. they may be accompanied with misprisions and misdemeanors in J. O. And if the particular crime of Treason, and the particular person of J. S. be only authorized to be enquired of, then the commissioners can do but half their work : and therefore this commissary power of yours, my lord (the ordinary courts being not obstructed, and you limited to particulars), is so far against the common law and usage, that it is against common and vulgar reason ; and (pardon that I must say it) savours more of a snare, than of a law ; and more of a warrant of arbitrary execution, than of an enablement, to and for a judicial and legal proceeding or trial.

The Fifth Argument.

My lord ; In all courts of justice, as there is supposed to be an equality intended to such as shall fall under their cognizance and inquiry, which is a principle of morality innate, as well as a practical policy ; so there have always in this nation, at least beyond memory, or indeed record to the contrary, been certain Oaths obligatory, and of indifference administered to persons either enquiring of, or passing judgment against, or upon the subjects in all cases whatsoever. And the same thing is but necessary in your lordships and this court to be done (if at all you will proceed in so weighty a matter as life), against which I make this exception.

1. If you are at all sworn, you are not sworn in conspectu ; and if you will be my Jury and my Judges also, I ought to have satisfaction that you are so sworn. Had you been only my Judges, and constituted after the ordinary manner, and to ordinary ends, I would have taken your being sworn for granted.

2. If you are sworn, and to no other words of Oath than what are comprized in the Act (which myself and all men else will easily believe you are not), then you are not sworn to any manner of equality.

The Words are, You (a) shall swear, that ' you shall well and truly, according to the best ' of your skill and knowledge, execute the several powers given unto you by this Act.'

I beseech your lordship, (b) that I may compare these words with the Oaths of Judges in England, when it was a kingdom.

The words pertinent are only these, ' You (c) ' shall swear, that well and lawfully you shall ' serve our lord the king, and his people in the ' office of justice, &c.

' And that you deny to no man common ' right, by the king's letters, or none other ' man's, nor for none other cause, &c.

' I (d) A. B. do swear, that I will do equal ' right, &c. according to my best wit, cunning ' and power, after the laws and customs of the ' land, and the statutes thereof made, &c.'

My lord, these will concern you as my Judges, to consider how little the stiles agree, and how far your Oath is in respect of these unobligatory, and consequently unsatisfactory, to the persons which are or shall be concerned.

1. As to the first, yours contains no such words of equality.

2. As to the second Oath, yours hath such words as skill and knowledge, holding some resemblance with those of wit, cunning and power. But, my lord, if your words were as well ushered, and as well paged as those, it were some satisfaction, viz. ' To do equal right, ' according, &c. After the laws and customs ' of the land, and the statutes thereof made.'

My Lord as you are my triers also, as well as my Judges, I beseech you to observe the Oath of a Juror, and the difference in sense (in letter, I know, for the dignity sake it ought to differ).

' You (e) shall well and truly try, and true deliverance make between our sovereign lord the ' King, and the prisoner at the bar, &c. I presume it is still the same (mutatis mutandis.)

Truly, my Lord, when I look upon your enablement to try the matters and persons, which, and whom you are to try : you have power to destroy, and not to save ; though to spare, yet not to acquit, or discharge ; and your obligation by Oath to execute that power, according to your best skill and knowledge. I must needs say, and it is apparent, that when you have destroyed me, you have discharged all the duty that man can exact from you (though God will have a better reckoning), and instead of being tried by sworn Jurors, and adjudged by sworn justices, myself and all who are or may fall into my condition, are to be tried by our sworn adversants, I might have said sworn enemies : and we cannot in reason expect more justice, than when the son lays the wager, the mother keeps stakes, and the father is judge, in a point of controversy. More and better you may do, more or better we cannot by any light of reason expect.

(d) Dalton's Justice of Peace, fol. 13.

(e) Oath of a Juror.

The Sixth Argument.

But, my Lord, if all this be but a wind against a rock, and move you to no declining of the exercise of your power, though against my right; yet certainly, my Lord, where your power and my right may be consistent, you will not stretch your power to the taking away my right; but rather by giving me my right, magnify your power.

This I may reasonably expect. It is my right (granting you to be my judges), to be tried by my peers, the good men of my neighbourhood, and it is in your power (if your power be not inward), to try me so.

That this is my right, I must revisit (f) Magna Charta, 'Nisi per legale iudicium parium suorum.'

The law of Ed. 1. having confirmed the great Charter, (g) saith, 'And we will, that if any judgment hereafter be given contrary to the points of the Charter aforesaid, by the justices, or by any other our ministers that hold plea before them against the points of the Charter, it shall be undone and holden for nought.' And upon this very Law or Clause, a writ of error was brought by the (h) earl of Lancaster, for the misattainder of his brother, whose heir he was; and in that the points were two, and upon them both, judgment given for a reversal.

Attinctus.

2. Quod condemnatus sive adjudicatus fuit absque araniamento seu responsione, seu legali iudicio parium, contra legem, et contra tenorem Magnae Chartae.

The like reversals, and upon the like reasons, have been had, In the (i) count de Arundel's case. In sir John of Lee's Case, It is provided, That no man from thenceforth should be attached by any accusation, nor forejudged of life, nor of limb, nor his lands, &c. against the form of the great Charter, and the law of the land. (k)

My Lord; Our fathers saw a Parliament (and reaped the blessing of it), which was called Benedictum Parliamentum (which hath circumscribed the loose interpreters of treasons to a standard, and not left it to be individuum vagum); and there it is said, that persons guilty of High-Treason (and my charge is not for less) must be provably attaint of open deed, by people of their own condition.—And again it is accorded, assented and established, that from henceforth none shall be taken by petition, or suggestion made to the king, or his council, unless it be by indictment, or presentment of his good and lawful people of his neighbourhood where such deeds be done, in due manner, or by process made by writ original at the common law; Nor (l) that none be ousted of his franchises, or of his freehold, unless he be duly brought to answer, and fore-judged of the same by the course of law; and if any thing be done against the same, it shall be redressed, and holden for none.—It is assented and established (for the good governance of the Commons), that no man be put to answer without presentment before Justices, or matter of record, or by due process and writ original, according to the old law of the land; and if any thing from henceforth be done contrary, it shall be void in law, and holden for error.

My Lord; That it is my right to be tried by a Jury of twelve men de vicinato, is evident; and it is as evident, that if you otherwise proceed with me (if law were not out of fashion), you would but weave Penelope's web, and one day's judgment would be unraveled by the next day's writ of error.

But after-games for life are dangerous; and for estate, I have no great cause to be solicitous: but my right is my duty to preserve, as in relation to myself, and my honour to keep it if it may be, from being in my precedent taken also from my countrymen, the Freemen (if any such be now) of England, who have equal reason, though they may be wanting (some of them) of the same reasons wherewith to defend it.

That your Lordship may proceed by Jury, for aught is said, or contained in your Act to the contrary;

1. I pray consider the before-recited laws are all unrepealed; and therefore if this law intend to oppose those laws, it should have repealed them, or at least have afforded a slight Non-obstante, or have given the subject the comfort of a hac vice tantum, that we might not have thought ourselves robbed of all, but only plundered of a part of our right for necessity and experience sake, or at least have given us the favour of the earl of Strafford's Act, that it should never be drawn into example: but I am sure in this Act, that proceeding against him is super-exampled.

2. I desire you would consider your qualification; you are made commissioners, and that of Oyer and Terminer, and those are not proceeders in their own proper, natural and habitual constitution and practices, upon and according to their own judgments in matters of fact: you are in these words, viz.

Required to hear and determine, &c. constituted Commissioners of Oyer and Terminer.

3. You are authorised to proceed to Trial, condemnation and execution, &c. but you are not restrained to the manner of such proceedings to Trial exclusively, as to trial per pares, but left to do the manner of the Trial, as well as the judgment or execution, as you, or the major part of you, or twelve of you shall judge to appertain to justice: And if such major part shall think fit to proceed by presentment and Jury, doubtless such your proceeding is no Premunire against the power given you by the Act; but it is justifiable to fall within the letter of the Act, and that without a strained construction.

4. And if when you may lawfully (I mean by your own law, if argumenti ergo, it be granted a law) try me by a jury, and will not; then, my lord, pardon me, that I must aver, that you take from me, and in me from the commonalty of England; three great privileges, franchise and rights; to which I and they are, by the known, ancient, and unabrogated, unrepealed, and constantly practised laws, entitled; which will be neither equitable nor honourable for you to do.

1. You take away the benefit of Challenge, which I might make to a jury or jurors.

And that is contrary to my right, which is given me by the (m) Common Law, in favorem vite, to challenge in case of High-Treason, for I go to no less) thirty-five peremptorily, and for reason of challenge sans number.

This was judged in 32 Hen. 6, abridged by* Fitz-Herbert, fol. 26, per challeng. where eight Jurors were sworn, and the rest challenged, a new return made; and those eight returned, and though formerly allowed and sworn, yet challenged, and adjudged good.

The like allowed in Hil. 1 Jac. in the Cases of sir Walter Raleigh and Brook.

If this benefit were allowed me, my Lord, to except or challenge the whole Court, who are in number and quality my Triers, as a Jury are, I should not need to be peremptory in my challenge, being furnished with abundant reason.

[Here he was interrupted by Keeble, who said, those Statutes and Cases were out of date now.]

My lord; A jury of Middlesex will be no more nor less, if what I am accused of, to have endeavoured, should take effect; and therefore are not less concerned: I cannot say the same of the Court (or if I should, I should not be believed,) and he that but whispers against Diana at Ephesus, makes all the craftsmen his enemies.

2. The second benefit and right, which by denying me a Trial per pares, you take from me, is the benefit of seeing, hearing, and counterquestioning the witnesses produced against me; which, in such way of trials, ought to be viva voce.

That such is the law,† Mr. Stamford avereth in his Pleas of the Crown. And,

* Poyning's Case.

† Stam. P. C. fol. 163, 164, Stat. Philip and Mary 1, and 2 cap. 10.

In Treason, two sufficient witnesses by the Statute of Edw. 6, are requisite; sufficient in relation to their quality, and to the fulness of their testimony.

Sir Edward Coke 3 Inst. f. 12. (an Author as authentic as any) put this for law in his expositions of the words in the Statutes for Treason, 'Provablyment attain'; because the punishment was great, the proof should be punctual; not upon presumptions or inferences, or strains of wit, but upon good and sufficient proofs. And this he makes good by the authority of † Stamford, and the several statutes of Philip and Mary, and of queen Elizabeth, and of Edw. 6.—Now, my lord, an evidence either taken in writing, as the person will voluntarily give it, or cautiously taken as the examiner will ask it (who is not sworn to take it indifferently, no more than the framers of the questions are to propound them fairly,) may be a seeming fair, apposite, and a full testimony; or concerning the person giving testimony, or concerning the modus, the ubi, the quando, &c. the whole laid together may prove either nothing, or a malicious thing.‡—The case of sir Thomas More, Lord Chancellor, accused for bribery, is common; and I hope, if mine have fair play, it will prove no worse.

3. The third and last right and privilege you take from me, is the main of all the rest, and to the making of which (as it should be made up) all the rest are but conducing, and leading; that is, of a fair Verdict.

My Lord; By a Jury a verdict passeth from all, or not at all; and one knowing and conscientious man may preserve that innocent man, whom eleven either ignorant or careless men would destroy. This Court's sentence is to be stated by number of voices, and some of them possibly not judging their own judgments, but concurring where their opinion of another's judgment shall lead them; which, as it was the great evil of the late court of Star-Chamber, so wheresoever it is used (in Trials of life especially) it is and can be no other than an evil.

My lord; By and from a Jury a verdict passeth before their discharge upon their necessary affairs, nay affairs of nature; and therefore they will give it both the righter, because their evidence is fresh in memory, without the intervention of other matters, as also for that they are without opportunity to be perverted by money or friendship. If this Court receive the evidence to-day, they may at any time (before the 29th of September next) give their sentence; for vere-dictum I never expect but from a Jury: and in the mean time, how much their own affairs may put the remembrance of me out of their heads, and how much the State's power may put my safety out of their hearts, I have just cause to suspect. For, fear I will not, being resolved never to be in love with that life which the Common Law of England cannot protect; and had rather die the Law's Martyr, than live the State's Slave.

The Close.

My lord; I have said; and now it only remains that I tell your lordship, that I desire you to take into consideration what I have said; and that you would not suddenly, but deliberately give your judgment, whether I ought to plead before you as judges, and to the charge in the Articles, and not in a Presentment or Indictment? Whether to be tried without a Jury, and condemned upon evidence unseen? Which this is, and I desire it may be recorded. As I do not now wilfully refuse to plead or answer, but offer my reasons for the suspension of my Plea, until your judgment in the points be known and pronounced; so, if I be in them over-ruled, I shall then give such Answer to the Charge, as shall become a man in my condition.

Fiat voluntas Dei, modo in ruinâ meâ.

EUS. ANDREWE.

3. 7. 2. 1650.

Here the Attorney-General Prideaux put a stop to Mr. Andrewes, telling him, that the Court was not at leisure to take notice of those Law-Cases, but of his confession; 'That he had an affection to act, though nothing acted, was sufficient Treason, and for that affection he deserved death.' And thereupon the Court pronounced Sentence against him, That he should be hanged, drawn and quartered: but on his Petition to the Parliament, an Act passed authorizing Commissioners of the High Court of Justice to issue their warrant for the beheading him according to his Petition.

Col. Andrewes. If I be over-ruled by the Court, that I must either answer or be sentenced for my wilfulness: then I move that I may have a copy of my Charge, and a day assigned me to deliver my Answer under my hand. Upon these Reasons: 1. If the Court proceed upon Articles, they cannot in reason conceive that I can plead the general issue to particulars; for in so doing, in case I be convinced of any one Article, I shall receive the doom of all. 2. For that de facto some of the Articles may be true, yet de modo they may not be available against me; and upon the general issue, I shall not be received to qualify fact with circumstance, and so instead of being allowed the freedom of my defence, which is allowed to every thief in Newgate, I shall be tried and snared by such confession or proof, as will serve the turn of my prosecutors, and not preserve myself, by making myself and actions understood.

The Articles are of several kinds and crimes; and as one single Plea will not be applicable to them all, so it is but requisite that I have a copy of them, to give thereby to each one its proper Answer; which though in Indictments is not allowed, yet in this way of proceeding was never denied in the most arbitrary courts. The Council-Table gave a Charge, and received Answer in writing, in cases of Contempt against themselves or commands. The Star-Chamber afforded the Defendant a Copy of the Bill, and liberty to examine and cross-examine witnesses, in case the fact charged were denied by the Answer. The High-Commission the like, by their Articles and Proceedings upon them. My Answer, if not in writing, may either not be understood, or mis-apprehended, or mis-set down by the Clerk to my prejudice.

If this be denied me, then I must conclude that they intend to wipe off my head, with the smooth-glazed sword of pretended justice; and must apply myself to my memory, in reference to the Charge, and shall hear it read, which by my own knowledge of what has passed between the State and me, I may conjecture; and therefore prepare these following Heads to help my memory, which in a case of so much concernment, is not totally to be relied upon.

First, As to what may be alledged against me in general terms, as a disaffected person, an oppugner of the State, or otherwise, &c. There are two things which draw subjection, and oblige persons to a commonwealth. 1. Protection in the State. 2. Personal engagement, or fealty in the subject.

(1.) Protection I have received none, but stand in the condition of a proscribed person. 1. Estate (if any) sequestrable, and not permitted by the laws of the nation to vindicate it. 2. Calling taken away, which the Turk would not have done, had he been conqueror. 3. Dwelling not permitted where I can subsist, but where I may be obnoxious to want, and to the State's infliction of punishment, when they shall take occasion to repeat upon me any thing they shall call a crime, in reference to my past actions for the late king and my sovereign. 4. Right I can have none, unless I will damn my soul to preserve my estate, or repair my wrong by a contra-legal and contra-evangelical engagement.

This was sufficient reason, owned and justified by the Parliament, for their subtraction of obedience, ἡ βασιλεὺς ἡ προσημασμένης λαόν, by their Declarations and Ordinances*.

(2) Fealty or personal engagement, I have given none, viz. 1. I have not taken the Protestation of May, 1642. 2. I have not taken the solemn Oath and Covenant; yet if I had, I might have justified my actions by them. 3. I have not taken the Negative Oath, because my Oath of Allegiance (from which no man can absolve me) is a negative to that, &c. 4. I have not taken the present Engagement, much more against my Oath of Allegiance than the Negative Oath.—If I had had so little conscience as to have taken them, I would have had so much as to have kept them; and the State cannot in reason expect from me, or any other, that we should take a second, when we see no conscience made of keeping the first; nor to take a third, the first and second being broken, without other dispensation than power, which, like Alexander's sword, cuts the Gordian knot which it cannot untie.—Neither hath any man assurance, if he should take the last Engagement, that he should have liberty to keep it longer than the fancy of the State held to the now new fashion of government.—And therefore I stand clear as a down-right subject of England, to stand or fall by the Common Laws of England; and if they will deny me that, they deny my Birth-right, which is equally righteous, and no more just, than to deny me my estate, my calling, my abode, my means of right.

Secondly, As to my Action at Linton, I justify myself, 1. By the late King's Commission, which my accuser knows I had, and under which he was by the same king constituted my major. 2. What was done, was so done, when he who gave me the commission was in being, and oppressed by injurious imprisonment; and what I did, was in order to his enlargement from his thralldom, and restoration to his lawful power; which was that to which my duty as a subject, by my Oath of Allegiance did bind me in general terms, and the duty of my qualification laid me under a particular obligation*.—It was done before the now reputed Parliament were, or pretended to be the supreme authority of the nation, or had assumed the power of government, or were framed into a state: and consequently I am not answerable to them for any opposition to them, further than the common law binds to Parliaments without their head and hand, or defective in their members; and as to such offence (if it be one) this Court is not qualified to take any cognizance.

Thirdly, As to the design concerning the surprise of the isle of Ely, it was but a bare discourse or communication, and no formal design laid, agreed unto, nor person engaged in it, so much as by promise. And in cases of Conspiracy against the lives of kings, there were some statutes made, that very words and communications should be reputed Treason; but all repealed or expired, and not thought fit by wisdom of law-makers (having indisputable power to make laws) to be revived since the days of queen Mary, notwithstanding those very many Treasons hatched and designed against queen Elizabeth, and king James, &c. If, in the highest point of Treason, communication be not Treason against lawful princes, certainly an affection, where the offence (such as it is) is of a far inferior nature of itself, so it had a far inferior object, or subject, concerning whom such discourse was holden.

Fourthly, As to my supposed corresponding with the king, the lord Hopton and the earl of Cleveland (if true) it was so long since, as that it falls not within compass of this Court's commission to try, being confined to infant matters of a year old, and my Charge not exhibited to the Court of Justice before Monday the 15th of July. My last letter, received from lord Hopton, bears date at the Hague, 18th or 28th of June, and was received in two days into Sussex.

Fifthly, As to the drawing, signing, or sealing of the Engagement, it consists of several branches. That, de facto, I did it, and must not deny it, because I have confessed it, which was more than needed to them who knew it without enquiry; for I dare aver, that they had their instrument by them employed and cherished in betraying me to it; and have some years past had a man in my bosom to watch me and my motions, which I did affirm to the Lord President, and he not denied it, but said, it was no more than did become any state to do, who had so much cause to hold an active man in suspect, as they had me, having never come in and laid down the cudgels, but held to my principles, and was ready upon every occasion to take fire.

And this I will prove, if I have legal, or (because that word is worn out of use) fair dealing from the Court. And out of that I may justly infer, what will be visible enough, that it is the State's act, and but my consent, and they in no danger of me, but that I should preserve myself from their new laws; into the lapse of which I was not otherwise, or by any other action, fallen.

As to the parts of it: 1. It consists of an Oath of Secrecy. 2. An owning of King Charles II to be such. 3. A Resolution to endeavour to make him such. 4. A crimination of the State, under the names of Rebels and Opposers, who would not have him to be such. To these, as they are ranked, 1. The Oath of Secrecy hath relation only as to the not discovering the co-engagers in that resolution, and the resolution itself being not treason, the oath of keeping secret that resolution is not greater than the thing resolved. 1. The thing resolved was to endeavour, but not an actual endeavouring. 2. If it were an actual endeavouring, yet it can only be supposed that it must be endeavoured by a war to be levied; and the endeavour to levy a war never actually levied, is not treason against the king, against whom only, and his relations, by our old laws, which are laws, a treason can be committed; and party treason, I am not accused for. That a bare intention, resolution, or engagement, to levy a war is not treason, I refer myself to my lord Coke, 3 Inst. fol. 14 and 38, who tells us (and he is a man of credit) in his book (printed and allowed for law by the houses, when they were two) that a conspiracy (and this Engagement amounts not to so much, but rather to an intention only to conspire) to raise a war (as hath been said, and so resolved) is no treason by the act of Edw. 3, until the war levied, as within, or to be reached by those words in that law (Overt Act); and if it were not Treason in those words in the original, it falls not within the words of the translation of this new-born law, viz. by any open deed. As to the first and third branches of the Engagement, which are interwoven, I conclude that neither of them, that is to say, neither the Oath nor the Resolution, are Treasons, either within the old or the new laws, either in respect of the persons against whom, or the progress made in the thing itself.

2. As to the owning of Charles 2, it falls not within your law; for that it is not a publishing, proclaiming, or publicly declaring his title. The words of the act are, 'proclaim, declare, publish, or any way promote,' which promoting is matter of action more than a private owning. And this by the oath itself was not to be published, nor could, without publishing the engagement itself, which was contrary to the oath.

And though it may be objected, that the raising the war could not be done, but by publishing his Title, and the Engagement at last; yet that, if it be granted, was no forwarder than an intendment; no more was this publishing, and being not done, falls not within your act.

The crimination of the State is but guessed at by implication (for they are not named) to be meant, and I believe your law reaches only to things literal, and not constructive only; and for the word Rebels, I hope they will not take that to themselves, and the word Opposers is a very innocent expression, and at the worst is all but a scandal.

Lastly, Be this Engagement what it will, yet the terms upon which I signed and sealed it were such, as that it was my act not absolute, but upon condition, and to be undone and avoided, in case of the non-co-engaging of others, by the State's decoy assured to be ready to do it, and at whose instance and for whose satisfaction it was pretended to be desired at my hands.

If the Court proceeds by way of Indictment, then I shall move, that those persons may be confronted, whom, in my Narrative, Examinations, and Letters, I have named, and that I may demand of them, &c. As also, that major Parker may be produced, to be likewise demanded of, as a person by me lately, and since my papers sent to the State, discovered to be of the plot to betray me.

If the Court proceed by way of Articles, and upon Examinations taken against me, I desire, and that is but reason, that I may examine my Defence, as in all Courts, where such proceedings were used, was allowed. If it be objected, That it was not used in cases of Treason, I answer, it is true; if they hold the ancient way of Trials, not; but if they proceed this way, it is but just; and otherwise the Court are at liberty to use all means, public or private, to catch me; but I have none to defend myself: so that it appears that they seek not to do justice, but execution.

And whether they be confronted or examined, these questions are to be propounded, either viva voce, or by Interrogatory; and if by Interrogatory, I must stand upon a fair way of examination, viz. That some one from me, as well as one for the State's behalf, may be present, and set down the Examinations or Depositions; and that I may have a copy of them, as well against me, as for me, as well taken already by the State, or to be taken upon my motion.

The Questions.

1. Whether he knows major Barnard, how long? &c. What communication and correspondence concerning me, or my actions held between them? Whether he knew of the supposed design against the isle of Ely, and of the late Engagement? How he knew them, and upon what reason, and to what end discovered to him, and by whom?

2. Whether he did inform the state (or any member of the council) of them, and how long he hath so informed?

3. Whether he ever had in his custody the Engagement under the hands and seals, and my letter to sir John Gell? If so, where, and whether not at Gravesend at my being there? Whether he were sent to watch me, and knew of my being there, before my being apprehended?

The same questions, mutatis mutandis, to be propounded to Barnard; and farther to him, and to Benson, Holmes, Ashley, Smith, as they are marked.

4. Whether he did propound in both designs to me, or I to him? Whether I sought him, or he me? In what disposition he found me, upon the time by the Act limited for departure? &c.

5. Whether he were real to me in the particulars of persons, confederates, or money, ready to engage and to be advanced; and if not, then to what end he feigned these to me?

6. Whether the letters by him to me produced from Smith, and Thatch or Thatcher, were true, or feigned; and if feigned, to what end, and by whom set on work?

7. Whether he were set upon me, to watch my ways and motions? And whether he were not promised, or did design unto himself profit for the discovering of me, and such whom I should bring in?

8. Whether I framed, or ever read the said supposed design? Or was to be de futuro acquainted with it?

9. Whether he brought, or I sought Benson, or Holmes? And whether confederates with him, or designed upon him?

10. Whether my engagement were absolute, or conditional, and what I signified at my departure, and upon Barnard's not coming; and where Barnard was pretended to be, and where he really was? What promise I had concerning the return of my engagement, in case sir John Gell did not engage at Gravesend?

11. Whether copies of letters weekly shewed to me were real or feigned? And if feigned, why pretended to be real?

12. Whether there were really any Kentish, Dorset, or Buckinghamshire men, and who, confederates? &c.

These preparations formerly made in rough Notes, were transcribed and put into form, and finished the 8th day of July, 1650, by God's good assistance; notwithstanding my abundant disadvantages of close imprisonment, and want of books, or advice; and I commit and submit the issue to God, whom I beseech to fortify my spirit, and enlarge my understanding, when they shall come to be made use of; myself resolving to be the law's confessor while I live, and (if called to it) to be the law's martyr, when I die by the hand of the impending violence, under the specious name of justice.

Eus. ANDREWE.—8. 7. 2. 1650. Domini.

His Exceptions to his Triers.

John Hurst, esq. a man who hath had his hand in blood, viz. Mr. Martin Hazelrigge in a duel, for which arraigned, &c.

A person trying, viz. a Juror, and in this way of Trial he is such, ought to be a freeman, viz. not in person, but in his pre-judging opinion; which he is not, having published that the Respondent was the greatest Traitor in England, and that there was enough under his hand to hang him the Respondent.

Sir William Roe, captain John Stone, two of my Triers, were employed to examine the Respondent, on the 2nd of July, 1650, and brought with them all the evidence against him; and therefore in their capacity of my Triers, by the rule in challenges, they are challengeable, and incapable to sit.

But no regard was had to any of his Exceptions, or any Answer returned to his questions; and he was ordered to be beheaded.

The last SPEECH of Col. EUSEBIUS ANDREWE, on the Scaffold on Tower-hill, August 22, 1650.

The Lieutenant of the Tower delivering the Colonel to the Sheriff, said, He had brought him thus far on his journey. The Colonel replied, I hope I shall neither tire in the way, nor go out of it. When he came on the Scaffold (kissing the block) he said, I hope there is no more but this block between me and heaven. After he had been some while on the Scaffold, he spake to the people as followeth:

Colonel Andrew. Christian Gentlemen and good People; Your business here this day is to see a sad spectacle, a man brought in a moment to be unmanned, cut off in the prime of his years, taken from further opportunity of doing service to himself, his friends, the Commonwealth, or especially to God. It seldom happens but upon very great cause; and though, truly, if my general known course of life were enquired into, I may modestly say, there is such a moral honesty, as some may be so forward as to expostulate, why this great judgment is fallen upon me? But know, I am able to give them and myself an answer; and out of this breast, to give a better account of my judgment and execution, than my judges themselves, or you are able to give. It is God's just displeasure towards me, for my sins long unrepented of; many judgments withstood, and mercies slighted; therefore doth my gracious Father chastise me with this correction, that he may not lose me; and I pray you assist me with your prayers, that this rod may not be fruitless: that when under his rod I have laid down my life, by his staff I may be comforted, and received into glory.

I am very confident, by what I have heard since my sentence, there are more exceptions made against the proceedings against me, than ever I made; my Triers had a law, and the validity of that law is indisputable for me to say against it, or to make a question of it; I should but shame myself and my discretion. In the strictness of the law, something is done by me, that is applicable to some clause therein, by which I stand condemned; the means by which I was brought under that interpretation, of that which was not in myself intended maliciously, being testimony given by persons whom I pity, so false, yet so positive, that I cannot condemn my judges for passing sentence against me according to legal justice; for equity lies in higher breasts. For my accusers, or rather betrayers, I pity, and am sorry for them; they have committed Judas's crime, I wish and pray for them St. Peter's tears; and I wish other people so happy, they may be taken up betimes, before they have drunk more blood of Christian men, possibly, less deserving than myself.

It is true, there have been several addresses made for mercy, and I will lay the obstructions to nothing more than my own sins; and seeing God sees it fit, (I having not glorified him in my life) I shall do it in my death, I am content.

I profess, in the face of God, particular malice to any one of the state or parliament, to do them a personal injury, I had never; for the cause in which I had a great while waded, I must say, my engagements and pursuance in it, hath laid no scruple upon my conscience; it was upon principles of law, whereof I am a professor, and upon principles of religion, my judgment rectified, and my conscience satisfied, that I have pursued these ways; for which, I bless God, I find no blackness upon my conscience, nor have I put this into the bead-roll of my sins.

I presume not to decide controversies, I desire God to glorify himself in prospering that side that hath right with it, and that you may enjoy peace and plenty here, when I shall enjoy my God.

In my conversation in the world, I do not know where I have an enemy with cause, or that there is a person to whom I have regret; but if there be any whom I cannot recollect, under the notion of Christian men, I pardon them as freely as if I had named them; yea, I forgive all the world, as I desire my heavenly Father for his Christ's sake to forgive me.

For the business of death, it is a sad sentence in itself, if men consult with flesh and blood: But, truly, without boasting I say it, or if I do boast, it is in the Lord, I have not to this minute had one consultation with flesh about the blow of the ax, or one thought of it, more than my passport to glory.

I take it as an honour, and I owe a thankfulness to those under whose power I am, that they have sent me hither to a place, however of punishment, yet of some honour, to die a death somewhat worthy my blood; and this courtesy of theirs hath much helped towards the satisfaction of my mind.

I shall desire God, that those gentlemen in that sad bead-roll to be tried by the High Court of Justice, that they may find that really there, that is nominal in the Act, 'An High Court of Justice, or Court of High Justice;' high in its righteousness, not in its severity: no more clouded with the testimony of folks that sell blood for gain. Father, forgive them, and I forgive them as I desire thee to forgive me.

I desire you now to pray for me, and not give over praying until my last moment; that as I have a very great load of sins, so I may have the wings of your prayers assisting those angels that shall convey my soul to Heaven. And I doubt not but I shall there see my blessed Saviour, and my gallant master the king of England, and another master which I much honour, my lord Capel; hoping this day to see Christ in the presence of the Father, the king in the presence of him, my lord Capel in the presence of them all, and myself with them, and all Saints, to rejoice for evermore.

Dr. Swadling. You have this morning, in the presence of a few, given some account of your Religion, and under general notions of words, have given account of your Faith, Charity and Repentance: (then speaking to the standers-by) if you please to hear the same questions asked here, you shall, that it may be a general testimony to you all, that he dieth in the favour of God.

(To the Colonel.) Now, Sir, I begin to deal with you; you do acknowledge, that this stroke you are by and by to suffer, is a just punishment laid upon you by God for your former sins.

Col. Andrew. I dare not only not deny it, but dare not but confess it. I have no opportunity of glorifying God more, than by taking shame to myself; and I have a reason of justice for justifying God in my own bosom, which I have intrusted to yours.

Dr. You acknowledge you deserve more than this stroke of the axe, and that a far greater misery is due to you, even the pains and torments of hell, that the damned there endure.

Col. I know it is due in righteous judgment; but I know again, I have a satisfaction made by my elder brother Christ Jesus, and then I say it is not due; it is due from me, but acquitted by his mediation.

Dr. Do you believe to be saved by that mediation, and no other?

Col. By that, and that only, renouncing all secondary causes.

Dr. Are you truly and unfeignedly sorry before God, as you appear to us, for all these sins that have brought you hither?

Col. I am sorry, and can never be sorrowful enough, and am sorry that I cannot be more sorry.

Dr. If God should by a miracle, not to put you to a vain hope, but if God should, as he did to Hezekiah, renew your days, what life do you resolve to lead hereafter?

Col. It is a question of great length, requires a great time to answer; men in such streights would promise great things; but I would first call some friends to limit how far I should make a vow, that I should not make a rash one, and so offer the sacrifice of fools: but a vow I would make, and by God's help endeavour to keep it.

Dr. Do you wish health and happiness upon all lawful authority and government.

Col. I do prize all obedience to lawful government, and the adventuring against them is sinful; and I do not justify myself, whatever my judgment be, for my thus venturing against the present government; I leave it to God to judge whether it be righteous; if it be, it must stand.

Dr. Are you now in love and charity with all men? Do you freely forgive them?

Col. With all the world freely; and the Lord forgive them, and forgive me, as I freely forgive them.

Dr. You have for some late years laid down the gown, and took up the sword, and you were a man of note in these parts where you had your residence; I have nothing to accuse you for want of diligence in hindering the doing of injuries; yet possibly there might be some wrong done by your officers, or those under you, to some particular men; if you had your estate in your hands, would you make restitution.

Col. The wrongs themselves you bring to my mind are not great nor many; some things of no great moment; but such as they are, my desire is to make restitution, but have not wherewithal.

Dr. If you had ability, you would likewise leave a legacy of thankfulness to Almighty God; something to his poor servants, to his lame members, to his deaf members, to his dumb members.

Col. My will hath been always better than my ability that way.

Dr. Sir, I shall trouble you very little farther; I thank you for all those heavenly Colloquies I have enjoyed by being in your company these three days: and truly I am very sorry I must part with so heavenly an associate: we have known one another heretofore, but never to Christianity before; I have rather been a scholar to learn from you, than an instructor. I wish this stage whereon you are made a spectacle to God, angels and the world, may be a school to all about you; for though I will not diminish your sins, nor shall conceal or hypocrite my own, for they are great ones between God and myself; but I think there are few here have a lighter load upon them than you have, if we consider things well, and I only wish them your repentance, and that measure of faith God hath given you, and that measure of courage you have attained from God, and that constant perseverance God hath crowned you hitherto with.—Col. His name be praised!

“One thing more I desire to be clear in; there lieth a common imputation upon the cavaliers, that they are papists, and under that name we are made odious to those of the contrary opinion. I am not a papist, but renounce the pope with all his dependencies. When the distractions in religion first sprung up, I might have been thought apt to turn off from this church to the Romish, but was utterly unsatisfied in their doctrine in point of faith, and very much as to their discipline. The religion I profess, is that which passeth under the name of Protestant, though that be rather a name of distinction, than properly essential to religion: but that Religion found out in the Reformation, purged from all the errors of Rome, in the reign of Edw. 6, practised in the reign of queen Elizabeth, king James, and king Charles, that blessed prince deceased; that religion, before it was defaced, I am of, which I take to be Christ's catholic, though not the Roman catholic religion.

“Then he turned himself to the Executioner: I have no reason to quarrel with thee; thou art not the hand that throws the stone: I am not of such estate to be liberal, but here is 3/. for thee, which is all I have; now tell me what I lack?”

Executioner. Your hair to be turned up.

Col. Shew me how to fit myself for the block.

After which, his doublet off, his hair turned up, he turned himself about to the people, and prayed a good while. Before he lay down to the block, he spake to the people as followeth:

“There is none that looks upon me, though many faces, and perhaps different from me in opinion and practice, but hath something of pity in it; and may that merry that is in your hearts, fall into your own bosoms when you have need of it: and may you never find such a block of sin to stand in the way of your mercy as I have met with.

“I beseech you join with me in prayer.” Then he prayed, leaning on the scaffold, half a quarter of an hour. Having done, he had some private conference with Dr. Swadling; then he taking his leave of the sheriff and his friends, kissing them, and saluting him next him, he prepared himself for the block, kneeling down, said, let me try the block; which he did. After casting his eyes, and fixing them very intently above, he said, when I say, ‘Lord Jesus receive me,’ Executioner then do thy office.” Then kissing the axe, he lay down, and with as much undaunted, yet Christian courage as possibly could be in man, did he expose his throat to the fatal axe, his life to the executioner, and commended his soul into the hands of God, as into the hands of a faithful and merciful creator, through the meritorious passion of a gracious redeemer. Saying the fore-mentioned words, his head was stricken off at one blow. He died very resolutely.*

* Mr. Whitlocke in his Memorials, page 473, says, “The High Court of Justice (afterwards) proceeded against sir John Gell, and he was sentenced by the High Court, for Misprision of High-Treason, to forfeit his estate, and to be imprisoned during his life. Page 474. Capt. Ashley was sentenced by the High Court of Justice to have his head cut off, and one Benson to be hanged, for conspiring against the Commonwealth, in the treasonable engagement of col. Andrewe. Mr. Benson was executed at Tyburn (the 7th of October 1650,) according to the sentence of the High Court of Justice; but in regard that capt. Ashley only subscribed the Engagement, but acted nothing in it, he was pardoned by the parliament.”

188. The Trial of Mr. CHRISTOPHER LOVE,* before the High Court of Justice; for High Treason: 3 CHARLES II. A. D. 1651.* [Published by John Farthing, Citizen of London, who took the Trial in the said Court for Mr. Love, and at his own Request.]

THE Court being set, and called over, the Lieutenant of the Tower was commanded to bring forth his Prisoner: And master Love was brought to the bar. After the reading of divers late Acts of Parliament concerning Treason, master Prideaux, the Attorney-General for the Commonwealth, spake as followeth:

* Oldmixon gives a short, petulant and false account of this Trial. Neal, in his History of the Puritans is more correct.

"The English Presbyterians," says Kennett, "had been startled at the murder of the king, and more disturbed at the prevalence of an independent faction in the army. Under these grievances and jealousies, they leaned much toward hopes and help from their Scotch brethren, and for their sakes were inclined for the restoration of the king as in covenant with them. This zeal for their own cause carried many of the Presbyterian ministers in London into a correspondence with the kirk, and so into a plot for the king, distinguished by the name of the Prebyterian Plot. This was soon discovered by the vigilancy of the government, and by the forwardness of the men concerned: so Mr. Love, Mr. Jenkins, Mr. Drake, very eminent Presbyterian divines, were seized by order of the council of state, and in order to their trial, were on May 7, brought before the high court of justice; and Mr. Love was first charged with high treason against the state and commonwealth of England, for holding correspondence with the king and his party, and supplying them with arms and money, contrary to an act of parliament in that case provided. He at first disputed the authority of the court, and then insisted upon his own merits in promoting the cause of the parliament; and terrified Mr. Jackson a minister from giving in evidence against him: for which obstinate refusal he was fined by the court 500*l.* and committed to the Fleet. At another appearance, June 25, he did at last confess, that the conspirators met at his house for furthering the Scots designs; and that letters were received, and answers were sent from thence; but equivocated in excuses, that he did not do it himself, and that he did not personally act any thing, &c. In short though he had Mr. Matt. Hale for an advocate, and the whole party for solicitors, on July 5, he received sentence to be beheaded; and the day of execution was appointed on the 15th. Before the day, very fervent petitions were presented from himself and his friends, to the parliament, for pardon of his life; which, on long debate, passed in the negative. And on the very day appointed for execution, several

Attorney-General. My lord, you have heard several Acts of Parliament read, and the offences therein mentioned. My lord, I have here a Charge against Mr. Love, the Prisoner at the bar; and I humbly desire that it may be read. And you may please to take his answer to it, whether by confession or otherwise.

ministers in and about London came with a most importunate petition to the house, praying earnestly, and "in the bowels of Jesus Christ, who when we were sinners died for us, if not totally to spare the life of our dear brother; that yet you would say of him, as Solomon of Abiathar, that at this time he shall not be put to death." Upon which the parliament granted him a reprieve for one month. Within this time, all possible solicitations were used to the men in power; and particular application was made to Cromwell, then in Scotland, who sent back a letter of his free consent to the pardon of him: but the post-boy being seized by some cavaliers, they searched his packet, and with special indignation tore the letter relating to Mr. Love, as thinking him not worthy to live who had been such a firebrand in the treaty at Uxbridge.

"The Council of State and leaders in the parliament bearing nothing from Cromwell, and not finding the ingenuous discovery and humble submission which they expected from Mr. Love (after the condemnation of two other of his accomplices, Mr. Potter and Mr. Gibbons) they vacated his reprieve, and recommitted him to the High Court of Justice, by whose order he was executed on Tower-Hill with Mr. Gibbons on Aug. 22.

"This blow helped to widen the breach between the presbyterians and the prevailing powers: for from this time the Presbyterians were always suspected of loyalty to the king, and the parliament and army were always jealous of them. Aug. 31, was appointed a day of thanksgiving for the success of the parliament's forces in Scotland and against the earl of Derby; and we are told, 'That the ministers who were not of the rigid Presbyterian judgment, were zealous in the duties of the day; but some of the more rigid persons did not think fit to observe that order, but dropt it in public, and had their private meetings to pray to God to bless their brethren of the Presbytery and the cause they were engaged in.' And Oct. 24, being kept for a solemn rejoicing over the king's defeat at Worcester, was so much slighted and slovenly observed by some of them, that they hardly escaped a public censure. Though it was the

A CHARGE of High-Treason, and other High Crimes and Offences, exhibited to the High Court of Justice by Edmond Prideaux, Attorney-General for the Commonwealth of England, for and on the behalf of the keepers of the liberties of England, by authority of Parliament, against CHRISTOPHER LOVE, late of London, clerk; by him preferred and commenced against the said Christopher Love. That is to say, “That he the said Christopher Love, as a false Traitor and Enemy of this Commonwealth and Free State of England, and out of a traitorous and wicked Design to stir up a new and bloody War, and to raise Insurrections, Seditions and Rebellions within this Nation, did in several days and times, that is to say, in the years of our Lord 1648, 1649, 1650, 1651, at London, and at divers other places within this Commonwealth of England, and elsewhere, (together with William Drake, late of London, mercer; Henry Jermin, late of London, esq. Henry Piercy, late of London, esq; John Gibbons, late of London, gentleman; Edward policy of the governing people to make them easy, by granting a pardon upon humble acknowledgment and submission to Mr. Jenkins, Mr. Case, Mr. Drake and others, who had confessed themselves guilty of Mr. Love's conspiracy. The petition of Mr. Jenkins for his life went high, and expressly owned the authority of the prevailing powers to be from God; for which reason it is said to have been printed here, and reprinted in Holland by order and procurement of the house of parliament, to stop the mouths of all other Presbyterians, and gain the reputation of a divine right to them and their cause.”

Lord Clarendon takes two occasions to mention Love, and on both expresses himself very characteristically. Relating the transactions of the Treaty at Uxbridge, he says:

“There happened a very odd accident the very first morning they met at the house to agree upon their method to be observed in the treaty. It was a market day, when they used always to have a sermon, and many of the persons who came from Oxford in the commissioners train, went to the church to observe the forms. There was one Love, a young man, that came from London, with the commissioners, who preached, and told his auditory, which consisted of the people of the town, and of those who came to the market, the church being very full, ‘that they were not to expect any good from the Treaty; for that they came from Oxford with hearts full of blood, and that there was as great distance between this treaty and peace, as between heaven and hell; and that they intended only to amuse the people with expectation of peace, till they were able to do some notable Massey, late of London, esq; Richard Graves, late of London, esq; Syllas Titus, late of London, gentleman; James Bunce, late of London, alderman; and other their accomplices, yet unknown) traitorously and maliciously combine, confederate, and complot, contrive, and endeavour to stir and raise up Forces against the present Government of this Nation, since the same hath been settled in a Commonwealth and Free State, without a King and House of Lords, and for the Subversion and Alteration of the same.

‘mischief to them;’ and inveighed so seditiously against all cavaliers, that is, against all who followed the king, and against the persons of the commissioners, that he could be understood to intend nothing else, but to stir up the people to mutiny; and in it to do some act of violence upon the commissioners. They were no sooner advertised of it, by several persons who had been present in the church, and who gave very particular information of the very words which had been spoken, than they informed the other commissioners of it; gave them a charge in writing against the preacher; and demanded public justice. They seemed troubled at it, and promised to examine it, and cause some severe punishment to be inflicted upon the man; but afterwards confessed, ‘that they had no authority to punish him, but that they had caused him to be sharply reprehended, and to be sent out of the town;’ and this was all that could be obtained: so unwilling they were to discountenance any man who was willing to serve them. This is the same Love, who some years after, by Cromwell's particular prosecution, had his head cut off, for being in a Plot with the Scots against the army, and their parliament.”

Lord Clarendon is not quite correct in saying, “This was all that could be obtained.” See Whitelocke's Mem. under date Feb. 1, 1644-5. 1 Thurloe's State Pap 65. 2 Wood's Athen. Oxon, 136, 137, and Love's Apology prefixed to his Sermon, as there referred to by Birch. Kennet adopts and rather exaggerates the misrepresentation of Clarendon. Carte goes farther still. And Oldmixon says, That Love escaped animadversion. He was confined to his house during the Treaty and then discharged. 3 Neal's Hist. of the Puritans 107.

was settled in the way of a Commonwealth or free state, as aforesaid, did traitorously and maliciously declare, publish and promote Charles Stuart, the eldest son of the late king of England, to be king of England (meaning this Commonwealth), without the consent of the people in parliament, first had and signified by authority and ordinances to that purpose.

“And further, to carry on and accomplish their said traitorous and wicked design, he the said Christopher Love, on several days and times in the respective years aforesaid, at London aforesaid, and in divers other places within this Commonwealth of England, and elsewhere, together with the said William Drake, Henry Jermin, Henry Piercy, Richard Graves, Edward Massey, John Gibbons, Syllas Titus, James Bance, and other their accomplices, as aforesaid, did traitorously and maliciously invite, aid, and assist the Scots, being foreigners and strangers, to invade this Commonwealth of England, and adhered to the forces of the enemy raised against the parliament and Commonwealth aforesaid, and keepers of the liberties of England aforesaid.

“And further, to carry on and accomplish the said traitorous and wicked Design, he the said Christopher Love, divers days and times between the 29th of March 1650, and the 1st of June 1651, at London, and other places, as aforesaid, did traitorously and maliciously give, hold, use, and maintain correspondence and intelligence by letters, messages, instructions, and other ways, prejudicial to this Commonwealth, with the said Charles Stuart, son of the late king, and with the late queen, his mother, and with the said Henry Jermin, Henry Piercy, and divers other persons, being of counsel, and abiding with Charles Stuart.

“And further, to carry on and accomplish the said traitorous and wicked Design, he the said Christopher Love, several days and times in the respective years aforesaid, at London aforesaid, and divers places within the Commonwealth of England, and elsewhere, as aforesaid, did traitorously and maliciously use, hold, and maintain correspondence and intelligence with divers persons of the Scottish nation; that is to say, with the earls of Argyll, Lowdon, Lothian, and Balcarras, and with one Bayley gent. and divers other persons of the Scottish and other nations, whom he the said Christopher Love well knew to adhere to the said Scottish nation in this war against the parliament and Commonwealth of England.

“And further, he the said Christopher Love, within the times, and at the places before mentioned, did traitorously and maliciously abet, assist, countenance, and encourage both the Scottish nation and divers other persons adhering to them in this war against the parliament; and did send and convey, or cause to be sent and conveyed, moneys, arms, ammunitions, and other supplies, to Scotland, and other places, and to the said Titus, Massey, and others in confederacy against this nation, without special leave and licence from the parliament of England, or council of state, or the captain-general of the parliament's forces.

“And further, to carry on and accomplish the said traitorous and wicked practice and design, he the said Christopher Love, within the times, and at the places before mentioned, did traitorously and voluntarily relieve the said Syllas Titus, Edward Massey, colonel Bamfield, and one Mason, late of London, gent. and one Sterks, late of London, gent. who then were, and yet are under the power of the Scottish nation, and in arms against the parliament and Commonwealth of England, with moneys, arms, and ammunition. All which treasons, and traitorous and wicked practices and designs of him the said Christopher Love, were and are to the apparent hazard of the public peace of this commonwealth and free state, parliament and people of England, and to the manifest breach, contempt and violation of the laws of the land, and contrary to the form of divers statutes and acts of parliament in such case made and provided.

“And master Attorney-General, by protestation, saving to himself in the behalf of the keepers of the liberties of England, to exhibit any other charge against the said Christopher Love, and to reply to the answer he shall make to the premises, doth for the said treasons, on the behalf of the keepers of the liberties of England, impeach the said Christopher Love as a traitor and public enemy to this Commonwealth and Free State of England: And doth pray that he may be put to answer all and singular the premises; that such proceedings, trial, examination, judgment, and execution, may be thereupon had against him, as shall be agreeable to justice.”

The Clerk. Christopher Love, you stand charged on the behalf of the Keepers of the Liberties of England, by authority of parliament, of High-Treason, and other high crimes and offences against the parliament and people of England: This High Court therefore requires you to give a positive and direct answer, whether you are guilty or not guilty of the crimes and treasons laid to your charge.

Love. My lord, before I plead, I humbly crave leave to express myself in a few words to this Court: and afterwards to make humble proposals of what I desire in order to this trial. In the first place, being I am this day called to a great and weighty work, in the entrance to it I do earnestly beg the prayers of all them that have an interest in God, that he would carry me through this whole trial with such gravity, godliness, and meekness of wisdom, as becomes a professor and preacher of the gospel; and that he would keep me in this hour of temptation rather from sin than from suffering. Sir, I am this day made a spectacle to God, angels, and men; singled out from among my brethren to be the object of some men's indignation and insultation. By my appearing in this place, I am made a grief to many that are godly, and a laughing-stock to the wicked.—[Here he was interrupted by the court.]

Ld. President, (Mr. Keble.) Mr. Love, how long time do you intend to take up?

Love. I will be brief, Sir.

Ld. President. We have been calling upon God to direct us and you, and all good people, that justice may be done; and you would glorify God rather than Man, if you would confess, knowing what was done in that great sin of Achan; there was great pains taken, and the whole nation was fain to be examined, and their houses divided; and at last when it came to Achan, you know what Joshua said to him, 'Confess and tell the Truth, and glorify God.' This is that, that if you respect God before man you may now clear yourself, and set forth his glory upon earth; and your next work is to plead Guilty or Not Guilty. For we see that those ways you go, would take up time, and we have taken all into our thoughts before-hand.

Love. I do not desire to protract time, but I would not lie under a prejudice.

Ld. President. When you go out of your way, we must help you; and know, if any be under a prejudice here, their prejudging is rather in mercy than in prejudice to you.

Love. I hope you will not be more severe to a minister, than you were to lieut. col. John Lilburne. When you were at the Court at Guild Hall, at the Trial of Lilburne, you gave him the liberty of two hours to plead, before he pleaded Guilty or Not Guilty.

Ld. President. To a Minister! You say well: but I tell you, we do more to a Christian than to a Minister; and we are all Christians, and your ministry is but an office; and therefore what Mr. Lilburne had, it was the favour of the Court then: but time is spent, and pray do not you follow that now.

Love. Whereas your Lordship is pleased to urge the Case of Achan to me, if my case were the same as Achan's was, I should do as Achan did, confess and give Glory to God; but Achan's was a peculiar and extraordinary case, and therefore I pray it may not be laid to me. God was the informer and discoverer, and God did by Lot discover Achan to be the man.

Ld. President. Will you plead?

Love. I desire liberty to speak a word. I had not diverted my discourse, but upon your lordship's words.

Attorn. Gen. My Lord, I hope he will be so ingenuous as not to be long.

Ld. President. Take this in your way, Mr. Love, God is at present here, as he was in the Case of Achan. Go on.

Love. Sir, by my appearing in this place, I am made a grief to many that are Godly, and a laughing-stock to the wicked, and a gazing-stock to all; yet, blessed be God, not a terror to myself. Sir, I am, as Jeremiah was, born a man of strife and contention: Not actively, I strive and contend with none; but passively, many strive and contend with me, yet I trust God will make me, as he did Jeremiah, an iron pillar and brazen wall against those that do oppose me, that I shall not be dismayed at their faces, lest I be confounded before them.—Strange suggestions against me are generally received; and great opposition strongly maintained: And in this condition no man dare stand by me: But God stands by me, and strengthens me.—[Here he was interrupted again.]

Ld. President. Sir, come to the business in hand.

Love. I beseech you, Sir, spare me: You gave Mr. Lilburne more time.

Att. Gen. My Lord, when he shall come with such speeches that are nothing to the business in hand! My Lord, he instances in Lilburne's Case: You know that debate; it was in relation to a narration.

Love. Sir, it was the narration of his doings and sufferings, that he might not be misrepresented to the Court.

Att. Gen. You know you are a minister: And if it be your purpose to spin out time, to think to ingratiate yourself to the people, it will not do. My Lord, this is a court of justice, that proceeds according to the established laws, and laws that have been read to him. Mr. Love is a minister; and had he applied himself to God, as he might have done, he need not have been brought hither, if he had not gone that way he did. But, my Lord, I desire he may go on to the charge, and give his answer to it. My Lord, before we have done, we shall have many occasions of discourse between him and I.

Love. I beseech your Lordship allow me that favour that you allow to every one you try, that I may not stand under misrepresentations to you, who are my Judges.

Ld. President. Are not we of as much credit as you? Are not we judged ministers as well as you, and more than you? And I tell you, that which you require, we have already done, and wish you as much happiness as to our brother: And for you to spend time about that which is nothing to the business, it must not be suffered.

Att. Gen. My Lord, let the constant known laws of the common-wealth of England be observed, as well as other laws, of which that is one, that he ought not to speak any thing till he hath pleaded Guilty, or Not Guilty. My lord, I desire to take my course. I do not make speeches against him, to misrepresent him to you, otherwise than he stands charged. And, my Lord, I would not have him to clear himself till he come to the trial, whether he be not accused justly. It is not my nature, but the duty of my place; and the duty of his place, as a prisoner, is to plead, and to put himself upon trial. That being done, there will be occasion enough for him to plead his own innocency. My Lord, to take up two hours time in talking of that which is not material, should not be.

Love. I insist upon that liberty that Mr. Lilburne had.

Ld. President. He did plead first.

Love. No, my Lord, he did not plead first: and I have much to move before I plead.

E

Ld. President. You can say nothing till you plead.

Love. My Lord, I desire not much time.

Att. Gen. My Lord, let the time now insisted on be what time it will, Mr. Love will have time to speak for himself; and it is so far from being to the point, that it is trifling; And this rather makes him seem guilty, than it gives him any acquittance.

Love. Prove me guilty first, Sir. Sir, do not prejudice me.

[Then command was given to read his arraignment.]

The Clerk. Christopher Love. You stand charged, on the behalf of the keepers of the liberties of England, by authority of parliament, of High Treason, and other High Crimes and Offences, against the parliament and people of England; This High Court, therefore, requires you to give a positive and direct answer, whether you are Guilty or Not Guilty of the crimes and treasons laid to your charge.

Love. I refuse not to plead; but I beseech you, give me leave to speak before I answer.

[Love having a Paper in his hand, the Judge said,]

Lord President. How many leaves is it?

Love. But two or three; and if this Court be more strict and severe to me, than that was to Mr. Lilburne, I cannot help it. What I shall say, shall be something in general; and I beseech you, give me leave to speak to it.

Attorney General. Sir, not before you plead.

Love. Yet I have this liberty, that when Matter of Law ariseth in the Indictment, to make a motion, and to move for Counsel, and to shew the illegality of it; and though I confess I am extremely ignorant of the law, yet I understand, that after I have pleaded, I am not capable of counsel.

Lord President. You are mistaken, Mr. Love.

Love. I suppose I am not mistaken; for in the third part of Judge Coke's Institutes I find it thus: 'The Prisoner, when he pleads Not Guilty, whereby he denies the fact, after the Plea of Not Guilty, can have no Counsel; but if he have any Matter of Law to plead before, he may urge it.'

Lord President. He pleads he is ignorant of the Law, and yet can make use of it.

Love. I am to plead for my life; and I am to use scripture, law, and any other lawful means to save my life. Paul did plead the Roman law.

Lord President. Some of us know as much of Paul and Scriptures as you do.

Love. Sir, I make no comparison. Then Mr. Love reads out of Coke's Institutes: 'The safest way for the party indicted, is to plead upon his Arraignment the special matter for the overthrow of the indictment.' And this must be done before I plead. 'And to require counsel for the pleading thereof, which ought to be granted; and to require a copy of so 'much of the Indictment, which is necessary for framing his Plea, which ought to be granted. And these laws ought to be construed favourably; for that the Indictment is commonly found in the absence of the party.'

Lord President. But your Indictment is in your presence. You are out of your way.

Love. Sir, you bring me out of my way.

Lord President. Your indictment is not yet found; there is nothing done behind your back, only the reading of this; but that is nothing but a written parchment till you plead unto it.

Love. I have something to except against the legality of this indictment.

Lord President. Go on, then.

Love. Sir, the first motion I shall make is for counsel, to advise in matters of law relating to this trial; and as I do gather from hearing the indictment, there are several matters of law that do arise, in which I desire to have counsel assigned me. And the first is, Whether the act, by which this court is constituted, of the 26th of March, 1650, that forbids the receiving or sending letters or messages to or from England or Ireland, do enable you to receive a charge against me concerning letters to or from Scotland, Scotland not being mentioned in that act by which you are constituted. Therefore, seeing this is matter of law, I desire I might have counsel to advise with about it.

Att. Gen. Mr. Love, then, doth admit that he hath received and sent letters to Scotland.

Love. I admit nothing, sir: you charge me with it, but I do not grant it.

Att. Gen. Then you will give us leave to prove it. If he will admit that he hath sent and received letters from Scotland, and so demur that it is not in your power, I will join with him. But, my lord, there was a particular act read, that doth relate particularly to Scotland; and that this court hath cognizance of that act, was read before-hand; but Mr. Love did not observe what was read to him. And it is so far in favour of justice to him, that you read in the laws and clauses upon which he stands impeached; and that there is a law against sending to Scotland. But, my lord, these debates are lingering of time: if a man will demand counsel, he admits the fact, that the fact is true; but being true, he ought not to be condemned upon it; if so, I will join with him; but if he plead Not Guilty, I shall be ready to prove it.

Love. I beseech you, sir, I do apprehend there is another matter of law ariseth, and that is from the act of the 26th of March, 1650, there is a prohibition of sending letters or messages to any in arms against the parliament. Now I am charged with sending and writing in letters to Scotland; now it doth not appear to me that Scotland was in arms against the parliament of England, but for their own preservation. Therefore I desire counsel in this, Whether I, that am accused of writing and sending into Scotland, am therefore accused of writing and sending to those who are in arms against the parliament of England? or whether they were in arms for the preservation of Scotland, or in opposition to the parliament of England?

Att. Gen. If you will admit still, that you have sent or received from Scotland, then I readily grant it.

Love. I will admit of nothing; I have so much of a Christian in me, that I will deny nothing that is proved to be true, and so much of an Englishman, that I will admit of nothing that is seemingly criminal.

Ld. President. You are a Christian, and you are here in the presence of God, as Achan was.

Love. If it be proved against me.

Lord President. Then your denial of it will be a high transgression against God.

Love. I could urge the cause of Jesus Christ, who, when he was accused before a judicatory, answered not a word.

Lord President. You are out.

Love. When Christ was accused in a civil business to be a mover of sedition (as now I am); they asked him, Whether he was king of the Jews? and he answered them not a word. But this is that I doubt, whether there be not matters of law arising from the charge read against me, and that in respect of the time of the act of the 26th of March, 1650, which gives power to you to determine several crimes, and to proceed to the trial of the offender. And, sir, it is also to me doubtful whether this be not matter of law, viz. Whether this trial ought not to be by a jury of twelve of the neighbourhood, or whether in any different way from it? And I doubt it upon this ground, your lordship having given me this hint; for I was present at the trial of Mr. Lilburne, and the formality of the law tied him to plead to this, That he must be tried by God and his country. He refused it, and your lordship urged it upon him, that he might safely plead it by God, because God was in all judicatories; and by his country, because, said you, by country is meant the jury of a man's equals. And this is a trial according to the law of the land. Now, if you have declared that in Guildhall, I beseech your lordship inform me, whether a different way from this of a jury of the neighbourhood be according to law in Westminster-Hall?

Ld. President. You shall be informed: That was a trial by the law, as it then stood; these now are all upon acts of parliament, and laws of the land, that are of as high a nature as they: Those are antient laws, and these are statutes lately made, and of an extraordinary nature, and were made to meet with such persons as you, that have done such things as you have done. And now for your neighbourhood, I hope you have twenty or forty neighbours that are within the equity of the law.

Love. If they be a Jury, I have power to except against 35 of them.

Attorn. Gen. My lord, he pretends Mr. Lilburne's Trial; but when you come to hear the Evidence, you shall hear what he was doing then: he was preparing himself then in his business; he thought his time might come; and I am informed, that since he hath been in the Tower, Lilburne hath been his counsel.

Love. Mr. Prideaux, Sir, you are no god to know my thoughts.

Attorn. Gen. I did say this from his own expression; he was a diligent observer there, that he might know what was done there, that so he might prepare himself.

Love. Sir, you did declare this after the change and abolition of a king and house of lords, That a Trial by a Jury of twelve of the neighbourhood was according to law; and you urged Master Lilburne with this, That he might plead, and do no harm unto himself. And not only so, but the house also declared, That since the change of government, they would never alter that way of trial: and upon the 9th of Feb. 1648, they did declare, That though they thought fit to abolish the kingly office and the house of lords, yet they resolved they would still retain and preserve the fundamental laws of the nation, for and concerning the preservation of the liberties, lives, and estates of the people. Now, Sir, they declaring they would never alter this way of trial, and you declaring this way of trial by Juries to be according to the Fundamental Laws of the Land, I beseech you give me the reason why it is denied to me.

Attorn. Gen. My lord, it is very unusual for a Prisoner to debate with the Court; here he is to be controuled: let him know he is a prisoner upon the trial of his life, before that Court that hath been empowered by the Parliament; they who did never bind their own hands. I must say, my lord, they cannot bind their own hands; and it is this trial that they have thought fit to give him. And for his excepting against 35, then you will hardly be a Court left. My lord, I think, if he look upon the Court, he will find no enemies here, knowing them to be of his neighbourhood, and most of them of London, and, I think, he known to them, and they to him, the most of them. But, my lord, these disputes are not allowed to others; and the gentleman will (I hope) have so much modesty at last, that he will think he hath said a little too much to the Court; and I think it is not good to provoke too far. And, my lord, he hath said much, and you have given him fair answers, and those that are clear and undeniable. But if he speak of the Jurisdiction of the Court, and that he will not plead, let him speak in plain English, and he shall hear me in plain English.

Love. Although I am not satisfied as to the foundation and original of this Court, yet I refuse not a trial, hoping that tenderness of conscience will appear in you, and clearness in me, and weakness of proof against me. Upon this I do not refuse a trial, but I will plead, if I may have that which the law allows me. And according to my weak measure and unskilfulness in the law, upon the charge read against me, I do apprehend there may be some things objected against the legality of the Indictment, and many things to take it off, both for matter of time and form, and other things, by a lawyer. Therefore I entreat I may have counsel to be with me, both in my chamber, and here in the Court; and then I will plead.

Attorn. Gen. I am not here to make a bargain; but this I will say to him. He hath had so much tenderness and respect, as few men more. He hath had notice of his trial above a fortnight; and, my lord, he hath not been denied counsel.

Love. I could do nothing in order to my Trial, because I have sent for counsel, and they would not come near me, because they were not assigned by this Court; and my studies being another way, and being unskillful in the law, therefore I could do nothing in preparation to my trial. Therefore I pray do not destroy me in a hurry; the more fair the trial is, the more just you will be, and I the more guilty, if it be proved against me.

Attorn. Gen. I appeal to Master Love, whether or no it was not denied to Lilburne; and there is none that hears him, but sees he hath prepared himself, and perused several acts whereupon he is impeached. But these are discourses, my lord, which if he will put too nigh upon the count, that we should dispute, we cannot force words from him.

Love. Mr. Prideaux is pleased to urge Mr. Lilburne, but I have more Matter of Law arising from the Charge than he had; and have not that trial by way of a jury as he had; and there are many things in the charge said to be done before the act of the 29th of March, 1650, which gives you cognizance only of things done from that time; so that many things there are, in which counsel would advise me; therefore I beseech you deny me not that right and just favour.

Ld. President. You do not breathe the same air and the same breath, for it comes from you both Yea and Nay: for you say you are ignorant, and yet will not be informed by any thing that can be said; and so your ignorance is wilful. But in this case I am sure what law soever you can plead, yet there be some acts and matters you have denied.

Love. I have urged Matter of Law arising out of the Charge, from the 29th of March, 1650. There was no Act then, that I know of that did prohibit the sending of letters or messages to or from Scotland, and I am indicted for letters or messages sent to and received from Scotland before that time.

Attorn. Gen. I would fain give you satisfaction: do not cast away yourself. My lord we do use in law to lay it so for the fact, we cannot tell what the proof will be; whether the proof will be within these three months or ten months; and it is laid in relation to other offences.

Love. I have here the letters of several counsellors, and they return me their denial; if I could have got their counsel, I would; and yet if I had it, I could not tell what they should have advised me in, not having a copy of my Charge.

Ld. President. If you had desired a copy of your Charge, you might have had it. You must know you are before those that have law and conscience, and that are bound to be of counsel for you, and that is the Court; and it is their duty to see that whatsoever the law of England allows you to have, that that you should have; but you must have it in a due and proper time and manner of law appointed. You are not now for the present where Lilburne was, nor before such a Court; he was before a Commission of Oyer and Terminer, who are to proceed according to those laws, and upon that the Commission directs; and that is by that which the known and fundamental laws of England direct unto. But this is not in all particulars the like; the Jury there hath a large latitude, who proceed by way of Grand Jury and Petty Jury, which are both included in this Court; so that in all things the proceedings upon that are not as upon this. But thus far the proceedings are alike; you have your Charge, and you are to plead to it, for that is the first thing to be done; there is nothing can answer your Charge, but whether you be Guilty or Not Guilty. If you plead Not Guilty, then the Evidence will be called; and if then any matter of law ariseth upon the Evidence, it is the usual course to assign you counsel, and to be counsel for you, and to tell you it is law to have counsel; but for you to demand counsel, and first to have counsel assigned you, it is against that form and legality that the law of England appoints; for till you put yourself upon trial, we cannot allow you counsel to the trial; so that you must plead, and it is our duty to tell you so. And it is the duty of this Court to be as careful, when you have put yourself upon trial, that all the benefit of the law may be afforded you; therefore you need not fear it; for if any of these things arise, you now fear, upon the Evidence, then will be your time and our time to stand upon this you now do, touching matter of law; but in the mean time, in truth, that which we are to tell you, and which we are bound in justice and conscience to let you know, is this: That you are out of your way; and therefore do not destroy yourself: for if you refuse to plead, there is nothing then but a plain downright Judgment.

Love. In ordinary courts of judicature the Judges do counsel for the prisoner; but you are here judges not only in matter of law, but of matter of fact also; and therefore I cannot advise with you: for should I confess any thing, then it ariseth out of my own mouth, and you will condemn me upon it. Seeing therefore both lie in you, both matter of law and matter of fact, I beseech you afford me counsel, and let me have a copy of my charge, and solicitors, that they may be here with me in court, and then I shall willingly plead.

Att. Gen. This cannot be done, nor ever was done, to have counsel assigned, until upon matter of fact something did appear; and for the copy of the Charge, it was never demanded, I think, before; and it is in vain for us to speak if the gentleman do refuse to plead: I shall then press you for justice.

Love. I do not refuse to plead: but yet I should be guilty of my own blood, should I not plead for that just and necessary means for the preservation of my life: through my ignorance I may run myself into hazard and danger, therefore I beseech you deny me not that just favour.

A Lawyer, a Member of the Court. Mr. Love, you are not prodigal, you say, of your blood; nor are we, I hope, prodigal of your blood; we are to answer for all; therefore I pray to me beg thus much of you: if you plead not guilty to the charge, then there is a proceeding to be by master Attorney, to prove you guilty of it; and if by any evidence that he shall produce, or in any thing that shall fall out from yourself in answer to the evidence, there shall arise matter of law, trust us, I pray you, we do promise you that we will give you the benefit of the law in it; and when there comes matter of law to be decided, which we are persuaded is matter of law, then you shall have counsel assigned you; but there is no counsel to be allowed till the prisoner desire it, and shew matter of law for which he desires it.

Another Lawyer of the Court. The main thing you stand upon, Mr. Love, is this: that there is no mention made in any act, that this court can take cognizance of sending to, or receiving from Scotland; but therein you are mistaken; for the business of holding correspondence with Scotland, is in express words appointed to be under the jurisdiction of this court; therefore I think you are utterly mistaken in that. Then, Sir, for counsel, if there comes any thing in the world that is legal, and is a fit thing counsel should be heard in, I think I may promise it, we will not make ourselves so far guilty of your blood, as to deny you that justice that belongs to any man; for it is your just right to have it, and we cannot deny it, when a point of law ariseth. And you do not urge matter of law, only you question the jurisdiction of the court, and we must over-rule you in that; for we are not to dispute the power of the court: for if the parliament give us jurisdiction, and by a special act appoints, that the business of holding correspondence with Scotland should be within the cognizance of this court, we must obey, and not dispute.

Love. I suppose, Sir, a man may demur concerning the jurisdiction of a court to one point: as, if he be accused for treason at the Common pleas, he may demur to the jurisdiction of that court in that: so, Sir, I apprehend there are some things read against me in the charge, of which this court cannot take cognizance, for that they are said to be done before the act for the constituting of this court came forth; so that I may demur to the jurisdiction of the court in that particular.

Lord President. For you to anticipate your evidence before we come to it, we do not tie you to the charge, but to the proof; and we must apply ourselves to the proof, and not to the charge.

As. Gen. And for the business of Scotland, which troubles him much, it is expressed in this very act, that the same offences are to be enquired, tried and judged by the high court of justice, in such manner and form, as other offences are to be tried, in express terms.

Love. But there is no time mentioned; for there are two acts, wherein if the prisoner be not indicted within a year, then the fact shall not be prosecuted. Therefore I must demur to the charge, as not legal in matter of form. There are two acts declaring what offences shall be treason, wherein it is said in those two acts, that if the party be not indicted within a year, he shall not be indicted at all. Now the indictment that is against me, looks back to things that are pretended to have been done by me in 1648 and 1649; and so according to those two acts I am not to be questioned for them, it being above a year before I was indicted.

Lord President. How is it possible that this comes to be an exception until you hear the evidence? If you hear the evidence, and do find that the witness do speak to this not within the time of the limitation, then is your exception proper; but no counsel can divine what time they can give evidence for.

Love. Sir, I am now to look to the charge of Treason read against me, and not to the evidence; and in the charge I am indicted for those things, for which I apprehend I ought not to be indicted. For according to those two acts, I ought not to have been indicted for things pretended to have been done by me so long ago: and this I apprehend to be matter of law. And for the Witnesses, let them speak to what time they will, yet this I am sure, they cannot prove that I was indicted within a year for those things that are charged upon me to be done in 1648 and 1649, for that were to prove an impossibility: so that it appears to me, I am indicted for those things for which I ought not to be indicted.

Lord President. It may be so; and if so, those things will fall off of themselves; there may be some things true, and some things not true; and the counsel may fail in proof of some of them, and you may clear yourself: yet this cannot be before the pleading. When you come to plead, if the matter be not proved against you, and within the time limited, it will fall off of itself without any words at all; and all this time is lost to all this auditory, and no counsel can give you advice in this.

Love. I still say, I do not refuse to plead, but if you would afford me counsel, I should think my life in a great deal less danger. For I do not know, whether I may not, by the advice of counsel, confess some part of the indictment; whether I may not demur in law upon some part, or a great part of the indictment, which I have done already: as that I am charged for treason for those things that are not within your cognizance or power, as I apprehend, and things done before your acts; and for such things, that if I had done them, I must have been indicted for them within a year, or else not at all : and these I deem legal exceptions.

A Member of the Court. My lord, he is very ignorant of the law ; for the fact must be put in question before matter of law can arise ; for if the fact be one way, then the law falls out that way ; if the fact be false, then another way. Now if Mr. Love brings in any of these exceptions for matter of fact upon proof, whether he sent letters into Scotland, or in such a time, whether that be any offence, that will all arise after the matter of fact proves true or false : but before that, under favour, none can speak to any thing against an indictment, unless he speak against the jurisdiction of the court. And then for other matters they are saved unto him. And you will, I suppose, admit of counsel in matter of law ; but his desire cannot be granted unto him until he plead, and until the matter of fact be some way determined.

Love. I beseech you acquaint me then with the meaning of these words in judge Coke's Institutes, ' The Prisoner at the Bar may have Counsel to overthrow the Indictment.' It must be either to overthrow a part of the indictment, or to help the plea, either to plead Not guilty in part, or to demur in part. Let me hear then, I beseech you, what is the meaning of those words, ' That the Prisoner at the Bar may have counsel to overthrow the indictment ; I cannot overthrow the indictment when I plead ; for then witness comes in against me.

Att. Gen. He may overthrow the indictment by the witness ; and I believe he is convinced, that the court hath jurisdiction in as full and express terms as law and authority can give them. And for the next, I may say, your lordship and the court did never allow a counsel to pick holes and find faults. But if he object that to you that is just and probable, and that which is dubious and doubtful and fit to be debated in law, assign him counsel. You have heard all his particular exceptions, and given your judgment upon them all. But I hope he doth not here expect to have Lectures of Law read him, and to make him understand them. But as to those particular exceptions that he hath made to you, I think some satisfaction is given, and that every man is satisfied, and that there is no colour of doubt there, for matter of fact, and the times that he insists upon. For the act directing what offences are treason, and not to be arraigned unless they be prosecuted within a year, I must tell him, the impeachment is laid from 1648 to 1651. Yet, my lord, I shall make it appear, that the indictment doth look backward to some offences, and forward to others. It is laid first in general : he committed such and such Treasons and Offences in such and such years. And I shall come with the Evidence, and apply them to such times that are within your power, and in which the law makes them offences ; and this is to be debated then, and not to be once spoken of now. My lord, I shall begin from 1648, and run on with him, that he hath continued in a treasonable disposition, and in treasonable plottings, to the time he was laid up, and since ; and will justify all : and therefore it behoves him to insist upon it. And I will make it appear, that he was one of the first that ever did appear against this Commonwealth in plotting ; and he did continue so until the time of his restraint, and after that time.

Love. Sir, you are no Witness ; if you be a Witness, come and swear.

Att. Gen. I will use you with all the duty of my place ; and if you give me not occasion, I shall not do otherwise.

Love. I shall give you no occasion.

Lord President. This will make all that hear him to think that this is the very best of his case ; as we know it is.

Love. Sir, although I do not come here to have the law expounded to me, yet I do come here to have the benefit of the law : and if the law allows me this benefit (I being unskilful) that if I can find in the charge matter of law arising, then to have counsel to advise me, and to overthrow the indictment ; why should I be denied this benefit ? And I do not yet, according to my understanding, see that you afford me the benefit of the law, you not granting me counsel to advise me to overthrow the indictment.

One of the Court. Mr. Love, if it were possible, I desire you might have satisfaction, for this that you desire is very just ; and when it comes to its proper time, then you shall have it ; but do not, by disorderly demanding of it out of you time, lose the benefit you might have of it, when it comes to your time. That which you stand upon, and call law, is not matter of law ; nor can you call it law, till you hear what the fact is. For can any man judge what is matter of law, till he know the matter of fact ? as it hath been told you well, that the law ariseth out of the fact ; so that if you will anticipate the evidence, and the proof of the fact, by urging this matter of law which you did hear read in the charge, you will do yourself wrong, and you are mistaken in it ; for there is no matter of law appears there, for it is barely, ' Thus you have done.' And if you say this is law, you exclude all the witnesses. Whether you have done it or no, we cannot tell ; and if you have done it, whether contrary to law or no, we cannot tell, because we must apply the witness to the acts of parliament that authorize us to sit here. And if we find that the doubt grows upon what the witnesses say, and upon what the law saith, then doth matter of law arise, and then it is time for you to say it appears not by this witness that it is within the act. I do rather speak this, because we do extremely desire you should receive satisfaction ; for I would not have any here have any thing put upon him, that may not appear just and according to law ; and none can ever say that a man had counsel assigned him before he pleaded here.

Lord President. It is now the sessions at Newgate, and there may be many prisoners; and if every prisoner should take the liberty to plead matter of law, and say, I am no lawyer, let me have counsel assigned me, and I will answer; when should we have any man answer? when would men be executed for robbing, and stealing, and killing?

Love. That Court is different from this; you here are judges both of law and fact, there the judges are judges of law, and the jury of matter of fact. But, sir, satisfy me in this; if there be any thing in law before pleading to overthrow the indictment, (as I perceived by judge Coke there is, and to which I have received no satisfactory answer) let me have that legal benefit to overthrow the charge. I have said what I can; but if I had counsel here, they could say a hundred times more.

Lord President. You have heard no body but yourself, for whatsoever hath been told you by the Court and your friends about you, hath not been hearkened unto. We have spent thus much time, and people are weak, and if you will plead, do. Read his Charge once again; and I tell you the next is judgment.

The Clerk. Christopher Love, you stand charged on the behalf of the keepers of the Liberties of England, by authority of Parliament, of High Treason, and of other high Crimes and Offences against the Parliament and People of England; this High Court therefore requires you to give a positive and direct answer, whether you are Guilty or Not-Guilty of the crimes and treasons laid to your charge.

Love. I am not satisfied but that matter of law doth arise from this charge; and I do earnestly press I may have counsel, and then I will plead.

All. Gen. I do as earnestly press, that you would as positively say, that you cannot allow him counsel till he hath pleaded.

Love. I now see Mr. Attorney's words to be true. When he came to me to the Tower, and examined me, the 16th of this month, he said, That seeing I would not acknowledge, as he called them, my treasons, I was judged peremptory and obstinate. And I remember he said these words to me; 'Mr Love, though you are too hard for me in the pulpit, yet I will be too hard for you at the bar.' And truly now I find it so; and it is an easy matter for a lawyer, armed with law and power, to be too hard for a poor naked scholar, that hath neither law nor power.

Lord President. Doth this do any good to you? If it were so that you are too hard for him, (for you are too hard for every man in the pulpit) yet you sometimes are so out, and in that you are controulable. If master Attorney be too hard for you here, let him be too hard for you; but it is the Court that are to deal with you here: we will not do it because of his saying, but you must think that the Court will be led by their Evidence, and not by Mr. Attorney.

Love. You gave this favour to master Lilburne, and I do not deny to plead: but I am not prodigal of my blood, therefore I crave Counsel.

Lord President. I do not know what to say more to give you satisfaction, than what I have said. You say you do not deny to plead, and yet you do not plead; you say Mr. Attorney is too strong for you, but you know it is not he, but the evidence may be too strong for you. And do not you think that you have such judges as will let you receive any prejudice? Mr. Love, you are a Minister, I pray shew forth the spirit of a minister of Jesus Christ; carry yourself so, as that you may not either wrong yourself or the Court. I would have you behave yourself without recriminating. You speak of Mr. Attorney, as if he could be too hard for you, as if we were all of his side, be it right or wrong: know that we are men of conscience, and have souls to save as well as you.

Love. The Charge is long, and I never heard of it before, nor knew of it before.

One of the Court. We give you our faith and credit, that if any matter of law ariseth, we will not make ourselves guilty of your blood, but we will allow you counsel: yourself hath read a Book in the Court, that shews the Court cannot allow you counsel till you plead.

Lord President. Did you ever consult with the lieutenant of the Tower? What, will you cast away yourself?

Col. West, (Lieut. of the Tower.) I could, my lord, advise him no more than what I knew, and that was the time of your sitting.

Love. I hope you will not in a hurry spill my blood.

Lieut. of Tower. Since Saturday was seven-night he was not restrained.

Lord President. Your profession goes much in profession; but when it is abused, it is the highest transgression; you would evade things with mental reservations, and say and unsay at the bar, as high as any Jesuit can do.

Love. I will not lie for my life; you may say what you please, and do what you please, I speak before God and this audience.

Lord President. Mr. Love, know that we are here in as sacred a posture as you are in the highest place of your calling; and if we do not know that God is here present, we are the miserablest creatures in the world; and therefore if your office and ours do not make us know that we are in the presence of God and Jesus Christ, it will be but ill for us; and yet you hurry out, that it should be such a terrible thing in you more than in us. You have spoken many words as a shadow in the air, there is nothing material in them, but the strength of your will against the judgment of the Court.

Love. If I do plead to the Charge, I do allow the matter and form of the Charge to be legal. I desire to have counsel to come to my chamber; I do not say, to come to this place, but to have liberty for them to come to my chamber.

Mr. Steele, (Recorder of London.) I did not think to have spoken, nor have I usually spoken in this Court, yet I will speak a word out of tenderness to yourself. You have very often insisted upon it, that you should have counsel assigned before you plead, that is it you plead for: truly the course of law is this, That if the prisoner charged at the bar, before he plead shall demand counsel, he must of necessity put in some special plea before the time he can demand counsel. The court doth not enforce you to plead Guilty or Not Guilty to the matter of fact; but they say, of necessity you must plead. If you put in a special plea, and tell them that it is a special plea, and desire counsel upon it, they will consider it: but till you can declare what that special plea is, for there is a general plea, and a special plea; the general plea is Not Guilty, the special plea is in some particulars. Now for you to alledge neither the special plea nor the general plea, it is impossible that counsel can be assigned you. And whereas you say you are concluded if you plead, and cannot object against the indictment afterwards; no, sir, I tell you in the name of a Christian, and one that knows a little of the law, that all the objections you have against the indictment, the formality of it, and those things you speak of, as that of your fact not being committed in such a time that the act holds out that the high-court hath no relation to try you for Scotland; all these will be saved to you, if they arise upon matter of fact from the evidence. True, if you make an objection against the jurisdiction of the court, that hath no relation either to the special plea, or general plea, it cannot be. It is impossible an objection should be received against the essence of the court, there is none can possibly over-rule that for you but themselves; it is such a thing, that no counsel can be assigned you as to that, because it strikes at the very being of the court. Now therefore I beseech you in the name of a Christian, that you will not do yourself that prejudice; for nature teacheth every man to preserve himself by all just ways and means; and I do believe that in this business you have apprehended it for your preservation, and that you are loth to do any thing that tends to your destruction; but you may satisfy your conscience, in that you have done what you can. And when you have pleaded, and used all the arguments you can, and have heard the Judgment of the court in it, you may satisfy your conscience, that in the words of honest men (unless it be the jurisdiction of the court, though you have tacitly spoken there) you shall have that right and privilege which the law allows you. I confess, I never spake here before, and it is a rule amongst us, that none but the president should speak; and we have done more to you, than to the greatest person that ever spake here, because we think some necessity lies upon us towards you, in regard of your calling and the worth that hath appeared in you, to direct you what you have to do.

Love. Sir, a man may demur touching the jurisdiction of any court, if he can shew any thing in the Indictment that the Court cannot take cognizance of, which he is charged with; though he do not demur simply as to their jurisdiction in general, yet as to that particular he may demur: as a man may demur in Chancery, when a cause is only triable at the common law.

Lord President. You must know, that he that speaks against the jurisdiction of the court, speaks against the jurisdiction of the parliament of England.

Mr. Steele, (Recorder of London.) Mr. Love, to help your understanding, I did not say that Mr. Love did expressly speak against the power of the court, as if they had no power to try him; but this he seemed to say, That what he hath offered against the jurisdiction of the court, in any thing he is questioned for, if he have not counsel for it before, he cannot have it afterwards. Now if the question you offer be a mixed doubt, for your objection is mixed; for you say, the court hath no power to try the facts whereof you are indicted: now is it possible the court can judge of that, or know there is matter of law arising out of it, till the fact appear out of the mouths of the witnesses? It may be the fact will not be proved, then there will be no matter of law arising; if the fact be proved that it was done at such a time, before the act was made, when that appears to them, the court then will strike it off, you shall not need counsel, then we shall not regard it: if upon the fact any other doubt ariseth in relation to Scotland, (for it must be from two witnesses, your doubting being mixed with matter of fact) we shall then be able to judge of it.

Love. Sir, if any crime be laid to my charge, that ought not to be laid; and that this court can take no cognizance of, I should have counsel in it.

Lord President. We have spoken more to you than became us, perchance, and that from tenderness to you; and if nothing can give you satisfaction, but over and over with the same things again, we can but speak our consciences, and leave it to yourself.

Love. I do declare I do submit to the trial, and am willing to do it; but it behoves me to use all just means for the preservation of my life: if you will give me but a day's time to consult with counsel.

Lord President. That is in your learning sufficient to say, you will do it, and yet do not do it; because I say I will submit, therefore I do submit; this is no obedience at all. I know no such logic as this; it is submitting, that must do it; you will submit, but you will not act: pray, Mr. Love, be so charitable as to take us to be Christians.

Love. What prejudice, sir, can it be to this court, being I have not spoken with any lawyer, to give me but a day's time? I will desire no more.

Att. Gen. I would fain know, why may not the next prisoner say, You have done so in Mr. Love's case?

Love. You have accepted of special pleas, you did it in the case of sir John Stowel; and if I through my ignorance in law cannot urge the strength of law, and a special plea, as otherwise I might do, I beseech you let me not be prejudiced by it.

Lord President. Sir John Stowel insisted upon special matter he had to plead, and that was, the Articles of Exeter; but he did first plead to the charge, Not Guilty: yet we gave him that benefit; and he had that which did last a great debate of this court, and so did Hamilton, and divers others: we will do no otherwise with you than with them.

Love. If you now deny me my special plea, I cannot help it; which is this, That the writing or sending letters, if it could be proved against me, into Scotland, doth not come within your act; and that it is only England and Ireland that are mentioned therein.

Lord President. If there be a special plea wherein there is no difficulty, then we give no counsel; but a special plea must have something that is dubious in the judgment of the court: but for this, that in the letter of the law every school-boy understands, the judge will not allow you counsel in a trivial matter; we have gone over and over with you again, and this is like other discourses with you: but certainly never was the like seen, that a court was so trifled with.

Love. This is my humble motion, allow me but counsel to-morrow that they may appear here.

Lord President. You may have counsel to-morrow, as the case shall be.

Love. Shall I have the copy of the Charge?

Lord President. You shall have what is fit, you shall have nothing denied you when it comes to you to have it, you shall have that respect; I do it not to flatter you: but refuse to plead at your peril.

Love. Will you give me but this favour, that I may have but an hour or two's time to consult with a lawyer?

Lord President. I do not know but that this that is done, must be done for all that come to the bar.

Att. Gen. I had thought there would have appeared in him that calls himself a Minister of the Gospel, more meekness and obedience to authority, not out-facing authority; and it is not well done of him. My lord, I humbly beg, that having had thus much of your patience, and persuasion by arguments, and all means used to him, and nothing will prevail; that, my lord, you will now be pleased to give your judgment according to the rules that the law appoints you, upon him that refuseth to plead.

Love. I do not refuse to plead.

Ld. President. Doth a man of your learning say you do not refuse?

Love. A man may demur to his charge, and yet not refuse to plead; and the Court may grant me a day's time, if they please; for I come here unarmed and unprepared.

Att. Gen. His demur is to matter of fact.

Ld. President. Will you put that upon law, for law, which is not law? And by your putting yourself upon that, you confess the whole charge.

Att. Gen. I desire one favour, my lord, which is of justice to him; which is, that you would be pleased to command your Clerk to read that Act that says, 'If any person before you refuse to plead, he may hear the Sentence of the law upon him.'

Ld. President. Clerk, read the Act.

[The Clerk reads that part of the Act about refusing to plead.]

Att. Gen. My lord, we desire his final Sentence.

Love. My lord, I desire but the favour of a day's time to consult with lawyers.

[The Lord President consults a while with the Court.]

Ld. President. I now do deliver it from all of the Court, and all of them are of that mind, and now plead, or you shall have Judgment.

Love. But if I plead, I desire I may have counsel to hear the witnesses.

Ld. President. We will not make a precedent; for it will be said, it was Master Lilburne's Case, and Master Love's Case.

Love. Will you promise me, that I shall have counsel to hear the witness?

Ld. President. We will promise you justice. Read the Sentence.

[The Clerk goes to read the Sentence.]

Love. Not Guilty.

Att. Gen. My lord, we do say in the behalf of the Commonwealth, he is guilty of the Crimes and Treasons laid to his Charge. And, my lord, you now perceive, that when you have been long troubled, you see he comes very hardly to it; an innocent man would not have made so much ado, and knowing his innocency, would not have had so much capitulation and trifling with a court of justice. My lord, for these crimes you are pleased to observe they are of several natures, and of long continuance. And now, my lord, for the state of the Evidence, it is commended to the Charge of another gentleman, that is, Master Solicitor General of the Commonwealth, to open to you the state of the fact, by which he stands here impeached and accused, the nature of it, and how it should have been carried on, the series of time, the persons with whom he complied, how plotted and contrived to undermine this Commonwealth, even to the foundations of it. My lord, when that is opened, I will then produce the evidence to make it good against him.

Solicitor General (Mr. Reynolds.) My lord, Mr. Love urgeth much for himself, but he doth not tell you what. For my part, I never saw his face till now; but his own carriage, if that do not do him wrong, none will. He says, he is singled out from all the rest of his brethren, I suppose he means those that are his fellow-conspirators: the reason of that is, because he was the first, he had a hand in the first action and last action; so that from the beginning to the end he was the principal man, both by counsel, friends, purse, and encouragement: and that is the reason he might justly be singled out to be first in the punishment; because he was first in the fact. He says, God in Achan's case wrought the discovery. My lord, I think the Court will think, that God was the great discoverer of this great Treason: for through the whole series of it, it was pressed and carried on with as much caution and secrecy as the wit of man could contrive; and nothing but the goodness of the God of lights, the Father of lights, could have brought this to light, who discovers the secrets of all hearts, and hidden things of darkness; he hath discovered this. My lord, the nature of the treason, it is not one or ten treasons, but it is a mystery of treasons, woven together during the space of two years, under the notion of religion. Many of them that were the conspirators giving out, that they were a party distinct and separate, and so they did behave themselves, like a party separate from the rest of the Commonwealth. First, This party did assume to themselves sovereign power, and did exercise it divers ways; they did take upon them to send agents abroad to treat with foreign princes and states, enemies to this Commonwealth, and to give commission to that purpose, and to give instructions to that purpose; they did demean themselves in this point, as if this party had been a free state. My lord, the very first of their rise was that in February, 1648. When the Scots had declared for the king, then they send immediately to their brethren here, these conspirators, to let them know that they intended to make addresses to the new king very speedily, and that there were propositions drawing to that purpose; and did desire a firm compliance with them, promising them faithfully (and how they kept it, we shall hear) as their brethren of Scotland, that their interest should be provided for as their own: and the covenant, that was the ground of all. When they had thus promised, they believed their brethren, and thereupon went about the work, and established a council at Dowgate, and there they met, and plotted and contrived how in the first place to make an agreement between the king and the Scots, to the intent that when they were agreed, they might come with united forces to invade this Commonwealth. They were plotting and contriving this about Midsummer, 1649. They were taken notice of abroad to be considerable men; and the king of Scots, as they called him, thought fit to send an agent to them, to treat with them, which was one Mason, my lord Piercy's man; his errand here, was to reconcile both parties, the royal and Presbyterian party, and to make them both subservient to do his work. My lord, he treated with the countess of Carlisle, William Drake, and divers others, citizens of London, and this was with the privity of the ministers. My lord, he had commission from the king to assure these conspirators, that if they could procure the Scots to send more moderate propositions than they had formerly sent (for the treaty was broken off before, the propositions were then immoderate) that they should be satisfied.

Thereupon they were so confident of themselves, and so bold (and in this Master Love had a principal hand) that without any more ado he frames a letter to Scotland, to advise them, and to persuade them by all means to send more moderate propositions. The Scots return them this answer, That they saw no cause to send more moderate propositions; but they desiring a good success of the treaty, they should send before-hand to the king, to prepare and move him to comply with the propositions when they came. Thereupon they were as ready, whereas they sent with the one hand to the Scots, so with the other hand to the king. They framed a letter to the king, and I will express it in their own language; this was the substance of their letter. First, they let the prince know, that there was a considerable party in England sensible of their sufferings there (they made themselves so considerable;) and by and by you shall see what became of that. First, the king did understand them to be so considerable. Secondly, they were bound in conscience and loyalty, to the utmost to help him to his just rights, if he were once engaged with them by taking the covenant, &c. and prosecuting the ends of it. Thirdly, that there was no way to do this, but by closing with his subjects of Scotland. Fourthly, that being done, all the Presbyterians were bound to assist him. And this which they did, must be sent away before commissioners come, to prepare the king to give them good entertainment. With this letter there was a letter sent to the late queen, to desire her by all means to work the king to a compliance with the Scots. And there was a letter sent to my lord Piercy and Jermin to that purpose; taking notice that the queen, my lord Piercy, and Jermin, were their very good friends, and ready for this conjunction: Whereof they took special notice, and did approve of it as a thing very acceptable, and which should be remembered in due time. My lord, this letter was sent; and afterwards Mason he brings the answer from the king, and queen, and Piercy; all agreeing to this work, that the Scots, if they came with propositions, should be complied withal. But Piercy and Jermin writ further, and did advise them to the intent the king might not fall back again, that they would send a meet person to be present about the king when the commissioners came, that so he might see fair play. And thereupon Titus was sent away, to be an agent there for them at this Treaty: And this Treaty was at Jersey. But this treaty took not effect, as was desired; whereupon they resolved upon another Treaty of Breda. But at the Treaty at Breda the king advised in his letter (which I shall read) in the latter end of the letter that they would send commissioners then to treat with him. My lord, the letter was written by the king back again to the ministers: First, the king in the letter took notice of the ministers non-compliance with the present power, and of their loyalty and good affection to him; and that if God restored him, he would requite them. Secondly, he promised all satisfaction to the Scots. Thirdly, made large promises of high favours particularly to the ministers. Fourthly, wished them to send commissioners sufficiently instructed, to treat at Breda. Now, my lord, in the diary that came along with this (for there was a diary of all Titus's negotiations) in that diary it did appear, that the king was very much satisfied with the correspondent's application to him; and that that should be a main argument to him to satisfy the Scots. So, my lord, if they had not thus moderated and persuaded the king that they were a very considerable party, he would never, in all probability, have closed with the Scots, but have thought them very inconsiderable. But when he was informed that if he closed with the Scots, he should have a considerable party in England, that made him think the Scots were worth closing with. My lord, Titus, in his negotiation at Jersey, did assure the king, That the ministers were averse to the present government both in pulpit and in print; and that they were well affected to serve him and the nation; and that the nation was ready to espouse his quarrel, if he did join with the Scots. This he did assure him in the behalf of the ministers. And to shew how they did own this, they did like this assurance so well, that they send him another letter; and they did likewise send him a letter of thanks for his good service he had done, in possessing the king how considerable they were. My lord, after this business of Jersey, when Titus had done his good service there, he was coming home to make his relation; but hearing by the way that the Council of State had intercepted some letters, he durst not come farther than Calais: And from thence he sends a letter, to let them know all this; and withal, that he had something to communicate to these Conspirators, that was not fit to be communicated by letter; and therefore desired that some meet person might be sent to Calais. Thereupon this letter being read in Mr. Love's study, (so secretly was it carried) there it was agreed that major Alford should be the man that should go to Titus, and should receive all this account from him. Whereupon Alford he went away to Titus presently, and there he did speak to him; and Titus did acquaint him with all these proceedings; and withal, they did advise that a commission should be sent in the latter part of the letter. So that now they had no more to do, but, since their hopes failed them at Jersey, to have an eye to the Treaty at Breda, where they desired to send commissioners. My lord, this letter, to be presented at Breda, was managed at Mr. Love's house. Col. Massey, col. Graves, Titus, &c. these were the parties. There were letters sent to them to act accordingly. And Titus sent letters to the king and queen, and Piercy. And again, my lord, for the Commission, it was as transcendent a boldness as ever was done by private men: The Commission was corrected by Mr. Love; for it was rough-drawn by William

Drake, which was the English agent here. But Mr. Love, in his study, and Dr. Drake, did help to correct it. The substance of the Commission was this: 'We, the Presbyterian Party in England, do authorise you Francis lord Willoughby of Parham, Edward Massey, James Bunce, Richard Graves, and Silas Titus, to treat on our behalf, and the rest of our brethren the Presbyterians of England, with the King; and to assist our brethren the Scots Commissioners in their Treaty with the King, and to do according to the instructions annexed.' My lord, here be the Heads of the Instructions; That the Commissioners should use all arguments they could to move the King to give the Scots satisfaction, and to take the Covenant; and particularly to inform him of the condition of affairs, and how things stood in England at that time, all which then cried out for an agreement with the Scots; giving them full power of all things; and what should be concluded by them the Commissioners, should be confirmed by the Confederates. I think, my lord, here was a very large Commission; whatsoever they thought fit, they were willing to comply with and make good. My lord, at Mr. Love's house, at the same time it was moved, (according to a letter from my lord Piercy to William Drake) that a good sum of money might be sent the king, as a great means to dispose the king to an agreement with the Scots. But they did not think fit to be cozened of their money; but if this conjunction did follow, then to raise money considerably. And they went on so far, as to debate how to raise this great sum of money for this pious work, as you shall hear by and by, under what notion when propounded. Those men agreed that the best way was, That the ministers should have several correspondents; and that they should propound the lending of 10, 20, 30, 40, or 50*l.* for a charitable use: But you must not ask what this charitable use is for. And this charitable use, what would it have been? If God had not blessed the battle at Dunbar, we should have seen it. My lord, a little before the battle at Dunbar, when they had letters from Massey, or Bailey, or somebody, they then began to understand their brethren better than before: For he did inform them, That notwithstanding what was pretended, yet for all that, there was no English employed, nor was the king crowned. This did disturb the minds of the Conspirators very much; insomuch that they did expostulate with a large letter, written by Mr. Love and Dr. Drake, written in a table-book in sack, and sent there. They did expostulate with them, because the Presbyterian party, which was the over-ruling party, were grown so confident of carrying all before them, that they did neither crown the king, nor mind the English. They did blame them for this, seeing this going upon a single interest, and upon one party alone, which they did call godly, would not do well. And, my lord, it proved so indeed: They carried it on upon this till the battle at Dunbar came, and then they began to be of another mind. After that battle, there was a letter from the Commissioners of Estates, pressing for arms and ammunition; and letters from Massey and Titus for money to be sent. My lord, these good-natured men, notwithstanding they had been so handsomely dealt withal when their brethren were in power, yet for all that, so fierce and eager were they to carry on this great design, which God knows what it would have come to, they notwithstanding, upon Mr. Love's proposition, (for he was the man who did propound it) agreed to send 500*l.* presently to Massey. My lord, this money was raised, and subscriptions taken by Mr. Love himself at his own table. And this is proved by one who brought his ten pounds: He brought it to Mr. Love, and would trust nobody else with it. And this was sent away presently by captain Massey. My lord there was a large letter sent also with the money, wherein was good counsel; for besides the money, he did write to advise his brethren, that it would be notable service to endeavour after union. The letter was sent; and that large letter, inviting to union, had been delivered to the assembly; and that would help to quash the dissenting party in Scotland, who had made the king a prisoner. But now the state and church were all agreed: And this was the fruit of Mr. Love's letter. And if they had not been so united, they could have done no harm. This letter came so seasonably, that they conceived it very considerable. They pressing to union very much, by this means did quash the dissenting brethren; and by that means they came to be as now they are. My lord, about Christmas last there came a letter from Massey, which gave an account of crowning their king, and of great preparations to take the field; and that the correspondents here should beware of unseasonable rising; and that they were most afraid that these persons would rise too soon, and spoil all. My lord, in answer to this letter, they write back again to Massey, to advise him on the other side, to take heed that he came not into England but well provided, and not to depend much upon the assistance here in England: They were afraid he was too weak, as he was afraid they were too forward. My lord, after Cook was apprehended, then the correspondents met no more at publick meetings; and yet they received letters from Drake, Massey, Rance, and the rest (whereof Mr. Love was still made acquainted, as a principal man) that told them of the hopeful condition of the Scotch army, that they intended to engage in England; advising the party here not to be too forward. This was the second advice. And see the reason of it: For if Mr. Love sat at the helm, as he did, all the meetings being at his house, after Drake went away, he still staying the question, drew these letters and corrected them. And if he were such a main stickler, truly there was very great reason for his advice. My lord, about the middle of March last col. Bamfield's man brings an answer to the message in the table book, written in sack, containing four or five sheets of paper. Upon this packet there was nothing written but the letter L. to deliver to one of the Conspirators. And seeing nothing but the letter L. written, he carried it to Mr. Love, and Mr. Love did own it as sent to him. And that was the large Narrative of the State of Affairs in Scotland, after the fight at Dunbar, how things stood there. My lord, with this narrative was sent also a letter from Mr. Bailey, by order from the general assembly: they did order Mr. Bailey (which was the Scotch correspondent there) to write a large letter; and there was another letter from my lords of Argyle, Lowdon, and Lothian, &c. It is worth your observing what this letter was that came from these men: First, Thanks for the good affections of Mr. Love and the rest of the conspirators. Secondly, Encouragement to persevere; and to credit Bamfield's negotiation for money. Thirdly, Promises to repay all, whatever they should lend. But when and by whom this payment should be made, the letter will tell you; and that is, when God shall bless their endeavours in procuring a free parliament in England. So the parliament in England must pay all the Scotch debts, that these conspirators shall lend. Truly, I think it will be a very free parliament indeed, when it comes so free out of the people's purses. My lord, Mr. Love and others gave Bamfield's man, that brought this narrative, out of their own purses ten pounds, and sent a bill of exchange of thirty pounds to Bamfield. By one witness it will be expressly proved that ten pounds of this money came out of Mr. Love's purse. My lord, William Drake's last letter did inform that Massey would break into England as soon as there was grass for his horses; and therefore he sent to have a good bank of money provided in readiness; and that they should think of timing a party; and that they should neither rise too soon nor too late, but just when Massey came in. This Mr. Love told major Adams. My lord, now we come so near to the time, as that one of these conspirators is apprehended by the council of state. When he had been in restraint three days, he sent to Mr. Love, and Mr. Love came to him; but he had been at a kind of fast; for they did keep fasts once a fortnight, at least, and prayers for the good success of this design; that God would bless this wonderful treason, which was for the making, by the Scotch army, an utter subversion of this commonwealth, and the free, and noble, and magnanimous people of England should be made vassals and contri- butaries to the Scotch nation. This was the design; and for this design the ministers fasted and prayed; but, it is plain, God did abhor such things. And, my lord, master Love took upon him to speak to the person under restraint:—'Take heed,' saith he, 'what you do, lest you 'wrong yourself or others.' And said, 'It is true, Titus's man hath broken up papers; but 'we are all well enough. But give notice to 'the rest of the confederates, that they may 'not be surprised; but be you not troubled, 'because we have prayed for you this day.' And they implored the God of Truth, that nothing of all this should come to light, but that we should be in the dark still in generals. My lord, this is the true state of the evidence, as near as I can present it, with a frail memory. And, my lord, I have opened nothing but generals; your lordship and the court will judge it; and master Love will have the less to do to answer. But it appears by this, that there hath been such a practice, such a series of treason, treason upon treason, that one act of parliament is not enough to contain it; but all those acts of parliament read, every one of them make him a traitor. And, my lord, I am sorry I have taken up so much of your time, especially when you have spent so much time before. If your lordship, therefore, will be pleased to have the patience to hear the witnesses, we shall prove more than I have yet opened.

Attorn. Gen. My lord, this was an early treason that began betimes to crush the Commonwealth in its infancy; and, my lord, master Love being singled out for justice, you will, anon, observe there was singular cause for it; and if he had had his desert, it had been long before now; but states can play sometimes with treasons, and not take a time till they see fit. My lord, this Treason, as I have opened it to you, began in the year 1648. The king of Scots, so called, but take notice, that the same nation and persons that proclaimed him king of Scotland, proclaimed him king of England also at the same time in the same nation; and those persons that proclaimed this person king of Scotland, the same proclaimed him king of England. My lord, you have heard some of the conspirators, named Titus and Drake, active men both of them; these men have been so ingenuous, that they have fled for their treasons. Notwithstanding, this gentleman, a minister of the gospel, he doth not do so. They have confessed their offences, and are fled for them: they dare not appear, they have so much guilt within them that prompts them to keep away; but this gentleman hath not so much. My lord, Drake was so active, and it was carried on with so much secrecy, and so much (as they thought) of caution, that master Drake writing, as that gentleman next Mr. Love doth, in short hand, he burnt his papers, and burnt all where any thing was to be seen; so that no originals are to be seen. My lord, in this case it hath been opened to you what transactions Mr. Love had with Scotland, and you have been pleased to observe, it was a tender point, that Mr. Love did enter discourse with the Scotch nation; Mr. Love was very much troubled at it, and he may see just cause to be troubled at it. And will you give me leave, there hath been blood and treasure spent, as was told you by Mr. Solicitor. I am afraid, I might too justly say by that gentleman, and those he did seduce, that they have been too much the cause of this blood, even that gentleman that stands at the bar, that should be a man of peace, and not of blood. My lord, I may justly say, that that gentleman hath been too much the cause of these late Engagements between these two nations, and making himself a party. And it is a sad thing when parties appear against a state. My lord, I am too much afraid, whatever God pleases to work upon him, that it should touch his conscience that he should be instrumental in such a work. But I verily believe, had there not been actings from hence, there had not been so much forwardness in the king's party to the Scots. My lord, I will mind that gentleman of what is said of the 5th of November; I am sorry for it, that it should be said of our ministers, 'whose faith is faction, whose religion is rebellion.' It is said so of the Romish ministers, I hope it will not be said so of the English ministers, That their faith is faction, and that they pray for strife, and fast for strife. My lord, for these men, Drake and Titus, they are gone, as I said; and they did confess themselves so much guilty, as that they have fled for it; and Mr. Love doth know (I am sorry to see him in that gesture) that he was conversant with them all, and doth know (I believe) that we can prove it: and when he hears the men named, he will say so too. Truly, my lord, I have nothing to say against the person of the man, but against his vices and faults; and nothing to his function, and nothing to those whom he pretends so boldly to represent, that is the presbyterian party. We do all know there are many honest, precious, and godly men, that have received no discountenance from the state; nor this gentleman, that should give him any countenance or encouragement to oppose the state. But it is somewhat a bold thing, for a particular man to be the head of a party, and they to engage as representing a considerable party, to engage to send commissioners to agree upon instructions. This is very bold. But, my lord, God be thanked, many of those that were seduced at first were wise, and did come in before the last; and did not strut it out, my lord, with states and justice, as that man hath done before now, and at present, even outfacing justice, and boldly, I say, wiping his lips: he hath done no offence. My lord, they were so bold with Scotland, that there was a known agent there, maintained and kept between Scotland and them: and I will tell him the gentleman's name: his name was Mr. Sterks. And, my lord, when he went away, the act requiring those of the Scottish nation to be gone, that gentleman did supply him with money himself, and others gave eight or ten pounds in his purse, to carry him away. My lord, I believe he knows this; and I am sorry that that gentleman, that hath gone along with us in much of this war, that he should at last so much betray his own discretion, as rather to trust a reconciled enemy, than to be true to his own friends. I say, he trusts a reconciled enemy, and a weak enemy, and that he will think and will know that they might betray him; as justly may be done, when men so cast themselves upon the party of the king, and queen, and Piercy, and Jermin. It is no great policy nor discretion to have so many of counsel. They say, three keeps counsel; but this gentleman hath now 20, 30, 40, in Scotland, France, and Holland, and agitations between them, and frequent intercourses. My lord, I shall now call the witnesses out to you, which when Mr. Love doth see, himself will say are honest men, and to be believed.

Love. My lord, I beseech you, let me speak a word.

Att. Gen. My lord, he hath heard his charge in particular; and those things which, if he be ingenuous to himself and his own conscience, he cannot but know we shall prove them: And before we prove them, I desire to hear whether, or no, he will confess them.

Love. I hope this court will not hearken to the insinuations of instruments of state, who are well rewarded for their eager prosecution of men in such a condition as I am in: it is an easy matter, through flourishes of law, and strains of wit, to stir up the minds of my judges against me.

Ld. President. You have heard the matter opened to you, which you cannot in any Christian or godly conscience or understanding but acknowledge, that such secrets as these you were privy to, and came, to your hand: You cannot, before God and man, do better than to confess these, which you know, by the urging of them upon you, are come to our knowledge.

Love. Will you give me leave to express myself as to these things which I am now charged with? I do declare and protest, in the presence of God and this great assembly, that I never wrote any letter either to the king of Scots, or to the queen his mother, or to the church or state of Scotland in the general, or to any particular person of the Scottish nation, since the wars began between England and Scotland, to this day. I do declare also, in the presence of the same God, I never received any letters, written to me, either from the king of Scotland, or queen his mother, or from the Church or state of Scotland in general, or from any particular person of the Scottish nation since the wars began between the two nations, to this day. I declare and protest likewise, in the presence of the same God, I never collected, or gave, or lent one penny of money either to send into Scotland, or into any foreign part, to the king, or queen his mother, or to the church or state of Scotland in general, or to any particular person of the Scottish nation, since the wars began to this very day. And as to these particulars, I have said it often, I am as innocent and as harmless as the least child: and if you will take the aggravating of these circumstances against me, and will proceed upon aggravations of the crimes against me, I hope God will help me with more peace of conscience to undergo the censure, than you shall have to inflict it. And as for that gentleman, that made that great relation to you of the Treaty of Jersey; for my part, I am as great a stranger to all those transactions as any here; I never saw the face of Titus; nor did I ever send to him, or receive any thing from him.

Att. Gen. My lord, we shall call the Witnesses.

[Captain Potter is called into the Court.]

Love. I except and protest against this Witness; for he hath been already examined in private, and hath made his confession there; and that is equivalent to a conviction: and I hope the court, in justice, will not admit of this man for a witness.

Ld. President. You shall have Justice as well as ever any jesuit had.

Att. Gen. You see now what Mr. Love drives at, and you will find his jesuitical evasions. And, my lord, let him be asked, whether ever this man was before this court, or any committee of this court; and I think in justice you ought to examine witnesses beforehand. But it is clear and evident that this man hath been a party with him. I do humbly conceive it is so clear and evident, that rather I should except against the witness, as an incompetent witness, than Mr. Love, because he hath been a party with him: But I desire he may be a competent witness, and one in whom there is more ingenuity than there is in Mr. Love.

Love. Sir, before he swears, I beseech you ask him this question, Whether he hath not been threatened with death, if he would not witness against me?

Ld. President. You cannot over-rule us with your beseechings and beseeclings; it will not do it: Your over-importunity shall not prevail with us.

Love. Let God prevail with you; though he may be Legalis Testis before conviction, yet he cannot be so after conviction.

The Clerk. The evidence you shall give between the Keepers of the Liberties of England and the prisoner at the bar, shall be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. So help you God. [He is sworn.]

Ld. President. Now look upon the God of Truth, and speak the truth.

Capt. Potter. I shall speak the truth.

Att. Gen. That gentleman was pleased to trust others, as I said, even reconciled enemies, and fell from his friends. I do grant that this gentleman hath confessed: and if every honest man confess his fault, that is no offence; for an honest man questioned for a fact, to confess the truth thereof: I have not heard that that is no good law. And I do say, that before ever this man came to be examined, we did know it all; and perchance from those that this gentleman thought fitter to trust than us. But we did so know it before, that every circumstance was opened by us; and we did convince this gentleman and others, though not Mr. Love. But Mr. Love saith—he must not accuse himself, he must not answer; but this gentleman did more ingenuously. I do affirm that he was questioned to every particular, before he answered: And we do know that the state hath long hands and ears. Now, my lord, if you please, ask Mr. Potter what he knows of this business, of sending to and receiving from Scotland.

Ld. President. You are upon your oath, and in the presence of God, than whom there is no higher upon the earth, that is in the seat of justice, and without relation, as Mr. Love saith, to the parties: Therefore tell the truth of your knowledge, in the transaction of this treacherous treason, that hath been now above two years in the passages between the Presbyterian party.

Att. Gen. No, my lord, we will not own that upon them: There are some that do style themselves so, the Presbyterian party, that are conscientious persons, and pious and godly men; and I should do them wrong, should I lay it upon them: But that which I do, is against those that do undertake to style themselves the heads of them.

Ld. President. Begin then with that which concerns Mr. Drake's agency.

Potter. I have taken an oath to speak the whole truth in this business; but that is the truth I know. I desire I may not be pressed to things that I have only heard.

Att. Gen. You must, and from whom you heard them.

Potter. I was examined several times, and had a wide latitude there; and then I was to speak to every truth as I thought and heard: But now I have taken an oath to speak the truth between the state and this gentleman. And I beseech you that I may be held close to those things, and I will give you the fullest and fairest account I can. What I said before, was in order to the discovery of the thing, much of which I had by hear-say from others; and in that I may mistake in persons, places, and times. What I have done myself, and what I know this gentleman hath done, that may be put to me fully.

Love. The Witness must so speak, 'That we have seen and heard, that do we testify.'

Att. Gen. Your doctrine will not pass here.

Love. It is Scripture, Sir; and it behoves me to speak, for I am upon my life.

Att. Gen. Mr. Potter, speak what you know, and from whom; and I desire there may be no glosses put there by those who, I am sure, cannot do it. I ask you first of the proceedings, and sending to Scotland, and back again to England; and what you know of it, and from whom.

Potter. My Lord, the Committee that examined me knows I was not privy to the first transaction; I did say indeed something of it by hear-say; and I did likewise say that Mr. Drake told it me. But I may err in that particular; possibly Mr. Drake did not tell me so; for as I apprehend, I said I did think it did put a necessity upon the king to agree with the Scots: and then having seen some papers, and conferred with that relation others have made, I collected the truth of them, as far as I did know. But now I am upon my oath; let me therefore come to the matter: I spake then many things as I heard, which I cannot affirm upon my oath.

Ld. President. We must judge of what you have heard.

Potter. My Lord, I cannot be certain of that.

Att. Gen. That is receded from. But what do you know of Mason's coming over here?

Potter. I know nothing of Mason: I saw him but once; and at that time there past nothing between us of public concernment, as I remember.

Att. Gen. What was the answer that was returned to that which Mason did bring?

Potter. That I can speak nothing to of my own knowledge: I heard he was come hither; and was here to see the tempers of men, and to see how things were like to go.

Att. Gen. My Lord ask him from whom he came.

Potter. It was said he came from my lord Piercy. But these things are so remote from me, that I can say nothing to them of my own knowledge.

Att. Gen. My Lord, let him speak what he knows about reconciling the Presbyterian parties.

Potter. I think others can speak more close to that; I can say nothing but by hear-say: I heard that Mason did endeavour here to find how the affections of the people stood; and whether there was a necessity that the king should comply with the Scots, or with the Cavaliering party; and that he found a necessity of complying with the Scots.

Ld. President. What assistance should he have from hence?

Potter. I know no more of Mason than this.

Att. Gen. My Lord, ask him if there were not some letters returned by Mason, in answer to what he brought?

Potter. Not that I know of.

Ld. President. Did you hear of it?

Potter. I think I did hear of it: but I cannot tell by whom: I think by William Drake.

Att. Gen. My Lord, ask him whether he knows of any petition sent to the king of Scots.

Potter. I do not know of any; but have heard so.

Ld. President. By whom did you hear so?

Potter. By William Drake.

Ld. President. Who did Drake say did carry the petition?

Potter. I cannot tell.

Att. Gen. Do you know of any answer returned from Piercy and Jermin?

Potter. I know nothing at all of these things.

Ld. President. Were not you invited to the meeting? Potter. Yes, I was.

Att. Gen. What did he tell you?

Potter. Nothing at all : we had nothing but common discourse there.

Att. Gen. Who was there?

Potter. There was William Drake, major Alford ; and I think Mason and Titus were there.

Ld. President. Do you remember any more?

Potter. I do not remember ; nor can I certainly say they were there.

Ld. President. Were not you pressed or moved to go to Jersey?

Potter. Not that I know of.

Ld. President. Did not Titus offer to go?

Potter. I cannot well tell : but at that time, or some other, he either was spoken to go or offered to go.

Ld. President. How long ago.

Potter. My Lord, I cannot speak this of my own knowledge ; but I have heard say, I think a month after the time.

Ld. President. Had he any money to bear his charges?

Potter. I know of none.

Att. Gen. Well, what meetings afterwards was there in Mr. Love's study?

Potter. I have been at Mr. Love's several times.

Att. Gen. My Lord, ask him whether he was not present in Mr. Love's Study, when a letter was there read from Titus ; and who was present there : and what were the debates upon it ; and what was the Contents of the letter ; and whether it was not for some to come to Calais to him.

Potter. The Letter I well remember : I cannot say it was Mr. Love's Study ; nor can I say it was in his house : I do not know Mr. Love was present. The letter, I have seen it, or heard of it : it did desire some to come to Calais about the treaty : and I remember well what major Alford told me he did go to him.

Ld. President. What was the contents of the letter.

Potter. I cannot well remember that I have seen it, but I have either seen it or heard of it ; I cannot tell which.

Ld. President. You must be true to the state, and speak the truth.

Potter. My Lord, I would be true to the state, and to the gentleman at the bar too. And, my Lord, I can say no more to it : I either saw it, or heard of it, I cannot tell which. I am upon my oath, my lord : the letter did desire some body to come to Calais to him.

Att. Gen. Was not this meeting in Mr. Love's Study?

Potter. I cannot say it was in his house : I rather think it was not.

Ld. President. Was he present?

Potter. I cannot say he was present ; I think he was not present : I think Mr. Alford was sent to the tavern.

[The Papers of captain Potter's Examinations were here produced by the Attorney-General, and by the Clerk read to him.]

Att. Gen. My Lord, these were his examinations.

Potter. I intreat this may be remembered, which I premised at first, I had a latitude then, that I have not now : I am now upon my oath, and desire to be true to my own conscience, and to the state, and to this gentleman. I have made (it is true) such a confession as this is ; and I believe the greatest part of it to be true according to the latitude I spake it in : but now I am upon my oath, and now I am to speak knowingly. The substance of the thing is true ; I believe that he was sent, and sent upon such things. So much I do verily believe to be true, upon my oath ; but of the places I cannot speak.

Att. Gen. Alford did go to Calais, and return : and how many days was it between his going and returning? And where did he give an account of what he did receive from Titus at Calais?

Potter. It is a hard matter for me to speak to the time. I think about a week. And for the relation he made when he came back, as I take it, I met him at the King's-Head in Vial-broke upon his landing ; whether he made the relation to me there, or afterwards at Mr. Love's ; whether I heard of the meeting, or whether I was at the meeting, I cannot say. I am sure he himself made me the relation ; but whether there, or any other where, I cannot make out.

Att. Gen. Upon your oath, did not major Alford make return of the answer in master Love's study?

Potter. I cannot say it ; but I think it was there. Att. Gen. Was master Love present?

Potter. I think he was present ; and I think it was in his house : I am sure major Alford made me a particular relation between him and I.

Att. Gen. Was Sterks, the Scotch agent there, or no?

Potter. I cannot say he was.

Lord President. Was it read in master Love's study?

Potter. I cannot say I was there.

[His Examination was again read to him.]

Att. Gen. What was the substance of the King's Letter?

Potter. It is so much out of my memory, that I scarce remember there was a letter ; it is so much out of my mind.

[More of his Examination was read to him.]

Lord President. What do you remember of this now? Is this true?

Potter. I remember I have heard as much ; and I believe it is true.

Lord President. Have you not heard the letter read?

Potter. I do not know there was a letter sent ; nor do I know there was a letter read. I desire to speak the truth : I had a latitude then, that I have not now ; I had then such an information shewed me, and I spake to it so far as I thought it was true. These papers you shew me, as my Examination, were not of my framing.

The Clerk. Look upon them ; Is not this your hand?

Potter. I know it is my hand.

Att. Gen. My lord, I did go to the Tower to him, and was with him, and did examine him. My lord, here be those that will prove it, that himself did confess, and said it was true: and he took time himself to inform himself, and had (as he said) other men's Examinations and Informations by; and he did add and amend, and gave it under his own hand. This is the truth, after several examinations. And he had papers by him, and did correct them himself, and brought them under his own hand written by himself, these very things. And, my lord, ask him whether he did not write these things first with his own hand, and bring them to the committee of examinations.

Lord President. Whether did you not bring in your own examinations, and what you could inform, written by your own hand?

Potter. My lord, that is my hand; and what is there I must own as mine. But I hope you will let me distinguish between what I delivered then as I heard it and thought, and what I deliver positively. I do say it is true now, as I have heard.

Lord President. Why did you not say 'of hearsay' then, as well as now?

Att. Gen. Upon the oath you have taken, whether do you not know this of your own knowledge?

Potter. Upon the oath I have taken (and I desire to speak it in God's presence) I do not remember that I saw the letter from the king, or heard the letter read, or the copy; nor can I say Alford told me so much, though I think he did, yet I do not know he did.

Love. I desire you would take notice whether this be fair, that Mr. Attorney should help the witness, by putting things into his mouth?

Att. Gen. My lord, I can help the Witness by asking him questions.

Potter. My lord, no man shall so far tamper with me, as to make me say an untruth.

Att. Gen. My lord, pray ask him whether he did not write these papers, most of them, with his own hand.

Potter. True; but to open to the committee the ground of this business: but I did not expect to swear to every one of these particulars.

Att. Gen. My lord, ask him whether after this return was made there was not a meeting, and instructions made about the commission to be sent to Breda.

Potter. My lord, to that, I have heard so much but I cannot speak it positively. I saw no commission, nor instructions: I heard there was both. I do not know by whom I have heard it; I think by William Drake.

Lord President. Were you not at Mr. Love's house when they were drawn up, and Mr. Love corrected them?

Potter. I never saw the instructions.

Love. Nor I neither.

Lord President. Did you not hear so?

VOL. V.

Potter. I did.

Lord President. To whom to be directed?

Potter. To capt. Titus.

Lord President. And to who else?

Potter. The commission and instructions were to be directed to my lord Willoughby of Parham, colonel Graves, major-general Massey, capt. Titus, and alderman Bunce.

Att. Gen. My lord, ask him whether he had not heard Mr. Love tell him so.

Potter. Never in my life.

Lord President. Were you not then present at his house?

Potter. I know not that I was; nor can I remember.

[His Examination was again read.]

Att. Gen. Whether were you not at Mr. Love's house? And was there not a letter agreed upon to Massey, and Bailey, and Titus?

Potter. I have been several times at Mr. Love's house.

Lord President. Whether were you not at Mr. Love's house with these correspondents?

Potter. I have been several times at his house with them; and I have been oftner there upon other occasions.

Lord President. Name them.

Potter. I mean with Mr. Love, and Mr. Jackson, and Mr. Robinson, and major Alford, and Mr. Drake, and Mr. Gibbons.

Lord President. What was then agreed upon about letters when you were at Mr. Love's house?

Potter. I have a very bad memory, I cannot speak to time, and places, and persons; such letters I have heard of were written, I profess I can speak no more knowingly. I never had a hand in any one letter, but such letters I have heard of.

Lord President. Upon what account did you meet at Mr. Love's house?

Potter. I met there sometimes upon a friendly account, sometimes upon a Christian account, and sometimes to hear news, and sometimes to tell news.

Lord President. Where did you meet with these persons, William Drake, and these so often mentioned?

Potter. My lord, there was a correspondence in point of news.

Lord President. Between whom?

Potter. Between capt. Titus there, and Wm. Drake here; and he would tell us many times news there.

Lord President. Do you know Titus was employed as an agent hence?

Potter. I think he was.

Lord President. Had he money collected?

Potter. I do not know of one penny I lent him, and I never contributed to him.

Att. Gen. My lord, ask him whether himself did not, upon an occasion, contribute 10*l.* and bring it into Mr. Love's parlour?

Potter. I confess that.

Att. Gen. For a Table-book that was written in sack, do you know of any such thing?

Potter. I do, my lord; I went to Wm.

G

Drake in his retirement, and he was writing out of his papers some letters in a table-book, which he told me was in sack, as I take it.

Lord President. Why did he write them in sack?

Potter. I take it, because it should not be discovered.

Lord President. Do you not know to whom the letters written in sack were sent?

Potter. I know not; but he told me to Bailey and Titus.

Lord President. Where was Bailey and Titus then?

Potter. I know not where Titus was, but I think Bailey was in Scotland.

Lord President. After Drake was gone, where were your Meetings usually?

Potter. Many times at Mr. Love's house.

Lord President. When you did meet there, what did you meet upon? Was it not to receive messages from Titus, and Massey, and Bunce, and Bailey, and to return answers?

Potter. We had sometimes letters read there, but from whom they came, or to whom, I believe few can tell, I cannot tell; something of news we have heard of affairs; that was the occasion of my coming sometimes.

Att. Gen. Did Mr. Love never tell you the occasions of those meetings, and press you to lend money to furnish Massey and Titus?

Potter. I can say nothing to that.

Att. Gen. What say you to the private fasts? Potter. There were private fasts.

Att. Gen. What! for a blessing upon the treaty at Breda?

Potter. There were fasts kept, but I never understood they were for any other end, but for the sins of, and Judgments upon the nations; and for the most part there have been hundreds of men and women there.

Att. Gen. Did Mr. Love often officiate there?

Potter. He hath preached and prayed.

Ld. President. Did any pray for a blessing upon the the treaty?

Potter. I cannot say so.

Att. Gen. What say you to those letters that came hither after the fight at Dunbar?

Potter. My lord, after the fight at Dunbar, there came letters from Bailey, and Titus, and Massey.

Ld. President. And where were these published?

Potter. My lord, I can say no more; I have heard of these letters too.

Ld. President. Were not you present at Mr. Love's house when they were read, or made known there?

Potter. Possibly I was: I cannot say I heard the letters read there. I did hear letters by a private hand occasionally afterwards.

Att. Gen. By the oath you have taken, were you not present at Mr. Love's house, when those aforesaid letters from Titus, and Bailey, and Massey, were published and read?

Potter. My lord, I cannot say I was there, and I dare not say I was not; it is a year ago:

I believe I was there several times when several letters were read, and it may be when those were read.

Ld. President. Whether was there not 5*l.* given to a messenger that brought them?

Potter. I have heard there was, but I do not know it.

Ld. President. Did you contribute any thing towards it?

Potter. I think I did contribute 10*s.*

Ld. President. Who contributed besides yourself? Potter. I know not.

Att. Gen. Was there not at Mr. Love's a promise of arms or letters?

Potter. I cannot say so.

Att. Gen. What can you say?

Potter. I have heard there was.

Att. Gen. By whom have you heard it.

Potter. I cannot say by whom, or who told me so, either Mr. Alford, or Adams or Far, or some of those men that used to meet there; for it was common, when I was not there, for some or other to meet with me.

Att. Gen. Did Mr. Love contribute to the messenger?

Potter. I cannot say he did.

Att. Gen. My lord, I do not ask him one question, but what himself hath confessed.

Potter. I do remember such letters I have heard did come, but never saw those letters; I do likewise remember I heard there were 5*l.* gathered for the messenger, and I do believe I contributed 10*s.* towards it.

Att. Gen. Who else gave beside yourself, and who received it?

Potter. I profess I know not.

Att. Gen. Whether was there not a Declaration to the Church of Scotland then published?

Potter. The declaration, I know nothing of it; you remembered me of it at the committee, when I was first examined, but I knew nothing of it.

Att. Gen. My lord, ask him whether the State and Church did not write for arms and ammunition at that time after the fight.

Potter. My lord, I have heard so much, but cannot speak positively or particularly to it; I have heard of such letter, but cannot tell by whom; I saw them not.

Att. Gen. To whom were they directed?

Potter. I never heard who wrote them, nor to whom they were directed.

Att. Gen. Was there not one letter with L. upon it?

Potter. My lord, about the letter L. I did receive those letters myself, there was an L. written upon them; My lord, these letters came from Bamfield out of Scotland. There was in these letters a large narrative of the affairs of Scotland, from Dunbar-Fight to the time of the date of them, which I think was about Christmas: This is a thing I know better than, (I am afraid I give offence by saying, I think, and I heard, and that I cannot speak positively; but of this I can speak positively) Bamfield gave an account therein of a narrative of two sheets of paper, and I and another or two opened them; and I carried these letters to Mr. Love's; there was one or two more with me, Mr. Jaquel, and I think Mr. Drake, I cannot well tell. There was a narrative of the Scotch affairs and a letter from nameless persons which we suppose to be from Mr. Bailey and from my lords of Argyle, and Lowdon, and Lothian, and others, whose names I do not remember. These letters wrote for 10,000*l.* for buying of arms, and hiring of shipping. These letters we disliked, and we dissented from them, and agreed to give a negative answer; but we thought fit, for our own safety, to raise some money for the messenger and Bamfield, to which I contributed 10*l.* I carried all these letters to Mr. Love's; one or two were opened. I think we opened them; the narrative and my lord of Argyle's letter I opened, before I understood what they were.

Att. Gen. Why did you carry them to Mr. Love's?

Potter. There was a great deal of news in them: there was a letter L., and I did in my Examination say; I conceived it was to Mr. Love: but now upon my oath, I do not remember very well, and I do not think it was to Mr. Love. I do confess I carried these letters to Mr. Love's, I and Mr. Jaquel; these letters were opened, but whether Mr. Love opened them, or I, or the other, I cannot tell.

Att. Gen. With whom did you leave them?

Potter. I brought them away, all of them.

Att. Gen. Were they not read?

Potter. They were all read.

Att. Gen. He confesseth further he paid 10*l.*: To whom were the letters directed?

Potter. The letters had no direction at all upon them, I believe.

Att. Gen. My lord, ask him, whether there was not a sum of 4 or 500*l.* agreed to be raised.

Potter. The advice that was given to that, was, That we should do nothing in it, and we did nothing in it more than I tell you; I carried those letters to them, and had discourse of them, and resolved to do nothing in them.

Att. Gen. Why did you carry them to Mr. Love's?

Potter. I went for advice what I should do with them.

Att. Gen. My lord, pray ask him concerning the 4 or 500*l.*, and for what; and whether this discourse was at Mr. Love's house. Whether there was not a proposition for raising 4 or 500*l.*, and for whom this was to be raised, and where to be raised, and by what means.

Potter. I heard there was, I do not know the place where: to this I contributed 10*l.*, I brought it one evening to Mr. Love's house, and there I left it.

Att. Gen. Where was this money agreed to be raised?

Potter. I cannot speak to that.

Att. Gen. Who took the Subscriptions?

Potter. I cannot speak to that neither.

Att. Gen. Did Mr. Love contribute?

Potter. I cannot say he did.

Att. Gen. Was it in his house?

Potter. I do not know that I subscribed at all, I do not think there were any Subscriptions; I am sure I never subscribed my name.

Att. Gen. When you came into Mr. Love's parlour, and left the 10*l.*, did you not give him a twitch by the hand?

Potter. I cannot say so. [His Examination was again read.]

Ld. President. Is this true?

Potter. The substance of it is true.

Ld. President. Of your own knowledge?

Potter. Of my own knowledge that I left so much money.

[The Clerk reads more of his Examination.]

Potter. This is a section I never worded, or phrased myself; I have heard as much as this comes to, but cannot speak it knowingly.

Att. Gen. Did you not write this yourself?

Potter. I believe not, I cannot positively say that Mr. Love either drew up the letter, or received the letter.

Att. Gen. You say he received the letter from your own hands.

Potter. But not the letter from Titus and Bailey.

Att. Gen. Do you know of a way of correspondence laid at Kendal, or no?

Potter. I heard there was such a correspondence.

Att. Gen. By whom?

Potter. I cannot say by whom.

Att. Gen. Do you know that Groves was sent to look for letters there? Potter. Yes.

Lord President. Did Mr. Love know of it?

Potter. I cannot say he did.

Att. Gen. What had Groves for his pains for going? Potter. Ten pounds.

Att. Gen. From whom?

Potter. I paid it.

Att. Gen. Did you receive any of it again?

Potter. I did receive some of it, I received two 10*s.* by several persons.

Att. Gen. From whom?

Potter. From Gibbons, and Alford, and Far.

Att. Gen. Not from Mr. Love?

Potter. I do not know I ever had a farthing from him in my life.

Att. Gen. My lord, ask him whether there were not letters returned to Bamfield again, and by whom?

Potter. My lord, I did receive a letter that I suppose was to Bamfield.

Ld. President. From whom did you receive it? Potter. It was left in my shop.

Ld. President. By whom?

Potter. I cannot say by whom.

Ld. President. Whom do you conceive it came from?

Potter. I think from Mr. Love or Dr. Drake.

Att. Gen. Do you conceive so? My lord, ask him whether Mr. Love or Dr. Drake was not appointed to draw the letter.

Potter. When we were together, there was a negative Answer resolved upon; and this Answer, to the best of my remembrance, was agreed to be drawn up by Mr. Love and Dr. Drake: but I received this letter.

Att. Gen. And who received the 30l.

Potter. I cannot tell.

Att. Gen. But you sent the letter.

Potter. I did.

Att. Gen. Ask him whether he did not send for Mr. Love, and what discourse passed between them, since he was in prison.

Potter. I did send for Mr. Love, and he did come to me; and I desired his counsel, as a Minister, and I told him upon what score I was questioned; then I was questioned upon Mr. Cook only, and he gave me encouragement only as a friend and Minister of the Gospel ought to do.

Att. Gen. What was that?

Potter. He wished me to make a Christian use of my afflictions, and gave me some other instructions; we had an hour's discourse, and it was all to this purpose: He wished me to make a Christian use of my restraint, and to labour to get Christian wisdom and fortitude.

Lord President. What did he say more to you?

Potter. My lord, no more passed between us; and I gave him an account of what questions I was examined upon in Cook's business.

Lord President. Did you give him an account?

Potter. I have said so, and he did advise me to prudence, and fortitude, and courage.

Att. Gen. Did he never advise you to be courageous, and that unless you discovered one another, you were safe enough?

Potter. My lord, my keeper was with me and we had no such discourse.

Att. Gen. Did he not wish you to be silent?

Potter. Either then or since he did tell me there was a letter came from Mr. Drake, that told him, Titus's man had taken some letters from Titus; but he could not conceive how it could concern me.

Att. Gen. But did he discover nothing, and wish you to be prudent for yourself, and them?

Potter. He did not then.

Att. Gen. When then?

Potter. I saw him once since; and he told me of Bamfield's man.

Att. Gen. How came it about Mr. Love spake with you?

Potter. I did prevail with my keeper to go with me to dinner, and to take a glass of wine, and then I provided for Mr. Love's coming to me.

Att. Gen. What hath Mrs. Love said unto you? Potter. I saw her ever and anon.

Att. Gen. What hath she said to you?

Potter. She hath wished me, with tears, to have a care of her husband, and not to discover any thing; I think she hath.

Att. Gen. Did not Mr. Love say then, That he had been at a fast, where you were remembered? Potter. He did so.

Att. Gen. My lord, I confess I was with this man in the Tower, as I am bound to do by my place, to examine him; he had made his examination before I came thither, and I brought it with me. My lord, I did ask him questions, he did answer me upon knowledge; he did confess the truth, but told them Mr. Attorney General was pleased to help him to particulars, and bring them to his remembrance.

Potter. I profess, if it had been to save my life, I could not affirm them; but you putting me in mind of it, I did know of it.

Att. Gen. At the Committee of Examinations, then he had more particulars told him, and he did confess he did know them all; and he may give you an account, whether he did not give an account under his own hand? My lord, I am not abused, but the council of state and the parliament are abused; and if this man should do this wrong to Mr. Love, and inform the court and council, and the man he brought upon his life, because he hath affirmed it; and that several times before several Committees; this man must not escape unpunished, if for no other fault but this, to accuse a man before authority, and when he comes to his oath, to deny every word of it. Capt. Fisher will witness, that he did bring all under his own hand, and upon my credit, he did speak as fully as we did open, and much more fully: and I answered upon hearsay, How do you know it? And he said, He did know it, he did remember it, and he put it down positively; and that when Mr. Drake went away, all the meetings were at Mr. Love's house, and Mr. Love did still declare the occasion of the meetings, and the letters were opened by him, and the discourse upon them; and every word he said upon his own knowledge.

Potter. I do confess again, that before capt. Fisher and Mr. Attorney did prompt me—

Att. Gen. Prompt you, Sir!

Potter. Before he did remember me of them, I had forgot them, as if I had never heard them; but it is one thing to remember a thing as I have heard, and as I conceive to be true, and another thing to swear to it positively: and the paper allowed me this latitude; some of it I have heard, the rest I believe, and some I know; and upon this account I believe it is all true.

Att. Gen. My lord, 'tis possible I might wish him to express what he did know himself, and what he did know by relation of others, and so did set it down, and he did it fully and clearly; and after all this, brought it in again, written with his own hand, to the council of state. My lord, if you please, capt. Fisher may go for the original under his own hands.

Clerk. The Original cannot be found.

Love. Here is nothing at all that concerns me about the business of Titus in Jersey, and about the letter from Titus, and the copy of the letter from the King; he tells you he doth not know it was in my house; he tells you it was but a copy, not the original.

Captain Potter withdraws.

[Major Alford called into the Court, and takes his Oath.]

Att. Gen. My Lord, let him declare what he knows, either by himself or others, and of his employment at Calais: make the whole narrative as much as you can remember.

Major Alford. My Lord, I was one morning wished to go with William Drake to the Swan at Dowgate, hearing there was a gentleman lately come from the Prince, where I should hear all the news from beyond the seas; when I came there, it was one capt. Titus, one whom I had never seen before; and he gave a relation of the good disposition of the Prince, and how inclinable he was to take the Covenant and to cast off the Cavaliering Party, and those about him, if there were an opportunity to make it known, that there was a considerable party in England that would stick close to the ends of the Covenant. Upon that, sir, myself, and some others that were there, did think we were bound in duty, and in relation to the Covenant, to press the ends of the Covenant, for the Prince to take it, and to prosecute the ends of it. And for that captain Titus said, If we would appoint another meeting, he would draw up something by way of Attestation or Petition to the Prince for that purpose. My lord, we did meet at the Bear in Bread-street, and there he did draw forth something that he had framed to that purpose, and he read it; and afterwards, not at that time, it was agreed upon to be sent over to the Prince. The substance of it was to press the Prince to apply himself to take the Covenant, and to prosecute the ends of it, and to cast off all his cavaliering party about him, which had brought so much mischief to his father, and would do the like to him. This captain Titus drew up, and this, I believe was sent over, for Titus undertook to send it over. I did ask how the Prince should be made to believe, that this coming from an inconsiderable party, as we were, should come under the notion of the Presbyterian party of England, for it went under that notion? He said, he should undertake that by the means of my lord Piercy. And the Petition that was agreed upon, he did send over, I believe; for I did not carry it to the post-house, but he did undertake to do it. Afterwards he went over himself, and when he was over, he had information that there was notice of his being there, and of the business he was upon; and therefore he writ over to William Drake, (as Mr. Drake told me) that he did desire some of us that knew of the business, should be sent over to him, to receive that account from him which he had in the business. So Mr. Drake did persuade me to go over to Calais; and having some business of my own, I did go over to Calais. I went from my house on the Friday night, and I was back again on the Tuesday following; and he did give me an account of that transaction: The substance of it was this: It was about his own troubles he had undergone there by the cavaliering party, in managing that business. He had likewise been imprisoned, and they told him, they would try him as a spy; and that they urged hard against him, and that he was in that condition till my lord Liberton, the Scotch commissioner, came over; and by this means he had access to, and favour with the prince: and that was the substance of all. He said, the king was averse to the Covenant, not of himself, but by reason of those counsels that were about him. And this was the substance of that account he gave me of his transaction there at Jersey, in reference to the business he went upon: and this he gave me in writing, which I brought over to deliver to Mr. Drake, for it was directed to him, which I did deliver. Afterwards master Drake carried them to master Love's house, where they were read. And that is all as to that business.—Then afterwards there was a commission, they called it a Commission, it was agreed upon among us, to be sent over to my lord Willoughby of Parham and Massey, and I think Graves and Titus, that they should agitate and act for us at Breda, and to advise with the Scotch Commissioners that were there, in behalf of the Presbyterian party here in England; and that is all in relation to that. Afterwards Mr. Drake read to me the copy of a letter in Characters, which he had written himself in his own back-shop, which he told me should be sent to the queen, which was to persuade her to persuade the king, as he came that way, to close with the Scots; for that was the likeliest way to make good his own interest; but that was at Mr. Drake's house only between him and I. Afterwards Mr. Drake told me he had disbursed money about receiving of letters, and receiving of news, and did wish me that I would let him have 10*l.*, and said he would speak to some others of his acquaintance to do the like; and if he could get up a considerable sum, I should have part back again; for he said the charge was too great for him to undertake: and I do think he had 10*l.* of me for that. After Dunbar-Fight, there was I and some others at Mr. Love's in his great lower room; where was a letter read, that was said to be from major-general Massey, that gave an account of the business of Dunbar; and also did write for arms, I know not how many thousands; and to that purpose, that they might be provided by the way of Holland. But upon that, all that were there did say—I heard no man speak of providing arms or any such thing. He writ in his letter, that for his own necessities, and captain Titus that was there, that a motion might be made for providing some money to send over for their supply: and it was then said, We were so inconsiderable, and so few, that the sum spoken of could not be done; and therefore it was moved, that every one should do by himself and friends what he could. This was the substance of that.

Att. Gen. I believe, my lord, he hath dealt ingenuously with you. This in the general: I pray you ask him, what he knows concerning any letters that should have been sent at the beginning of the change of this government, to Scotland from any part of England?

Alford. For that I know nothing, but heard

Mr. Drake say, That he had correspondency with some in Scotland; and I have heard use one Mr. Bailey's name; and he had a cypher which they writ by.

Att. Gen. For the Swan at Dowgate, he gave relation of that; but who was present then?

Alford. Truly, my lord, it is so long since, that I cannot positively tell; but I am sure I can remember there was Mr. Huntington, and William Drake, and lieutenant-col. Bains; and I cannot tell, my lord, I think there was one Mr. Hall.

Att. Gen. Was Mr. Gibbons there or not?

Alford. Truly, my lord, I cannot tell whether he was there at that time or no.

Att. Gen. My lord, he says Titus at that time did give relation of the prince and his party: Can you remember what that relation was? And do you know whether this was not afterward communicated, and to whom?

Alford. I have given you the substance of it; but for communicating of it, I knew it from none but only from those there.

Att. Gen. Titus took time to draw it up?

Alford. He did so; and at the next meeting at Breadstreet, there were the same men again; and I think at the same time there was col. Barton.

Att. Gen. Was there no mention then, (when it was propounded to you to be a considerable party) was it not said the ministers were to be acquainted with it?

Alford. It was asked Titus, how the king should be possessed that this came from the Presbyterian party in England, because it was agreed upon that there should be no names used to it? He said there needed none, but only the engagements of the ministers in it.

Att. Gen. What ministers?

Alford. Truly he did not speak a word of any man that I know of.

Att. Gen. Was it not then propounded, that Titus should be sent to the Scotch king before commissioners came to him, to have a correspondency settled between him and some others here?

Alford. I cannot say at that time, but afterwards. Whether at that time or any other, I cannot tell; but one time Titus said, he had learned from my lord Piercy, which had hastened him over, that this business was of that concernment, that they did undertake it should be there before the Scotch commissioners did come. And thereupon Titus (as William Drake told me, for this was not at the meeting) was persuaded to undertake to go about that business.

Att. Gen. Whether was there not some directions given for a letter to be written to the queen, to prepare the Articles with the Scots?

Alford. I cannot say any thing but what Wm. Drake told me privately between him and I, as to that purpose, a Letter to the queen.

Att. Gen. What was that?

Alford. I did tell your lordship.

Att. Gen. My lord, ask him whether he was not at supper with Titus.

Alford. No, my lord, I was not there when he offered himself to go, as I know of.

Att. Gen. What money had Titus to bear his charges? Alford. Thirty pounds.

Att. Gen. From whom?

Alford. From William Drake singly.

Lord President. Did not Drake gather it up again?

Alford. My lord, I cannot tell; I know nothing of any man, but what I did myself.

Att. Gen. We are now speaking of the meeting at Mr. Love's house, and of Titus's letter being read, and he sent. Let him give a particular relation of that again. I make bold to ask him questions to help his memory.

Alford. The letter that was read of Titus, was not at Mr. Love's house, as I know of, but Mr. Drake's (for all things came to him, and we knew nothing but only from him, for the correspondency was settled between William Drake and captain Titus) nor at any public meeting that I know of, but what Drake told me.

Lord President. But you were at Mr. Love's house, you said but now.

Alford. I was, but not upon this account, it was after I had been over; for I do not know that ever I was at Mr. Love's house, or ever spake with him, till I went over: if I have, I have forgot that ever I spake in my life to Mr. Love about it, till after I came from Calais; and then I did bring over a relation, and gave an account of it concerning Titus's transactions.

Lord President. That account you gave at Mr. Love's house.

Alford. No, my lord, I gave it to William Drake, for it was directed to him; and it was three or four days after that we met at Mr. Love's house, where Mr. Drake read the thing.

Lord President. At what time was it?

Alford. At the time when the Scotch king was at Jersey.

Att. Gen. Whether did you bring from Titus a copy of a letter from the king?

Alford. That I forgot; but Titus did shew me a letter, at leastwise he said so, that he had it from the king, that he sent to this Presbyterian party. And, my lord, he did copy out the letter, and the copy he gave me, which I did bring over.

Lord President. To whom did you deliver it?

Alford. I delivered it to William Drake, I gave it Mr. Drake himself, and I think at his own house; I think it was the same, and that it was read at Mr. Love's house. The substance of it was this, as he told me, That he took in good part the petition or application that was made to him; and if ever God did restore him, and that he was in a condition, then he should think of it.

Lord President. What did he speak of a Non-compliance with the present Government, and by whom?

Alford. I do not remember a word of that.

Att. Gen. What said he concerning the Scots, and what he would do for the ministers, if God restored him?

Alford. I cannot tell any such Passage, nor do I remember the particulars of it.

Lord President. The letter was then read, you say?

Alford. I suppose it was the same that I gave to Mr. Drake, but I cannot say it was the same, because it was not in my custody.

Att. Gen. Did not you propose to send 50*l.* to Titus?

Alford. For that, I heard say that there was 50*l.* sent to him; but whether it were or no, I know nothing of it, nor did contribute to it, nor knew nothing of it.

Att. Gen. Did not you make a Narrative yourself of what you received by word of mouth from Titus?

Alford. It is very like I did speak of it to this purpose I tell you of, I do not know particularly what I said.

Att. Gen. Did you not receive an account from Titus of his transaction at Jersey?

Alford. I did.

Att. Gen. Did you not give an Account of that you received from him?

Alford. He gave it me in writing, and I delivered it to Mr. Drake.

Att. Gen. But when you met at Mr. Love's house afterwards, did you not make some Narrative of what you received from him by word of mouth?

Alford. I had it not by word of mouth, but only by the delivery of papers to me, which he could not bring over with safety.

Lord President. Where those Papers read at that meeting?

Alford. I tell you, my lord, I delivered them to Mr. Drake, and Drake did read some papers, and I believe they were the same; but I cannot say there were the same, for they were out of my custody.

Att. Gen. Who then were there present?

Alford. There was Mr. Love, Dr. Drake, Mr. Case, Major Adams, Mr. Gibbons, and captain Far. Truly I cannot particularly tell.

Att. Gen. This was given him at Mr. Love's house, and Mr. Love present. My lord, I pray you ask him whether Titus's message was not well approved of, and the letter of thanks to be returned, and the 100*l.* in money.

Alford. I do not remember any of these things you speak of now.

Att. Gen. What do you remember was said concerning him there?

Alford. I do not know what was said; I do not know what any man could say to them which were papers from him: I do not remember any particulars, it is so long ago; I believe now it is two years ago.

Att. Gen. Do you not remember that this was one passage in the king's Letter, that the king wished them to send Commissioners to Breda?

Alford. I do not remember that.

Att. Gen. But was there not a commission at Mr. Love's house agreed upon to be sent?

Alford. That there was.

Att. Gen. What was to be the effect of that Commission?

Alford. It was to advise those men to join with the Scotch commissioners, to take advice with them, and to accept the Presbyterian party with the king, in relation to the first petition that was sent.

Att. Gen. Was Master Love there?

Alford. Mr. Love was there: but I do not know what Mr. Love or any man did direct in it.

Att. Gen. Who did correct those Instructions?

Alford. I cannot tell.

Att. Gen. Who was agreed to prepare the Commission?

Alford. I do not know, for I believe it was prepared when it came there; I heard that which we call a Commission read there, but who prepared it, or acted in it, I do not know.

Att. Gen. Did Gibbons bring it?

Alford. Who brought it, I cannot tell.

Att. Gen. Who were the Commissioners?

Alford. As I remember, my lord Willoughby of Parham, and Massey, and Alderman Bunco; and whether Titus and Graves, I cannot tell.

Att. Gen. Was this in Mr. Love's study, or in another place?

Alford. It was in Mr. Love's study.

Att. Gen. Was the rough Draught corrected by any body or no?

Alford. I cannot tell whether it was or no, nor can I remember any more particulars of it than what I have given you.

Att. Gen. What do you know concerning any Instructions to give power to the Commissioners what to do?

Alford. At the same time there was agreed upon some Instructions for them to walk by, which was the substance of the Petition which had been formerly sent; that is, it prest the king to take the Covenant, and to prosecute the ends of the Covenant.

Att. Gen. Who carried the Commission and Instructions?

Alford. One Mason.

Att. Gen. Who was that Mason?

Alford. I did not know him, but I have heard say he did belong to my lord Piercy.

Att. Gen. Was there not at that time some letters propounded to be written to the Queen, and Jermin, and to what purpose?

Alford. I cannot tell that any of these things were propounded there, but Mr. Drake had told me, and read to me in characters some that he had writ thither.

Att. Gen. And was it sent?

Alford. I cannot tell, for it was privately between him and I.

Att. Gen. When this Commission was thus brought into Mr. Love's Study, was there not a question propounded, what warrant have we to send commissioners, and by what authority, and what was the resolution upon it?

Alford. Well, it may be, but I do not remember it.

Att. Gen. Do you remember who went with Mason, when he carried away this?

Alford. None went with him but I, and Mr. Gibbons did carry the Papers two or three days after that we had them from Mr. Drake, which was this Commission we speak of, to Gravesend, to Mason; for he was at Gravesend before, and there delivered it to him.

Att. Gen. What was the effect of these instructions?

Alford. The substance of them was, according to the first commission, to press them to use all their endeavour to advise, and take advice with the Scotch commissioners how to press the king to take the Covenant, and to join with the honest party, the church-party in Scotland; that was the substance of it.

Att. Gen. Did he not write to you to send money to the king?

Alford. I heard Mr. Drake once say, there was a letter from my lord Piercy, to that purpose, but captain Titus himself wrote against it.

Att. Gen. What course or way was propounded to raise money?

Alford. I know of nothing propounded that way: it was not agreed for me at that meeting to go down, but Mr. Drake suddenly went down, and Mr. Drake alonespoke to me.

Att. Gen. But he told you it was the first advice of some others?

Alford. Truly, I do not remember that he did tell me so: there was a Commission and Instructions read at Mr. Love's, but whether agreed upon there or no, I know not.

Att. Gen. What know you since Dunbar Fight?

Alford. For that, we met at Mr. Love's house, in his lower room, and there was a letter that was said came from Massey, wherein he gave an account of that business, how many men were lost; and that he did write for arms to be sent, and in his letter did propose a way, as I remember, to be done by the way of Holland: I cannot tell the particular number of arms he writ for, but for arms: and also did speak something in it concerning his own and Titus's necessity, they being there strangers.

Att. Gen. There was a proposition made, of raising some money for supply of their necessities?

Alford. It was not to raise money, for arms, or any such thing, but only a proposition made for supplying those gentlemen's personal necessities.

Att. Gen. And how was that to be done?

Alford. It was to be done among ourselves, to raise some money; there was 500*l.* spoken of, but it was impossible for us to do that, for us that were inconsiderable men, being men of mean estates and fortunes, and so it was brought down to a less sum.

Att. Gen. What was that sum?

Alford. Either 2 or 300*l.* I cannot tell which.

Att. Gen. How was that to be raised?

Alford. It was to be raised among ourselves.

Att. Gen. And did you subscribe then presently? Alford. No, I did not.

Att. Gen. Who did?

Alford. I cannot tell that any did; for I then said, that I did not know that either myself, or any there, was engaged by promise to do any thing for any, only for capt. Titus; for he alone was there upon our interest, and therefore I said, for that I would contribute 10*l.*

Att. Gen. How much did Mr. Love contribute?

Alford. I do not know of any particular sum.

Att. Gen. Did Mr. Love press you to contribute, or move any to do it?

Alford. Truly Mr. Love did move to contribution of money, for the purpose we speak of, for the supply of Titus.

Att. Gen. Where was Titus then?

Alford. I cannot tell.

Lord President. Did Mr. Love move it?

Alford. Yes, my lord.

Love. Was I the first that did move it?

Alford. Truly I cannot tell that.

Att. Gen. Was it at that time that the letters were read?

Alford. It was at that time.

Lord President. And was Mr. Love there then? Alford. Yes it was at that time.

Att. Gen. Do you remember of any Declaration of the Kirk and State read at that time?

Alford. No indeed, I do not.

Lord President. You did say, that the letter did mention for arms?

Alford. But we did all, every one of us disallow that, but only the supply of their particular occasions.

Att. Gen. Was there no motion then made for a letter to be written to the Church of Scotland, to press them to union and moderation?

Alford. Not that I know of.

Att. Gen. Was there not a motion of sending 50*l.* to col. Graves? And what succeeded upon it?

Alford. I do not know of any particular, but only of the sum to be raised in respect of Titus.

Att. Gen. How should your 300*l.* be disposed of? Alford. That I cannot tell.

Att. Gen. For whom was it to be raised?

Alford. I told the court that it was proposed for Massey, and for Titus.

Att. Gen. Did you pay your money?

Alford. No, I did not pay it; for I went out of town presently: I did promise 10*l.* and 10*l.* I paid; but I cannot tell to whom I paid it, I believe it was paid by my man.

Att. Gen. Did he bring it to you upon account as paid?

Alford. I believe he did.

Att. Gen. What do you know more?

Alford. Truly nothing more.

Att. Gen. What do you know of any correspondence settled at Kendal?

Alford. Nothing at all.

Att. Gen. This was since Dunbar fight. Do you know of any letters that came from the Kirk, or Lowdon, or Argyle, or any of those?

Alford. No, I know nothing of that Love. You confess you went to Calais, and brought the copy of a letter from Titus: Did I send you to Titus?

Alford. No, I do not say you did.

Love. It is alledged by this gentleman, that it was sent out of my house: Did I write any letter by you when you went into Holland? And upon your coming home, you say the copy of a letter was read at my house: Will you swear I was in the room at the time when the letter was read? I was in my house, but did not I go often out and in? Sir, I do speak this, because some at the Committee said I went in and out often? Do you swear that I heard the letter read in my house?

Alford. Mr. Love, it was read in your study; but that you were there when the letter was read, I cannot tell.

Love. He says he cannot tell that I heard the letter read.

Alford. I cannot tell whether you might go out.

Love. How long ago was this letter?

Alford. I think it was at that time the king was at Jersey; I cannot remember the month, I think about two years ago.

Love. Was the letter sent to me, or was it received by me?

Alford. I did not say it was. I gave the paper I brought over from Titus to William Drake; and some two or three days after, when we did meet at your house, Mr. Drake read those papers; for he told me they were the same, but I cannot tell they were the same.

Love. I desire he may be asked, Whether I did give my consent to the sending the pretended Commission he speaks of?

Alford. Truly, there was not any man's particular assent asked that I know of.

Ld. Pres. Was it not agreed in the general, that it should be sent over?

Love. I pray ask him this question, Did not I dissent from sending the Commission?

Alford. I do not remember it.

Love. For the business of money, he saith, there was 2 or 300*l.* raised: Do you affirm I raised a penny?

Alford. I did not say it was raised, but I say it was there propounded to be raised.

Ld. Pres. This he did say, there was a proposal for the doing of it, and you did persuade the doing of it; and he left 10*l.* with his man afterwards.

Love. Ask him whether there was not a letter at that time read, that Massey was withdrawn at that time in discontent from the court?

Alford. I do not remember that particular.

Love. Ask him whether the money was sent to buy arms, or raise forces, or only to supply his wants, he not having a livelihood?

Alford. It was not for arms, but it was for Massey and Titus, to supply their necessities.

Love. But he proves not that I lent any.

Alford. I do not say you did.

Att. Gen. Observe, Sir, there was a Letter for Arms at Mr. Love's house read there, and

Mr. Love did propound 300*l.* to be raised, and pressed the doing of it accordingly. Major Alford did likewise lend 10*l.*; you may believe there hath been tampering with this Witness too. My lord, ask major Alford, whether there was not a letter brought to him by his sister?

Alford. My lord, after I had liberty for my wife to come to me, she did give me a paper, which I knew was my sister's hand; if I saw the thing, I could tell, but it did miscarry.

Captain Fisher. My lord, the messenger is here in the Court that did take the letter, of which this is the true Copy word for word.

[Major Alford withdraws, and major Huntington is called into the Court, and is sworn.]

Ld. Pres. What do you know about Mr. Love's house, about the Commission, and captain Titus?

Major Huntington. My lord, I can say that about March, 1648, I met with major Alford, and he told me, that Titus was in town, and asked me if I knew him, and I told him Ay; and asked him where he was? He said he was newly come from beyond sea, from the Fry, there being alderman Bunce. I asked him where he was; he said little to me; but he said he was to meet him the next day at the Swan at Dowgate; that there was to be some citizens in order to meet those gentlemen beyond the seas, to speak with him there. I did meet, and the citizens there were col. Barton, col. Vaughan, captain Massey, lieut. col. Bains, and I think Hollis his man, I am not certain of: but captain Far was there. The business at that time, was only commendations from their friends there; and to tell them that he was commended to their acquaintance. And afterwards, he grew into very high praises of the prince, and that he had the knowledge of it from a Scotch lord, I know not his name. After this he told them the prince was running very unhandsome courses, and they had very great hopes his own inclinations did not lead him to it, but it was the malignant party about him, that had a prevalency over him there, as over his father here; but he did rather incline to join with the Irish rebels, and did believe he would incline that way, unless he could get something from hence, to divert him from it: Whereupon he did hope they would all set themselves that way, and that he would get letters from persons of honour (whom I know not) that should persuade him into a good belief of the Scots, and to take the Covenant. After this, there was a meeting again, I think 14 days after, at the White Hart in Bread Street, and there I met too. In the time that I was there, I did understand there had been a meeting or two before, in order to the business; and capt. Titus did declare, he had now again letters from persons of honour, to send to my lord Piercy, and did hope they would set something a-foot amongst themselves of the like consequence: For Massey, Bunce, and Graves, could see no way under the heavens but for the king to take the Covenant, and join with the Scots, and to engage the covenanting party here. And to that purpose, he draws forth a paper that did purport, that they were bound in honour and justice, and conscience, and I think loyalty, to maintain him in his just rights, if he would go and join with the covenanting party in Scotland; and that he had no other way under God but that: Which if he did, they took themselves bound in conscience to help him to his just rights. Upon this lieut. col. Bains makes objection to it, and said it was a malignant business, and did fear there was no good design in the thing; and thereupon they did break up. I cannot tell whether it was sent or no, for they were afraid he would betray the business.—After that, I was told by major Alford, that Bains told them he was very sorry he should meddle in that business, and that they would never prosper that had any thing to do with him, for that the sins of him and his father were so great: Whereupon they were very wary, and afraid he would discover the business. And he, I think, knew no further. After this, I did understand this letter was sent to the Prince, and I was told so by major Alford, that it was sent in the name of the secluded members, and ministers, and citizens, and soldiery, and noblemen; I remember it fetched a great compass. Whereupon when the Prince saw this letter, and had it from my lord Piercy, he stormed at it, and said, Who are these noblemen, and the rest? What can they do for me? Can they raise me ten thousand men? Whereupon there was nothing done; but Titus retired himself to his mother's house, and there lived about three quarters of a year, and came to town after, and did solicit his own business. A little after this, I heard, upon the business of the Scots, that there was another letter sent, that did begin the thing again, and now the Prince had considered of the thing, and sent over the letter, and I heard that it was to the ministers of London. I did not see the letter, but Alford and Drake told me it was so. After this, Titus was sent away, and that with a sum of money, as I heard; who lent the money, I cannot tell, and what sum I know not: But presently after this, I coming to town out of the west in March, 1649, in the beginning of March, the day of my coming to London, after I had been here one or two days at most, I met with Hollis's man in Fleet-street: I do not know his name; he met me, and I asked him what news? He told me, he wondered that I was a stranger, and asked him what news? Saith he, If you come to Mr. Love's house, you shall hear news. What is your business there, said I? He said, it was to pray together, and to hear the news. I went about nine o'clock, and prayer was over, and the news a great part was over: But after I did come there, that I did hear was this: Wm. Drake pulled a paper out of his pocket, that I understood he had put into his pocket, or withdrawn, because of a stranger, and afterwards he took it out again. The substance of the Paper was to this purpose, as I remember; it was in characters, and pulled out of his pocket, and by him read: 'In the name of the Commissioners 'commissionating the lord Willoughby of Parham, major-gen. Massey, col. Graves, capt. 'Titus, and alderman Bunce, in order to the 'treaty, in the behalf of the well-affected party 'in England; and these to join with the Scotch 'commissioners, according to such instructions 'that should be therewith inclosed.' And somebody asked him, What power have we to give such a commission? It was answered again by Wm. Drake, that we have the king's command for it, and we have likewise the authority of some prudent Parliament-men, whom we look upon (saith he) beyond the power of them that now sit. Whereupon Mr. Love replies, Come, come, let it go; and after that I knew nothing.

Att. Gen. Repeat that again.

Huntington. When the question was asked, what power have we to send or give commission? saith Drake, we have the command of the king to do it; besides, we have the authority of secluded Members. Whereupon Mr. Love replied, Come, come, let it go.

Love. Pray ask him this one question, were there no speeches between William Drake's words, and those words he pretends were mine?

Huntington. I remember none.

[Huntington withdraws, lieut. col. Bains is called into the court, and is sworn.]

Ld. Pres. Speak what you know of this business.

Bains. My Lord, concerning any thing that came from Scotland, I never knew any thing, nor did I ever hear any thing. For Dowgate, I was at two meetings at Dowgate: at the first meeting there was a person that I did not know, which at the second meeting I was told was captain Titus; and he at that meeting, where there was nine, or ten, or more, or thereabouts, he did propose something to be done, in order to the restoring or preserving the Presbyterian interest, by way of application to the King, as he called him, and did advise it to be by way of petition, and that he conceived to be the only way to preserve the Presbyterian interest in England: and that way would be the way to assure him he had a considerable party in England. And he did use many arguments, as a duty lying upon us by our Covenant, to apply ourselves to him, and he offered to draw up a draught of a Petition against the next meeting to that purpose: and he said it was necessary something should be done by some parliament-men, and some ministers, and some citizens, that were leading men, men that thereby he might be assured that he had a party, and that considerable. At the next meeting, which was suddenly after, he did produce a paper, which, as I remember, was in short-hand; a Petition which was to the purpose I have hinted. There were several debates, whether it should be signed or not signed, and myself and two more disliked it; and before he read the paper, he began to commend the good-nature of the king, what good affections he had; and likewise did say, there was a necessity something should be done to the queen, and Jermin, and Piercy; who, he said, were our friends, that they should stir him up to comply with the Scotch commissioners. And upon this, there was myself, and two more there present (I hope it sat upon them as upon myself), disliked the business; and from that time, for my own part, I never heard any thing. The Heads of the Petition I cannot suddenly remember. This Paper carries the sum and substance of the business.

Bains. This Paper, if it be not interlined since, it was of my own dictating, and writ with my own hand. [He looks upon the paper.] I see no alteration made at all.

Ld. President. And this you deliver upon oath?

Bains. Yes, upon my oath, to the best of my remembrance. And as to the prisoner, I can say nothing.

[Bains withdraws. Major Adams is called into the court, and sworn.]

Ld. President. Declare your knowledge in this business.

Adams. Touching alderman Bunce and Mason, I know something by relation touching the correspondency with them.

Ld. President. Tell the manner of it.

Adams. I conceive it was carried on by Mr. Drake, that is now absent; and in Scotland, by one Bailey.

Att. Gen. What do you know of Mason, and of letters sent by him?

Adams. Mason I do know, and I do know he did receive letters.

Ld. President. From whom?

Adams. He said, from my lord Piercy.

Att. Gen. To whom were those letters communicated here?

Adams. They were communicated to Mr. Drake, and by Mr. Drake to myself, and Mr. Alford, and capt. Potter, and capt. Far.

Att. Gen. Was Mr. Love privy to it?

Adams. I cannot say that, my lord.

Att. Gen. Were there not letters sent to Scotland to them, and back again hither, about sending moderate propositions to the king?

Adams. There was such letters.

Ld. President. Who writ them?

Adams. That I cannot tell.

Ld. President. Had Mr. Love a hand in them?

Adams. I cannot say he had: I cannot prove a negative, I cannot say he had not.

Att. Gen. What know you of the Petition sent to the king?

Adams. I know nothing of it, only I was told of it.

Ld. President. Who told you of it?

Adams. I cannot, my lord, fix it upon any particular man, but I believe I was told of it by Alford, or Far, or Bains: for I was not there at that time.

Ld. President. What do you know about the meeting at the Swan at Dowgate?

Adams. My lord, I was not there.

Att. Gen. Then, my lord, he may tell you what he doth know.

Adams. My lord, upon our meeting in some place or other, I cannot tell where, I cannot tell the time, nor the place, but either at the Swan in Fish-street, or at the Swan at Dowgate, or in Cateaton-street: in one of these three places, I cannot punctually remember.

Att. Gen. Who was at that meeting?

Adams. Mr. William Drake, capt. Titus, major Alford, capt. Far, capt. Potter, and myself; and I do not know how many more, or whether any more or no.

Ld. President. What passed there?

Adams. It was there agreed, that captain Titus should go over to Jersey.

Att. Gen. What was he employed about?

Adams. The end of his going was to endeavour to work an agreement between the King and Scots, according to the Covenant; that was the end that was propounded. And in order to his going, we did agree to furnish him with money for the present, and made some kind of promise to maintain him while he was out.

Att. Gen. What money was he furnished with?

Adams. I cannot be punctual in that, but about a hundred pounds.

Att. Gen. Who should pay it.

Adams. I paid 20*l.* of it, but I cannot tell who paid the rest.

Att. Gen. To whom did you pay it?

Adams. To Mr. Drake.

Att. Gen. My lord, ask him, Whether when this was sent to Jersey, was there not a return made?

Ld. President. Well, go on: there was your twenty pounds gone?

Adams. This is the substance of what I can say of his going.

Att. Gen. Was this 20*l.* that you laid out of your own, or did you collect it of some of the rest, or did you gather any of it again?

Adams. I cannot say that I did.

Ld. President. Did you not?

Adams. My lord, I tell you the truth, I do not know whether I did or no; for I remember it was determined that we should gather it at that meeting.

Att. Gen. Did not Mr. Love know of the collection?

Adams. I cannot say he did; it may be he might, but I dare not say upon my oath that he knew of it.

Att. Gen. Ask him what return Titus made, what answer and what account he gave?

Adams. Major Alford went to Calais to meet Titus, and Titus did send word, that the Council of State heard of his being there, and thereupon desired that somebody might be sent over to him; for he had something to communicate, which he could not well do by writing, and thereupon Mr. Alford was sent.

Att. Gen. My lord, ask him where the letter was read?

Adams. The letter that Titus sent, was read by Mr. William Drake.

Att. Gen. Where?

Adams. At his house, as I think, for I cannot certainly remember. I did not say upon my examination, that it was read any where.

Att. Gen. Whether were not you moved to go?

Adams. There was some motion to that end, I think in Mr. Love's chamber.

Lord President. Who moved it, and where?

Adams. Who moved it, I cannot tell; it was moved, I think, in Mr. Love's chamber.

Att. Gen. Was Mr. Love there?

Adams. He was there.

Att. Gen. Did Mr. Love move it?

Adams. I cannot say he did.

Lord President. He will not say it.

Adams. I cannot say it upon my oath.

Attorn. Gen. My lord, so much he saith, That it was moved in Mr. Love's chamber; then he may give you an account of Mr. Alford's return, and where the account was given.

Adams. The return of Mr. Alford's account was given at Mr. Love's house.

Lord President. What was it?

Adams. The return he made in general was by a Narrative, and a copy of a Letter from the king. There was with the Narrative that which was said to be the copy of a letter from the king.

Lord President. What was the substance of that letter?

Adams. The contents of the letter, as I remember, was, First, He expressed a great deal of affection to the ministry of England in general, and promised great favour when he was in a condition to do it, and desired them to continue stedfast in the way they were in.

Att. Gen. Was this letter published at Mr. Love's study?

Adams. It was read.

Lord President. Was Mr. Love there?

Adams. Truly, to be positive that Mr. Love was there, I dare not say; but Mr. Love was there at that meeting, either at the beginning or ending; but whether the letter was read at Mr. Love's house, I dare not swear. The narrative from Titus was a very long one, and very well drawn. I cannot give an account of it now; the whole of it was after this manner: to give an account to us of all the transactions that happened since his going out of England, he did give an account of his usage by the cavalier party, that was against the king's agreement with the Scots, because there was some did incline to his agreement with them, and there was another party was much against it; and he gave a very large account of that. After that, he went on describing his disposition and condition.

Att. Gen. This was the substance of the rest. Was there not some propositions for giving of thanks to Titus, for his so well managing his affairs there?

Adams. There was a motion made by somebody.

Lord President. Who made the motion?

Adams. I cannot tell.

Att. Gen. Was not 100*l.* more to be sent agreed upon there? Adams. I think so.

Att. Gen. There was more money contributed: who agreed to lend any?

Adams. Sir, to that question, I cannot say who propounded it; but that there was money sent.

Lord President. Who contributed?

Adams. I did my share.

Lord President. How much was that?

Adams. As I remember, 10*l.*

Att. Gen. To whom did you pay it, and where did you pay it?

[Then they shewed him his Examination.]

Lord President. Come, look upon it, and be well advised.

Adams. I paid it to Mr. Drake, at his father's shop in Cheapside.

Att. Gen. Next, about the Commission and Instructions to be sent, what do you know of that? When this Letter was read from the king, and published in Mr. Love's study, whether was there not a Commission agreed upon, to give Instructions to treat with the king at Breda?

Adams. There was a motion made at Mr. Love's house, that there should be a Commission and Instructions drawn and sent. The motion was made at Mr. Love's house; they were there spoken of.

Lord President. By whom? Who did the dialogue run between? Did Mr. Love do it?

Adams. Truly, for my part, I did not then take such special notice, that I dare at this time, upon my oath, deliver any thing positively against any particular man; but generally all spake something, as I remember.

Att. Gen. Was there any debate to mend the Instructions?

Adams. Truly, sir, not as I remember.

Att. Gen. Did not Mr. Gibbons bring the rough draught of the Commission?

Adams. Truly, I think he did; as I remember, he did. I have spoken of the Commission and Instructions that were debated then and there; and that many of these persons, here mentioned, were there; but that some of them mentioned might not be there then, is very likely.

Att. Gen. Was Mr. Love there?

Adams. That he was there some part of this time, I am very confident.

Lord President. Was it in his study?

Adams. It was.

Att. Gen. Was there a Commission agreed upon to be sent?

Adams. For the word 'agreed,' I cannot tell what to say to it; 'agreed' holds forth as if a Vote passed.

Lord President. Was there not a general consent?

Adams. Being upon my oath, I desire to be cautious; for I must be tender in speaking the truth in this case; and I do not know what to make of the word 'agreed.'

Lord President. Was it approved of?

Adams. To my understanding, the thing was thus: That at such meetings as these we were not absolutely formal, as if we had been established by a court of justice to act thus; and that there should be prefaces, and such things, or such methods observed, as that any man undertook to make a preface either at the beginning or conclusion; but it was spoken to by many persons, and by every person spoken to; and in this sense it was agreed.

Att. Gen. Were there not Instructions agreed upon; and all this in Mr. Love's study?

Adams. It was so.

Lord President. Were they not read there?

Adams. I think they were.

Lord President. Who read them?

Adams. I cannot tell who read them; but they were read; and I think Mr. Drake read them.

Att. Gen. What was the contents of the Commission?

Adams. The contents or the substance of the Commission was to this effect: [This he reads out of his Examination.]

'We, the Presbyterians of England, do authorize you, the lord Willoughby of Parham, Edward Massey, Richard Graves, Syllas Titus, and James Bunce, to assist our brethren, the Scotch commissioners, in their Treaty with the King, according to the Instructions annexed.'

I dare not swear it in these words; but to this purpose it was. The substance of the Instructions were to use all the arguments they could, to move the king to give the Scotch satisfaction, and to take the Covenant. Such arguments were mentioned as the then condition of affairs best afforded, particularly how things stood in England at that time: which did all of them cry out for an agreement, and gave them full power as to all things; and what should be concluded by them should be confirmed by these here. But I cannot say so; but what words were, were to this purpose, saving this conclusion, That what was concluded should be confirmed here, I do not remember that.

Att. Gen. Was there not some debate by what warrant they should act in this Commission and Instructions?

Adams. There were some such words at the meeting.

Ld. President. What did Mr. Love say?

Adams. I cannot remember what Mr. Love did say; or whether he said any thing or nothing at that time: but that there were such words said, I have said; but by whom, I cannot fix it upon any particular person.

Att. Gen. Was it not debated by what warrant they should derive Power to themselves to send this Commission?

Adams. There was such language; but by whom, I cannot say; I think by William Drake. It was because the king had writ this letter, wherein he desired there should be such Instructions. There was something spoken of the secluded Members; but by whom I do not know. There was a proposition, whether the authority should be taken from the secluded Members, or from some other.

Att. Gen. Did not Mr. Love then say, Come, let it go on?

Adams. I dare not say so.

Att. Gen. Was it not propounded at the meeting to write to the queen, and to Jermin and Piercy for them to mediate with the king to agree with the Scots?

[Adams's Examination was here again read.]

Adams. My lord, so much of this as I think to be true, I shall own.

Att. Gen. Was not a letter writ from Piercy, that a considerable sum of money was fit to be sent to the king? And what answer was given? Was it not to be done till the king and the Scots should agree, and then to raise the money?

Adams. That there was such a letter writ, I must needs acknowledge.

Att. Gen. Where was it read? At Mr. Love's house?

Adams. No, certainly: I only saw it in Mason's own hands; and I remember he shewed it me.

Att. Gen. Next, ask him, whether there was not a letter written about August last to some here, that Massey had back-friends in Scotland, complaining he could not be promoted there?

Adams. I did understand there was such a letter; but by what way I do not know.

Att. Gen. Was not the letter communicated at Mr. Love's house? And were not you present when this letter was read at Mr. Love's house, wherein Massey complained he had back-friends in Scotland?

Adams. No, certainly: that letter was not to my remembrance read there, I heard of such a letter, but saw it not.

Att. Gen. My lord, ask him, whether he was not appointed to draw up some letters?

Adams. There were some I should have had a hand in drawing.

Att. Gen. Who were appointed with you?

Adams. As I remember, Captain Potter, Captain Massey, and Mr. Gibbons.

Att. Gen. But was there no meeting upon it? Was Mr. Love named?

Adams. Mr. Love was not named.

Att. Gen. Was there not one Sterks, a Scotch agent here, that kept intelligence from Scotland?

Adams. I know there was such a one, we took to be an agent here.

Ld. President. Did he meet at your meetings?

Adams. Yes, he did meet sometimes.

Att. Gen. Was he at Mr. Love's house at any time?

Adams. That he was.

Att. Gen. When the act came forth for banishing the Scots, was there not a collection for his charges? And were not you at Mr. Love's house when it was agreed to?

Adams. I was not.

Att. Gen. Did you contribute money?

Adams. I did contribute ten or twelve shillings; I cannot tell which.

Att. Gen. What discourse upon Dunbar fight was there from this person that is already spoken of?

Adams. This is the thing: if you please to help my memory; for there are so many particulars in this correspondence, that I cannot tell whereabouts it is I am to speak to; I am very uncertain whereabouts it is I am to speak to.

Ld. President. Speak the certainty as it is in your breast.

Adams. My lord, if it be doubtful to me, how can I be certain, and charge it upon my memory?

Ld. President. Speak the truth.

Adams. I will speak the truth.

Ld. President. Do so then.

[Here again Adams looks upon his Examination.]

Adams. There is some of it I did set down, that I dare not own upon my oath: I then did deliver it so, when I set it down.

Att. Gen. Did Mr. Love know that this Scotchman was the Scotch agent? Did you not take notice that Mr. Love took notice of him?

Adams. I do think he did; as far as I understand, he did.

Att. Gen. Did not Mr. Love generally tell you the cause of the meetings?

Adams. No, Sir.

Att. Gen. Did you not hear Mr. Love say, that this Sterks was the Scotch agent.

Adams. I never heard Mr. Love say so; but I knew this, that by our usual meetings Mr. Love did understand him, as I did, to be the Scotch agent.

Att. Gen. How often did you meet at Mr. Love's house?

Adams. I cannot tell: It may be seven, or eight, or ten times: an uncertain time.

Att. Gen. He was at Mr. Love's study?

Adams. Whether so many times, I know not.

Att. Gen. My lord, ask him, whether it was not at Mr. Love's study, when money was propounded to be raised for Massey and Titus?

Ld. President. Was that in Mr. Love's study?

Adams. I cannot tell whether it was in his study, or in the lower room: I am apt to believe it was in the lower room.

Att. Gen. Was Mr. Love there?

Adams. Certainly he was there.

Ld. President. What was the contents of the letter?

Adams. The contents of the letter I cannot remember.

Att. Gen. Whether did it not declare the poverty of his condition? And was it not after Dunbar fight?

Adams. Yes, it was.

Att. Gen. Was this letter from Massey read at Master Love's house? Was this for money?—Adams. It was.

Ld. President. Was it agreed for money to be raised?

Adams. If you take the word 'agreed' as I formerly propounded, it was so.

Att. Gen. How was the money to be raised, and in what manner?

Adams. It was by those that were privy to the contribution.

Att. Gen. Was not Mr. Love there? And did not he write down the sums that were to be contributed?

Adams. This I must needs say, That master Love had papers in his hand, and he did write something; but I did not see what he did write: And every man did write that was there.

Att. Gen. Did not you conceive so, That master Love summed up every man's sum? Did he put the letter of their names before them, when he writ the sums?

Adams. I cannot say that.

Att. Gen. Was not there a letter penned by master Love and doctor Drake?

Adams. To that question, I must say there was a letter; but I cannot deliver it upon my oath that it was penned by master Love or doctor Drake: But it was taken to be so; and I thought it was so.

Att. Gen. To whom was that letter directed?—Adams. I cannot tell to whom.

Att. Gen. To whom was it declared to be directed? To whom was it declared to be written?

Adams. To the General Assembly and Kirk of Scotland.

Lord President. Was this at Mr. Love's house too?—Adams. It was so.

Att. Gen. Was Mr. Love present, and did approve of it?

Adams. Mr. Love was present at some time of this meeting. The reason why I thought it to be of master Love's or doctor Drake's drawing, was nothing but merely the language of it, it being in order to promote the ends of the Covenant; and all the whole language was couched to that purpose; and taking notice of the want of respect to Massey and the English, and of their being beaten.

Att. Gen. My lord, this is very high: For he tells you this letter was approved of, and directed to be sent; and this was after Dunbar fight, after we were engaged in blood.

Adams. There was also a large letter, in the nature of a Declaration, penned by master Love and Dr. Drake, and approved of by me of the Presbyterian party, ministers, and others, and directed to the General Assembly and Kirk of Scotland, subscribed by none: Which contained the substance of what was declared by Titus and Massey; but durst not promise any great sums of money till they appeared more considerable, and grew nearer action. The business required higher spirits than was for the present; and the business required a considerable sum: But to leave no means unattempted when the business was feasible. [So far he reads.]

Att. Gen. Major Adams is now upon his oath to tell you.

Adams. My lord, as well as I remember, it did put forth much after this sort: But I cannot swear it in these words; but that is the substance of it.

Att. Gen. Was not this agreed and declared at Mr. Love's house, that such a letter should be written to the honourable committee, and to the Kirk?

Adams. I answer that, after the same manner as all other things are agreed at such meetings as this is: But I have no ground, and do not know why I should say master Love and Dr. Drake penned it.

Att. Gen. Ask him for the substance of the letter; whether it were not as he hath told you; and whether he did not say they could not promise a considerable sum of money.

Adams. Certainly, either in that letter, or some other, there was some such expressions.

Lord President. Well, it was about that time, and in that letter, or in some other letter, and at Mr. Love's house.

Att. Gen. My lord, ask him if there was not an agent come from Scotland, and a way laid at Kendal for a correspondency between these gentlemen here and some of Scotland; and whether one Groves was not sent thither.

Adams. That was something obscure: That there was such a thing, I do verily believe, because it went amongst us for a truth; but how to make it out for a truth, upon my oath I cannot tell.

Lord President. Did Mr. Love know of it?

Adams. I do not know.

Att. Gen. Ask him what he knows concerning col. Bamfield's man coming hither.

Adams. Concerning that, I know nothing: But I confess I had some item that at that time there was something found. And this is all I can say to that; I cannot guess the time.

Att. Gen. Was it after the fight at Dunbar?

Adams. Yes, that it was.

Att. Gen. Were there meetings at Mr. Love's house?

Adams. I cannot say all: But all that I know of were.

Att. Gen. Ask whether upon the large letter Massey did not write that things were well settled in Scotland.

Adams. Many of these things were understood so, and taken for granted amongst us; but I can say no otherwise: I thought it to be so; but I know not.

Att. Gen. Were you not present at Mr. Love's house, when these letters were read, that they were in a hopeful condition?

Adams. I cannot say so.

Lord President. What can you say?

Adams. As before, That it went for a truth amongst us: And that is as much as I can say to it.

Att. Gen. Was there not a large letter inviting your friends to union?

Adams. I understand the other letter to be this you propound to me now.

Att. Gen. Now we speak of a letter from alderman Bunce, and others.

Adams. I cannot speak particularly to that; for I did not see them; but they were told me by one or other of those that were of the correspondency: And this is all I can say.

Lord President. What is the truth? Do you conceive it is so?

Att. Gen. My lord, we shall not trouble him with that. My lord, ask him one question more: What did Mr. Love tell you, that if the Presbyterians got the upper hand again?

Adams. Those words, I think, did but amount to this, That if the Presbyterians were in arms again, by the blessing of God, the cavaliering party might be prevented from getting the day.

Lord President. Who do you mean by the correspondents?

Adams. By correspondents I mean Alford, Potter, Far, &c.

Lord President. Was not Mr. Love one of them?

Adams. I took him to be so, my lord.

Love. My lord, I pray ask him, whether any of these pretended or supposed letters were ever received by me, any one of them, or that I writ one of them, or mended one of them.

Adams. I cannot say that ever I saw him do any such thing; nor did I ever see him write any.

Lord President. But you saw the letters there?—Adams. That I have said.

Love. Ask him whether I gave my consent to the sending away of this he calls a Commission and Instructions, about the time of the Treaty at Breda.

Adams. No, I will not swear that; and upon my oath I cannot.

Lord President. Will you not? I will press you to nothing. You said even now, you did not know he did send them away; but you did say he was privy to them, and to the debates of them. Did he declare any dissent?

Adams. I cannot say that.

Love. Will you ask him this question? Whether he read the letters that he pretends were sent into England or Scotland, or whether he heard them read?

Lord President. That he swears.

Adams. I did not swear that these were the contents of them exactly: I was there when these letters were read.

Love. He only heard them read.

Lord President. If there were half a score that had correspondency, and received letters, and come together, and one of the most confiding men read them; will any man say that he will not believe these were right read? Such a bear-say as this, is such a bear-say as you may take notice of.

Love. But let him prove how it was a correspondency on my part.

Adams. I did not say that Mr. Love was one of the correspondents; I deny that I said so: I said I conceived him to be so; but that is not that he was so.

Ld. President. They did debate together, and met together, and received Instructions; and therefore he may very aply conceive he was a correspondent.

Love. Doth he swear that I assented?

Adams. I did not swear so.

Love. He saith money was sent to Titus; pray ask him whether by agents I employed.

Adams. I cannot say so.

Love. Here is no proof at all that ever I received a letter, or writ or sent any letter. Pray ask him if I knew before they came to my house, that they would bring such letters with them. Do you swear that I was present in the room at the time that the letters after the defeat at Dunbar were sent, wherein there was, as you say, a promise of assistance?

Adams. You were there some part of the while.

Love. Ask him whether he was not threatened with death in case he would not, and promised favour in case he would, bring in evidence against me.

Adams. I cannot say I was threatened with death to that end.

Love. I shall bring a witness that shall prove from his mouth, that he hath confessed, if he did not bring in evidence against me, he should be hanged.

Adams. It is true, Percival did come to me, and I did say to him, that upon examination, I did say, if I were not ingenuous, I was threatened to be hanged.

Att. Gen. When a man is a traitor, and doth confess, he deserves mercy.

Love. Ask him whether he hath not received money to give in this information against me.—Adams. I have not.

Love. Did not some messenger come to you, some months ago, from some members of the Council of State, and told you you were poor, and should be ruined if you did not confess it? He had three messengers sent unto him from the Council of State, or some of them, that told him, if he would not confess, he should be ruined.

Att. Gen. Did you receive money, or were there promises made to you, to testify against Mr. Love?

Adams. Upon my oath I did not.

Love. Hath he never come to Mr. Scot's chamber? Did he not come a month before I was committed, being brought there by major Cobbet? And whether he hath not received money from major Cobbet? I desire that major Cobbet may be called upon his oath, to know whether he hath not given him money to bring in information against me: For he hath taken notice of all facts, and of all things done, and hath brought all to Mr. Scot. I know, by information, that this Adams is a hired witness. Sir, this man is a Tobiah and a Sauballat: Some men have hired this man against me. I desire major Cobbet may be called.

Ld. President. He did, and might do it: But did he it to testify against Mr. Love? I hope a state, that watches the nation, may watch for the safety of a nation.

[Mr. Cobbet, a major of the army, is called into the court, and is sworn.]

Love. Pray ask him whether he hath not at any time, within this three months, given any money to major Adams, to acquaint Mr. Scot, or the Council of State, with this design, as it is called.

Cobbet. My lord, I must and do deny that which this gentleman doth aver: And truly I wonder at his boldness, in the presence of this honourable court. I do know major Adams, and have known him a long while; and commiserating him, as being a prisoner, I lent him ten pounds; but for no consideration that he should betray Mr. Love, or any man. I paid the money to his wife.

Love. He paid it, he saith; how then did he lend it? And he paid it to his wife: That was to cover the bribery. But did not you discover to this man, if he would reveal it to Mr. Scot, what recompence he should have of him? Did not you, walking in the fields with him, desire him to reveal what he knew; and promised him if he did, he should be a man preferred?

Cobbet. I have been acquainted with major Adams this four or five years, and met with him in the behalf of the Presbyters, understanding there was something was driven on dangerous to the commonwealth; and I thought I was bound in duty to requite them, if it were possible, for their pains of discovery. And I laboured with him that he would deal so honestly with himself and the commonwealth, as to let the commonwealth know what he did know of this design. Accordingly, he gave me some notice; and I said to him, major Adams, if I find you ingenuous, if there can be any thing that I can do for you, I shall be ready to serve you by night and by day.

Love. It appears then that the Ten Pounds was not lent to major Adams, but was paid him for his discovery: So that it is clear he is a hired witness. And have you not brought him to Mr. Scot's chamber with promises of preferment?

[No answer to that question.]

[The lieutenant of the Tower is commanded to withdraw his prisoner; and the court adjourns till to-morrow.]

The Second Day's Proceedings, July 21, 1651.

The Court being sat, col. West, Lieutenant of the Tower, was commanded to bring forth his Prisoner; and Mr. Love was brought to the bar.

Master Jaquel was called into the Court, and the Clerk tendered him his oath; and Mr. Jaquel spake to the Court to this purpose: That there were many oaths abroad, and he could not tell what to say to them; and he desired to be excused. The Lord President told him, that he could not be excused. Mr. Jaquel said he was a Prisoner, accused of the same offences that Mr. Love was accused of; and that he conceived he was not a competent witness against him. The Court again pressed him to take his oath. Mr. Jaquel said that he durst not in conscience swear against Mr. Love; and therefore desired it might not be pressed upon him. The Court still persisted in it, that he must take his oath, and witness what he knew. He answered, he would speak the truth of what he knew, as well as if he was under an oath. The Court told him that could not be; for if he did not swear, what he should say could not be received as any thing in matter of Evidence. Mr. Jaquel still persisted in his refusal. When the Court saw he could not be otherwise prevailed with, they fined him 500*l.* for refusing to swear. And Mr. Jaquel, after he was withdrawn out of the Court, was called in again, and pressed to take his oath; and was told that the Court had fined him 500*l.* for refusing to swear; and again asked him whether he would swear. Mr. Jaquel then, when the oath was read to him, did not swear in that manner as the other witnesses did, but only put his hand to his buttons. And when Mr. Love asked him whether he was under an oath, he answered that he was as good as under an oath. But the Court not being satisfied with that answer, pressed him further; and then he did say he was sworn, and was under oath.

Ld. Pres. Declare now what you know of this business.

Mr. Jaquel. My lord, for the paper I was examined about, as for knowing Titus, I never saw him in my life but one quarter of an hour in a private house, and I knew nothing of his business any where. For the other, Alford coming over with letters, I was at Mr. Love's house, and when I was there, there were several men there.

Att. Gen. In what part of Mr. Love's house?

Jaquel. I conceive in his chamber; for I went up to several that were there, whose names I can positively say, for two or three of them, though I cannot remember the other absolutely, though I conceive most I have named in my examination were there; capt. Potter was there, and Dr. Drake and major Alford, and Mr. Love was there sometimes, though divers times he went out, some coming to speak with him.

VOL. V.

Att. Gen. Was there not a copy of a letter, said to be sent from the king, read there?

Jaquel. I remember no such thing.

Att. Gen. Was there not a Narrative?

Jaquel. Yes, from Titus, wherein he declared the king's inclinations to make peace with the Scots, but that his wicked council about him did hinder it.

Att. Gen. Was not this of what Titus had related from Jersey, the Narrative of what had passed between him and the king there?

Jaquel. I think it was.

Att. Gen. Was not major Alford sent to receive an account from him at Calais?

Jaquel. William Drake did tell me so afterwards.

Att. Gen. Did major Alford deliver no account there?

Jaquel. I think it was major Alford read the Narrative.

Att. Gen. Did he make no relation by word of mouth?

Jaquel. Truly I cannot remember.

Att. Gen. You cannot remember it was read?

Jaquel. I am sure it was read, and at Mr. Love's house.

Att. Gen. And he was present sometimes?

Jaquel. Yes, sometimes.

Att. Gen. What money was there agreed upon to be provided for Titus?

Jaquel. I know of none; it was moved by captain Potter, that there might be 40*l.*, but I know of none; nor was it agreed by Mr. Love, Mr. Drake, or myself, that we should lay down any at all.

Att. Gen. Did you not meet with William Drake, and desire to go along with him to see Titus?

Jaquel. I did so, but I think Drake desired it: I met him in Newgate-Market, and, saith he, I am going to see Titus, go along with me. I said I never saw him, nor did I know him: Says he, You shall not stay at all. Whereupon he went and found him in a cheesemonger's house in Newgate-Market.

Att. Gen. What discourse had you?

Jaquel. He said he was newly come out of Holland, and he had been with the king, and he was a man of excellent parts for his years; and that he was inclinable to what was good, but that he had such desperate evil council about him; and that he did much pity him, and that his clergy especially was wicked: and he propounded nothing to us, nor did I ever see his face afterwards; and this is about two years and a half ago. And for any other meetings at the Swan-Tavern, or for any agents, I never met him, or saw him.

Att. Gen. Do you not remember at any meeting, that there was money propounded for captain Titus, or for Alford's being sent over to Calais? Speak what you know of that, and by whom it was told you.

Jaquel. Major Alford himself told me he was to meet his son, and he went over upon that score; but after he was gone, William

I

Drake told me he was gone to see or meet captain Titus, I am not certain of the words: and when he did come again, which was the next time I heard of him, then William Drake comes to me, and desired me to go along with him, for I think he went up and down to every man.

Att. Gen. You think then that Wm. Drake was the prime man.

Jaquel. Yes, he was the actor and agent that moved all.

Att. Gen. When Alford returned, he desired you to go with him.

Jaquel. To Mr. Love's house.

Att. Gen. What was done at Mr. Love's house?

Jaquel. There were some papers read, which Alford as I take it, read, or William Drake, I am not certain which; but read it was of a relation, that Titus came out of Jersey, and had seen the king there, and the Scotch commissioners; and that the king had a great inclination to agree with the Scotch commissioners; and that he was a man of excellent inclinations and parts, and had a great desire to agree; but his council, and wicked crew about him, would not let him: and he said, as I remember, that the king was a kind of a prisoner with them there, and said, his council did hinder him, or else, if he were from them, he would agree with the Scotch commissioners.

Att. Gen. You say this paper was read, this narrative was read in Mr. Love's house; was not Mr. Love present?

Jaquel. I am not able to say he was: when I came in, I remember he was not in the room, and he was there two or three times while I was there, but he was several times called out.

Att. Gen. Do not you know there was an agreement of a letter written back to Titus.

Jaquel. I can remember no such thing, but I think William Drake told me so, as I remember, but that was two years ago, I do verily believe by what I conceived, was of his writing.

Ld. Pres. I could wish that men's consciences could not be scrupled to believe so much of a minister, more than of a magistrate: I hold it pernicious doctrine for any man to think he is bound more to obey the minister than the magistrate; I ask you then before the magistrate here who was present at that meeting?

Jaquel. William Drake, I am sure, and major Alford was there, and capt. Potter, and several others, as I remember Master Jenkins.

Att. Gen. This was in Mr. Love's house, was it not in his study?

Jaquel. I cannot tell that. I say as I conceive, that Master Jenkins and Master Case were there, but positively I cannot say it; and Mr. Jackson and Mr. Nalton I think.

Att. Gen. What say you of Mr. Watson?

Jaquel. I think he was there.

Att. Gen. What say you of Mr. Herring?

Jaquel. I think he was.

Att. Gen. What say you of Mr. Cauton?

Jaquel. In truth I cannot tell.

Att. Gen. What say you of Mr. Robinson?

Jaquel. I think he was.

Att. Gen. What say you of Mr. Drake?

Jaquel. Yes.

Att. Gen. Was colonel Vaughan there?

Jaquel. Yes, I conceive he was there.

Att. Gen. Was Mr. Jackson there?

Jaquel. Yes.

Att. Gen. Were capt. Far and capt. Potter there?—Jaquel. I believe so.

Att. Gen. Was Mr. Gibbons there?

Jaquel. I cannot tell.

Att. Gen. What say you of Mr. Sterks?

Jaquel. No, Sir, I do not know it.

Att. Gen. Did you not know him to be the Scotch agent? Was he not taken among you to be an agent from Scotland?

Jaquel. Yes, he was a Scotchman.

Att. Gen. And for contribution of money, what money did you pay, and to whom?

Jaquel. Two five pounds to Mr. Drake.

Att. Gen. For what use?

Jaquel. For charitable uses.

Att. Gen. Then he asked it of you so, or for that purpose; but afterwards, what did you learn it was employed about?

Jaquel. Sir, he did not tell me how he did employ this money; but afterwards I heard him say, that he had sent Titus money.

Att. Gen. What did you contribute to Sterk's going into Scotland?

Jaquel. Ten shillings.

Att. Gen. And who else did contribute, that was there? And how much was the sum that was collected?

Jaquel. I cannot tell.

Att. Gen. How much do you guess, or have heard?

Jaquel. Four or five pounds, I think.

Att. Gen. Ask him, who gave the Scotchmen money?

Jaquel. Truly I did give several Scotchmen money, both to poor ministers, and others that were banished by the act, because I knew they were very poor, and knew not how to get away; and I did it out of charity towards them.

Ld. President. Because the state had an ill opinion of them, therefore you had a good opinion of them.

Jaquel. There was one minister that had twelve children that was banished.

Att. Gen. Were you at any meetings at Mr. Love's after Dunbar fight?

Jaquel. No, not I.

Att. Gen. At what fasts were you at? And who officiated at those fasts?

Jaquel. I was at major Adams's and colonel Barton's.

Att. Gen. Who did exercise at those fasts? Was Mr. Love, Mr. Jenkins, Mr. Case, any of them?

Jaquel. I believe they were, I conceive so, I profess I cannot remember: I believe Mr. Jenkins was there.

Att. Gen. Was not Mr. Love one of them?

Jaquel. Yes, he was.

Att. Gen. What was the occasion of those fasts?

Jaquel. I know no particular occasion, but for the good of the two nations.

Att. Gen. How do you know they were for the good of the two nations? Was it not for an agreement between the king and the Scots?

Jaquel. I confess it was for the good of both nations, as both nations are the church of God, and both profess themselves protestants, and of one religion; and I conceived it was my duty to pray for the good of them both.

Att. Gen. But was there not some expressions for a blessing upon the treaty at Breda?

Jaquel. I cannot remember such expressions; for in such duties I desired to have my heart lifted up unto God: And, my lord, it is a great while ago.

Ld. President. Will you say your heart is lifted up unto God, when your understanding is in your heels?

Jaquel. My lord, I do not remember one passage in prayer a week after.

Att. Gen. That is in ordinary meetings, but this is for both nations: but by what did you know that this was for the good of both nations, and why was it pretended to be for the good of both? And, my lord, why they should not meet before, but just at that time, and at a private fast?

Jaquel. I think, that since the nations of England and Scotland were at odds, I have been at twenty fasts.

Att. Gen. My lord, ask him, Whether he were not late with Potter, and did not meet with him about letters from Bamfield, and whether they went to read them?

Jaquel. This was about February or March last, he told me he received letters, and desired me to go along with him to Mr. Love's, and after Dr. Drake came in, and then these letters were read; and I profess I know not from whence they came, nor the man; and so did Mr. Love declare, That he never saw, nor knew, nor heard of Bamfield before.

Att. Gen. Did he not make mention of parties in Scotland, That one party was for the King, and another for the King and Kirk, and a third neither for King nor Kirk?

Jaquel. Yes.

Att. Gen. But who were those he named, that were men for the King?

Jaquel. I think Hamilton, and his party.

Att. Gen. And who for the King and Kirk?

Jaquel. Argyle and Lesley.

Att. Gen. And who neither for King nor Kirk?—Jaquel. Straughan and Car.

Att. Gen. What did he tell you of the young king's escaping?

Jaquel. Something there was in that, but he was fetched back again.

Att. Gen. What said he of Argyle?

Jaquel. Nothing at all, as I remember.

Att. Gen. Was there not an expression, That they were now agreed to receive in the whole nation, unless it were those that were notoriously scandalous and excommunicated?

Jaquel. I believe there was.

Att. Gen. Did it not mention 5,000*l.* for providing of shipping?

Jaquel. Yes, in the narrative or letter, whether there related at that time, I know not.

Att. Gen. And what mention was there made, who were fit to command in England, if that party should come from thence into England?

Jaquel. I conceive there were three noble-men.

Att. Gen. Name them.

Jaquel. My lord of Suffolk, my lord of Warwick, and my lord of Manchester, or either of them.

Att. Gen. That was propounded by Bamfield; but I hope those lords were more noble than to do any such thing. Was there not another letter that came with that of Bamfield's, sent by my lord Argyle, and it was only, That there should be an approbation of him? And was this letter likewise read at the same time, and at the same place?—Jaquel. Yes, my lord.

Att. Gen. What was then propounded for money to be raised for Bamfield?

Jaquel. Truly, capt. Potter did make mention for 40*l.* to be raised, 10*l.* for col. Bamfield's man, and 30*l.* for Bamfield himself: but that business at the reading was wholly declined, and absolutely refused by all, to act any thing in that relation in which it was sent over. Whereupon capt. Potter did move, That if nothing were done in that, whether it were not convenient to send the messenger something to bear his charges: says he, If you will pay the messenger 10*l.* and send Bamfield 30*l.* I will give the messenger the 10*l.* But there was no agreement, nor conclusion I know of, no bill of exchange was sent, but capt. Potter said he would lay down 10*l.*

Att. Gen. But no body spake against capt. Potter's laying down of 10*l.*; and it was propounded to you to lend 10*l.*, and you said, you would consider of it: But did Potter lend it?

Jaquel. I cannot tell that, my lord, he said he would do it.

Att. Gen. My lord, let now Master Jaquel tell you what was the cause why they did refuse to do any thing in the letter about 5,000*l.*; what was the cause upon the debate between you at Mr. Love's house, why you did refuse to do any thing about the 5,000*l.*

Jaquel. The debate was soon over, for we absolutely refused it, we would not meddle in it, not liking the business; it was a trouble, I am confident, to them that heard it read.

Att. Gen. You do not remember that ever any body did acquaint the magistrate with the design in working from Scotland?

Jaquel. No, not I.

Att. Gen. Did not some say, that Bamfield was a Malignant?

Jaquel. I cannot tell, but I never heard of him before.

Att. Gen. Were you not told he was a Cavalier, and of the king's side, and that that was the true reason why they would not trust him?

Jaquel. I do not remember any such thing.

Att. Gen. Did Mr. Love agree for 10*l.* for Bamfield's man, and 30*l.* for Bamfield?

Jaquel. No, I cannot say so.

Att. Gen. Did not major Alford tell you, upon his return from Calais, That he was sent thither to take an account from thence?

Jaquel. He did not, but Wm. Drake did tell me that he was gone to Calais to speak with capt. Titus.

Att. Gen. And to take an account of the transaction of Jersey?

Jaquel. Truly, Sir, I cannot say that; but Wm. Drake told me he was gone thither to speak with Titus: and this is above two years ago that Wm. Drake told me so.

Att. Gen. To what end?

Jaquel. To tell and hear news.

Att. Gen. What did he do more?

Jaquel. I profess in the presence of God, I cannot tell, Sir, I beseech you; for in the paper, I told you before, there were some circumstances, and something that I cannot say; but it was to this purpose, To speak with Titus, to hear the news from Jersey; but I cannot say certainly that word.

Att. Gen. We do not press you to the word, but to the effect of it: My lord, I think Mr. Jaquel hath given an account already, that this relation was at Mr. Love's house. Mr. Jaquel, let me bring one thing to your remembrance, if it be true: At your meeting at Mr. Love's house upon this business of Bamfield's Narrative, you say, 30*l.* was moved to be sent to Bamfield, and 10*l.* to his man.

Jaquel. Yes, by capt. Potter.

Att. Gen. And when it was then said, it was thought fit by Mr. Love, Mr. Drake, and capt. Potter, that it should be so done; whether did you not all agree it should be so done?

Jaquel. No, there was no agreement, but it was thought convenient, or to that purpose.

Att. Gen. It was thought convenient by all the company present?

Jaquel. Truly, Sir, there was not much regard taken in that business, nor was there much done; for we did not stay long, but there were such words.

Att. Gen. But by all present?

Jaquel. Yes, there were such words.

Att. Gen. Whether were not some friends at dinner at Dowgate, and was not Mason there?

Jaquel. My lord, there was a gentleman there, I cannot say who he was, nor did I see him before or since.

Att. Gen. Who did they tell you he was? Did they not tell you Mason?

Jaquel. I profess I cannot remember that, nor can I tell, but I conceive it was so.

Att. Gen. In your Examination you say it was Mason.

Jaquel. I said, I conceived so.

Att. Gen. Why did you believe so?

Jaquel. I cannot tell, but as I remember, Wm. Drake told me so.

Att. Gen. Whether when Bamfield's letter came, and the letters from my lord of Argyle, Lowdon, and others came, was there not a letter from Bailey?

Jaquel. I do not remember, my lord.

Att. Gen. Nor from the General Assembly?

Jaquel. I do not remember any such thing.

Att. Gen. Bethink yourself, you are upon your oath, whether he that brought the letters from Bamfield, did not bring letters from Bailey, and from the General Assembly?

Jaquel. I cannot remember there was any such thing spoken of there.

Att. Gen. Was there no expression of letters of thanks for the good affection of the Presbyterian party here, and encouragement to persevere?

Jaquel. I do not remember any such thing.

Att. Gen. Were there no promises, that when they by their endeavours should get a free Parliament in England, that they would reimburse all that was laid out?

Jaquel. I do remember no such thing.

Love. I would ask him some questions; and the first is, Whether he hath spoken this as a mere relation, or whether he owns all this he hath spoken, as under an oath.

Att. Gen. We are past that, my lord, he did say, he was under an oath.

Love. If he say so, I am concluded.

[Mr. Jaquel made no Answer to this.]

Lord President. You have asked two Questions; in a few words: for the first, Whether he spake it under an oath? You know that time was spent to declare it before he began: if you ask of his own knowledge, you mistook it; for he saith something he hath by relation, and some that he knows. This he hath taken notice of, what should we further examine over the same thing; for he saith some of his own knowledge, some by relation from particular parties, and some from parties he calls not now to mind; and it was declared by the court, that he was a witness, and the court accepted him.

Love. I desire your lordship to ask him this question, whether the supposed Narrative that he speaks of, that Alford said he brought over, and read at my house, was read at my house; or only by Alford, and so brought over as news?

Jaquel. In truth, my lord, I cannot tell that.

Love. He speaks of Sterks a Scotchman; I desire your lordship to know whether he knows, or can affirm by the oath you say he hath taken, that he was a Scotch agent.

[No Answer to that Question.]

Love. Sir, ask him this question; he mentions a Fast at major Adams's, or col. Barton's and that for the good of both nations, because he thought they were the Church of God: whether there was any intimation in that meeting, that it was under this notion, for the good of both nations; whether that meeting was for the Scotch nation to invade the English nation?

[No Answer to that question.]

Love. He said (if I have taken him rightly, and if not, I desire your notaries to inform me better), that Mr. Love did not agree to such a sum as forty pounds, and afterwards he said, that all there said it was convenient: now I would ask how these two can agree together?

Lord President. You are right; for the thing of agreement he disclaimed totally.

Love. Then I did not agree to it.

Lord President. No, nor any else.

Love. But afterwards he says, that they did conceive it was convenient. Now I pray ask him, how he knew that I thought it was convenient?

Jaquel. I cannot say any thing that Mr. Love did say it was convenient; but it was not dissented from nor spoken against by any, as I remember.

[Mr. Jaquel withdraws. Col. Barton is called into the court, and is sworn.]

Att. Gen. My lord, let col. Barton tell you what he knows of the meeting at the Swan at Dowgate.

Col. Barton. My lord, I was there a little while after the death of the late king. I was going into Cannon-street, and met with William Drake; he desired me to go with him to the Swan at Dowgate. I told him I had a little business in Cannon-street, and I would be there by and by. I staid about half an hour about my business, and went then to the Swan at Dowgate, and there was to my best remembrance (for positively I cannot say) Wm. Drake, and one a stranger, major Huntington, and lieut. col. Bains; and there was one capt. Titus, as was said, and major Alford, and I do not remember who else were there. My lord, at that time truly I was under a defect in my hearing, and since that I have lost an ear, through a huge heat, and cold taken. But, my lord, I not coming but to the middle of the discourse they had, and not perfectly hearing, could not well judge of their discourse: but afterwards I asked Wm. Drake, what the intent of the meeting was? He told me, that their intentions were to make some addresses or applications (some such word it was) unto the Prince, to take him off from his malignant or evil council about him, and to put him upon such as would be honester and better counselors. And this is the substance of what I then understood from Wm. Drake. My lord, I think two or three days afterwards, I know not which, there was a meeting again at the White-Hart in Basing-lane-end, at the corner of Bread-street. There were, I think, most of them that I have named at the first meeting: I am sure William Drake was there, and capt. Titus, and lieut. col. Bains, and major Huntington; I cannot tell whether Mr. Alford was there or no, but these I am sure were there. I did not come to the beginning of that meeting neither, the paper had been read before I came in, to my best remembrance: but I asked Wm. Drake what was the meaning of that meeting? He told me, it was to the same effect that they spake of before; and they had thoughts to send somebody over to the Prince, to persuade him from that condition. A while after I met with lieut. col. Bains, and truly I did ask him more fully of the circumstances of that meeting: he told me something, that they intended to make use of my lord Piercy and Jermin, and those about the Prince, which he disliked. Truly, my lord, it troubled me extremely, to think that they should make use of such ill instruments to persuade the king, and I said, I thought it was not well. And the next time I said to Wm. Drake, you have not done well, for it is not a Christian way we take, to make use of such men as these to persuade with the king; for do you think that my lord Piercy and Jermin, and those men, will ever persuade the king to leave themselves, and their own counsels? So he put me off, and from that time he was a little more shy of me. Afterwards he did secretly and cunningly get from me 10*l.* and came under a pretence to supply a friend in necessity; and I said to him, you have money of your own. Says he, I have not so much as I must need supply him with; and he could not do it of himself, for fear it should be missed. My lord, I asked him what friend it was. Nay, saith he, you cannot know that, and you cannot have it till he is in a condition. To tell you truly, he had been a good customer to me, both for himself and friends, and I was loth to deny him it, supposing I should have it again. I afterwards did not, to my knowledge, meddle or make at any meeting; I was never at any of those meetings after the business at Basing-lane, because I disliked them; but afterwards I did suppose that this 10*l.* was for captain Titus; for I did put it to him, and said, I am afraid you did furnish Titus with that 10*l.* What then, said he? Then I shall require it again of you. So he put me off, and run out of the land. My lord, for any other meetings, transactions, or knowledge of any other thing from the time of the meeting in Basing-lane, I know none. For the prisoner at the bar truly I do not remember, and I am confident I was never at his house in my life, nor changed one word with him.

Att. Gen. Did you meet with Titus in Fleet-street?

Barton. I did, my lord, and I asked him whether the king that was dead (for I knew he was much about the king, because I had heard it)—and I asked him, I say, whether the king was a man of those parts he was reported to be. Titus told me, not only of his parts, but virtues. Truly I suspected then, that Titus was not the man he seemed to be, and I feared he was a cavalier in his heart; and truly that did occasion me, with the dislike of others, to leave their company.

Att. Gen. There were sometimes private fasts at your house; what was the occasion of them, and who spoke to you for them?

Barton. My lord, I do not remember the party that spake to me. I am not certain whether it were master Vicars, but cannot positively say it, or whether it were by sir Matthew Brand, or by whom they desired to meet; they met in a room at my house, to humble themselves before the Lord; and I cannot say any thing of the fast, because I had customers, and I did think I was bound to serve my calling; and I was not there above half an hour, and it was up and down, off and on. There were divers ministers, who did exercise at that time.

Att. Gen. Who did exercise at that time?

Barton. I was not there much of the time, but I think Mr. Jenkins, and to my best remembrance Mr. Love was there; there was Mr. Tate the parliament-man, to my best remembrance: I think Mr. Jaquel was there, and there was sir Matthew Brand.

Att. Gen. What other ministers were there?

Barton. I think Mr. Case, and to my best remembrance Mr. Robinson; but I am not certain.

Att. Gen. What was the occasion of your Fasts, and at your house?

Barton. I knew no occasion, because I was not there; but I have heard a servant of my house, who was there, give this relation. Mr. Jenkins began in this manner; 'O Lord, thou knowest we are not met to put up complaints against any, but to humble ourselves before Thee, and to pray that the sins of the land may be pardoned.' But I do not remember there was any word, but for the pardoning the sins of the nation.

Att. Gen. Was there no sins named in particular?

Barton. My lord, I do not remember.

Att. Gen. My lord, ask him whether any body hath been with him, to call for any money for any parties beyond sea; for Massey, or any others.

Barton. I shall give you a true narrative of that. I understood, my lord, that after the prisoners that were taken at Dunbar were come down the river, there were divers citizens both men and women, that came to see them, and made a relation of their misery to be such, as I have not heard; and there was one among the rest, that said there was a piece of meat reached down among the prisoners, and two or three catching at it, it fell down among the dung and they took it up and eat it. There were divers did move for a contribution to them, and it was a pretty while before I did contribute any thing: there was capt. Far with me, and desired me to give him some money, and he did not propose the use; but to my best remembrance, it was either for charitable uses, or for some in misery. Now I was loth to ask him for what charitable use, because I did not desire to be known to give such a sum of money to the Scotch prisoners. I had a little money which I had devoted to charitable uses in my own purpose: When the parliament granted my petition for re-imbursing the money I lent, I did promise 50*l.* to charitable uses; and this, I confess, I did intend for the Scotch prisoners, but was loth to ask him, because I would not be thought charitable to your enemies; but did it not under that relation.

Att. Gen. Mr. Jaquel, you know William Drake and Mr. Love very well, do you not know that Mr. Drake and Mr. Love were very familiarly acquainted?

Jaquel. I must needs say, Mr. Drake would be acquainted with all the ministers in London; and I cannot say he was more acquainted with Mr. Love than any other minister.

[Captain Far is called into Court and is sworn.]

Att. Gen. My lord, let him acquaint you with what passed at the White Hart in Bread-street.

Capt. Far. I desire the benefit of my Papers.

Att. Gen. At whose request did you come to the White Hart in Bread-street, and when was it?

Far. By William Drake.

Att. Gen. Was that the first time you were acquainted with any thing of this nature, for carrying on and prosecuting of an order, to the furtherance of an agreement between the Scots and the king? What do you know of that, at what time was the meeting?

Far. It was about two years since.

Att. Gen. What was the discourse at that meeting?

Far. It was the drawing-up of some heads of a letter, which might be sent to Scotland.

Att. Gen. What was the effect of it?

Far. It was to this effect, to the best of my memory; for it is so long since——

[Here captain Far was at a stand, whether through infirmity of speech (for he seemed to be slow of speech) or otherwise, I cannot say; and he, or the Attorney-General for him, made great use of the papers of his examination.]

Att. Gen. To desire them, the better to bring them to an Agreement that there might be moderate propositions.

Far. It was to moderate their desires in the agreement between the king and the Scots.

Att. Gen. What to do?

Far. That they might abate of their demands.

Att. Gen. Of their former demands, that they might be the more like to agree; was it not so.

Far. Yes, my lord.

Att. Gen. Was it not propounded likewise, that some should be sent to the king, to persuade him to give satisfaction to the Scots.

Far. It was propounded by Titus, but not approved of.

Att. Gen. But did you not agree to send to the Scots that you did agree to, and were there not heads which Titus, or Drake, did undertake to write, and afterwards were drawn up?

Far. I saw no letters.

Att. Gen. But did not Drake tell you he had sent them to Master Bailey in Scotland?

[Captain Far being at a stand, the Attorney-General asketh him again:]

Att. Gen. Did not William Drake tell you, a letter was sent accordingly into Scotland.

Far. Yes, he did tell me he had sent letters.

Att. Gen. My lord, let him give your lordship an account before the treaty of Jersey, where Drake met with him, and what he propounded to him, whether to send to Jersey, and what persons, and upon what message.

Far. Mr. Drake did say, that capt. Titus did say, it was requisite for one to be at the treaty at Jersey; and I had it from Drake, that Titus did undertake to go himself thither.

Att. Gen. What was his employment to be there, and what money was to be raised for him? Did he tell you he wanted money?

Far. After Mr. Drake desired I would help him to ten pounds, and Titus was in want of money, to relieve his necessities: and upon this request I did leave 10*l.* in Mr. Drake's warehouse.

Att. Gen. Was Drake present?

Far. I think he was. I was promised it again, but never received it.

Att. Gen. My lord, let him inform, after this negotiation of Titus was ended at Jersey, whether there was not a letter written by Titus, and whether this was not read in the presence of Mr. Love, and some others, and whether at Mr. Love's or no?

Ld. Pres. Upon the ending of the Treaty at Jersey and Breda, were you not present at Mr. Love's house, when it was signified from Titus, that it was not convenient for him to come into England, because he thought he was discovered to the Council of State, and desired somebody to be sent to Calais, to take an account there of his negotiation?

Far. Yes, my lord, I was there.

Att. Gen. Where, at Mr. Love's house?

Far. Yes.

Att. Gen. In what part of his house, whether in his chamber or study?

Far. In his study, as I remember.

Att. Gen. Was the letter read there, and who read it?

Far. W. Drake read it.

Att. Gen. What was the substance of the letter, as you remember?

Far. It was for sending one over to Calais.

Att. Gen. Was Mr. Love present when this letter was read?

Far. Yes, sure, he was present.

Att. Gen. Was it agreed that one should be sent to Calais, to take an account of it?

Far. It was desired, and I was propounded to go.

Att. Gen. Who named you to go?

Far. Mr. Drake.

Att. Gen. What was the occasion that maj. Alford did go?

Far. It was his son's being there, that was gone from him.

Att. Gen. But then it was agreed that Alford should go? When Alford did return from Calais again, and there was an account given of his employment, where was this account given? And where were those papers read, that did give the account?

Far. It was given at Mr. Love's; but I cannot say he was present at that, for he was absent sometimes. I cannot be positive to say he was present: I do conceive he was present, but cannot positively say it.

Att. Gen. What was the substance of the Account given by Alford or Drake, or who read it?

Far. It was a Narrative that he had been at Calais, and what entertainment he had.

Att. Gen. Was there a copy of a letter brought thither, written from the king to the presbyterian party?

Far. I cannot say he brought it.

Att. Gen. What was the substance of the letter?—Far. To send commissioners to the treaty at Breda.

Att. Gen. What else was in the letter Did not the king of Scots declare in the letter, that he would give satisfaction to the Scots, and in order thereunto he desired commissioners?

Far. It is so long since, that I cannot remember it.

Att. Gen. I ask you, whether it were not to this effect, to declare that he was willing to give satisfaction to the Scots, and to that end desired the presbyterian party to send Commissioners to Breda?

Love. This is gross darkness, for you to dictate words to him, and then to say, Was it not thus, or to this effect? and so to put in the mouths of the witnesses what you would have them say.

Att. Gen. When you go in darkness, it is gross treason.

Love. Eight witnesses have not proved that I either writ letter, or received letter, or lent money.

Att. Gen. What was the effect of the letter?

Far. It is so long since, that I cannot speak particularly; but it was to send commissioners.

Att. Gen. The copy of the letter that came from the king by major Alford?

Far. I do not say so, sir.

Lord President. Such a letter as they conceived to be brought from him, as they read.

Att. Gen. What was that?

Far. That he had been with Titus, and did bring the Narrative from him, or to that effect.

Att. Gen. Was it not to be communicated?

Far. Yes, it was so.

Lord President. What was the Narrative read from Titus? Who were present at this meeting?

Far. There were several there? but I cannot positively remember any.

Att. Gen. Was Mr. Love there?

Far. I cannot say he was.

Lord President. Was Dr. Drake there?

Far. I cannot say positively that he hath been at any meetings.

Lord President. When you were at this meeting, and major Alford returned this at Mr. Love's house, was Dr. Drake there?

Far. I cannot say it.

Lord President. Was Mr. Jenkins there?

Far. I cannot say it.

Lord President. How many were there?

Far. About ten or twelve.

Att. Gen. Ask him, whether this meeting, when this letter came from the king, advising to send commissioners to treat with the king at Breda—whether was there not a commission named, and persons named to treat?

Far. W. Drake read papers; but it was not agreed upon by the company, because private persons could not give commissions.

Lord President. Was it not debated at that meeting for a commission to be sent accordingly?

Far. Wm. Drake read papers there, that was in the nature of a commission, but it was not agreed upon by the company, because private persons could not do such a thing.

Lord President. Was it not in order to the treaty?

Far. It was to advise with them about the treaty.

Att. Gen. Was it not read in the presence of the company?

Far. The Commission and Instructions were read in the presence of the company; but they were not agreed upon.

Att. Gen. Was it not in the name of the Presbyterian Party in England?

Far. As I do remember, the Commission was in the name of the Presbyterian Party; for I did but only hear it read.

Love. Let him speak viva voce.

Far. To the best of my remembrance, it was for the Presbyterian Party; but positively I cannot say so. My lord, it is two years since, and, as near as I can remember, it was so.

Lord President. The commission, you say, was not agreed to; but the Letter and Instructions were?

Far. Wm. Drake did undertake to draw them up.

Lord President. Were they drawn up and sent?

Far. I am not able to say they were.

Lord President. Who were to be the commissioners?

Far. My lord Willoughby of Parham, alderman Bunce, major-gen. Massey, col. Graves, and capt. Titus.

Att. Gen. What were they to do?

Far. To advise, but not to treat in the behalf of the Presbyterian Party.

Lord President. Not in the behalf of the Presbyterian Party?—Far. No.

Att. Gen. Was there not an Agreement of letters to be sent to the queen, and no Proposals that way?

Far. No, my lord.

Lord President. What was the substance of that letter read?

Far. It was, as I remember, to have the queen persuade the king to give satisfaction to the Scots in their just demands.

Att. Gen. Was it not moved then to be debated what power they had to send a Commission, and by what authority they should do it, and by whom was it spoken?

Far. It was demanded, what authority had private men to send commissioners?

Att. Gen. Did not you go afterwards with some over into Southwark?—Far. Yes.

Att. Gen. Where did you go?

Far. I went with major Alford, and with alderman Bunce his son; and I went to Gravesend.

Att. Gen. What other company was there?

Far. Nobody else; nor had I gone, but at the request of master Alford.

Att. Gen. Did you know that Mason went?

Far. There was no such man went along with us.

Att. Gen. Did no body tell you that Mason went with the Instructions agreed upon?

Far. There was a gentleman we met with at Gravesend, that I conceive to be that Mason.

Att. Gen. Did he carry the Instructions?

Far. I cannot tell.

Lord President. Did nobody tell you so?

Far. Not as I remember, I did not see any delivered to him.

Lord President. Do you believe he carried them, out of these circumstances you heard?

Far. Yes, I believe he did; I am upon my oath, and to say positively, I cannot.

Att. Gen. Were there not letters left at your house, and for whom, and what did you with them?

Far. There was at my brother's house letters left, but they were returned.

Att. Gen. But for whom were those letters?

Far. They were directed to Wm. Drake by Titus.

Att. Gen. Were you at col. Barton's house at the Fast?

Far. I was.

Att. Gen. Who officiated there? Was Mr. Love one of them?

Far. I cannot say positively, I believe Mr. Love did.

Lord President. Do you believe Mr. Love was one of them?

Far. I conceive he was one of them, and Mr. Robinson.

Att. Gen. Did he not pray for a blessing upon the Treaty between the king and the Scots?

Far. That was done, but I cannot say it was by Mr. Love; but these words were said there.

Att. Gen. Were you at a meeting at Mr. Love's, after the Fight at Dunbar, a remarkable time to this nation?

Far. I was there, but came in late.

Att. Gen. Were you there, when a letter was read from Massey?

Far. I did not hear it read.

Lord President. What do you know of it?

Far. There was such a letter came, to assist the king with money and arms; but it was not agreed upon.

Lord President. Do you swear such a letter came?

Far. I cannot swear positively.

Lord President. Did the gentleman tell you so?—Far. He did tell me so.

Lord President. The letter did write likewise for arms and ammunition, did it not?

Far. Yes, and for money.

Lord President. Did not Mr. Love tell you, they could not do it?

Far. I did understand it was Mr. Love.

Att. Gen. Did not Mr. Love tell you, they agreed to raise a sum of money for Massey, and Titus, and Graves, or some of them?

Far. Yes, he did.

Att. Gen. What was the sum of money, and for whom was it agreed upon? Did Mr. Love tell you so?

Far. I say, Mr. Love did tell me it was agreed upon for the sending of some money, whether 250 or 300*l.* I cannot say positively; and it was to relieve Massey and Titus in their necessities.

Att. Gen. Did not Mr. Love move you to contribute to this? And what did you contribute?

Far. Mr. Love asked me, and I did promise 5*l.*, and brought 5*l.* and laid it down upon his table.

Att. Gen. Who was in the room then?

Far. There were several.

Lord President. Do you know none of them?

Att. Gen. Mr. Love saith, he hath neither writ, received, nor sent; but he doth not say, he did not mend letters.

Far. I brought 5*l.* in a paper, and laid it upon his table.

Lord President. And was he in the room?

Far. Yes, my lord, but I cannot say any else was.

Att. Gen. I could tell you who there were more; Mr. Case was there too: My lord, ask him if it were not agreed between them, that it should be so brought.

Far. As I did understand, it was so; it was so for my particular, but I cannot say it of others.

Att. Gen. Did not Mr. Love speak to you to that purpose, to bring it in that way?

Far. I cannot say he bid me lay it down.

Lord President. What was the manner of Mr. Love's requiring of you, or notifying of it to you, and the manner of your pursuit of that? [Here captain Far was at a stand, and made no answer.]

Att. Gen. I will make it very short: Whether this were not done, that there might be no discovery of it?

Far. It was done to that effect, that there should be no discovery of it: I did it under that notion.

VOL. V.

Lord President. And do you not think Mr. Love conceived it under that notion?

Far. I cannot say he did.

Att. Gen. Were you not spoken to by capt. Massey, to speak to col. Barton to lend money?

Far. I did speak to him.

Lord President. What was that?

Far. Ten pounds, as I conceived; for I received it from him in a paper.

Att. Gen. To whom did you deliver it?

Far. To capt. Massey.

Att. Gen. Massey's brother, my lord.

Lord President. You received it from col. Barton. Capt. Massey bid you speak to col. Barton for a sum of money; and he gave it to you; and you gave it to capt. Massey.

Att. Gen. Was the money, as you conceived, returned to Massey and Titus?

Far. I cannot say it was.

Lord President. Do you believe it was desired to be raised to that purpose? And do you think it was done according to that purpose?

Far. I do not know.

Att. Gen. Whether do you conceive that this money you thus brought to capt. Massey, was not for Massey and Titus?

Far. I do conceive it was.

Att. Gen. And was not Mr. Love commonly at your meetings? And whether, after Drake went away, the meetings were not at his house?

Far. I met with Mr. Love often at his own house.

Att. Gen. This money was taken up under the notion of a charitable use?

Far. I do conceive it was given them under that notion.

Love. Sir, he gave you a large account of the negotiation with Titus; pray ask him if I were privy to it.

Far. I cannot say so.

Ld. President. Do you believe it?

Love. You say the copy of the king's letter, you suppose, that was brought over by Alford, was read at my house; whether did I hear the letter read in my house?

Far. I cannot say you did.

Ld. President. Was not Mr. Love, when the letter was communicated, sometimes in the room going and coming?

Far. I cannot say when it was read; but I say he was there during some part of the communication; but I cannot say he was there at the reading of the letter.

Att. Gen. These are good questions, my lord.—Love. The court will judge of that.

Ld. President. But do you conceive that he understood the contents of it?

Far. I do conceive so.

Love. But he doth not say it was so. He said there was a narrative read from Titus, I desire your lordship to ask him, whether I was present whilst the narrative was read, yea or no.

Far. I cannot say any thing to that; I cannot swear he was there.

Love. Ask him whether I did not go often out of the room.

K

Far. I did observe, that when Mr. Love hath been there, he hath been often called away, and hath been absent; and therefore I cannot say such a thing was done when Mr. Love was there.

Att. Gen. He hath before proved it upon oath, that he was there sometimes.

Love. But look before, and he said he could not say I was present when it was read.

Att. Gen. This Narrative, whether was it a copy written by Alford, as news brought over, or the copy written by Titus himself?

Far. Alford said it was a Narrative from Titus.

Love. Pray, ask him whether I did send Alford over, yea, or no; or agreed to the sending of him over.

Far. I think he did not; but he was sent by William Drake.

Love. My lord, whether was he not privy to it? He told you Titus's letter was writ before Alford went.

Far. But it was not agreed upon.

Att. Gen. Titus's Letter, that he writ, that some might come to him, to receive an account of him, was read at Master Love's house.

Love. I move this question, because Alford, who was the man sent, confessed that Wm. Drake sent him. He pretended there was a Commission read in my house; I desire to know when, or at what time; whether before the 29th of March, 1650?

Far. I am not able to speak to the time; it is about two year since, or something under.

Love. I desire, Sir, to ask him this question, Whether the rude draught, written by Wm. Drake, or the original copy, was sent away?

Far. There was only a rude draught that read; and then afterwards Drake was to draw it up.

Love. Ask him whether I gave my consent to the sending away of this Commission.

Far. I cannot say Mr. Love was there when it was sent away.

Att. Gen. Did Mr. Love make any protestation against it?

Far. It was agreed by all that the Commission could not be sent.

Love. Ask him whether I did not declare in the company, when there was such speech of commissionating, that it was an high act of presumption for private persons, to commissionate any, and a notorious falshood to say it was an act of the Presbyterians; and whether did not I declare myself against sending the Commission?

Far. I did say it was agreed upon by all, that we could not send the Commission.

Love. I can prove, if I may have the witnesses indemnified, that I declared against any Commission.

Ld. President. Mr. Love hath declared then he knew of the Commission.

Love. I acknowledge the disavowing of any Commission; I gave my reasons for it.

Att. Gen. My lord, I hope you will remember what the prisoner says.

Love. I do not own any thing about concurring with any Commission, but only disavowing of it. After Dunbar Fight, he saith, he came late; and he cannot tell whether the letter was read at my house; only he says I told him so; And whether was that the letter, or a copy of it?—Far. I cannot say that.

Love. The most that I have done, is but to receive news; and I hope I shall not die for that. Was this letter of Massey written to me?

Far. I have said already I cannot say so.

Love. I would be glad to be freed in court.

Ld. President. You are a very free man indeed.

Love. He speaks of a sum of 250*l.*, or 300*l.*, sent to Massey and Titus; pray ask him whether I did agree that it should be sent.

Ld. President. Did he disagree?

Far. I said it was agreed to; but by whom, I cannot say.

Att. Gen. Did Mr. Love at that time disagree?—Far. I cannot say he did.

Love. Did I move capt. Far, or say, capt. Far, will you contribute 5*l.* to Massey or Titus, or any money?

Far. You asked me the question, what I would do.

Love. But for Massey and Titus?

Far. I did conceive it was for Massey and Titus.

Love. He says he laid it in my house: and he so far justifies me, that he cannot say I received it; and God is my witness, I never did see it in my life. If another man agrees to receive money in my house, I hope the court will not judge me for it.

Ld. President. It is an easy matter for you to take it, and convert it to another use.

Far. I do conceive that captain Massey had the money.

Love. Now you clear me: Another man brings the money, and I do not order him to bring it; and another receives it, and not I.

[Captain Far withdraws.]

Att. Gen. Now, my lord, we shall conclude in a very short word, with a minister to a minister.

[Master Jackson the Minister is called into the court.]

Jackson. Sir, I dare not swear.

Ld. Pres. Dare you testify the truth when God calls you to it? For God will appear in no other vision than in the power of magistracy.

Mr. Jackson. I dare not speak against this man's life.

Ld. Pres. Dare you speak the truth before a magistrate?

Jackson. That that I say, is this: That I look upon this man as a man very precious in God's sight; and, my lord, I fear I should have an hell in my conscience unto my dying-day, if I should speak any thing that should be circumstantially prejudicial to his life: And in regard of these terrors of the Lord upon me, I dare not speak.

Att. Gen. I think all the Jesuits in all the colleges have not more desperate evasions or shifts from the purpose than these men have. My lord, you now see what a desperate combination here is, that men being before authority, and in the face of magistracy, in such a court as this is, so eminent in the presence of it, and so authorized as this is; that men should dare to dally as they do; and that ministers should say they dare not speak the truth: Not when Treason is hatched and contrived, they dare not speak the truth; that this man should be more precious, though a traitor, than the commonwealth, which should be preserved. I hope we shall root these opinions out, or some of the parties that hold them; that I will say.

Ld. Pres. Master Jackson, you are one of the parties in these meetings, you have been at their meetings; and we require nothing of you but to speak the truth. St. Austin will tell you, That to conceal a truth, or tell a lie, you had better let the world fall about your ears. You are required nothing but to speak the truth; and will you say this truth will be a torment to your soul? Are you a professor of Jesus Christ, a minister of God? The great errand you are sent hither about, is to speak the truth from him. Therefore lay your hand upon your heart, and do as becomes you as a Christian, and as a rational man, and as one that will tell truth; for by the truth the world stands. We are all no better than savage men, if we have not judgment to tell truth one to another.

Att. Gen. My lord, suppose Mr. Love should kill one of these men (that do hear the debate) in the presence of Mr. Jackson, and he should be called to give evidence, and refuse it; he may take away any man's life. Personal respects should be set aside, when we come to judgment. You see, my lord, the person of this man; how it is preferred by this man. That which is the truth, you are required to speak, and nothing else.

Ld. Pres. Have you any oath or promise among your combiners to be secret in this business?

Jackson. Never in my life, my lord.

Ld. Pres. Will you take your oath?

Jackson. I dare not, my lord.

Ld. Pres. What is your reason?

Jackson. I have told you, my lord, and I will tell you it again; I am a man of a troubled spirit, and I dare not do any thing that should cause a hell in my conscience to my dying-day.

Ld. Pres. Do you look to die?

Jackson. Yes, my lord.

Ld. Pres. And do you expect to live again?

Jackson. I trust in Jesus Christ I shall live again.

Att. Gen. My lord, I desire your clerk may be commanded to give him his oath, and he required to take it.

[The Clerk tenders him the Oath.]

Ld. Pres. Will you take this Oath or not?

Jackson. No, my lord.

Ld. Pres. Then I think you are the men that were spoken of before, Jesuits and priests: They say you are none, but you are their brethren.

Att. Gen. My lord, these go beyond Jesuits: The Jesuits will swear with a reservation, and these will not swear at all. This man must be proceeded accordingly with; for if this be allowed, I conceive there will be no justice in England. And in respect of the quality of his person, function, and gravity, by so much is it a more pernicious example, and it aggravates the thing every way.

Ld. Pres. Let it be known here, that it may be dispersed abroad; and I think here are some of most counties of England. And this air is gone forth; this very plot is secretly spread with some chief ministers throughout all England.

Att. Gen. This right they have done to many of them, that I believe it will make a more severe inquisition into these persons, than otherwise there would be: It is not blood that is looked after, but confession and contrition. I am glad that those that are not clergymen do come in, and the clergy will not confess at all.

Ld. Pres. Master Jackson, for your refusing to swear, the Court fineth you 500*l.*, and Imprisonment during the pleasure of the Court.

[The Keeper of the Fleet is called upon, and commanded to take him in custody.]

Mr. Love. My lord, I have some motions humbly to make to this Court. The first is, to entreat your lordship, and the rest of the members of this Court, that if I have let fall any expressions through inconsiderateness, or for want of skill in the law, that have been an offence either to your lordship, or to any, I beseech you, if I have spoken any derogating expressions, or made any unseasonable motions, that you would impute it to my ignorance.

Ld. Pres. None of them shall hurt you.

Love. Then I entreat this favour, That I may have Counsel assigned me, and Solicitors here in Court, and in my chamber at the Tower, and a copy of my Charge, and convenient time, as the nature of the business requires, my Charge being long, and I have not read a word of it, nor the Depositions; that I may have, I say, Counsel assigned me, and convenient time to bring in my Answer. And I am confident, through the good hand of God upon me, I shall clear myself of all the Treasons charged upon me, and of their aggravations through strains of wit and quillets of law by instruments of state: I am confident I shall clear my innocence, that I shall not stand a Traitor before you.

Ld. Pres. They being instruments of state, are instruments of God appointed by the state. For your time, you have all this afternoon. Are you not ready?

Love. I was yesterday nine hours locked up in that close room, and in this place; and I could not read one word last night, not out of trouble of mind, but through weariness, being kept so many hours in the Court.

Att. Gen. My lord, he hath had a fortnight's notice of his Trial to prepare for it. My lord, we have been two days; and by the course of proceedings, if the gentleman had had his Trial by a Jury, both must have been dispatched in one day. We are appointed to go on to hear his defence now, or else on Monday.

Love. I desire a convenient time to bring in my Witnesses, to make it appear how the Witnesses against me contradict themselves. I have not yet read the Depositions of one man, and I cannot read the Depositions by Monday; and to-morrow is a day that some time of it should be spent in other employments.

Ld. Pres. To do justice, you must run out of the church; and though you were at your prayers, you must forsake praying and sabbaths to do justice. Sir, this is of a higher nature than all your preaching and praying.

[The Court consults a-while together.]

Ld. Pres. The Court all agree to give you till Wednesday, 3 o'clock in the morning.

Love. I desire that I may have Counsel here, and in my chamber.

Ld. Pres. You have shewed nothing these two days that raises any doubt in matter of law.

Love. There are some things in my Charge, that I doubt this Court cannot take cognizance of; something in those acts, and something in respect of the time. It is matter of law, whether the act speaketh of sending or receiving letters or messages. And here are eight witnesses come in, and never a man proves that I received letter, or sent letter, or lent any money. And this I conceive is matter of law, whether the acts reach being present only where other men lay down money.

Ld. Pres. You have had counsel.

Love. My lord, I have had none.

Att. Gen. For counsel, you are to send him none, my lord: He hath his liberty; he hath recourse for all the people of England to come to him.

Love. Counsel have refused to come to me; I have their letters about me.

[Here he reads the Letters of some counsellors, which they sent to him to the Tower, declaring they could not come to him, unless they were assigned by the Court.]

Att. Gen. All that we can say to you is, that Counsel may come to you, if they will.

[Master Love is commanded away; and the Court adjourns till Wednesday.]

The Third Day's Proceedings, July the 25th, 1651.

The Court is set; and Mr. Love is commanded to the bar.

Att. Gen. Mr. Love, this is the day the Court hath given you, according to your desire, to make your Defence; and they are ready to hear it.

Ld. President. And I hope those directions that have been given, have been observed, that any persons of what quality soever, either lawyers or others, that came to you, have had in a fair way access unto you; and that you have been debarred nothing that the Court gave order for. If there have been any impediments, we will do our best to have them taken away.

Att. Gen. My lord, I have nothing more at present against him: You have heard that whereof he stands accused, and the Evidence produced to prove it. And, my lord, I hope they be sufficient to convince the gentleman that there is proof against him for these facts and treasonable designs whereof he stands accused. This day is appointed for his Defence, if he thinks fit to make it. But if God hath otherwise wrought upon his heart, and that he himself is convinced that the Charge against him is proved to be true; to me it will be the best way of his preservation. But what way soever he thinks fit to take, I shall be ready to go along with him in it: And so, my lord, I expect what he shall say.

Mr. Love's Defence.

Love. My lord, I shall not trouble your lordship and the Court, to bring in at present any Witnesses to testify any thing that might invalidate that testimony that some have brought in against me; I love not to pretract time: but I should betray my own innocency, should I by my silence lie under all that charge and obloquy which is cast upon me. And therefore I deem it my duty, wherein I can, and as far as I am able, to express myself before your lordship and the Court. And therefore I humbly crave leave of your lordship, and this Court, that I may make my Defence for my life before you.

Although I am denied Counsel to plead for me in this Court, which is so just and necessary a means for the preservation of my life, yet my comfort is that of the Psalmist, 'My Defence is of God, which saveth the upright in heart, and pleadeth the cause of his servant against him that puffeth at him.'

My lord, you have granted me that favour which the Romans did to Paul, that he might answer for himself, concerning the crimes laid against him. In making my Defence, I shall humbly crave leave to proceed in this method: To speak something, First, concerning the Charge; Secondly, concerning the Witnesses, and their Testimony: Thirdly, something concerning myself: And then, lastly, some things humbly to propose to your lordship and the Court concerning my Charge. Mr. Attorney-General hath exhibited a Charge against me, consisting of two parts; of High-Treason, and of other High Crimes and Offences. As touching the first, comparing the acts which the state hath made with the actions which myself have done, I know not any personal act of mine (proved against me) that renders me guilty, as to treason, by any public act of your lordships.

And therefore I pleaded the general issue, Not Guilty, as to that.

As to the second, my Counsel having a general licence to come to me, and since having been with me, they have acquainted me, that presence with, or silence at what my accusers had done, this renders me culpable by your acts; and therefore as to that I shall humbly commit myself to your justice and mercy.

Concerning, Sir, the Charge laid against me, I can safely and truly say, I am charged with many things which I ought not, being pretended to be done before the act was published which constitutes this Court. I am charged likewise therein with many things that I knew not, and with other things that I did not; and therefore dare not in conscience lie under the obloquy of the whole charge. I do therefore in general declare and protest against what is mentioned in the Charge, touching the raising of insurrections, seditions, and rebellions. I may say in that regard as Jeremy did: I desire not that woful day, God he knows.

To the other particulars, to wit, the Confederation with Jermin, Piercy, and others, in foreign parts, to raise forces, I answer, I dislike the very mention of their names, or any concurrence with them in any practice of such a nature, who are persons whose principles are so contrariant to religion and liberty.

As touching the other Particulars, to wit, a correspondence with the son of the late king, the queen, Jermin, and Piercy, and others mentioned in the charge; I do declare before you, that I never received letter from, nor sent letter to any of them; nor had I any correspondence with them.

There are other things in the Charge, to which all the Depositions of the Witnesses do not in the least come up: and should I by my silence render myself obnoxious to the whole, you might judge me to be guilty of that which indeed I am not guilty of.

I observe in reading the Charge, that there are many things in it which the witnesses do not in the least speak unto: For, first, none of them swear that ever I writ Letter to the king, or to the queen his mother, or to Jermin, Piercy, or any other person named in the charge, or to any person of the Scottish nation, since the troubles began.

Again, none of the Witnesses swear that ever I either desired, or persuaded, or directed, any person to write any letter to any persons whose names are mentioned in the Charge, or to any person in or of the Scottish nation: Nor do any of them swear that ever any letter was written in my house; but that only letters supposed to be come from or sent to the Scots were read there; which I do not deny. Again, none of them swear that ever I did so much as read a letter in my house, or other where, that was pretended to come from the Scots, or pretended to be sent into Scotland. Further, none swear that ever I gave my express and particular assent to the sending away of any letter. And none swear that ever I collected one penny of money either for the king, or the Scots, or any person in Scotland. That which is affirmed by one testimony, to wit, by Alford, that I moved for money, I shall answer when I come to it. Again, none of the Witnesses prove that ever I invited any person, or foreign forces, to invade the nations of England and Ireland; which yet is laid expressly to my charge, in the Charge read against me. None likewise prove that ever I plotted, contrived, or endeavoured to raise Forces, Tumults, or Insurrections within this nation against the present Government. None swear that I was a correspondent. Indeed Adams in his testimony had these words (which both the notary and myself took,) That he took me to be a correspondent. But when I had your lordship's and the Court's leave to put this question to him, Whether upon oath he would affirm I was one? His answer was, That he could not positively say I was so; but he said, He did conceive I was a correspondent; but did not say I was so. So that, Sir, as to these particulars, there are none of the eight Witnesses, neither the seven that have been sworn, nor yet master Jaquel, whom I do not take to be under an oath, that do charge any of these particulars upon me.

I have a word also to speak concerning the Witnesses who are my accusers; and I might say there is an Incompetency in them, as to their number. There are many particulars sworn against me, to which but one witness hath sworn to one fact: and this I shall humbly offer to your lordship's and the Court's consideration. I might alledge also an incompetency as to their quality: they are not only persons accused of treason, and so are not to be believed, but they have made an open confession of that which is treason by your act, and so are not legales testes. They have done that by an open confession, which, as I am informed, is equivalent to a conviction: they have confessed sending of letters, receiving of letters, and lending of money; but they have proved none of these against me. Now they having both given it under their hands, and also publicly declared that they have done these things, I cannot judge them competent witnesses against me; but this I must leave to the Court's consideration.

Sir, concerning the Incompetency of their number, to that wherein two witnesses do concur, I am concluded; and wherein they have testified any thing true, I would not deny it for all the world; and wherein they agree in their testimony in a truth, therein I will be candid, and ingenuous to acknowledge it.

My lord, though the Charge be long, and my time but short, and the Depositions many sheets of paper (and truly I could hardly read them over till late last night); and yet through the good hand of God upon me, I shall labour to make as plain and clear a defence as God shall enable me.

Sir, in reading over the Charge, I observe, that those things which seem most criminal against me, are sworn to but by single testimony; and I will mention, with your lordship's leave, a few particulars.

First, Touching the letter said to be from Titus, the effect of it being, as was said, to desire some to come over to Calais, that he might give them information touching affairs at Jersey; none but Far swears that this letter was read in my house. The other witnesses, some say, it was read in one place, and some in another: Alford, I remember, he says he heard it from William Drake: and Adams says, it was read in William Drake's house: but none but Far swears it was read in my house. There is likewise none but Far swears, that major Alford was desired in my house to go to Calais to Titus; neither Jaquel, nor Potter, nor Alford, nor Adams, nor any of the rest lay this to my charge: it is only Far that lays this to my charge; and he doth it most untruly, which I will make out unto you by an undeniable demonstration.

He says, that at a meeting at my house, the company did desire major Alford to go to Calais. Now if your lordship observes Alford's testimony, he tells you upon oath, that he was never in my house till after he came from Calais; nor ever spake with me in my life till after he came from Calais; therefore could not be desired in my house to go to Calais. So that, Sir, I will not lay it upon the badness of Far's conscience, but upon the badness of his memory. I do not think he is such an atheist, to swear falsely deliberately; but being asked so many questions as he was, for he was asked four-score and eighteen questions by Mr. Attorney, and some of the court, he might easily say he knew not what.

And I saw the man was confounded, and it was hinted to him what to say, by the help of the papers, and examinations taken from him in private, and shewed to him in public: So that, Sir, I saw the man under a temptation. I was loth to mention this then, though I knew his testimony herein to be false, because I would not anticipate my last answer.

A third particular charged upon me by one witness only, is a copy of a letter (not the original, none swears that) that Alford received from Titus; and he told him, it was a copy of a letter from the king. Now Far he swears, that the substance of the letter was to desire commissioners to be sent over to Breda, at the treaty there: Now Alford, who pretended to receive this letter from Titus, being asked the question, he swears that there was no such thing in the letter that he knew of. Now truly, if any did know the contents of that copy of a letter, it must be Alford, who brought it over: I beseech your lordship therefore to consider it, and though the charge against me be very high, and my condition very low, and the opposition against me very great; yet I hope I am in the hands of merciful and just men, and that wherein you see but single testimonies, that therein you would be very tender in proceeding to a sentence against me upon those testimonies.

Again, in the next place, I observe a single testimony only in another business, and that is major Alford. None but he, of all the witnesses, did swear that it was agreed upon among us, that is, at my house, that a Commission and Instructions should be sent over to the lord Willoughby of Parham, Massey, Titus, and alderman Bunce; none, I say, but Alford swore this. Adams indeed swore, that there was a motion, that this should be; and Huntington swore this, that Mr. Love should say, Come, come, let it go; (to which I shall answer when I come to it). But Far said expressly, three times in court, being upon oath also, that all the company were against sending away the Commission. And Alford he only swears, that the Commission was agreed upon.

I hope your lordship and the Court will judge which of these to believe; and for Alford's affirming that it was agreed upon among us, I am sure, if he had any conscience, he could not say that I agreed to it. I will not deny (now witnesses have proved it) but that I was present. But I did express myself against the Commission and Instructions, as being an act of high presumption, for private persons to send Commissions and Instructions; and as being an act of notorious falsehood, that it should run in the name of the Presbyterian party, when none did know any thing of it, that I know of, but only those that were then in the room. And I beseech your lordship and the Court to consider, that this is not only a single testimony, but that it is said to be done in 1649, a great while ago, my lord. And so the business of Titus, if it had been true, was done some time before that: so that, Sir, it being done before the act of the 26th of March, 1650, which constitutes this Court, herein I hope it will not be deemed criminal, if I had agreed to and approved of the Commission, which I never did. Another particular, to which I observe there is but a single testimony, which is Alford also; he swore, That at a meeting at my house, I moved for contribution of money to Titus; none swore this but only he. Adams swore, I took pen and ink in my hand, but he knows not what I writ. Others swore, That I was sometimes present at the meeting; but none but Alford swore, that I moved at a meeting for contribution of money. Now, Sir, as to that, it is but a single testimony; and if it were true, I do not deem it comes under the act, because the act (of which I was ignorant till the day I heard it here in Court) of the 2nd of August 1650, that act doth adjudge this to be treason, to wit, The sending, or causing to be sent, money, horses, or arms into Scotland. Now, Sir, if it had been true, which this witness deposeth, That I at a meeting did move for money, yet he proves not against me, that ever I received or sent away a penny; and if I had moved it, that had neither been sending away of money into Scotland, nor a causing of money to be sent away; and so brings me not, as to treason, under your act.

Another thing, unto which only a particular

Witness swore, to wit, Far, is, That I moved him particularly to contribute money. He chargeth not this at a meeting, as Alford doth; for he says, he came in late, but saith, that it was a personal motion to him alone: And he doth not say, that I moved him for money for Massey and Titus, but that I only asked him this question, Captain Far, What will you do? And if your lordship consider it, and that your notaries have taken right, you shall find that to be his answer, which I shall answer when I come to it. And thereupon he confesses he brought 5*l.* to my house, but he doth not tell you that I received it; and God is my witness, I never saw it, nor received it, nor did I give any directions about it. But as Far was going out of the Court, he named capt. Massey, the person which he thought received the money; for which he was rebuked by some that were by him, that so the greater odium might lie upon me: as if because the money being brought to my house, I must needs therefore receive it. His name, as I am informed, that rebuked him for declaring who received it, is capt. Bishop: so that they would insinuate into your breasts, who are my judges (who I hope will be conscientious), That it was I that received the money, when the witness meant honestly, that another received it. But if I had received it, or moved for it, yet he is but a single testimony to that particular. Again, in reading the depositions, I take notice that there is only a single testimony to those words (upon the reading, reading, I cannot say, for I never read it; upon the hearing some papers read, supposed to be a Commission) that Huntington swore, that I should say, 'Come, come, let it go.' Those were his words; but the other who were there present, two or three of them being asked, whether they heard me speak such words, they all of them denied that they heard any such words. Now truly this Huntington is a man whose face I never saw before that day, nor since, till I saw him here in Court: and if I had known that a business of any dangerous nature had been come to my house, which I did not, (for I knew no more of it, than any here present, before Drake took the papers out of his pocket, which Huntington confesses were written in characters, and read by Drake) I should have been accounted a very indiscreet man, to speak any such words in the presence of a man whose face I never saw before. And for those words that I should say, 'Come, come, let it go;' I hope your lordship and the Court will be satisfied, that I never spake any such words, as to the Commission and Instructions: for then I should have contradicted myself in one breath: for at the same time I had spoke against it.

Again, I observe in the Depositions, none but Adams affirms that there was a letter, 'which,' says he, 'was declared to be directed to the General Assembly of Scotland.' He doth not swear it was directed to the General Assembly, but that it was declared to be so, and so swears by hearsay. None but he, I say, affirms upon oath, That at my house there was a letter read, which was declared to be directed to the General Assembly. And he says further, He thought this letter was penned by Master Love or Dr. Drake: But I beseech your lordship and the Court to consider by what reason he did conceive this; and I hope your lordship will distinguish between a positive assertion, and a conjectural supposition. For being asked, why he conceived so? 'I conceive so,' says he, 'because of the language of it:' as if he that never saw any letter of mine, to know that poor and low style I write in, should conceive that either I, or that other gentleman named, should pen that letter, merely because of the language of it, it being (he said) in order to promote the ends of the Covenant. I hope the Court will judge of the insufficiency of this evidence; and were it never so clear, yet as to that particular, it is but one testimony.

Again, none but Adams swears concerning a large letter, that, for my part, I never knew of, till the day he affirmed it here in Court. A large letter, he says, in the nature of a declaration, penned, as he thought, by Master Love or Dr. Drake, wherein it should be said, That they could not send money till the Scots did appear more considerable, and grew nearer to action: yet he confesses he had no ground to say Master Love penned it. And indeed he had not. But, Sir, as for this letter, though I durst not for a world deny any thing which I know to be true; yet God is my record, to my knowledge, I never so much as heard any mention of it. And as for these words he speaks of to be in the letter, I know nothing at all of them; nor did I ever hear them, as I know of, till I heard him affirm them here in Court.

But if it had been so, yet he is but a single testimony; and I beseech your lordship to consider, that he says it was to this effect, or this was the substance of it: now I hope so many grave judges and lawyers that sit upon my life, and so many conscientious men, will be tender of a man's blood, when a man shall come in with evidence, and shall shew neither my hand, nor the letter, nor the original, neither copy, nor transcript, nor any thing but the vain ravings of a man's memory in things spoken or done so long ago; and that a man shall come in against a man's life, and shall only say, that this was the sum or substance of it, or it was to this effect. And I being a divine, I shall not speak as to matter of law, that this is insufficient testimony; but as a scholar, and one that studies the Scriptures, I shall observe one memorable instance that pleads my justification in this particular, and they are the words of Christ; Christ said, 'Destroy ye this Temple, and in three days I will raise it up,' John ii. 19. Now the Scripture in Mark says, 'There arose certain, and bare false witness against Christ, saying, We heard him say, I will destroy this Temple, &c.' Mark xiv. 57, 58.

I beseech your lordship to consider, that in this testimony of the false witnesses against Christ, there is only the variation of a word, and the addition of a letter; there is the addition of a letter I, and the alteration of the word ye for will (there is all); for Christ did not say, 'I will destroy,' but, 'destroy ye;' and yet the Scripture takes notice of it, that this addition of a letter and alteration of a word brought his accusers under a false testimony, though they spake according to their intention; for they did verily believe he spake of the temple: for they said, forty years was it in building. So that I beseech you be tender in matters of blood. I know you who are skilful in the law do know, that the proof of treason must be as clear as the Sun, 'Probationes oportent esse luce clariores.' Now when a man shall come against a man's life, and cannot shew any letter that ever he wrote, or that ever he did receive, but shall only swear 'it was to this effect,' or 'to this purpose,' or 'I believe this was the substance of it;' I hope you are so wise and conscientious, that you will pass no judgment upon this conjectural evidence.

Another particular, to which only one Witness testifies, and that is Adams; he swears that I should say, That if the Presbyterians were in arms, by the blessing of God, Malignants might be prevented from getting the day. Truly, I do not know what crime is in these words, but as they may be wrested. But, Sir, I do remember that this Adams hath often come to my house; he said seven or eight times, he might have said seven-and twenty times; for he hath come sometimes once or twice a week to my house, to tempt me (as I now perceive) and hath offered me money; and would ask me whether I knew any thing for a public use that might require money: and though I never suspected him, yet so free am I from maintaining correspondency, or from having intelligence, or contributing of money to maintain a war, that I never received one penny of him in my life, though I have been moved to it by him: but I remember, of late especially, about a quarter of a year before I was in prison, he would come once or twice a week to my house, and he pretended that he was wrought upon by me, and that I had turned him from his malignant principles; for he was very violent for Hamilton's invasion of England, which I was, and to this day am against; and I did labour to possess him what a mischievous design that was: and so he pretended to be turned to my principles, and upon this got some room in my affections. But these words were not above a fortnight before I was committed to prison; and I remember the occasion of them was this: I was bewailing the great alienation and difference that there was between the Presbyterian and Independent party (though I do not love names of distinction); and indeed thus I said, that if the Godly party, that were now disunited and disjointed, both of the dissenting and Presbyterian way, were in arms, there were no hopes that ever the Malignants should get the day. And God is my record, I spake nothing to him but to this purpose. And thus, through the good hand of God upon me, I have spoken to what I observe in reading the depositions, wherein I find but single testimonies against me.

I shall now crave leave (which is the main of my work) to run over the depositions as briefly as I can; for I shall not trouble you with large speeches: but being the depositions were large, and the witnesses many, your lordship and the court (I hope) will bear with me with the more patience, if I speak more largely in it. It is my duty to speak for myself, and it is for my life.

The first Witness that appeared in court against me, was Henry Potter. As to his testimony, there are many particulars which he was asked about me, to which he spake but conjecturally; 'as he thought,' and 'as he believed,' and 'as he conceived.' And when papers by Mr. Attorney-General of his examination were tendered to him, he answered, That 'then he had a latitude to speak more than he durst affirm upon oath.' And upon this I shall humbly crave leave that I may make this motion to you, that you would not, in passing judgment upon me, hearken to any private examinations, which are extrajudicial, to be brought in court against me; for most of the witnesses had their private examinations shewed them in court, and were read to them, and they did not speak in their relations of what they knew, but what they conceived; and when they could not tell what to say, then their examinations were produced to direct them: and I hope your lordship and the court will take notice of this. And herein I cannot but acknowledge the justice of this court in this particular, that you would not receive private examinations till they came face to face, that I might answer to the crimes laid against me.

But as to his testimony, I shall not run over things that touch me not, I must not flatter myself to pass over things that concern me: for I know it will be looked upon with more prying eyes than mine are. There are only two things in his testimony that concern me: he speaks not of any meetings at my house that he knows of; he speaks not of any money that ever I lent him or gave him, though there was a narrow and exact examination of him in those particulars. But two things concern me in his deposition; the one is, that he received a letter with a great L. upon it, from one colonel Bamfield, which was a narrative of the affairs of Scotland; which letter, with two more inclosed, from my lord of Argyle, Lowdon, and Lothian, he said, he brought them to Mr. Love's: and herein I might take notice, that he forgot himself a little, for he might have said, that he brought them first to Mr. Jaquel's; for Jaquel did affirm in court, that Potter brought the letters to him, and spake to him to come to me. The substance of the letters from the earl of Argyle and the rest, he says, were to move for 10,000*l.*; and (as I remember) Jaquel says, for 5,000*l.*: but Potter himself acquits me in this matter; for he doth not swear the letter was to me, nor could he swear it justly; nay, he swears he did not think it was to me. And as for this Bamfield, he is a man whose face I never saw to this day: and he swears, (and indeed he had been injurious if he had not told you thus) that when he came into Mr. Love's house, he said, 'Mr. Love, I have news to shew you.' And unless things be aggravated against me, by the insinuations of men, and by rigid inferences and collections, this will be the worst charged upon me, that there were several meetings at my house, and several letters read there, which I do not deny. But, Sir, he confesses that he said, 'Mr. Love, I have news to shew you;' and that he opened some of the letters, and that some were not opened when he brought them: but neither he nor Jaquel swears, that I opened them; and he tells you, that he carried away the letters with him. And he swears further, that both myself, and all that were there present, did manifest an utter dislike and detestation of those letters. But herein I know what will be laid to my charge; it will be said, why did not Mr. Love reveal them? Truly, in this I do ingenuously say, that I did conceive by reading of the act that constitutes this court, that those only were bound to reveal, that did receive them; and not that I was bound to reveal that which another man received. But herein I am better informed by my counsel, and they tell me, That presence with, or silence at what others do, makes it a criminal fact in me, if the matter of the letter be criminal and treasonable by your acts; and therefore in this, that I did not discover them, I shall humbly beg your favour.

The next thing in Potter's testimony that toucheth me, is, he swears that he heard of a proposition for raising of 400*l.* for Titus and Massey; but he varies from the others: Alford said, 2 or 300*l.* and Far said 250 or 300*l.* and Potter saith, 400*l.* But he saith he was not present, when the proposition was made, and therefore he cannot speak as to that. But yet saith he 'I brought 10*l.* to Mr. Love's house, and there left it' (five or six persons more being in the room). Mr. Attorney-General was pleased to ask him, whether he did not give me a twitch by the hand or cloke, when he brought it? Potter, I remember, denies that he did so; and I do not remember that ever he did it, nor do I remember that ever he laid a penny of money down in my house: and I tell it you in the presence of God, I never saw it, nor received it to this very day. But, Sir, if he had given me a twitch, which is intended as an aggravation against me, I hope a Judicatory will not proceed upon so silent a thing as that is: though Solomon says, 'There is a teaching with the fingers,' Prov. vi. 13, yet that is so silent a thing, that a court of judicatory cannot take notice of it, unless it be manifest and apparent by some act. And therefore seeing he doth not affirm that I saw the money laid down, or that I received the money, or directed or ordered him to come to my house with any money, I hope you will not lay that to my charge. And thus I have done as to that particular.

There is only one thing more in order to the letters he was examined about. He was asked what answer was returned to those letters that he received from Bamfield, and the earl of Argyle and the rest, that he shewed Mr. Love?

To that he gave this account, That a letter was left at his shop, which he thought, he said, came from Mr. Love, or Doctor Drake. Now, Sir, for my part, I declare in the presence of God, that I never in all my life, either wrote or sent, or left a letter at his shop: and although I am not to plead another man's cause, yet I believe that godly minister he mentions will clear himself also; but I must only speak to my own defence. For my part, I never in my life sent a letter to his shop, written to those persons: and he only swears, that he thought the letter left in his shop came from me or Doctor Drake: But how could he know from whom it came, or what was the matter of it? and if it had come from either of us, which he did not affirm, yet he doth not say he opened the letter, and so could not tell the contents of it, that it was an answer to the supposed letter he shewed me. I have only one thing to observe in his whole testimony, and that is, that he confesses, until he had a sight of other men's examinations in private, to wit, of Alford's and Adams's, the things did not come to his remembrance, or words to that effect he hath in his depositions; and that there were some things to which he could not speak exactly, till he first saw some informations, and that Mr. Attorney General did shew him some informations, and that did bring things to his remembrance; and that before capt. Fisher and Mr. Attorney did prompt him, and remember him, he had forgot. So that, Sir, I beseech you consider, whether this be a clear and a good testimony in law, that when a man hath forgot a thing done so long ago, he shall through the examinations of others have his memory rubbed up, and then shall come here in a public court to testify this against a man's life.

The next Witness is major Alford. He gives you a large relation about sending Titus to Jersey, and of 100*l.* given him for his journey, and of letters to the queen, and Jermin and Piercy. My lord, I am as ignorant of all these things as the child unborn, and did never know that Titus was gone or sent to Jersey, by any person, till a long time after I heard he was there, and till I heard of his name in the Diurnals, that he was an ager: for some presbyterians; till then, God is my record, I knew nothing of that. And I need not speak to this; but because this was part of my Charge, and brought into the court, many may imagine, as if I were guilty upon the whole matter. But that which concerns me is this: He affirms, that the Commission and Instructions were agreed upon at my house, to send to some persons, to wit, my lord Willoughby of Parham, Massey, Titus, and alderman Bunce, to treat at Breda; and this is to be in the behalf of the Presbyterian party.

Now, Sir, I shall humbly crave leave to offer, wherein this testimony is not only disagreeing with the testimony of others of the witnesses, but even to his own testimony also. For here he says, it was agreed upon at master Love's house; and in three leaves after, he says, It is true, there was a Commission and Instructions read at Mr. Love's house; but whether they were agreed upon there or no, saith he, I know not. I do not say he hath a bad conscience, but sure I am he hath a bad memory. He disagrees with the witnesses also; for Far did expressly affirm upon oath, That all the company was against sending them away; and therefore, for Alford to say, it was agreed upon among us, in that, I am sure, he doth not speak truly. Another thing, which Alford lays to my charge, is about a letter, which, after Dunbar fight, should come from Massey, wherein he should write for money and for arms, by the way of Holland; and he swears this letter was read in my house, and says, That upon the reading of it, I did move for the contribution of money to be raised for the supply of Titus. Now, before I answer to that, though I am not in a condition to retort, yet I shall humbly crave leave, without offence to Mr. Attorney-General, to intreat the court to take notice of this one thing: Muster Attorney-General, when the witness had spake these words, did pray your lordship and the court to observe, that Massey wrote for arms, and that Mr. Love moved for money; as if he would insinuate to the court, That he writing for arms, and I moving for money, that my moving for money was to buy arms. Now Alford, upon oath, did declare, That every man there was against arms, and he only said, That the motion for money was to supply the personal necessities of Massey and Titus, who were in want. So that I intreat you to consider it, that the insinuation of Mr. Attorney-General might not be aggravated against me, and that a bad inference might not be drawn from it; as if he writing for arms, and I moving for money, that that money should be to buy arms; which is contrary to major Alford's oath. Again, another insinuation of Mr. Attorney-General is this: He prayed your lordship and the court to consider, That I moved for 300*l*. Now this is contrary to Alford's oath; for Alford hath these words: 'Mr. Love did move for the contribution of money, but there was no sum spoken of.' Now, when he shall affirm that there was only a motion for money, but no sum spoken of, shall this be laid to my charge, as if I moved for 300*l*.? Therefore I intreat you, that those insinuations and aggravations of Mr. Attorney-General may not be laid upon me; and that ye would take no notice of any private examinations, nor yet of any aggravations of those who are instruments of state, but upon the plain deposition of the witnesses; and according to their testimony and your consciences I must stand or fall. Alford said further, That after he came from Titus, he gave an account of a Narrative, and of a copy of a Letter from the king of Scots. What he might bring, I know not; and if he did, I never desired him either to go to Calais, or to come to my house; for I never spake with him, as I remember, till after he came from Calais; nor till the time, he says, the Letter and Narrative was read in my house. Now, Sir, he only says it was a copy of a letter, not the original. 'That Titus,' saith he, 'did shew me a copy of a letter 'at leastwise; which he said was from the king 'to the presbyterian party.' So that this, which is the foundation of the rest of the testimony, is only this, That the copy of the letter was read at my house, and that it was a copy of the king's letter. This he affirms only upon hear-say; for he says, Titus told him so. But who can swear, either that Titus had the original letter, or that this was a true copy? Nay, might it not be a fictitious thing, either of Titus or of this man, as may well be suspected? So that they that receive letters, if that be treason, and those that write letters, and send money, if they be traitors; yet they have proved none of these against me, and yet I only am arraigned, and they in hope of favour.

Again, I desire the Court to take notice, though capt. Far says there was this clause, in the copy of the letter from the king, 'to send commissioners to Breda,' (and yet he overthrew his oath afterwards: for he says, It is so long ago, that I cannot remember it: but I shall speak to that when I come to it) yet Alford, that brought this letter, affirms, That he did not know it was to desire commissioners to be sent; and if it had been so, I should never have done it, and never did it. At that time I was in my study, I do not deny it; but when Drake read the Commission, I did declare my dislike of it, and detestation against it; and so did (as Far affirmed) either most or all the company; and if any such thing were sent, God is my record, I did neither know of the writing of it (other than in characters) nor of the contriving of it, nor yet of the sending of it away, till I heard Alford confess in the court, that he carried this Commission to Gravesend to one Mason, a man whose name I never heard of before I was in trouble. And if I had written and consented to it, yet it was in the year 1649, as major Huntington swore, and therefore was before the time that your act could take hold of me, if I had concurred to it, which I never did. Again, he insisted upon it, That I moved for a contribution. Now herein I beseech your lordship, that I may offer these two things:

First, This is but the single testimony of one man, and by the law of God, and of the land, a man must not die, but under the testimony of two or three witnesses. In the Old Testameant, Deut. ix. and xv. 'One witness shall not rise up against a man for any iniquity, or for any sin in any sin that he sinneth. At the mouth of two witnesses, or at the mouth of three witnesses, shall the matter be established.' And lest this might be thought to be a judicial law pertaining only to the Jewish state, it is therefore quoted four times in the New Testament: by Christ, in Matth. xviii. by Paul, in 2 Cor. xiii. and in two other places, as noting it to be a law of moral equity, That no man's life should be taken away but by express and clear testimony of two sufficient witnesses. Now, in this that may seem most to pinch upon me, that I should move for money, there is but one witness; and it is, as I am informed, contrary to the laws of the land, and the statute of 1 Edw. 6, which provideth, That no man shall be indicted, arraigned, and convicted for treason, but by two lawful and sufficient witnesses; and therefore I beseech your lordship and the court, that you would be tender in those things, wherein you find but one witness speaking.

The other thing that I should say to this point, about moving for money, is, That I humbly conceive the act doth forbid relieving persons in arms; but now no person can be relieved by a bare motion: it is not the motion, but the having the money moved for, before the person in arms can be said to be relieved; and if it were true, yet it is not proved, That those persons were then in arms. The other act, of the 9d of August, I conceive, gives me relief, if I had moved for money; for it judges those only to be guilty of treason, that shall either send, or cause to be sent, money, horse, arms, and ammunition, into Scotland. Now, Sir, if I had in a meeting moved for money, yet he tells you not how much I moved for; for aught he knows, it might be but for six-pence, for he cannot swear to it: and I hope, when the sum is not spoken of, you will be very tender. Yet this comes not under your act, either to be a sending of money into Scotland, or a causing of it to be sent, which is not the least fastened upon me. When I asked him (though he swore I moved for money) whether I contributed any money myself? to that he answered, he would not say I did; nor could any of the eight witnesses that came against me. And thus I have done as to his testimony.

The third Witness is major Huntington; and he affirms, That in the year 1649, one asked him to go to my house, and told him there were some there at prayer, and that he might there hear some news; and that he spake upon hear-say: But then he spake upon oath, 'And when I came there, Prayer was done.' Now for a man to be so positive in the first entrance of his testimony, as to say prayer was done, when he could not know that there was any prayer there at all: (for when he came, it seems there was no prayer; and how then would he know there was any prayer there at that time?) This at the very first entrance of his evidence, I suppose, might be a just ground to suspect his whole testimony. But as for the man, I knew him not, I never saw him, as I said, before that time, nor since, till I saw him here in court. This man affirms, That William Drake read in characters, that which he called a Commission, and said, That he had a command from the king to send this Commission away; which, God is my record, I never heard, nor ever knew of it: and Alford that brought over the letter, in which Far swore those words were, he himself denies it. But that which concerns me in Huntington's testimony, is this: He affirms, That when the Commission was read by Drake, I should say, 'Come, come, let it go.' Now, Sir, I asked him this question, Let it go, what doth that refer to? Says Huntington, let the papers go. Now truly I am not so bad a grammarian as to speak of papers, 'let it go,' and not to say, 'let them go.' And if I had spoke of papers, as he says I did, I must either be guilty of nonsense, or else he of falshood; I believe he of both. But as for those words, Come, come, let it go; he doth not affirm that I said, Come, let it go away, but let it go; and that may be a word of dislike: And if I did say so, yet it was not of the Commission, God is my record; for he came not till nine of the clock at night, as himself says: And before he came, I had declared myself against sending away the Commission and Instructions, as being an act of too high a nature for private men, and of notorious falshood, to say it was in the name of the Presbyterian party, when it was not. And the other men that were here in court upon oath, and that were then present, as Adams and Alford, did confess upon examination, That they heard no such words from me.

The next testimony is master Adams; and he relates a story of a correspondence between William Drake and one Mason; and being asked, Was master Love privy to this correspondence? he did so far clear me, that he could not say it, nor was I privy to it. Being asked again, Was master Love privy to these letters of sending moderate propositions to the king? That he likewise clears me in, he cannot say it: And I can say, that I am so far from moderation in their sense, that moderation in their sense I deem downright malignity; which I was and still am utterly against. He was asked likewise, Did master Love know of collecting a hundred pounds for Titus? To that he answered, That he durst not upon oath say that Mr. Love was privy to this collection; and he doth not say, that it was agreed in my house to send away the Commission, but says, it was moved in my house: For he says, 'I cannot say it was agreed upon, for there was no Vote passed.' These were his words; and he contradicts Alford and Far in three places of his testimony. He overthrows Alford's deposition. He affirms that the copy of the letter from the king was to shew what great affection he bare to the ministry of England; and promised great favour when he was in a condition to do it, and desired them to stand stedfast in the way they were in. And he saith he dare not swear that this letter was read in my house; but he thinks it was. Now, as to this letter likewise, I desire the same favour from you, that when the letter doth not appear, neither the original, nor the individual copy, that you would be tender of passing any judgment upon me upon the vain ravings of a man's memory; and of a man's memory too, that is engaged to prosecute my life to save his own, as most of the witnesses are that came in against me. He saith there was a motion made in my house, that a Commission and Instructions should be drawn up, to send to my lord Willoughby of Parham, and the rest in Holland; but he says, 'But by whom I cannot say:' and says he, 'There was no Debate, as I remember, to mend the Instructions;' though the Attorney-General did lay it upon me, as if I had corrected and amended them, when I did neither read them, no, nor so much as touch them in my life. The substance of the commission, he tells you, was to authorise the lord Willoughby of Parham, Massey, Graves, and others, to assist their brethren of the Scottish nation in their treaty. Now to this there is a manifest contradiction in another man's testimony: For capt. Far swears that the Commission he speaks of was not to treat, but only, as private persons, to advise that the king might agree with the Scots upon the interest of religion, and the terms of the Covenant; that he might not be drawn away by the high-flown Cavaliers and Malignants. So that Far overthrows this testimony of Adams. Adams says it was to treat; and Far says it was not to treat, but to advise. But be it the one, or be it the other, I detest both; I had no hand in, and gave no assent unto it, but manifested my dissent to the whole. He being likewise asked (for I am still upon Adams's testimony) whether at a meeting it was not propounded at my house to write to the queen, and to Jermin and Piercy, to mediate with the king to agree with the Scots: To this he answered, No. And truly he might very well answer so; for I am sure I did never in all my life hear of a motion so much as of a letter to be writ to any of these three persons, to the queen, Piercy, or Jermin; and should have loathed and abhorred the very thought of it; and should think that cause the worse, wherein these persons were engaged. Being asked whether there was not a letter from Piercy, that writ for money to be sent to the king; and whether the answer given was, That they should stay till the king and Scots were agreed, and then to send money; Adams in this did me this right: He confessed he saw such a letter writ; but (says he) I only saw it in the hands of one Mason: a man, who, for my part, I never knew nor heard of till I was in trouble. And being asked whether this letter from Piercy was read in master Love's house, he said, Certainly no. Being again asked, whether about August there was not a letter written from Massey, wherein he said he had back-friends in Scotland, and complained that he was not promoted there, and whether that letter was communicated at Mr. Love's house: In this also he did me right; for he answered, 'No certainly, that letter was not, to the best of my remembrance, read there: I heard of such a letter, but saw it not.' Then being asked whether one Sterks was not a Scotch agent; and whether he did not use to come to my house: To which he gives this Answer, 'We took him to be a Scotch agent, and he met sometimes at master Love's house.' Now, Sir, as to that, he supposed that he was an agent, but doth not swear that he was so, much less that I knew him to be so. Nay, I can swear, upon the best information I have had both from his own mouth, and the mouths of others, that he was no agent; for he lived in England 14 years, and had not been in Scotland in 14 years.

And I heard himself say so when he went away upon the act: and I asked him, Are you employed by the Church or State of Scotland? And he told me, No, he was not. It is in your breasts whether you will believe me, or no. And likewise Mr. Blair, when he was here in London, did affirm to me that he was a poor honest man; and that he was no way employed as an instrument of State. I know nothing of the man's agency: be he agent or not, I never sent letter or message by him, nor received any from him in all my life. But I see it is laid heavy upon me in my charge, that I contributed money to him; but no man in his depositions did prove that I ever gave him a penny. Adams being asked whether master Love did not write down the sums of money that was to be contributed to Massey; in this he doth me right also, for he saith, 'Master Love had a Paper in his hand, but I did not see what he wrote:' And therefore to that I need not answer. Being further asked, Did not master Love put the first letter of their names before the sums which others wrote? he answered, He could not say so. Being asked further, Was there not a letter penned by master Love and Dr. Drake? this Answer he gives, 'There was a letter, but,' says he, 'I cannot deliver it upon my oath that it was penned by them; but I thought it was so.' He could not tell to whom this Letter was directed, but said, 'It was declared to be directed to the General Assembly of Scotland.' Now, as I observed in the beginning, this is only the single testimony of one man. And, indeed, it was the first question, as I remember, that was asked me, that was of moment, when I was examined by the Committee, whether I did not pen this letter. I did declare to them in the presence of God, 'That I neither penned that, nor any other, to any person of the Scottish nation, since the wars began:' And this I declare in the presence of the same God, still to be a truth. Being asked further, Was master Love present at some time of this meeting? He answered I was: and the reason why he thought that we might pen it, was because of the language of it. Mr. Attorney General upon this, I remember, uses this expression, 'My lord, this is very high; after we were engaged in blood, that a letter should be sent.' But to this I say, there is only a single testimony that such a letter was writ; and whether it was sent or no, he doth not prove: nor doth he prove that I writ it: and I declare to you that I never writ it. As touching this letter, which Mr. Attorney General is pleased to insist upon so much, Adams being asked whether it was agreed upon that this letter should be sent, he gave this answer, 'It was after the same manner that other things were agreed upon; but there was no vote passed.' And therefore he cannot prove my particular and express assent to the sending of the letter, or any other letter whatsoever. And here to take off the jealousy of a correspondency, which in the close, through the grace of God, I shall clear to you; but to take it off now a little, before I come to it: if there had been a correspondency maintained, would it have been imaginable that from the time of the Fight at Dunbar, which I think is ten months since, to this time, that there should be no letter that any man can say, nor that I did certainly know of, that either was written, or conveyed, or debated upon to be written, from that time to this very day, to any of the Scottish nation? And yet all this tends to aggravate matters against me, and all the burden is laid upon my weak shoulders. Other men that have heavy loads have laid them upon my back, to lighten them from off themselves. Touching this Letter, he saith, 'This was the substance of it, or it was to this effect, or purpose.' And again, I insist upon it to beseech your lordship and the court, to take heed what you do. It concerns you more than me: it concerns my life only; but it concerns your honours, and lives, and souls, and all, that upon an uncertain evidence you do not spill a man's blood. The man never read the letter, only he heard it read; and then he brings into that and other letters, 'This is the sum of it, or it was to this effect.' And though this man hath done me injury in some particulars, yet in others he hath done me right: for being asked, Did master Love write letters, or receive any, or mend those Instructions? he only swears he saw the letters; but cannot say I did read them. Being asked whether I did give my consent to the sending away of that letter after Dunbar-Fight, which is so much insisted upon, and so greatly aggravated, he did thus far right me; he said, 'I will not swear he did give his consent.' Being asked whether I was a correspondent, he said he took me to be a correspondent: and upon these words I had leave to ask him this question, Whether he knew I was a correspondent? To this he said, That letters were heard by me; but, said he, 'I cannot swear that he was a correspondent: I did conceive master Love to be a correspondent; but I dare not say so: and I dare not swear that he was a correspondent.' So that herein likewise there is nothing but his humbly conceivings, and his suppositions; according to which I hope you will not pass any censure upon me. And thus I have done with Adams's testimony.

The fifth testimony is that of Jaquel, which I do here again in court except against as no legal Witness; for he did declare he could not in conscience take an oath against me. He did well nigh half an hour declare he could not swear, but that he would make a narrative or relation of what was true. I did intreat your lordship's leave to put it to him, whether he was under an oath, or no? and he said, twice at least, 'I am as good as under an oath.' If any person, good or bad, come under an oath, I must stand or fall by his testimony; and, according to God's ordinance, an oath is to decide all controversies: but the man declared he was not under an oath, and went out of the court, and was fined 500*l.*: and when afterwards he was called into the court again, he did only put his hand upon his buttons on his breast. So that this was not any taking of an oath; but fearing his fine, he did it, though with much seeming regret of conscience; and I am informed this day that he denies that he was under an oath. And if so, then I have nothing to say to his testimony; and so shall not speak to it, but only as to a bare relation and naked information. There is nothing that doth concern me in his testimony, but only a concurrence with Potter: Potter and he coming to my house with some letters, as he saith, one from Bamfield, another from Argyle, London, and Lothian, and Belcarras, and another from one master Bailey, if I remember right. Now, Sir, as to these letters, I do not deny but that they brought them to my house; nay, I do acknowledge those two men did bring those letters to my house, at leastwise which they said were such: but whether they were the originals or copies, I know not; for I never read nor kept the letters, but they carried away the letters with them. And capt. Potter said, 'Master Love, I have news to shew you;' at that very time when Mr. Jaquel and he came to shew them at my house. This witness, I cannot call him so, but this informer saith, that being asked what was done upon the hearing of those letters, he said Potter read the letters; but that there was no agreement upon it, but an utter dislike in all that heard them about the contents of them. And he hath these words further: 'It was,' says he, 'a trouble, I am confident, to them that heard and read the matter of those letters.' But being asked, Did master Love agree to the giving of 40*l.* to Bamfield and his man? To that question he answers thus: He said there was no Agreement; but it was thought convenient by all. Upon this I craved leave of your lordship to ask him this question, How he knew my thoughts, that I thought it convenient? To which he gave this Answer; 'I cannot say any thing, that master Love did say it was convenient.' So that therein, though he might presume upon a man's thoughts to know them, yet he must only judge my thoughts [by my words, as the tongue and heart agree; for he is not a God: but he doth not say that I said it was convenient. Nor did either of them prove that ever I gave a penny either to Bamfield or his man.

The last Witness that came in against me, is capt. Far. And, indeed, I do not know what to make of his testimony: I will not call it a prompting; that will be thought too bad a word; but certainly it was such a testimony that I never heard produced in any court in my life: For Master Attorney General, and some others here, did ask him 98 questions. So that the man spake nothing deliberately, but spake by reading out of his private examinations, which is extra-judicial to be brought in court, where the Witnesses are to speak viva voce. There was, I say, so many questions, besides those I had leave to ask him, propounded to him, during the time he was upon his oath. And the man was of a dull spirit, and slow of speech; and I did perceive him to be so possessed with fear, and that he knew not what he said: For he hath manifest contradictions in his testimony, which I believe all the court will see, and therein concur with me, when they come to hear them. The first word I heard him say in court was this, To desire the benefit of his papers. It seems he did suspect the badness of his memory, that he must have his papers to help him, and papers written by another, before he would depose in court against me for my life.

Being asked, whether upon the ending of the treaty of Jersey there was not a letter came from Titus, to desire somebody to come to Calais; and whether that letter was read at my house; and whether at my house Alford was desired to go; he affirms he was, (which none else did) and which is a most notorious falsehood. I have no rancour in my heart against him; the Lord knows I have prayed for all those that persecute me; and my heart cleaves to them in love and pity. I do not tax the badness of his conscience, I think he dares not be so vile; but I do tax his memory in things done so long ago. And afterwards he says, he could not remember aught, though he did pretend to remember, because they were done so long ago; yet before he did affirm them. Now to demonstrate this, that he says in this clause, to be false, that Alford was desired in my house to go, Alford himself says he was never at my house till he came from Calais, which is certainly true; And therefore Alford could not at my house be desired to go to Calais. When there was an account given of Alford's return from Calais, then I know he was there, though I never spake with him before that time, as I remember; nor was he ever within my doors till after his return. But, says Far, 'I cannot say Master Love was present while Alford's return was there read; for sometimes he was absent.'

Then further, being asked what was the substance of that copy of the letter from the king that Alford brought from Titus, he answered,

That the sum of it was this, That the king of Scots did declare he would give satisfaction to the Scots; and in order thereunto, he desired commissioners to be sent over to Brada. These are the words of his testimony. Now, Sir, this is but the single testimony of one man: and it is contrary to the testimony of that very man that brought over this letter: And if any man knew the substance of the copy of the letter pretended to be from the king, it must be Alford, that brought it over: Certainly none could know it better than he. And therefore for this man to be so strangely besides himself, and to forget himself so, as to say this is the sum of the letter, when he that brought it said the contrary, and did not know that this was the sum of it, this may seem strange; and I hope you will judge of the weakness of this testimony. Being asked whether he did not conceive this to be the copy of the king's letter, he did me right in that; for he said he could not tell whether it was the copy, but that Alford told him he brought over a copy of the King's letter. And Mr. Attorney-General was pleased to aggravate this of capt. Far against me: Says he, The king sent over for commissioners to treat: and accordingly at Mr. Love's house it was agreed upon that commissioners should be sent, and there were persons named. To this I say, That, God is my record, I never in all my life heard, as I remember, of any letter from the king to that end, that commissioners should be sent over. And Far doth me right herein; for in answer to that question, Was your commissioners agreed upon? he three times answers negatively. I do not perceive that he remembers himself so well in all his testimony, as in that particular. Being asked whether the Commission was agreed upon, he said it was not agreed upon by the company.

And herein he did me more right than any man; for he gave my reason, 'For (says he) the reason given was, Because private persons could not give a Commission.' And though he hath done me more wrong than any man, yet herein he hath done me more right than any man. Being further asked, Was it not debated to send a Commission over? Drake, he said, 'read a paper in the nature of a Commission; but it was not agreed upon by the company, because private persons could do no such thing.' And a third time, he says, 'The Commission and Instructions were read in a company at Mr. Love's house;' (that he affirms, and that I do not deny) 'but not agreed upon.' And further he said, He did conceive, to the best of his remembrance, it was in the name of the Presbyterian party of England: But, says he, 'I cannot positively say it was so; for I did but only hear it read.' Then your lordship asked him this question, Did you say that the Commission was not agreed upon, but that the Instructions were? To this capt. Far said, That Wm. Drake undertook to draw up the Commission and Instructions; but yet, says he, 'I cannot say 'that they were either drawn up, or sent.' Again, he says further, (and herein he doth me more right than Adams or Alford doth) Adams, he says it was not agreed upon; yet he saith thus, There was a Commission read for to treat; and so says Alford; But this man says directly, That this supposed Commission was not to treat in the behalf of the Presbyterian party. And it had been a folly for private men to assume such a vain title to themselves. So that he says directly, upon your lordship's question to him, that it was not to treat, but to advise the Scotch commissioners, and the ministers especially, to agree with the king upon the interest of religion, and terms of the Covenant. But being asked, Was it not in the behalf of the Presbyterian party? he answered, No. Being further asked, Was there not an agreement at Mr. Love's house for a letter to be sent to the queen? Herein also this man doth me right; he said, No, my lord. And yet he contradicts himself likewise; for being asked in the next question what was the substance of that letter to the queen, he answered, The substance of the letter to the queen was, that she should persuade the king to give satisfaction to the Scots in their just demands. Now, either he must hear of this letter somewhere else, or else frame a fiction to himself, that this was the matter of the letter, when there was no such letter 'in rerum natura.' The next thing he charges me with, is, That I should say it was agreed that money should be raised for Massey and Titus; and he names the sum, he thinks 250, or 300*l.* and that I thereupon should particularly move him with this question, 'Capt. Far, what will you do?' Now, I beseech your lordship and the court to consider, that he doth not swear that I said 'we were agreed,' but it was agreed; and that might be the act of other men, and not mine. And in another place he saith, 'They agreed;' but he doth not say that I said 'we agreed,' to include myself: But to that, That I should move him, and say, 'Capt. Far, what will you do?' Truly this is but a general question. And he himself did me thus far right; When I had leave from the court to propound this question to him, 'Capt. Far, did I move you, or say to you, what money will you give for Massey or Titus?' he answered, he did conceive it was for that use. So that he proves not against me, that I moved for money for Massey or Titus; but only that I should say, 'Captain Far, what will you do?' And if you observe the words of the testimony, they are these exactly. He tells you that he brought 5*l.*; for there is all that ever I am charged with. I am not charged with lending a penny; but only that 15*l.* was brought to my house; 10*l.* by Potter, and 5*l.* by this man. And he affirms that he left this 5*l.* at my house. And herein I perceive a contradiction in the man; and therefore it is hard to determine when he speaks true, or when he speaks false. These are his very words. 'Mr. Love, you have asked me what I would do; and I have answered down 5*l.* upon Mr. Love's table, when several persons were in the room.' And being asked, Did Mr. Love receive this money? he said he could not tell; but was loth to tell who he thought received it. But in his last word, save one, that he spake in Court (which made much for my advantage) he said, he thought I did not receive it; and God is my record, I did not: But he said another man did, and named captain Massey. But the contradiction I observe is this: He tells you he laid down 5*l.* when several persons were in the room, and in the next question but one being asked, Was Mr. Love in the room? 'Yes, my lord,' says he, 'but I cannot say any body else was there.' So that therein the man evidently contradicts himself. And it appears he was under a very great fear, and even confounded by the many questions propounded to him. I asked him further, 'Did I bid you lay it down?' Says he, 'I cannot say that you bid me lay down the money.' Being asked, Was this way of laying down of money to prevent discovery? he said he did it under that notion. But being asked by me, 'Did I bid you lay it down under that notion?' he answered, he could not say I did. So that I neither directly nor indirectly did bid him bring money to my house, or lay it down when it was brought there: But other persons were in the room; and he conceives what person took it away. Therefore I beseech you make a candid and fair interpretation of what I have said or done.

Being asked about the copy of the king's letter, that Alford says he brought over from Titus, whether I was in the room whilst it was read, he said, 'I cannot say that he was there when it was read; but he was there during some part of the communication.' 'But,' says he, 'I cannot say he was there at the reading of the letter; nor can I say he was present whilst the narrative was read.' He observed I was often called away, and was absent; and says he, 'I cannot say there was any such thing done by Mr. Love. And I asked him this question, 'Did I send, or agree to send major Alford to Calais?' He answers, He thinks I did not. And herein he falsifieth his former testimony; for he said major Alford was desired in my house to go to Calais; and yet Alford swore he never was in my house till after he came from thence. But herein he doth me right too (though with contradiction to himself): He said it was agreed at my house that Alford should go; and yet now he says he thinks, I did not agree to the sending of Alford.

Being asked further, whether I did give consent to the sending away the Commission, he answered, 'I cannot say Mr. Love was there when it was sent away.' And truly I may say, who brought it away, or who drew it up, and what was done in it, I cannot tell. There might be a thousand Treasons in it, for aught I know: for I did neither own the reading of it, nor the sending of it, but did utterly protest against both. Being again asked, whether I consented to the sending of it away, he answered,

'It was agreed upon by all, that we could not send the Commission away.' When I asked him, 'Did I say to you, Captain Far, will you contribute 5*l.* for Massey and Titus?' he gave this answer, says he, 'You asked me what I would do; so that I conceived it was for Massey and Titus.' And he affirms he laid this 5*l.* down in my house; but did not say that I received it. And in the presence of God I speak it, I never saw it, nor received it in all my life.

And thus with much acknowledgment, and blessing God, and thanking your lordship and the Court, you have given me leave to take a brief survey through the Depositions of the Witnesses, though they have been very large, and the Charge against me very high

Not having spoken to the Depositions (before I shall crave leave to speak something concerning myself, and make humble proposals to this Court), I shall add but one word, and it is this: I was loth, before I saw witnesses face to face, to confess any thing; I deemed it against nature for any to confess against himself, unless he could be sure his confession should not prejudice him. And I might have been guilty of my own blood, if I had confessed; for then, did the matter confessed amount to Treason by your law, my life would be at your mercy, and you might hang me upon mine own confession. And upon that ground I went resolved to the Committee; and through the grace of God I resolved not here to confess a word nor tittle, till I heard what proof was brought in against me. And now I do ingenuously acknowledge that there were several meetings at my house; that these persons met there; and that this Commission was read there, but I did utterly dislike it, and dissent from it. And that I was present at the reading of letters, either at the beginning, or end, or some part of them, I do acknowledge: And this I say, that I was ignorant of the danger that now I see I am in. The Act of the 2nd of August, 1650, doth make it Treason to hold any correspondence, or to send letters, though but in a way of commerce, into Scotland, let the matter of them be what it will. Now herein my counsel acquaints me with my danger, That I being sometimes present when letters were read in my house, am guilty of a concealment; and as to that, I do humbly lay myself at your feet and mercy. But as to Treason, I do not know any personal act of mine proved against me, that brings me under any act of yours. And thus having briefly spoken concerning the Charge in general, and concerning my accusers, and having briefly surveyed their testimony, I shall humbly crave leave to speak something concerning myself, and I shall be very brief in it.

Concerning myself, it is needful I should speak a word: I would not stand under misrepresentations, to seem to be what I am not. I am presented unto some as if I were a Malignant, an apostate from my first principles, a mover of sedition, and what not, but what I am. Wherefore I am constrained to speak a word in my own vindication, and I shall make the apostle's apology, 'I am become a fool in glorying; but ye have compelled me.' I count it never lawful for a man's own mouth to praise him, till another man's mouth accuses him; and then he may without vanity be his own vindicator. What I shall say of myself, the Lord knows it is not voluntarily, out of an affected ostentation, but by compulsion, for a necessary and clear manifestation of my principles and practices now suspected. As touching Malignity, I hate both name and thing: And as cardinal Farnesus said of himself profanely, that if he knew any part of him infected with Lutheranism, he would cut it off and cast it into the fire: that I can say truly that if I knew any part of me infected with Malignity, I would cut it off with the pruning-hook of mortification, and by an ingenious retraction before you all this day. God is my witness, I never drove a malignant design, I never carried on a malignant interest: I detest both. I still retain my old covenanting principles, from which, through the grace of God, I will never depart for any terror or persuasion whatsoever. When I look upon all the vows and covenants, and declarations, and protestations of both houses of parliament, I do find a suitableness between my judgment and them, and am not conscious to myself of any thing that I have done in opposition or contradiction thereunto. And therefore I may say as Jeremy did when he was accused, in the like case, of making defection to a contrary party, Jer. xxxvii. 13, 14, 'Irijah said to Jeremiah, Thou fallest away to the Chaldeans. Then said Jeremiah, 'It is false, I fall not away to the Chaldeans.' So, if it be charged upon me that I am fallen from my first principles, or that I am fallen to Malignity, I say to any that shall so accuse me, it is false, I fall not away to Malignity; I do retain as great a keenness, and shall whilst I live, and as strong an opposition against a malignant interest, whether in Scotland, or in England, or in any part of the world, against the nation where I live, and have to this day, as ever I did in former times. I am no incendiary or evil instrument, to divide the nations one from another: God knows the grief of my heart hath been for the divisions, and the desire of my soul hath been for the union of both the nations. And if I had as many lives as I have hairs on my head, or as much blood in my veins as there is water in the sea, I could count it all well spent to quench the burning that our sins have kindled between the two nations. I have all along engaged my estate and life in the parliament's quarrel against the forces raised by the king: My appearing in their cause was not from any aim at profit, but out of a persuasion of conscience and sense of duty. I may speak it, as Paul doth it of himself, 'I was in labours more than they all.' I speak it without vanity; I was, according to my obscure station and mean condition, in doing and giving in the parliament's quarrel, more than many. Many gave out of their abundance; but I out of my want: And as Christ spake to the widow who gave two mites, 'That she gave more than they all; for she gave all that she had, even all her living:' So did I; though I gave my mite, yet I gave my all. And I did not only deem it my duty to preach for the lawfulness of a defensive war, but (unless my books and wearing apparel) I contributed all that I had in the world: And that was no small sum, considering the meanness of my condition. And I have at this day a great sum due to me from the state; which is still kept from me, and now my life endeavoured to be taken from me. And yet for all this, I repent not of what I have done; though I could from my soul wish that the ends of that just war had been better accomplished: Then should we have been happy, and united among ourselves, and honoured among the nations round about us. I am so far, I say, from repenting of what I have done, both by doing and contributing, and suffering in the parliament's quarrel, that were it to do again upon the same unquestionable authority, for the same declared ends, and against the same malignant persons, I should manifest as much readiness of mind to engage according to my measure, as ever I did.

And thus I have declared myself touching my principles in these particulars; I shall now crave leave to express myself a little touching my sufferings; and then to make but a few humble proposals, and so cast my life into God's hands and yours. Touching my sufferings, I may say that my whole life hath been a time of affliction, either of body or mind: God sees my heart to be a tough and knotty piece, that it needs so many blows to break it. I may say with the Psalmist, 'I have been afflicted from my youth up,' and from my youth up have I met with opposition: From the prelates, being persecuted by them merely for conscience-sake. It is near 20 years since I was cited to the Bishops' Courts: I have been often troubled for hearing of sermons, and discharging other exercises of religion, which were an offence in those days. When I was a scholar in Oxon, and Master of Arts (I do not speak it out of vain ostentation, but merely to represent unto you, that what I was I am, and what I am I was), I was the first scholar I know of, or ever heard of in Oxon, who did publicly refuse in the congregation house to subscribe unto those impositions or canons imposed by the archbishop, touching the prelates and common prayer; and for which, though they would not deny me my degree, yet I was expelled the congregation house, never to sit as a member among them. When I came first to London, which was about twelve years since, I was opposed by the bishop of London; and though I was called as a lecturer to Ann Aldersgate, yet it was near three years before I could fusten upon any lecture. After this, about the year 1640 or 1641, I was imprisoned in Newcastle, merely for expressing myself against the errors of the service book, and was removed from prison there, by a Habeas Corpus, to this place; and in this Court of King's-Bench I was acquitted. After this, about the beginning of the wars between the late king and the parliament, I was the first minister that I know of in England, who was accused for preaching of treason and rebellion, merely for maintaining in a sermon, in Kent, at Tenderden, the lawfulness of a defensive war, at the first breaking out and irruption of our troubles; but was then publicly acquitted in a Court there, and recovered costs and damages of my accuser. After this I had a little breathing time, whilst the two houses of parliament were in power; only I was once complained against by the king's commissioners at Uxbridge, for preaching a Sermon there. I did not know that I should preach there till the Psalm was sung; and did only preach a Sermon which I had preached the day before at Windsor Castle. I was, I say, complained of by the king's commissioners to the house, for that Sermon; but within three weeks I was acquitted and discharged by order of the house of commons. That Sermon is much spoken of, because it is so little seen, it is so obscure a piece; and many imagine as if the keenness of my affection was blunted from what it was in that Sermon. But I declare unto you, that I come up to this day to every tittle of that Sermon. I hear it is lately printed; and if it be printed according to the first copy, I will own every line of it, as that to which my heart and judgment concurs to this very day. After all this, since the late change of government, I have been three times in trouble: I was once committed to custody by, and twice cited before the Committee of Plundered Ministers: but there was no sufficient proof against me, and so I was discharged.

But now last of all, this great and last trial and trouble is come upon me. I have been kept several weeks in close prison, and now I am arraigned for my life; but herein is my great comfort, even that which was the Apostle's, 2 Cor. i. 10. 'God that hath delivered me, he doth deliver me, in whom I trust that he will yet deliver me.' And that that shall be made good to me, Job, v. 19. 'He shall deliver thee in six troubles, yea in seven there shall no evil touch thee.' As Cato, he was accused thirty-two times by the unkind state whom he faithfully served, and yet after thirty-two times accusation, his innocency and uprightness brought him off. Why should not I be confident in my God, who have had a life-time of experience of his care and love towards me? It is not the danger of my life troubles me; I am a sickly man, and I know a disease will ere long kill me, whatever you do with me: but this grieves me more, that I should suffer from their hands, for whom I have done and suffered so much in my obscure station, and according to my weak measure. Had it been an enemy had dealt thus by me, and made such an eager prosecution of me, and such high aggravations of that which in the simplicity of my heart I have done, it had not been so much; and as

I told the Committee when I was examined by them (who charged me with jesuitism and non-ingenuity, because I would not confess against myself and others), that though I honoured them as private gentlemen, and should acquaint them with what myself had done, when it should not be a snare to me; but when they shall apprehend me by a warrant for treason, and examine me in order to a trial for my life, in no judicature in the world will I confess a word, till I first hear what will come in against me. Now, as I told them then, I never wrote letter, nor received letter, nor sent or lent money to any person of the Scottish nation. Now that I should meet with this hard measure, to have the most rigid and severe interpretation put upon all my actions, to be looked upon with so jealous (I might say with a worser) eye, that have in my measure ventured my all in the same quarrel that you were engaged in; and lifted up my hands in the same covenant, that have took sweet counsel together, and walked in fellowship one with another: that from these I should have such hard measure, this, this troubles me greatly. Had I been so dealt withal at the junctio at Oxon, I should not have been so troubled at it; but to be dealt so with at Westminster, this is that at which I stand amazed: yet, blessed be God, I am not afraid; my conscience doth not tell me of any personal act of mine proved against me, that brings me under any of your laws as to treason.

And thus having expressed myself concerning my Charge, and the Witnesses, and myself; I shall now in the close of all say (whatever tortured collections or inferences are drawn from my practices, and however lawyers may aggravate those things that in part have been proved against me), yet I do declare in the presence of God, that whatever I have done, in the simplicity and integrity of my heart I have done it; and did deem it to be consonant and agreeable both to my conscience, and to the protestations and covenant I have taken: and I have done nothing out of animosity, or from a spirit of revenge. And thus I have done concerning myself.

I have only a few humble proposals to make to your lordship and the Court, and then I shall leave all to God's determination and yours. To you that are my judges, I humbly crave this of you, and I do it upon your lordship's words the first day of my appearance here. When you were pleased to deny me counsel, you said you would be counsel for me: and I beseech you be so, for you are judges both of matter of law and matter of fact. I may make use of that passage, Prov. xxxi. 8, Solomon says there, 'That rulers must open their mouths for the dumb, in the cause of all such as are appointed for destruction.' Truly, my lord; I am as a dumb man before you; dumb in matters of law, I cannot plead one word for myself; I beseech you, be as Solomon's rulers were, and open your mouths for him that is appointed to destruction; you who are my judges, be my advocates, my life lies in your hands. And then, I beseech you, let me make this humble motion to you, that you would not count any thing that I have done to be out of animosity or stoutness of spirit: Truly, nothing but conscience could carry me through all my sufferings; I could not leave such dear relations that God hath given me, and such a loving people, and comfortable livelihood, as any minister hath within the walls of London: nothing but conviction of conscience can carry me another way; and till conscience be fully satisfied, I cannot stir one step.

The next thing I beg, is, to beseech your lordship and the Court to put a candid and fair interpretation upon all that I have done, or that by witness you have heard; that it was no malignant design, though I do not own the management of any design: I never writ letter nor sent letter to any of the Scottish nation; yet thus far I own the thing, that it was agreeable to my judgment and conscience. For I thought the interest of God and religion, and the good of the nation, would be more advanced if the king went into Scotland upon Covenant terms, than if he should fall into the hands of the Irish rebels, or offer this nation to the Turk or Spaniard, or any other to come in and make a prey of it. I did judge it would be a foundation laid of great troubles and blood, if he were not received by that nation. And though I did not, and do not in the least own either the Commission or Instructions, or the way of management of that business; yet I confess the agreement between the king and Scots I desired, and deemed it my duty upon this ground, one clause of the Covenant being, to seek the union and good of both nations; and those who endeavour the contrary, are declared by the Covenant to be incendiaries, malignants, and evil instruments, who not only divide the kingdoms one from another, but divide the king from the people. Now they declaring him to be their king, according to my apprehension I thought it agreeable to my Covenant, to pray and desire, as a private man, and no more, for an agreement between the king and them, upon those terms, consistent with the safety of religion, and the terms of the Covenant.

And thus I have opened my heart to you: the favourable interpretation I humbly beg of you, is this: that things might not be taken in the worst sense: 'Non est reus, nisi mens sit rea'; he is not guilty, unless the mind be guilty; I heard your lordship say so at Guild-Hall, as I remember.

The Lord knows in the uprightness of my heart I have done what I have done. It is a maxim in the law, (I have read it in Divinity-Books) 'Ampliandi sunt favores, et in penis benignior interpretatio facienda.' favours are to be amplified and enlarged by magistrates; but in punishments the most benign and favourable interpretations must be made. Now of my actions the harshest interpretations are made: I have a charge laid against me, which I deem (and as my counsel tells me) to be rather a flourish in law, than reality of matter.

I stood amazed when I heard the Charge against me, I thought it had rather been against some other man than against me. As if I should send to the queen, Piercy and Jermin! Herein I did rather venture my life upon a trial, than to lie under that obloquy which that charge did lay upon me. Therefore I again beseech you, to put a fair and candid interpretation upon what is proved against me.

I remember a phrase, 'summum jus est summa injuria;' to be over-just, is to be injurious. 'Be not over-righteous,' may refer to courts of judicatory. Herein I acknowledge, that my not revealing what my accusers have done, this layeth me under the fault of a concealment, for which I lay myself at your feet.

The next humble request I have to make, is this, to intreat your lordship and the court, that you would not hearken to any politic suggestions that may be laid before you: I know under what disadvantage I lie, that am the first minister in England try'd for treason, in a business of this nature, and what a prejudice this is to me, to make an example upon.

The first suggestion that I humbly intreat you would not hearken to is, that it will not be for the honour and interest of the state, if I be not condemned. Truly, it is for the honour of the state for you to do justice: if you have found, that I ever writ letter, or sent or received letter, or lent money; if in these regards you have found me within your acts, spare me not: but if I have been only present at the reading of letters, and have been silent at what others have done; therein I lay myself at your mercy to shew me favour. It was a suggestion to Pilate, 'If thou sparest that man, thou art no friend to Cæsar;' and so if you do not condemn me, you are no friends to those who commissionate you: but be friends to yourselves and families, and take heed that you bring not guiltless blood upon you.

And here (and so I shall have done) in the close of all, I do acknowledge, that in many particulars, as touching not revealing (I say not as to personal actings, nor do any prove it against me), I do fall within your acts, as to the censure of a concealment; and herein I humbly beg your mercy. And however I may be judged to be a man of a turbulent and unquiet spirit, yet those who know me in my relations, will not say so of me; and my people, over whom God hath called me (I think), will say, I am a man who desireth to live quietly in the land. But however my spirit and principles are questioned, yet I resolve by the grace of God to lead for the future a quiet and peaceable life in all godliness and honesty.

I have but one word more to close all I have to say for myself, (for I have made no plea in law; in those matters I am as a dumb man, and cannot open my mouth,) and 'tis this: the Charge and Depositions lie before you, and I will but lay this before you also: that if so be my fact should deserve death, which I believe it doth not, and I hope you cannot find me under your own acts as to treason; yet if you do censure me rather upon a political interest, than from the merit of the fact, the Scripture accounts not that justice, but murder. Jehu put to death Ahab's son's, and that by the command of God; but he did it upon a political interest, to establish himself in his new-gotten government: and when God reckons for this, he says, 'I will avenge the blood of Jezreel upon the house of Jehu.' To do any thing upon a political interest, tho' the fact may deserve death, the Scripture counts this murder, not justice.

And I beseech you, let me suggest one thing to you, though I am 'a worm and no man,' and deserve not to be regarded amongst the children of men; yet what I have done and suffered, let it be a little thought on by you: and let me urge that of Abiathar the priest: he did an act that was not justifiable, and saith Solomon, 'Thou art worthy of death; but I will not at this time put thee to death, because thou bearest the ark of the Lord God before David my father, and because thou hast been afflicted in all wherein my father was afflicted.' I leave it to your own consciences to make application. Many things else might be suggested against me, and all to exasperate and exulcerate your minds against me, to make you with less regret of conscience to pass a doleful sentence upon me; which I hope you cannot, and for the fear of the Lord you dare not: but if you should, (and so I have done) I will say to you as Jeremiah did to the rulers of Israel: 'As for me, behold I am in your hands, do with me as seemeth good and meet unto you: but know ye for certain, that if ye put me to death, ye shall surely bring innocent blood upon yourselves.' But I will say as the apostle did, 'I hope better things of you, tho' I thus speak.'

And thus I commit myself, and my all, unto God, and to your judgments and consciences.

Mr. Attorney-General's REPLY to Mr. Love's DEFENCE.

Att. Gen. My lord; You have heard him say much, and it had been much better for him if he had said less. My lord, when men go out of the way of their own calling, they very often err; and truly I may attribute much of Mr. Love's confidence to his ignorance; my lord, to his ignorance of the law: and when men meddle beyond their own bounds, they do transgress. Mr. Love hath made you a continued speech; my lord, I do find the old proverb commonly true, 'In multitude of words there wanteth not evil.' And should I say nothing against Mr. Love, my lord, he hath said enough against himself, in that that he hath now repeated, even to his own condemnation, in that which he acknowledgeth, my lord, (I cannot say ingenuously, though himself hath said so) to be rather a misprision of reason and a concealment. My lord, acts of concealment are not so long continued, they have not so long continuance: and, my lord, you very well know (for the satisfaction of the gentleman at present, and some else that hear me) that he that hears a treason (for I do now go out a little in his own way) he that hears a treason must not look back before he go to the magistrate and reveal it, and if he be at the plough, he must leave his plough; if this gentleman were in his pulpit, he must leave his preaching: he that knows a treason, must go presently and reveal it: there must be no repetition of treason, my lord: Mr. Love, my lord, will be mistaken in that. But truly, my lord, I was very sorry, considering the condition Mr. Love now stands in, to hear those expressions from him that he hath made to you in relation to the past and present authority: my lord, I am not willing to repeat them, Mr. Love must hear of it another time. Truly, my lord, here is little of ingenuity (all men will believe) in this gentleman, that hath now laid it for a principle to himself, and all that shall hear him (and I think it not to be so Christian, so ingenuous), not to confess any thing any time; but that is ingenuity, that what is proved, that he will confess; and that is a high piece of ingenuity, that those things that are proved, he will ingenuously acknowledge: I, my lord, do not take that to be ingenuity, neither in my law, nor I believe in his divinity will it be. My lord, there hath been a great deal of care and pains taken by Mr. Love to take in pieces the evidence; I shall not undertake now to join them together, but in convenient time I shall, I doubt not, for the satisfaction of the court and their judgments, who, I must say, have been threatened by the gentleman; and, my lord, I hope for the conviction of himself. My lord, he knows there are shrewd pieces against him that he hath acknowledged, but he would take them off one by one; but when they are put together, they will not be single evidence, nor single testimony, nor single facts, but a continued reiteration and repetition of treason, a continued and series of time. My lord, you are pleased to observe, that he himself doth appear from 1648 to 1651; so that in 1648, 1649, 1650, and 1651, in all these years, my lord, there hath been this constant repetition and transacting of treason.

My lord, I learn from him, and it is very true—It is not good dallying with holy things; nor is it with states and commonwealths, it is very bad dallying with them; those that flutter there, will burn their wings at last; and it is not quirks of wit, nor strains of sense or nonsense, will, my lord, clear these things; it will not do it, my lord. My lord, he hath desired you will not hearken to private examinations; my lord, I have said so too, and there hath none been offered to you, but that which hath been public, and visâ voce; all have been so. But surely, my lord, I could wish this gentleman, and all others of his profession, would meddle in their own sphere, and not to walk out of that, to come and teach courts what they should do, to teach the magistrate what is his duty. My lord, I do hardly think it belongs to them even in the pulpit to do those things: but to tell us we must not examine before-hand, and ask questions in private; my lord, we cannot then be prepared for felons and treasons. And, my lord, I say this confidence is much from his ignorance; for these things are very familiar, and must be continued to be done: so that these things are not well broached by him, and I do think he will say at last, he understands not himself; and those, I hope, that hear, my lord, will say, I do not use it: for, my lord, I must say, it must be otherwise in all well-governed commonwealths. My lord, be hath not denied, but acknowledged meetings at his house more than once, twice, or thrice: and truly, I did expect from this gentleman, that he would not have continued those fearful imprecations of calling God to witness, that he did never write letter, nor send letter, nor lend money. I had thought he would not have gone upon these equivocations: did he never move other men to write? Did he never move others to lend money? It is not to say, this and this I have not done; but I had thought he would have cleared himself totally of any guilt that way, either in relation to receiving, or hearing letters read; or lending or receiving money, or moving for money. My lord, to put it upon a particular case, this will not blind the eyes of justice, but you will be able to see it. He is pleased to say, my lord, he will not lay it to the badness of the witnesses consciences, but to the badness of their memories. My lord, I hope in the conclusion their memories will appear to be right, and somebody's conscience else to be bad. And, my lord, for to hear this said by this gentleman that is a minister of the gospel, that it is a crime for these men to acknowledge their offences, this is strange: I had thought the first step to repentance had been confession; and that it had been no offence for any man living that hath committed a fault, or that thought he had committed a fault, to acknowledge it. In my law and divinity I thought it so, and I have not learned otherwise; and shall this gentleman take exceptions, because these gentlemen who have thought they have done amiss, have acknowledged their errors, and have craved mercy? My lord, I must say thus, If any deserve mercy, it is those that do acknowledge their offences, and crave mercy, and are sorry for them; and not those that are obstinate, and bid defiance to justice: prove what you can, I will confess nothing; that is not so conscientious or Christian a way. And for the witnesses, I do wonder that Mr. Love, of any man, should find fault with them; I cannot say they have taken sweet counsel together, but I shrewdly suspect they have taken very bad counsel together: these gentlemen are of his own choice, and of his own companions, and those that were conversant with him; and if you please to observe, at every word, Will. Drake; methinks that is a word of familiarity. But, my lord, for these, they were his companions, and whether I might say more, his household friends or guests ; but sure they were in his house very often, and were private with him, and in his chamber and study ; and to cover all these actions, and these treasonable practices, and letters and designs, here they must come to hear news, and this must cover it all : they come for nothing but news, and our contributions must be for charitable uses ; but you must not ask why or wherefore we lend money, but it is for charitable uses : neither God nor man will be blinded in these things ; and if these fig-leaves be sewn together, it will neither cover nakedness nor treason. My lord, Mr. Love hath said (and in that given judgment against himself), that either to treat or advise with the king of Scots in Scotland, he detests them both. My lord, if he be guilty of both then, I hope, he doth detest and renounce himself, and then I think he hath laid your judgment somewhat ; his own having past first, yours will easily follow. My lord, he confesses, that for this act of the 2d of August, 1650, he was ignorant of it, and of the danger of it. My lord, he very well knows that ignorance is no excuse ; the act is a public act, and hath been long printed, now ten months since himself saith ; and yet methinks I cannot reconcile that (that he that goes to make others differ), that he knew not of this act, and yet Sterks, the Scotch agent, was banished upon this act, and there was a contribution for him for his going away : the same act that doth the one, doth the other. My lord, he hath been pleased to cite a saying of cardinal Farnesus, ' That if he knew any part of him infected with Lutheranism, he would cut it off, and throw it into the fire : ' and so can he speak truly of himself, he would do, if he knew any thing of malignancy by himself. My lord, the question between him and us, is, what is malignancy ? I doubt we differ in that ; I doubt his sense of malignancy ; I am sure by some words I shrewdly guess at, that I count that malignity, and I hope all this court, and all that hear me, count that malignity, that I doubt his judgment leads him not to it, so I doubt we differ upon that.

My lord, he hath said, he was never an incendiary, or evil instrument ; I wish there were not cause for you to think otherwise : but surely the gentleman hath made large imprecations ; and hath spoken much for himself ; but I believe he knows there is so much justice here, that he expects not to be believed in what he says. If it were enough to accuse, who should be innocent ? And if it were enough to deny, who should be guilty ? He doth not expect to be believed for his word certainly ; for now he knows he stands in another capacity ; and as things are alledged and proved on both sides, so he is to be believed, and no otherwise. My lord, he hath been pleased to reflect upon myself in many particulars ; yea, and the court knows in what a capacity I stand here, as a servant to the state, to do my duty faithfully, and I must do it ; and yet I must say, it doth not become me to prompt witnesses ; that word, my lord, was not well spoken. He is pleased to say in the commendation of himself, that he hath a place in London where he hath a very good congregation, and a very good competency of maintenance ; and I heartily wish he had thought so really, and had kept himself singly to that. I do not think he will say, that in the duty of his place, as a minister of the word, to preach to instruct, to exhort, rebuke, reprove his people, or any under his charge, that ever the state did interpose or meddle with him, neither the parliament nor the commonwealth : then for God's love, my lord, why should this man interpose or meddle with the state ? Had you not enough to do in your own calling ? Had you not charge enough lying upon you, but must you be going abroad, and put your sickle into another man's harvest ? I will say, the state did never trouble the gentleman in his duty ; he did go on with as much peace and quietness as himself could desire, we interrupted not him ; let him reflect upon himself, and whether others have dealt so kindly with him ; when had he that liberty that now he hath had ? You may be pleased to observe, himself says, twelve years ago he could not in three years in London get an admission to be a lecturer ; and when he spoke in the congregation-house at Oxford, he was expelled there ; he hath had no such measure here. Doth kindness provoke him to these things ? Those that sin against kindness, are the highest transgressors. What provocation hath this gentleman had in his ministry, that he could not follow that, and have let the parliament and state alone ? Doth he not receive breath here to live, and his livelihood to sustain himself and his relations ? Why should you interpose to disquiet yourself and the commonwealth, when they did not provoke you ? And let all judge, whether this should not convince you ; and let me say thus much, that you have dealt foolishly, and have gone beyond your bounds, and have not kept within your limits, in what you have done in these things that you have acknowledged.

My lord, I speak this, that those may hear now that may not hear the other ; for that which Mr. Love hath said, we must have some time to recollect, and to speak in the vindication of the proceedings of the state against this gentleman ; which, though I think it needs not much, in respect of the court that hath heard him say so much, and confess so much as he hath done ; yet for the lenity of the state, that hath moved them to take care of their own preservation : and I would not do it, but that he hath stood upon all terms of defiance with justice and majesty ; and you have heard from a fellow-minister what he did the last day, and the principles he urged this day, which let me repeat again, there will be no living in society, if these things be let alone. My lord, it is much insinuated by him, that his blood will be upon you and the court ; I would he had thought upon blood before these things had been so transacted by himself: I am afraid (between God and his own conscience be it, and those that have had correspondence with him) that much of this blood that hath been spilt in Scotland, hath been made by their means: you hear him say, that what was desired by them (and in order to what it was) was, that the king of Scots might join with the Scottish nation, and not go to Ireland—that was his conscience. I do not know his conscience led him to meddle with those things, to meddle with state-affairs: but, my lord, if it be so, and this hath been brought on by them, that one hath encouraged the king to join with the Scots, and the other hath encouraged the Scots to join with the king by hopes of parties here, which he himself acknowledgeth now, was undertook in the name of a Presbyterian party; though I think, and do believe it, for very many honest Presbyterians, that they would spit in his face, if he should say it of them: but I say these doings have occasioned the shedding of much blood, and a great deal of variance between the two nations, and the Lord knows when it will end. But, my lord, as he concluded for himself, you will be pleased, my lord, to give me leave (though not in that way of conjuration as he hath done) to say for the state, I shall not prevent your judgments; but it is better that one man than a state, should perish. And if this man be guilty of the treasons proved against him, I believe himself will judge, he had better perish, and suffer death, than the state should perish. All these actings of his have been underminings of the state clean through, carried on very closely and covertly in disguises, and not discovered: but he that dances in a net, will be caught tripping at last. My lord, before you give your Judgment, you will consider that justice to the commonwealth—

So, my lord, I have added what my bad memory, I hope not bad conscience, hath repeated to me, as might give some Answer to what he hath said: But since he hath been pleased to take such pains to run through all and every one of the Evidence so exactly, and hath had three days given him for it; my lord, I shall ask but one for myself, and for those that are the counsel for the Commonwealth. My lord, this is all I shall say at present to you, and shall say no more till next meeting.

[Judge Keble, the Lord President, speaks after the Attorney General; the very beginning of his speech was not heard, he beginning very softly.]

Ld. President. But again in this point, for the Presbyterian Government, if it be rectified, doubtless it tends to the peace of this nation, and all places, but not with a Scotch limitation. I deny that; nor limited by a Scotch Covenant.

The next thing is this; because you often fall upon distinctions of the law, and that you are ignorant of the law; the more to blame you, that profess the learning of the law of God; for there is no law in England, but is as really and truly the law of God as any Scripture-phrase that is by consequence from the very texts of Scripture: For there are very many consequences reasoned out of the texts of Scripture; so is the law of England the very consequence of the very decalogue itself: And whatsoever is not consonant to Scripture in the law of England, is not the law of England, the very books and learning of the law: Whatsoever is not consonant to the law of God in Scripture, or to right reason, which is maintained by Scripture; whatsoever is in England, be it acts of parliament, customs, or any judicial acts of the Court, it is not the law of England, but the error of the party, which did pronounce it; and you or any man else at bar may so plead it. And therefore to profess you are knowing in the laws of God, and yet to be ignorant of the laws of England, when yet the laws of England be so purely the laws of God, as no law in the world more practical at this day—for you to be ignorant of them is not to your commendation, nor to any of your profession.

Then, Sir, for your going on in these ways: The Court with patience hath heard you, I think, two hours, or thereabouts, and you have done nothing but anticipated the Court: What! Do you think they have not understandings, and judgments, and consciences? They would have done it, they would have examined these witnesses precisely, and would have compared them, but you have taken up all this time by way of anticipation; and in a rhetorical way to do it! Let me tell you, that orators among the Heathens have been the greatest incendiaries; and those orators in Christendom that do not set their judgments upon right ends, they are the most unworthy men in Christendom: For there are no heresies, murders, traitorous or treasonable practices and attemptings, and all the highest wickednesses that ever were committed in Christendom whatsoever, or in this nation in particular, but they have had some of that profession that have called themselves ministers of Jesus Christ, as the Jesuits of Jesus, and the priests of those; and all these things and high actings have still had some tincture of your coat in them. Therefore it is not your office can excuse you; your office is sacred as other Christian offices are, and you are no more divines by your office; but you are to remember, and you must know, that Christian justice that you teach in the pulpit, to act it in the Court, is of a higher nature than preaching is: And therefore in this, that you should advance your profession beyond the judicatories of this land, know, that judgment and justice is the highest religion in the world, both in Christendom and out of it. And this, Sir, we would have you know, that lawyers doctrine tends to this, and I hope hereafter you will be more obedient, and better versed to know these grounds of the laws of England, by which now you are called here.

I shall say no more, but take advice of the Court about you.

[The Court adjourns, and Mr. Love is commanded away.]

The Fourth Day's Proceeding, June 27, 1651.

Mr. Hall, the first Counsel for the Commonwealth.

Mr. Hall. My lord, the prisoner at the bar, Mr. Love, stands impeached before your lordship of High Treason, which Impeachment hath been read before your lordship and the Court. My lord, by that he stands charged with High-Treason, with several offences of High-Treason; That he in the years 1648, 1649, 1650, and 1651, with William Drake, Henry Jermin, Henry Piercy, John Gibbons, Edward Massey, Syllas Titus, and others his accomplices, did traitorously, wickedly, and maliciously confederate, plot, and endeavour to stir up a new and bloody war in this nation, and to subvert the government now established without a king and house of lords.

My lord, that in the same years, since the death of the late king, he did, with other his accomplices, endeavour to promote Charles Stuart to be king of England, contrary to an act of parliament before that time made in this nation.

My lord, that in the same years he and his accomplices did traitorously and maliciously aid and assist the nation of Scotland, to the end that they might invade this Commonwealth; and hath adhered to the forces raised by the enemies of this Commonwealth.

My lord, that in the same time, between the month of March and the first of June, this present month, he hath traitorously and maliciously held and maintained correspondence and intelligence by letters, messages, instructions and otherwise, with the enemies of this Commonwealth, and to the prejudice of this nation; and in particular with Charles Stuart and the late queen his mother, and with Jermin and Piercy, and other persons of counsel abiding with Charles Stuart.

My lord, That he hath likewise held correspondence and intelligence with the Scottish nation, prejudicial to this Commonwealth, and to the end they might invade and bring a bloody war upon this nation.

My lord, These treasons and traitorous and wicked practices of the prisoner at the bar, were and are to the apparent hazard of the public peace of this Commonwealth, and free-state, and the parliament and people of England; and in contempt and violation of the laws of the land, and contrary to several acts of parliament in such cases made and provided.

My lord, There have been several Witnesses and Proofs of these particular Charges against the Prisoner: And, my lord, I do conceive that there hath been such proof made, that in your lordship's judgment he will appear to be guilty of all these particular actings. But, my lord, I will not enter upon the proof, only make a summary relation of the beginning and continuance of this Plot and Design.

My lord, This Plot did begin very suddenly after it pleased God to take away the chief enemy of this nation. The king died in Jan. 1648, and this Plot began in February, the very next month following: And in the same month, my lord, the Scotch nation did proclaim Charles Stuart king of Scotland; and they did not stop there, but proclaimed him likewise king of England; and then, my lord, this Plot began here. For in the month of February, the next month after the king died, the meeting was at the Swan at Dowgate, where were several of the correspondents at that time; as Drake, Huntington, Titus, and others: And the end of that meeting was to contrive a way that they might agree the king and the Scottish nation; that was the end of their meeting at that time.

My lord, within a few days after that, they met again, all these several persons, at the White-Hart in Bread-street, and to the same purpose; and at length it was resolved to make their addresses to the queen, and to Piercy and Jermin (first it was to the king himself) for a compliance between the king and the Scots: Letters were sent accordingly, and several meetings and several returns of messages were had of them. My lord, at length it was resolved, that they should send messengers to the king at Jersey, and agreed upon one Titus; and they raised money and gave it to Titus to undertake the journey. My lord, Titus accordingly went in the month of May, 1649, and returned in August following. After he had done his negotiation there, he returned to Calais: But being afraid this wicked Plot was discovered, by reason of letters that were intercepted, he durst not come into England; but sent letters to desire some correspondents might be sent to Calais. My lord, all this time I do not find that the proof discovers the prisoner at the bar to be any actor, or present at any meeting hitherto: But when these letters came from Titus, then the letters were brought to Mr. Love's house; which is the first time I find him by proof to be present. The letters were read in his house, and in his study, as some of the witnesses say that were there present; and it was then agreed, my lord, that Alford should go to Calais to Titus. My lord, accordingly he went, and there Titus did communicate unto him the affairs that passed at Jersey. Within four or five days after, Alford returns again; and where should the meeting be but at Mr. Love's house again, where Mr. Love and divers of the accomplices were in his house! A Letter from the king was read, the Diary, the Narrative from Titus likewise was read there; and there was the consultation what should be done, and what further course they should take to join the king and the Scots together. My lord, afterward they did agree that there should be some sent to treat with the king at Breda; the Instructions were drawn in Mr. Love's house, (I think one witness says so), and Mr. Love present; money was raised, and Mr. Love himself did speak to one of the witnesses to raise money, which was Far: Far accordingly did bring in 5*l.* and laid it down upon Mr. Love's table, Mr. Love being present then in the room.

My lord, I shall not trouble you with the relation of more particulars; but, my lord, I conceive that Mr. Love doth upon these proofs stand guilty of endeavouring to promote the king to be king of England: For, my lord, what should be the end of uniting the king and the Scots together, after that the Scots had proclaimed Charles Stuart king of England, but that they might come in a warlike manner to invade this nation, and set up his authority as king among us?

My lord, I conceive I shall submit to your lordship's judgment, that he is guilty of intelligence from a professed enemy. The intelligence is, my lord, That divers letters were sent, and these letters were read in his presence, as himself doth confess he was at the reading of divers letters, and did not consent to them; and thereupon makes it as it were but misprision of treason. My lord, I conceive that this is apparently treason: For if letters were sent to one person, and did occasionally come into another man's hand, and he conceal them, being not sent to him, there peradventure it is but misprision of treason. But when there are sent to these particular persons letters from the king and Scots, and divers persons in hostility against the commonwealth of England, and received by the confederates in Master Love's house, and there were read and debated, though they did not agree to some particulars, yet they are actors: They are—in the very intelligence itself; and did likewise return several letters.

My lord, this intelligence was with the Scottish nation; which truly, my lord, I do conceive hardly an Englishman, that had the blood of an Englishman running in his veins, would join in confederacy with that nation, of all the nations of the world, against this Commonwealth; a nation that hath been known (and I am sure the prisoner at the bar is well read in the histories and stories of this nation) to have been a constant enemy to this nation in all ages through the memory of all histories; and, my lord, of late, not three years since, came and invaded this nation with a puissant army, which it pleased God to deliver us from: And this the prisoner could not be ignorant of, that we had lately a fight with them at Dunbar; that hostility could not be unknown unto the prisoner at the bar neither. And yet for all that, to confederate with a nation that were such constant enemies to us; my lord, I could not conceive it had been in the heart of an Englishman, much less in a minister and preacher of the gospel among us.

My lord, there are some particular charges upon him, more than upon any of the rest:

after Drake fled away, being doubtful that his secret traitorous plot would be discovered, Mr. Love supplied his room; all the meetings, and confederacies, and letters, and agitations in this business, were constantly at Mr. Love's house, himself being present: And, my lord, money, as I said before, by Mr. Love himself desired to be raised for the furthering of this design; and several sums of money were raised. I shall trouble your lordship with no further relation, but leave it to the proof that was made before your lordship and the Court.

Sir Thomas Witherington, the second Counsel for the Commonwealth.

Sir Tho. Witherington. My lord, Mr. Love's Defence which he made for himself, as he did it for his life, so he took a great deal of pains in it, and was very accurate in the Defence he made, especially in the Witnesses. My lord, I shall not take upon me (for it is not my charge at this time) to reply unto the whole Defence that Mr. Love made.

My lord, that I shall say shall be in two particulars, for Mr. Love divided that which he said into four parts; the first concerning the Charge; the second concerning the Witnesses and Testimony; the third concerning himself; and the fourth concerning some Proposals to the Court.

My lord, I shall only meddle with that which is concerning the Witnesses; and secondly, to some part of that he said concerning himself: I shall only reply as to these two, and the rest I shall leave to Mr. Attorney-General, that better knows what is for the advantage of the Commonwealth.

My lord, I shall begin concerning the Witnesses, to clear them (for now we are in our Reply for the Commonwealth). Mr. Love, who did profess a very great deal of ignorance in the laws of the land, yet he did insinuate something that implied some knowledge of them, in that, my lord, he took some exceptions to the witnesses. My lord, I take it, that these exceptions were:

1. That the Witnesses were not probi testes et legales. And,

2. That they were Participes criminis: And that indeed is included in the other.

My lord, first, I shall speak to this, that the witnesses produced against him, are legales testes: They are competent witnesses, and sufficient witnesses, without exception against them. I shall first speak to that they are testes legales: For Mr. Love did object, that they themselves confessed themselves to be guilty of the same crimes; and so their confession is upon the matter a conviction; and so they are convicted of the crimes in which they are witnesses against him: and so are not competent witnesses.

My lord, I shall clear this: Under favour I take it they are very clear and good witnesses, notwithstanding the exceptions. And, my lord, this I take to be a very plain case: the case which is in our common law: The case is —which proves it fully : for if a man be accused of High Treason, indicted of High Treason, and will confess the indictment, and become an approver, yet he may be a witness against all those parties guilty of the same treasons with himself; he is particeps criminis with them and they with him : And yet this man thus becoming an approver, will at common law be a witness and a legal and good witness against them.

My lord, I shall a little open that, because it clears the case. My lord, an approver can only approve, it is true ; that is when a man is indicted of High Treason, and other his accomplices with him, and he upon the indictment says it is true ; and then desires he may have something assigned to him, and then he accuses such and such persons of the same crimes : In this case this man, after he hath confessed the indictment, and takes his corporal oath to reveal all treasons he knows in the indictment, (for he can accuse no further) after this done, he shall be a witness : he is a witness against those with whom he is Particeps criminis : Nay my lord, it is of merit and justice that he shall have this reward, he shall be pardoned his life. Now, that I prove to you, because that shews the reason that even the man, after indictment and confession, yet being an approver, shall be an accuser of his brethren, those that were Particeps criminis with him, and a good witness. And the reason of that goes to this case in hand : For although these men had a hand in the same plot and design with him, and have confessed, and did confess it upon evidence, that they were there present, and did many things ; yet I take it they are clear, competent, and good witnesses, and that is no objection against them, that they are Participes criminis. My lord, if the law were otherwise it were impossible to prove many offences ; for many offences cannot be proved but by some men that had a hand in them. In an ordinary case, an action of trespass and false imprisonment, if three men are guilty of it, it is an usual thing in courts of justice to admit one of them a witness. True, they are not parties in the action, and so may be witnesses : For these things may be so secretly done otherwise, that their treasons could never be revealed to recover against the Prisoner.

There is a case, I think, in all our knowledge: it is the case of the earl of Castlehaven.* He was accused of a very grievous fact. The witnesses, which came against him, were one or two footmen, that were participes criminis in the very same fact; and these men, by the opinion of the judges, were competent witnesses. My lord, he was arraigned, indicted, and convicted, and suffered death; nay, it is very true, that one of these persons was afterwards hanged for the same offence. So that, I think, under favour, as to that, I take it that they are clear and good witnesses, notwithstanding that objection.

The next objection is, That they were not probi testes. Truly, for that, my lord, I must appeal to your judgment in it; whether these men be not probi testes, et honesti too; for, in case of an approver, as I mentioned before, that man that accuses his brethren upon the same treason, it is said, that of merit and justice the king ought to grant him his pardon; for they that discover the traitors against the commonwealth, these certainly are probi testes, and good commonwealth's men. And so I take it, that this is no objection against them in that, but as before they were legales testes, so they are probi testes. My lord, I mention these things, to shew that the witnesses for the commonwealth are good and competent in this case.

The next objection touching these witnesses; is, That though they be admitted for good witnesses, yet there is not to any one fact two witnesses. There is not any one of the most criminal parts of the charge proved by two witnesses. And so as before they were incompetent, in regard of the quality and participancy of their crimes, so now he would make them incompetent for want of number.

My lord, I shall first agree to the ground of this objection; for truly, my lord, I take it, that it is by the common and ancient law of England, that in cases of treason there must be two witnesses; and it is by a law more ancient than that; that is, by the law of God. But, my lord, it is true, the law of this land is explained by several statutes; the statute of the 1st and 5th of Edw. 6, and the 2d of Philip and Mary. My lord, I take it upon all these statutes; the one statute says, To accuse another, there must be two Witnesses: I take it, the Accuser and Witness are all one; that is, the same that in one statute is called a witness, in another is called an accuser. But there must be two; that is the objection. But then give me leave to consider this case, and to consider how those two witnesses shall be. My lord, I say, under favour, that in a case that consists of a complicated fact, that is, the reiteration of many actions, my lord, I conceive none of these laws are to be intended, that for every of the particular facts there should be two witnesses: that cannot be the intention of any of these laws, that in every particular fact, that is to say, whether Mr. Love was present at the reading of the letters; if you have one witness to that, another for the writing of them, another to the sending of them; though these three witnesses speak to several parts of the business, yet they are a concurrent testimony, for all agree to the fact. I well remember, my lord, a case in the Star Chamber, against B. of Leicestershire; I think there was an information against him for bribery and extorting of fees. The matter came in the conclusion, that one man proved a bribe, and another man proved a bribe; one proved a bribe of 40*l.* and another a bribe of 40*l.*; but there were several witnesses to several bribes. The question now was, Whether he took bribes, or no? And these tending to the same general charge, it was the opinion of all the judges, that he did extort and take bribes. The one witness spake to one bribe, and another to another; and in that case, as two witnesses made good a charge against an offender, yet in that case it was taken, that where witnesses, though they speak not in every particular, yet, all tending to the same general charge of bribery, these were taken for plural witnesses, and that was a good conviction. That was the opinion of the judges then. I mention this case only for an instance to express myself in this; for Mr. Love cannot expect, that to every particular thing laid to his charge two witnesses should be produced. But, my lord, when one witness proves, this thing he hath done, this letter hath he written, and another, that another thing he hath done, which all tend to the treason; now these are more witnesses, and two or three witnesses of the same thing, though not to the same individual thing, it is—So that upon the matter they are concurrent witnesses in this complicated fact, though not concurrent in this or that circumstance: for that is impossible almost in any action to be done.

But then Mr. Love did further enlarge this objection, which was out of a saying he had, That in case of treason, 'Probationes oportent esse luce clariores,' The proof must be as clear as the sun. Truly, my lord, it is very hard that works of darkness should need so much light for discovery, and that so clear a proof should be necessary when the things are done in darkness and secrecy. My lord, I think, under favour, though in this particular we have our witness, as I take it, to speak very plainly and clearly: for it is their own faults if they do not, for they were present at the meetings, at the consultations and debates: but yet I do observe, that in this case things were carried on in a very secret manner. For I do observe, first, at these meetings, all of them were done under a disguise, every thing acted in this business. I observe it upon evidence, first, That the very meetings themselves, they go under the title of Prayer and Fasting; for so Huntington told you, He was spoke to go to prayer at Mr. Love's house. The contributions made for raising of money, for sending of messages and dispatches, was under the disguise of charitable uses. So that here was a darkness all along. And then for the letters, there were no names subscribed to them: all were done without names, only the letter L. was upon one. And the place, truly I must say, that was obscure too; for what man would have thought that the place of meeting should have been at Mr. Love's house? a man that hath been so much for, and shewed so great an affection to the parliament, as he said himself in substance. A man would sooner have thought to have found this treason in any cellar in London, than in Mr. Love's house. For the Instructions, for the Directions and Dispatches, some were sent in table-books, written in sack in a table-book: but, my lord, I am afraid, in the conclusion, the letters will be written in blood. But, my lord, this I do observe, that through these difficulties, though we passed through our evidence, yet your lordship heard how plain the proof was in most particulars. My lord, I shall say no more as to these witnesses, because the other part of answering the witnesses belongs to the Attorney General; for master Love went over all the particular Witnesses.

My lord, I shall only say one thing, and that is this, concerning Mr. Love himself; and it is only concerning this point. My lord, Mr. Love himself did say, He would be ingenuous so far as he took himself to be guilty. But, my lord, I know your lordship and the court observes that that ingenuity did follow the proof that was for the commonwealth. My lord, he confesses he was present at them; he was silent after all these meetings and debates: I mean the meetings after they began at his own house; for I speak not of them that were at Dowgate, for there is no proof that he was there. My lord, this he confesses; and this he says is misprision of treason. Truly, my lord, I must be bold to differ from him in that particular: I take it, that that he confesses is high-treason. I shall speak a little to misprision of treason, and so conclude.

My lord, Misprision of Treason is when a man hath notice of a thing that is treason, and he conceals it. Now, my lord, under favour, the concealment must not be long; it must not sleep long with him. My lord, I remember an axiom an Author hath in our law, and that is Bracton: He hath a discourse of Misprision of Treason; he hath it in Latin. Says he, "He that knows a Treason, he must not stay in one place a day and a night, but he must go on; he must go toward the magistrate. Nay" (says he) "though he have most urgent business, yet he must set it aside, and go on, and must not stay in any place till he hath revealed it. Nay" (he says further) "he ought not to look back till he hath given information to the magistrate." The man that doth not after this manner forthwith reveal it, this only is Misprision of Treason. But considering this case of Mr. Love's now confessing the fact, he takes it to be Misprision of Treason; but I take it to be treason itself. My lord, I shall observe what Mr. Love did: He was at these meetings; these meetings were continued for divers days and months. My lord, was there any discovery made by Mr. Love? Was there any revelation of his to any magistrate? Did he tell it to any man? Nay, did he confess it upon his examination, when examined? Nay, did he not deny it when he came to the bar before your lordship? Can this be said to be misprision of treason, that a man should hold so long in treason, and not reveal it? My lord, as every treason includes a misprision of treason in it; so I conclude that misprision of treason may grow up to treason itself. Now when a man shall so long sleep upon it, and be violent in it, and not reveal it,

I take this misprision of treason grows up into treason itself.

My lord, I shall say no more of that, but I shall conclude; because the other part lies upon Mr. Attorney-General, who is better able to do it. Only one thing I shall take notice of to your lordship, and I am troubled at it; and that is, That as he saith, that he that hath been so much for the parliament, with whom he hath gone along, and took sweet counsel together, and hath been active for, and passive with, through all the passages of the late wars; that he should suffer from them, this, he says, stuck very much upon him. But, my lord, for him that hath been so much for the parliament, so familiar with their proceedings, that hath been so active for them, and hath suffered so much for them; my lord, for him to kick the heel against the parliament; for him, after all this, now even in the infancy of this commonwealth, that this child should be destroyed, and by one with whom we have took sweet counsel together; and by one, I may say this, that though he had no hand in making this commonwealth, yet I dare say he had in the preparations to it; for himself all along hath gone with the parliament: So that, my lord, I take this to be an objection against him. But, my lord, I shall say no more in it, but refer the other part to Mr. Attorney-General.

Mr. Attorney-General, the third Counsel for the Commonwealth.

Att. Gen. My lord, I am sorry Mr. Love hath given me the occasion of this meeting, and of my speaking at present; I could much rather have wished to have been silent: But now I am drawn hither, I am forced to it. Mr. Love, my lord, in the beginning of his Trial, did desire God so to assist him, that he might go through it with gravity, meekness, and wisdom, as became a minister of the Gospel. I wish that God had heard his prayers, that he had so gone through it. What he hath done, the Court hath observed. My lord, in that part I have to do, I do heartily desire I might do it with faithfulness to you, and the duty of the place I ought to discharge, and to the Court.

My lord, the work that this day lies upon me, is to reply somewhat to what was said by Mr. Love in his own defence, and to make a faithful repetition to the Court, and to do the witnesses and the prisoner right; to repeat that, and that only, that hath been said; and in that, that I may do no wrong to mis-lead the Court, and offer nothing to the prejudice of the witnesses, nor to the prisoner. And truly, my lord, I shall not (in his own words) have any tortured collections, nor any inferences, nor strains of wit: He hath shewed his oratory in his Defence; my lord, I shall shew the simplicity of law in the Reply.

My lord, the Charge hath been repeated to you; and for that insisted upon by Mr. Love for the Witnesses and testimony, you have had answer: I shall not trouble you; there hath been pains taken in it. My lord, I think all men were satisfied that it was clear enough; yet to make it more clear, Mr. Love, my lord, insisted upon one thing more, and that is upon point of time, and the point of the jurisdiction of the court, which (by your favour) I shall first begin with.

He stands charged, he says, for crimes done in 1648, 1649, 1650, and 1651. And those crimes, he says, were before this Court was, or had a being; and so had not power to take cognizance of them. That, my lord, I shall endeavour to clear to you, and I think in much clearness; clearer than the light, as he will have his Evidence. He stands charged (I say) positively, my lord, with no crime before a law was emitted, that did give an inhibition, and was published and known. He stands charged with no crime before the law was published, that did declare what the crime was, and gave notice to beware.

My lord, that that was first, was the law that was made the 30th of January, 1648, that doth declare, (and upon that law I shall fetch the foundation and rise of this treason) That whoever shall proclaim, declare, publish, or any way promote Charles Stuart, or any other person, to be king or chief magistrate of England or Ireland, without consent in parliament, shall be adjudged a traitor, and shall suffer pains of death as a traitor. Here was this law published, and notice given what every man should trust to, and, I may say, my lord, obedience expected. Against this law hath Mr. Love transgressed, and, under favour, in a very high measure; so that, my lord, I charge him upon this law, and since this law was made; and to this law there is no limitation of time for men to be questioned for it: And for this law, it is in express terms given in commission to this Court to take cognizance of it: so that, I think, this is a little clear to him.

My lord, the next is a law published in July, 1649, that is entitled, 'An Act declaring what Offences shall be Treason:' That, I think, he is not ignorant of, though he pretended to be ignorant of another. My lord, that law likewise, though it was before this Court was erected, yet this Court hath, by express words of the commission, power to take cognizance of it. And this Court, in these things, is not like other judicatories, that when offences are committed, the state takes care to appoint courts and judges to judge those offences. Let it be no offence to Mr. Love, if this Court were erected especially to try him. But the law was not made especially to punish him; for the law was made before, and the offence committed before; and so, I think, in all England the offences are committed before the Judges go their circuits, and have their commissions.—My lord, the next is the law that constitutes this Court, and says in what particulars this Court hath power to take notice of offences, besides those mentioned before, and the last concerning the Scots: That was but lately, which Mr. Love says he was ignorant of; but he was not ignorant to do somewhat against it.

My lord, these are the laws that Mr. Love is impeached upon.

The next thing that I have to do, is (and in that I humbly beg your favour, that as I am now to do justice, if I may so say, to the Court, and to be faithful to my trust, and the duty imposed upon me) to repeat the Evidence right unto you; and in that, as the gentleman, the Prisoner at the bar, hath had that favour from you to have a notary by him, to take all that was said of all parties; so, my lord, by your favour we have had some here to help our memories: with whom I have conferred; and by the help of their notes and our memories, my lord, we think we have faithfully transcribed that which was said by the witnesses. And, my lord, I humbly crave favour, as not now being a private examination to be read, but a public testimony in the presence of Mr. Love himself and the Court: I hope it is not private now, but I may use notes to do him right, and may read those things that they testified upon their oath here.

In the first place, my lord, I shall according to my best judgment do him no wrong. For the first, I shall acknowledge it was but a hearsay, and that from Drake, of letters sent from Scotland to the Presbyterian party in England, to let them know what had been done of proclaiming the king there, and that care should be taken for their interest. This I do acknowledge was but a hearsay; but that which followed not long after that time, my lord, was positive; and there, my lord, I shall begin the rise of this. And thus, as hath been observed by my fellows, that are counsel here, though there was not acting, nor presence, nor knowing, yet, my lord, under a second, it will appear he was consenting and approving, and so guilty of the first fact. My lord, there was a meeting at Dowgate: I suppose you remember it full well; it hath been several times repeated to you by several persons; and Titus the party now beyond the seas, and Drake, and other traitors fled, were prime sticklers for this, and moved others to come in, and to be there present, and hear what was the design. As I did crave your lordship's favour, so I shall, that I may not, as he says, trust to a fickle nor a roving memory, that I may be faithful, to read to you that I have taken, and what was said by them. I suppose Mr. Love hath by him one that can controul me, if I do not right.

I begin with this meeting at Dowgate, and continued at the White Hart in Bread-street: Alford gave you this evidence, "That one morning he was wished by Drake to go to the Swan at Dowgate: When he came there, there was one Titus who gave relation of the good disposition of the Prince, and how inclinable he was to take the Covenant, and to cast off the cavaliering party, and those about him, if there were opportunity found, how to make him know there was a considerable party in England that would stick close to the ends of the Covenant; and upon that, we that were there did think we were bound in duty, in relation to the Covenant, to press the Prince to take it, and to prosecute the ends of it. And for that Titus said, if we would appoint another meeting, he would draw up something in way of application of the Presbyterian party to that purpose. We afterwards met at the Bear in Bread-street, and there he drew forth something he had framed to that purpose, and read it, and it was agreed to be sent over to the Prince; the substance of it was to press the Prince to apply himself to take the Covenant, and to prosecute the ends of it, and to cast off all the Cavaliers and that party about him, which had brought so much mischief to his father, and would do likewise to him: And this (I believe) was sent over, for Titus undertook to send it over. We asked him, how the prince could be made to believe that this coming from so inconsiderable a party as we were, should come under the notion of the Presbyterian party of England? He said he would undertake it by means of my lord Piercy." And, my lord, I think you do remember there was one Mason, servant of Piercy, that was sent over hither, so testified by some, to reconcile the royal and Presbyterian party. This Mason, my lord, was Piercy's servant, so testified here by divers. My lord, here is now the foundation: Drake is he that moves Alford; and Titus, I may suppose, the mover of Drake; and both of them fled as traitors. My lord, if they were traitors, and this is treason, then whoever had a hand in carrying on their design, himself is a traitor, and this action is treason. My lord, this is the testimony of Alford.

My lord, there is another Witness, and that is lieut. col. Bains, who I think was present only at this meeting, and had enough of it, and did leave it; and yet was present at this, and gave in evidence of what was there proposed. I think he was present at no other meeting, he was satisfied this was too much; his testimony, as I take it, was this, for I shall read it, that I may do no wrong to no party: Bains said, "It was also proposed by Titus, that something should be done, in order to restoring the Presbyterian interest, by application to the Prince, and to assure him, that he had a considerable party in England, which looked upon it as a duty, and lying upon all of them by the Covenant. And that it was necessary somewhat should be done by some parliament men, ministers, and citizens, that were leading active men, that he might have an assurance that somewhat would be done for him; and somewhat to the queen, Jermin and Piercy, whom he said were their friends:" This, my lord, was that which Titus said at this meeting: and testified by Bains.

My lord, there is another, colonel Barton, who was produced as an evidence. My lord, I think that he spoke not much more than to this, and gave off here. My lord, his testimony was this; for I do conceive, under favour, we have taken the very precise words spoken by them; and, my lord, so as spoken and taken, so written, and so, my lord, read to you. Barton, my lord, said, "That Drake would have him to be a messenger; and to that purpose there were several meetings at the Swan and White Hart." This was what Barton testified.

My lord, then there was major Huntington, which was at this meeting, and one more at Mr. Love's house, which he full well remembers. My lord, Huntington says this, that about March 1648, (in January was the law published) Alford told him that Titus was in town, and that he was newly come from beyond the seas from their friends, Massey, Bunce, Graves, and others; and that Titus was to meet the next day at Dowgate, where he fell into high praises of the Prince, and told them, that though he was taking unhandsome courses, yet they had great hopes his inclinations were otherwise. Titus said further, he feared his inclining to the Irish, unless something should be gotten from his friends here to divert him; that you remember was Mr. Love's charity too, as you will hear anon. Titus proposed to get letters from persons of honour, to persuade him to a good opinion of the Scots, to take the Covenant, and to join with them.

Afterward they met at the White-Hart in Bread-street, where Titus declared that he should gain these letters, and hoped to set something a-foot to the same effect; and there said, they were confident they could see no way under heaven for him else, but by taking the Covenant, and engaging the Scots against England: To which purpose he drew forth a paper, purporting that they were bound in honesty, conscience, and loyalty, to maintain and help him to his just rights, if he would go along and join with the covenanting party in England and Scotland.

My lord, this is that now that hath past in proof by Evidence concerning this first meeting at the Swan at Dowgate; which I do humbly conceive was the rise and foundation of what follows afterward. And this, my lord, if true, I suppose no man will say, but that was treason that was transacted there. I do not say, my lord, that Mr. Love was present at it, nor, as yet, can I say, knowing of it; but what follows after, my lord, will bring him in danger.

My lord, here, you have heard, was this meeting, and what was propounded to be done here, and how active Titus was, and that he was to go (you have heard by the testimony) to Piercy; and it is not doubted by any but he did go thither; it is not doubted by any but he was sent, and did go thither. To that purpose I shall now read you two witnesses more, which I have caused to be transcribed too, in the words as spoken by them, as I do conceive, that is, Adams and Far: that there was money agreed upon, to send Titus to Piercy; that there was money collected, and that they themselves did contribute. Adams he expresseth it thus: "that upon a meeting, the place and time I remember not, where I think were present Drake, Titus, Alford, and my self, and I cannot tell how many more; it was agreed that Titus should go to Piercy: the end of his going was to promote an agreement between the king and the Scots, according to the Covenant (and, my lord, you shall hear in due time what that Covenant is, that Mr. Love hath said in his late Defence)." In order to his going, we did agree to furnish him with money for the present, and made some kind of promise to keep him while he was out: about 100*l.* was furnished; for my part, I paid 20*l.* of it." This is Adams.

The next is Far: he says, "He did understand by Drake, that Titus, who was here requested as one to be present at the treaty of Jersey, which Titus did undertake to go thither: he undertook to go himself. That after he was gone, Drake desired Far to let him have 10*l.*, saying Titus was in want, and upon this I lent him 10*l.*: the letter was read at Mr. Love's house when he came from Calais." So, my lord, here is now, under favour, his proof before you of this meeting at Dowgate, at the Swan there, finished in Bread-street, carried over unto Jersey, Titus the messenger furnished with money by a party from hence in this errand, as we told you. My lord, all this while I do not hear of Mr. Love; if he were, my lord, he was like the mole under ground; but however, my lord, Mr. Love hath carried himself (as some have said) like a rat among joint-stools, a man can see him, but cannot hit him. But, my lord, I doubt he will appear to be too busy in what follows, and that he had a hand in it at first.

My lord, the next to go on with is this, in time: That when Titus finished his work in Jersey, he was then to give an account to his masters that employed him, and upon his return he was to do it faithfully, as he thought. But being informed, that the state had vigilant eyes, and they discovered him what he had been doing there, and he having notice from some of his steadfast friends here of it, he thought it was not safe for him to come in person, so that his guilty conscience kept him off. But then he did desire that he might give an account by the hand of some others, by their memories; and for that purpose wrote a letter, to whom I cannot tell, I think to Drake: the letter was written, and under favour, my lord, this letter from Titus was read in Mr. Love's house, to have one sent to him; and there it was propounded for some to be sent. Adams was propounded for him to go; Far propounded for him to go: but not them, but Alford was agreed to go, and did accept of it; but not that he was there, my lord. My lord, for this I shall crave the same favour from you, to read Adams and Far, as to that particular. This is major Adams; "It was moved in Mr. Love's house, Mr. Love being there present, that I should go to Calais to meet Titus; but Alford going thither, did at his return give an account of the state of things at Mr. Love's house." My lord, that I read him for, is for that part, that it was moved in Mr. Love's chamber, Mr. Love being then present; "that I should go to Calais to meet Titus: it was moved, that Adams should go;" My lord, this I read to show Mr. Love was privy to this before the messenger was sent. My lord, the next is captain Ralph Far: "I was in Mr. Love's house in his study, wherein" (in Mr. Love's study) "a letter was read from Titus, desiring one might be sent to him to Calais; and thereupon it was moved that I should go, but afterwards it was agreed that Alford should go, who went accordingly." That is now as to that particular, that before any man was sent unto Calais, it was made known in Mr. Love's house, and some propounded for to go, and at last another did go; this, my lord, I offer to you, as that which will not be controverted by Mr. Love, for I have read you two witnesses to it. The next, my lord, is, in which (I think) we do not differ; but that when Alford had been at Calais, and had taken the account that Titus gave him, the copy of the letter which he said was from the king to the presbyterian party here, the Narrative of all the transactions and proceedings to Jersey: that upon his return, I think we do not differ, nor is it denied; I am sure Mr. Love acknowledged it in his last defence, because proved by four, therefore confessed, my lord, that this Narrative, the copy of this letter was read in his house; and for that I have the testimony of Adams, Alford, Jaquel, and Far; which, if it be your pleasure I shall humbly read unto you.

The first is major John Alford: "Having received at Calais a Narrative in writing of Titus's transactions in Jersey, I brought the same to Drake, to whom it was directed." Now it appears to whom the direction was. "And he brought it to Mr. Love's house, where it was read; afterwards there was a commission so called." But, my lord, if you please, that is for this in the first place, That this narrative brought from Titus by Alford was read at Mr. Love's house.

The next is Adams; "But Alford going to Calais, did at his return give an account of the state of things at Mr. Love's house, which account was the Narrative from Titus, and the copy of the letter said to be the king's letter: The contents whereof I remember was as followeth; The king expressed a great deal of affection to the ministry in general in England, and promised them great favours, when he was in a condition, and desired them to continue stedfast in the way they were in; which letter was read and published in Mr. Love's study, and Mr. Love was there some times of the reading. At the same time a motion was made, of giving thanks to Titus for his well managing affairs there, and at the same time the Commission and Instructions were." So that here is another testimony, that this was done at Mr. Love's house; the Narrative, says this gentleman, and the copy of the king's letter.

My lord, the next I shall read unto you, is Mr. John Jaquel: "After Alford's coming home, I was at Mr. Love's house, where was Potter, Drake, and Alford; and Mr. Love was there some times, though divers times somebody came to speak with him, and called him, and he went to speak with them. A Narrative from Titus was there read by Alford or Drake, wherein was declared the king's inclination to make peace with the Scots, but his wicked council hindered him. I think it was a Narrative of what had passed between the king and Titus at Jersey." This is that that Jaquel says.

The next, my lord, is Far. Alford being returned, he gave an account of his employment at Mr. Love's house; a copy of a letter was there read, from the king to the Presbyterian party in England: The substance was to send commissioners to the treaty at Breda. The Narrative brought from Titus was communicated at Mr. Love's house, where were present 10 or 12 persons. So, my lord, you have heard these four witnesses, what they have said concerning this: Now you shall give me leave to make application of this to the former, I shall crave your favour to go through this: There follows more at Mr. Love's house, this is not ended yet. My lord, after this, there was somewhat propounded to be done upon this Narrative and a Letter from the king; somewhat was propounded at this meeting: My lord, then there was, as I know the Court remembers, speech of a Commission that was somewhat controverted. There was speech of a Commission, and a Commission read: Mr. Love ingenuously acknowledgeth, and it was proved, and he declared his dissenting from it, and that he was against it, because as private persons they had no power to do any such thing. But, my lord, that there was a Commission read there, brought by Drake (I do not say that this proves that Mr. Love corrected it); that there were Instructions and Letters read for to be sent over, I think, is not denied; But, my lord, for that, if you please, I shall read you the witness. The first is Alford: "Afterwards there was a Commission, so called, agreed among us, sent over to the lord Willoughby of Parham, Massey, Graves, and Titus, at Breda, to advise with the Scotch commissioners there, in behalf of the Presbyterian party in England. This Commission was read in Mr. Love's study, and at the same time Instructions for the commissioners to walk by, were agreed on to be sent; which Commission and Instructions were by the substance of the Petition formerly sent, to press the king to take the Covenant, and to prosecute the ends of it." This Petition was (I conceive) what was formerly agreed upon at Dowgate; which Commission and Instructions one Mason, the lord Piercy's man, carried over. This is Alford's testimony as to this. And being asked by Mr. Love, "Did not I dissent from sending the Commission and Instructions?" he says this, "It was agreed in the general, that the Commission and Instructions should be sent, Mr. Love being then present." All present are principals, my lord.

My lord, in the next place is major Huntington's testimony; and the first is this, "That at Mr. Love's house in the beginning of March 1649, I found Drake and others, and there was read a paper in the nature of a Commission, commissionating my lord Willoughby of Parham, Graves, Titus, Massey and Bunce, to treat in the behalf of the well affected party of England, and to join with the Scotch commissioners, according to such Instructions as should be therein inclosed. And this question being asked, what power have we to give or send such a Commission? Drake answered, We have the king's command for it, and the authority of some secluded parliament-men; for I look upon them beyond the power that is now sitting. Whereupon Mr. Love replied, Come, come, let it go." You have heard Huntington's testimony, and Mr. Love's paraphrase upon those words.

The next is Adams: "At the same time a Commission and Instructions were spoken of at Mr. Love's house to be drawn up and sent: As I remember, Mr. Gibbons brought the rough draught. I am very confident that Master Love was there some part of this time, and it was in his study where this was generally consented unto. The Instructions were there agreed also, and read by Drake as I remember. Sterks, the Scotch agent, met with us some times at master Love's house." This is what was testified by Adams. There is another to this, and that is capt. Far, "William Drake read there a paper of the nature of a Commission, which was not agreed to by the company, because private persons had no authority to give commission. The Commission was in the name of the Presbyterian party. A Letter and Instructions was then agreed upon; the commissioners were to be the lord Willoughby of Parham, Bunce, Massey and Titus, who were to move in the behalf of the Presbyterians. Papers then were read, to have been sent to the queen, to persuade the king to give satisfaction to the Scots; but they were not assented to."

My lord, I have done with this that concerns this Meeting; and now I shall apply that which I intended, and spoke of before. The design you heard, that, my lord, was at the Swan at Dowgate, was treasonable enough in conscience, high enough; and partly employed to agitate! And though we do not find Mr. Love to have been knowing or privy to it at first, yet, my lord, if there be a treason hatched and designed, a party sent in it, and any subsequent act of any other party that shall come into this, and approve of it, and join in it in what way soever, this man, my lord, is guilty of the first transaction of treason. So that though master Love did so walk under ground, that we cannot bring him in to be knowing at first, yet I bring him approving at last: and, my lord, though here be his first appearing, it is enough, and too timely. And, my lord, Titus departing, and an account given of all, and, for aught appears, not to be proved by me, nor by any for the commonwealth, whether master Love did approve or not, or how far he went in it. But he was present, and at the debates and discourings about it, and actings in it. My lord, this is far from misprision of treason; for misprision of treason is a bare silent act that carries nothing of discourse nor debate with it; it is a simple act of omission. But when treasons are hatched and are designed, and others shall come and treat, and debate, and discourse upon carrying them on; my lord, by the subsequent act he hath approved of all that passed before, and made himself party to it. Here is an account given by Titus of what had passed there; this is brought into master Love's house, there are debates concerning a Commission; whether they took the king for the authority, or the king wrote of it, it doth not much move me. A copy of a letter from the king was read there, let them take it among themselves as they please. Here was a Commission debated, and master Love acknowledgeth he debated against it. My lord, under favour, if he had declared an utter dislike, and, as he himself says, a detestation and abomination against it; but he goes on, though not in that particular, yet in another, and he is guilty of all. In treason there are no accessaries, all present are principals.

The crime of treason is beyond the crying blood of murder; one is but private, the other is public: so as, my lord, though Mr. Love acknowledgeth, that he so far owned the Narrative from Titus, and the proceedings there, the reading of it, but did dissent from the Commission, and did speak against it, and at present I shall take it so too; yet for the Instructions sent, and for the Commission named, you have had four witnesses named to you. My lord, dissent will not serve his turn; and yet to that there is not a pretence of a dissent from the Instructions, and what was sent, and that is a consent and concurrence, and that is an approbation of all precedent actions, and makes himself a party in it, and that is by one witness: And, my lord, you have heard by master serjeant Witherington, that to every circumstance there needs not two witnesses, but to the design there must be two: And Adams himself says, it was propounded to have given Titus money, as you shall hear by and by; and Far tells you, that there was going on so far in it, that a paper was read for letters to be sent to the queen, to move her to persuade the king, but that was not assented to; but it was moved among them.

My lord, the next thing I shall take, as near as I can, was when this was done, and this transaction passed over, and the Instructions sent, that were agreed upon for Commissioners at Breda; then begins the troubles in Ireland. You have heard of a paper book sent, written in sack, and returned a year after; that comes next. There was sent over from col. Bamfield (Mr. Love says he knew not the face of the man) but he liked his employment, it seems, that would be privy to such proceeding from a man he knew not. There came a servant over, I take it from Bamfield, and that was about Christmas last, that is the time expressed.

after Dunbar Fight. My lord, this was brought, the letter was delivered to Potter, and their superscription was singly with the letter L. which I may say, may be better applied to master Love, than to any other, all circumstances considered; yet I shall not conclude from it; but though he says he had no letters directed to him, I shall say as truly, that they were directed to him, as much as to any man else, and a little more; for master Love was very unfortunate that these letters should be brought to him, read in his house, the transactions there, and Mr. Love to have no hand in it, this is hardly to be believed.

My lord, in the next place are these letters that came from Bamfield; if it please you, for that I shall read Potter. "I received letters out of Scotland from Bamfield, with the letter L. upon it, wherein was a large narrative of the affairs of Scotland, from Dunbar Fight, to the time of the date of them, which (I think) was about Christmas. I carried those letters to Mr. Love's, where was one or two more with us, Jaquel, and, I think, Dr. Drake; we three, I am sure of it. There were letters from a nameless person, whom we supposed to be master Bailey; and a letter from my lords of Argyle, Lothian, and Lowdon. These letters wrote for 10,000*l.* for buying of arms, and hiring of shipping; and for 5,000 men to be landed in England. These letters were disliked and dissented from; and it was agreed to give a negative answer: and we thought fit (for our own safety) to raise some money for the messenger and Bamfield: the sum agreed on was 40*l.* to which I contributed 10*l.* I carried the letter to Mr. Love's to take advice upon it. Mr. Love, and I, and Jaquel, read those letters that were opened, and those that were not opened, we did open and read, and discourse on them; and upon advice resolved to do nothing in it: neither did they reveal it." And then being demanded, Whether at Mr. Love's house there was not a discourse for raising 4 or 500*l.*? He answered, There was. Being demanded, whether letters were not returned to Bamfield, with the money sent him? He answered, "A letter was left at my shop, and I apprehended it came from master Love, or Mr. Drake." And Jaquel being demanded, whether Mr. Love and Mr. Drake were not appointed to draw up the letter? He answered, "Yes, they were." And that is Potter's testimony.

The next mention is, That Jaquel was present there, here is sure of it, master Love himself and Jaquel. This is Jaquel's testimony: "At a meeting at Mr. Love's house, master Love being present, it was thought fit that 40*l.* should be raised for Bamfield. A letter was read from Bamfield at master Love's house, master Love being present: Mr. Love declared, he never saw, or knew Bamfield. The letter was for 5,000*l.* to hire shipping. And another letter from my lords of Argyle, Lothian, and others, at the same time and place, were read, to induce the confederates to give credit to Bamfield. Potter moved, that 10*l.* might be given to the messenger that brought the letter and 30*l.* to Bamfield; which was considered of, and nothing said against it: there was no agreement, but it was thought convenient by all then present." Upon this Mr. Love asked Mr. Jaquel a question, and he said, "I cannot say that Mr. Love said it was convenient, but it was not dissented from, or spoken against by any."

My lord, I suppose this is a faithful Relation of what the witnesses said. My lord, you have heard of this, and the time when it was, that Bamfield's servant was sent, and letters brought from Scotland, giving an account of proceedings there: letters from Argyle, Lothian, Lowdon, and Belcarris, to give credit to what Bamfield should relate: money provided, though not the sum, nor the means those letters did hint to them; per-chance their purses could not reach that; but so far as they could go, they would: they would reward him that brought it, and him that sent it; and thereupon 40*l.* was provided, 10*l.* for the messenger, and 30*l.* for Bamfield. In this repetition I think I have not wronged Mr. Love.

The next is the Letter that came from Massey and Titus, who were then in Scotland; and in what condition, I think every man knows, in what condition they are there: though by the way I should be sorry to repeat that which Mr. Love did say the first day, That it did not appear to him, that the Scots were in arms against the parliament of England, but in arms for their own preservation: and therefore did desire counsel. Here was one of his reasons why he desired counsel to be informed, to advise him whether they were in arms for their own preservation, or in opposition to the parliament of England. This was that Mr. Love was pleased to say the first day. My lord, this of Massey and Titus gives them account likewise of the affairs in Scotland after Dunbar fight too. If you please, my lord, I will read you three witnesses to that, and that neither doth Mr. Love deny, but that these letters were read at his house.

This is major John Alford's. "After Dunbar Fight we met at Mr. Love's house in his lower room, where a letter from Massey was read, which gave an account of the fight there; wherein he also wrote for arms, mentioning his own and Titus's necessities. Thereupon a proposition was made for raising of monies for the supplying of their necessities; and 500*l.* being propounded, it was brought down to two or 300*l.* to be raised among ourselves. Mr. Love did then move for contribution-money to that purpose; and I thereupon promised 10*l.* which my man paid." This, my lord, is the testimony which Alford gives as to this concerning Massey.

The next is Adams. "When the money was propounded to be raised for Massey and Titus, certainly Mr. Love was then present;" [and this after the Fight at Dunbar] "and the money was agreed to be raised by those that were privy to the correspondence. Mr. Love had then a paper in his hand, and did write something, I saw not what he did write; and so every man that was there did write what he would lend; I conceive Mr. Love summed up every man's sum. Massey's letter was for arms, and the money propounded was for Titus and Massey; for Titus, because he was sent by us; and Mr. Love was there." This, my lord, is Adams's testimony; and though he did not know what Mr. Love writ, yet he knew what Mr. Love moved.

My lord, here is another, and that is captain Far, which I shall make bold to read to the Court likewise, concerning the same action. "After Dunbar Fight, I came somewhat late to a meeting at Mr. Love's house, where Mr. Love told me a letter was come from Massey, to assist the king with money and arms; but it was not agreed that any money or arms could be sent. And I understood from Mr. Love, they could not do it. Mr. Love then likewise told me, they agreed to raise a sum of money for Titus, Massey and Graves, to be sent to relieve them in their necessity: which sum, whether it was 250*l.* or 300*l.* I cannot positively say; but Mr. Love moved me to contribute. I told him I would give him 5*l.* which I brought wrapped up in a paper, and laid it down on Mr. Love's table, Mr. Love and several others being in the room; it was so done, that there might be no discovery." And Mr. Love asking him some questions upon this, whether it was done so by Mr. Love, or no? He did not know that; but it was done so by himself, that there might be no discovery. My lord, Mr. Love did not disagree: Far being cross-examined by Mr. Love, did not say, that Mr. Love did disagree to the sending the money to Massey and Titus. So I have done with that particular likewise, the receiving letters from Massey, and of the account from Scotland, and the fight there.

That which Adams saith, Mr. Love having replied unto it, concerning a letter writ to the general assembly and Kirk of Scotland; and in that, my lord, he is pretty positive. Adams's testimony is; "There was a Letter written to the General Assembly and Kirk of Scotland, at Mr. Love's house, Mr. Love was sometimes present at this meeting: which letter was taken to be penned by Mr. Love and Mr. Drake; and I thought it to be so, because of the language of it: and that after Drake escaped, all the meetings I know of, were at his house," [and so, my lord, say some others.] Being examined, he says, "I saw letters which were read in Mr. Love's house; Mr. Love was present and privy to the debating of them, and did not declare any dissent."

My lord, I have now done with these particulars; you have seen Mr. Love at the end, though you found him not at the beginning: it is not good to come at the ending of the quarrel. But, my lord, under favour, by the laws and rules of justice, if any ill thing be contrived and plotted, and afterwards any other person shall come into the contrivance of it, and carry it on; my lord, I think I shall not need to say much in it, but he is culpable and guilty of the whole, from the first to last. And that Mr. Love should be but a mere spectator, a mere concealed person, it is very hard to be believed by any that are rational men: for after that once Titus had done his errand at Jersey, and gives his account here, my lord, that his transactions, and the subsequent employment, all that we know of, are all transacted, and carried on in Mr. Love's house, in Mr. Love's study, in Mr. Love's presence: it was not one or two, or three times, which had been enough, and very well had it been for Mr. Love, if he had done as Baines did, or as Barton did; they, when they heard (though they were too much for them, my lord, to conceal, as they have done, yet did confess it when required) they left off when they heard of it, they would go no further in it, they knew the danger of it. Mr. Love, my lord, as you will hear anon, by what himself hath proposed, what judgment and conscience led him to carry on this; it was a conscience of his own covenanting interest and principles for the Scots and religion, that led him on to carry on this design.

My lord, I have done with this, that is, the Evidence against him; for application to it, you have heard the several Laws read before the Charge opened: That man is guilty of High-Treason, and is a Traitor by the laws of the land now, that doth any way promote, declare, or publish Charles Stuart to be king of England. My lord, you have heard the Evidence, what Titus hath plotted, what Drake hath carried on, what Mr. Love hath approved of, and how far he hath consented and joined in the design. My lord, I shall say it again, if Titus and Drake be traitors, as their own guilty consciences have made themselves judge themselves so: he that flies, confesseth the fact; my lord, they are fled. My lord, if they be traitors, Mr. Love must be the same with them; for Mr. Love was carrying on, and hath agreed, and concurred, and approved of carrying on the design that Titus and Drake have acted: consenters and agents are to have the same punishments; in treason there are no accessaries. My lord, the next point is this; the next act is that of the 17th of January 1649. Having given you the evidence, you will give me leave now shortly to repeat the law. The first is, for promoting Charles Stuart, &c. That if any person shall maliciously and advisedly plot, contrive and endeavour to stir up, or raise forces against this present parliament, and for the subversion of the same, and shall declare it by any open deed, &c.

My Lord, Mr. Love is pleased to express himself, That none can accuse him, nor none have sworn against him, that he hath raised any seditions, any insurrection, any rebellions; my lord, I cannot say it fully, whether he be guilty of that, or no: but this I will say (the Judgment I shall leave to the Court upon the Evidence heard) if Mr. Love be guilty of any thing moving or tending towards the raising of forces, seditions or rebellions; though the thing be not done, yet, my lord, it is treason; those practices, those purposes are treason by the law, though they never came to act. We shall not look, I hope, to see a rebellion raised before we shall say it is treason, and endeavour against it; but for that, how far he is guilty upon the evidence of being instrumental of the war in Scotland, and to have endeavoured to have a party got in England, my lord, I shall leave it to your judgment, upon the evidence you have heard.

My Lord, there is likewise another in the same law: If any person procure, invite, agree, aid, or assist any foreigner or stranger to invade England or Ireland, or adhere to any forces raised by the enemies of the parliament or commonwealth, or keepers of the liberties of England; this is high treason. For this, you have heard the evidence what Mr. Love hath done towards this; still upon the same foot of account it is treason, though but proposed and intended, though not acted. Then there is another clause upon the law that Mr. Love hath insisted upon, of constituting this court. But for those former I have said, and you shall give me leave to repeat it again, that these laws offended against, though in time before this court was constituted, yet this court hath, in express words, commission and authority given them by the parliament, to take cognizance of all facts and offences done after that law, though done before your commission; and that, my lord, is not to be doubted to be a very good and legal authority. And yet for this the law that constitutes this court, of the 26th of March 1650, that no person after the 29th of March 1650, shall give or hold any intelligence by letters, messages, or otherwise, with Charles Stuart, James Stuart, or the late queen their mother, or the council abiding with any of them, prejudicial to the commonwealth; or with any that shall be in arms against the parliament of England, or shall bring or send in England, Ireland, or any dominions of this commonwealth, letters, messages or instructions, tending to raise insurrections, or a new war within this nation, and shall not forthwith reveal the same to the Speaker of the Parliament, or to the Council of State, or two members thereof, or to two justices of peace, shall be guilty of, &c. That is a clause in the law that constitutes this court. And no person shall voluntarily relieve any person in arms, or that shall be in arms against the parliament, with any money, victuals, or ammunition on pain of death, or other corporal punishment. And whosoever shall voluntarily take up arms against the parliament, and shall encourage others to do so, shall die without mercy.

These, my lords, are clauses contained in the Act that constitutes this Court; and I read the law before the Charge: and now, my lord, I have repeated the Evidence faithfully; now let it be considered how far the evidence goes with them. There are three acts of Parliament, I suppose Mr. Love knew not of the next; for he says, he knew not of that of the 2nd of August; but it was published solemnly at the Exchange, and at Westminster-hall: but ignorance cannot excuse him; that no man will pretend. This, my lord, is in relation to Scotland; it was made in August. The battle at Dunbar, I cannot well tell whether it was in September or October; in September this correspondence from Bamfield, Argyle, Lowden, and Lothian, Belcarrie, Massey, and the rest, were all since Dunbar Fight; that is clear, they were since that time: the words of the law are these; 'Whoever, after the 5th of August, shall use, hold or maintain any correspondence or intelligence with any of the Scottish nation residing in Scotland, without licence from the parliament, or with any other person or persons of the Scottish or any other nation, whom they know to adhere to the Scottish nation against the parliament; or shall abet, assist, countenance, or encourage the Scottish nation, or any other person adhering to them in their war against the parliament and commonwealth of England, or shall send, or cause to be sent and conveyed any money, horse, arms, ammunition, or any other furniture of plate, goods, merchandize, or any supply whatsoever, to the Scots, or to any port or place thereof, or in their power, or in confederacy against this nation, these facts are high treason by this law.' And the High Court of Justice is to take cognizance of the contents by express provision of that law.

My lord, I shall not need to repeat the Evidence again; but upon these, my lord, I must leave him to your justice and judgment to do what in your consciences you think is just upon these laws, and what Mr. Love hath done in transgression against them.

My lord, Mr. Love was pleased, at the beginning of his Trial, to make some deep Protestations; I think he did move all honest men that heard him: and truly I did think, and did hope that they were not made with any relation to equivocation, or mental reservation, but to a positive denial of any facts of treason, or looking that way; that it had been made in that sense, that he had been clearly not guilty of any thing. But, my lord, having looked upon them, and caused them to be transcribed to me, I do find that they are somewhat cautious, and perchance they may be true, my lord, in the sense spoken by Mr. Love; but whether true in the sense they should have been spoken by a Christian in a public assembly, that I shall not judge. His first Protestation was, in the presence of God and this Assembly, 'That I never wrote any letter to the king, or to the church, nor to the queen, or church and state of Scotland in general, or to any particular person of the Scotch nation, since the war began to this very day.' My lord, this may be true; but whether any letter hath been sent from the king, or from the Scottish nation, or others, or by Massey, or the rest, that shall be believed as the evidence is.

Mr. Love. It is in my second Protestation.

Att. Gen. 'Again,' saith he, 'I do likewise declare in the presence of the same God, ' I never received letter written to me from the ' king, or from the queen his mother, or from ' the church or state of Scotland in general, or ' any particular person of the Scottish nation ' since the war began. I protest and declare ' likewise in the presence of the same God, I ' never collected, gave or lent penny of money ' either to send into Scotland, or any foreign ' parts, either to the king of Scots, or to the ' queen his mother, or to the church or state of ' Scotland in general, or to any particular person of the Scottish nation, since the wars began.' But that Mr. Love did not move others to contribute, we have not a word of that. Truly, I did think it when he spoke it? But it seems these asseverations were studied to evade, and that he would speak true, but not the whole truth. I have given them but a touch; these may be true, my lord, but, under favour, there is something else that is as true, and goes almost as near as this.

My lord, Mr. Love the last day had your patience and justice to make a large Defence, and he was very large in it; and though he did beat us down that are the counsel for the public, that we should not use oratory, nor flourishes, nor quorks of law, nor niceties, in which I shall be guided by him, and shall not do it; yet he is pleased fully to make use of all insinuations to the Court to trip up every Witness upon niceties, upon not-expression, upon nonsense, and such, my lord, which I shall not follow him in: for I shall deal as truth ought to deal, in pure nakedness and simplicity, and not use any oratory, but to set the matter of fact before you, and leave it unto the Court, who are the judges between the commonwealth and himself for life and death. But, my lord, you shall give me leave to touch upon some few things in the late Defence of his; it was divided into four parts. The first, the Charge; the second, the Witnesses and Testimony, both in one: The Witnesses for the Persons, the Testimony for the Fact. The third, concerning himself; the fourth, some Proposals to the Court: which truly, my lord, might better have been termed rather Threatenings than Proposals.

My lord, for the Charge, you have heard it hath been gone through, and the Evidence concerning it. Concerning the Witnesses, my lord, I have read unto you (for I do take it upon my conscience) what I knew, and nothing but what was true: I have not varied, that I know of, a syllable; and I think I ought not to do it; the duty of my place requires it not from me.

My lord, concerning himself, he is pleased to say something, and much of his merit: But, my lord, it is a grief to this Court, to myself, and all that are well-wishers to the public, that any man that hath been a friend to the Parliament, that hath gone along with them, acted for them, suffered for them, done as he hath done, that this man should be called to public justice: I hope, my lord, all that hear me bear witness, that I think, my lord, we are all sensible of it.

But, my lord, look upon who hath been the cause of it; let that be looked into, and every man will be satisfied in his own judgment and conscience, whether Mr. Love were provoked, or no, or whether he hath not provoked the state to bring him to be thus exemplary in justice. Mr. Love says, my lord, (I shall desire to make use of the Paper) "I confess it is not so much the danger of my life; I am a sickly man, and I know a disease will ere-long kill me, whatsoever you do with me: But this grieves me more, That I should suffer from your hands, for whom I have done and suffered so much in my obscure station, and according to my weak measure. Had I been so dealt with at Oxford, at the Juncto there! But to be so dealt withal in Westminster-hall, this troubles me." And, my lord, it doth trouble me to deal so with him. My lord, whether may we or himself take up this complaint? Had the state been thus used by a Cavalier, by a professed open enemy, it had not been so much trouble to us; you would have come to justice upon a little more desire than now: But that Mr. Love, a minister, a minister of the gospel, a man that hath preached for us, prayed for us, acted with us, gone along with us; that he should go to undermine us, that he should be joined, or in confederacy with others to undermine the state, where he did live peaceably and quietly, where none interrupted him: He had a free liberty, as much as a king in this commonwealth: Truly, that Mr. Love should do this, it is (I think) an aggravation; and not an aggravation upon the Court or State, that they should prosecute where a man is prosecuting them. What he hath done, my lord, you have heard; what his offences have been, and who gave the cause; That a minister should do this; one that had a calling elsewhere, and better to employ himself, than to meddle with states and secular affairs: And these things to be done in Mr. Love's house, and in his study, where he should have been studying better things. My lord, next he says, "I could not leave such relations as I have, nor such a loving people and competent living, as any minister hath within London, only conscience carried me another way; and till conscience be satisfied, I cannot stir one jot." My lord, this his conscience, I do not know what it hath to do in government, or what Mr. Love's conscience had to do in these affairs. He had a calling of his own to use; and should I go out of my calling, and meddle with other men, I humbly conceive I were a busy-body. Mr. Love had a calling enough for any one man to employ himself in; and, methinks, when he says he had such a relation to a loving people, a competency of livelihood, that he should not apply himself to return to them, but to wander abroad: And when we once wander, it is hard coming in again, till perchance we are fetched in again with the whip. But, my lord, Mr. Love had other relations, of wife and children, which he might have looked upon also, and taken care of them.

In the last place, he is pleased to say, (and that I believe hath carried on his design) "The Covenant-Interest." You have heard what Titus did, what Drake did, and what the rest did; that all this, it was upon the Covenant; and the Covenant is urged, I am sure, to things the Parliament hath forbid. Mr. Love is pleased to declare himself still to retain his old principles, from which, by the grace of God, he will not be taken off by any terror. My lord, you will hear by and by what the Covenant he supposes leads him to: And, my lord, I shall take it asunder, and bring it next, if you please, that is the Covenant-Interest. Says Mr. Love, "Though I own not the way of managing any Papers, I neither writ them, nor sent them, yet thus far I own the thing; I confess it was agreeable to my judgment and conscience, and I thought the interest of Godliness would be more promoted, if the king went into Scotland upon Covenant-Terms; it would be more for the good of the nation."

Love. No, Sir, those are not my words; I said, "Than to fall in with the Irish rebels, or to offer this kingdom to the Spaniard." I thought a greater foundation of trouble would be laid, if this reception were not laid by that nation. And the Covenant hath a clause in it, That we are to seek the good and union of both nations; and they are judged to be incendiaries and malignants that not only divide the king from his people but the kingdoms one from another. Now they declaring him to be their king, according to my apprehension, I thought it agreeable to my Covenant to pray and desire, as a private man, and no more, that there might be an agreement upon those terms, consisting with religion and the terms of the Covenant.

Att. Gen. But had you gone on as a private man, Mr. Love, we had not stirred you now. My lord, this is plain of itself what interest this Covenant interest is, "Till the king and the people in the two nations, &c." Truly my lord, Mr. Love is pleased to express himself somewhat obliquely against the present government: He saith, my lord, "When I look upon all the Vows, Covenants, Declarations, Protestations, of both houses of parliament, I find a suitableness between my judgment and them, and am not conscious to myself of any thing I have done in opposition or contradiction thereunto: I repent not of whatsoever I have done; though I could wish the ends of that just war had been better accomplished: Then should we have been happy, and united among ourselves, and honoured among the nations round about us. I am so far from repenting of what I have done, both by doing, and contributing, and suffering in the parliament's quarrel, that were it to be done again upon the same unquestionable authority, for the same declared ends, and against the same malignant persons, I should manifest as much readiness of mind to engage, according to my measure."

After this where he had mentioned his troubles at Oxford, when a scholar there; and at London, when he came to be a lecturer here; at Newcastle, when he spake for the parliament there; and in Kent when he spake against the king there; when these were over, after this he had a little breathing, whilst the two houses of parliament were in power. This gentleman was troubled in the time of the king, in the time of the bishops, in the time of these wars, for being for the parliament: But I appeal to his own conscience and judgment, whether ever he was troubled or disturbed by this parliament or by this government of the commonwealth, whether he had not as free and as full liberty to preach the gospel, to instruct others, and to save souls, as his heart could wish; and I desire to know whether ever the parliament did interpose with him, till he did interpose with us. He went out of his way, my lord: He was quiet and safe, in as much security as any of us; and, my lord, even those that were watchmen for the safety of this commonwealth, did watch and take as much care even for his preservation, as for any one of ours: And thus he hath requited them. My lord, I will repeat it: I appeal to his own conscience, and to any of his friends here, whether ever, till his judgment and conscience did interpose in state-affairs, to dispose of kingdoms and commonwealths, whether ever he were in the least interrupted.

My lord, he says himself, when he came to be a lecturer in London, the bishop would not admit of him in three years; yet my lord, he is admitted here three years, and none hath interrupted him. And yourself say, you have a competent livelihood, and a people very loving to you; and you might have so continued if you would.

My lord, his proposals to the Court, I do say, were hardly fair Proposals; for they had a little of threatening in them: "For" (says he) "if you censure rather upon a political interest, than of the merit of the fact, the Scripture counts it not justice, but murder." Truly, my lord, I think justice is a political interest, the preservation of the general: But surely I do not think the person will come in judgment before you, but the merit of his fact; and as yet I may say, I suppose the treasons he hath committed, if those find him guilty, if the Court finds him guilty of those facts laid to his charge, and if you are satisfied in your judgments that they are proved, my lord, it is justice, not murder; and it is justice that which political interest requires of you, that justice be done upon the prisoner. And he is pleased to say in his last Defence, That he denied the Commission to be sent, and entitling the Presbyterian party to it: and he hath acknowledged it had been very high presumption if they should have done it, and a notorious falshood. And in that I join with him; and whether he hath not done so, my lord, that I shall leave to you. That the Presbyterian name was made use of, you have had many concurrent evidences; and Mr. Love was present when these things were mentioned: And if it be a fault, which himself hath acknowledged, it is right done to the Presbyterian party, who, I am sure, will not own him in it.

My lord, but a word more: This last day he was pleased to mention his Sermon; * which made me a little to enquire after it: It was preached at Uxbridge, (my lord, I had the honour to be at the Treaty) which hath been so much spoken of; and truly I wonder this gentleman did not remember what he said then. If you please, my lord, I shall put you in mind of some Passages: I have the Sermon here.

[Mr. Attorney-General reads out of the Book, which he said was Mr. Love's Sermon.]

"I have ever thought that too much mercy towards Malignants hath made more Delinquents † than ever justice hath done. Mercy should not weigh down justice;" (my lord, these are good instructions.) "In God they are both equal; why should it not be so in man? Pity to the bad, hath proved cruelty to the good: The sparing of offenders hath made many worse; few or none better." (And, my lord, we know it.) "To them that have shewed no mercy, let judgment be shewed without mercy: Much guilt contracted; much innocent blood spilt; which either must be avenged on us, or by us." My lord, that is one of his clauses; and here is another. "2. The Lord heals a land by cutting off those distempered members that endanger the health of a land." (Here is good doctrine, my lord.) "It was the Lord troubled Achan, and cut him off, because he troubled Israel. Oh, that in this our state-physicians would resemble God, to cut off those from the land, who have distempered it;" (I suppose he meant, or shall do.) That, my lord, was his opinion then. "And those who lie under the guilt of much innocent blood are not meet persons to be at peace with, till all the guilt of blood be expiated either by the sword of the law, or the law of the sword; and a peace can never be safe nor just till then." What Mr. Love hath endeavoured since, my lord, I shall say nothing. And I have but one word more, and it is this; my lord, he says it is not likely to have a peace with such men as these, the Malignant party, while they continue thus. "We can as soon make fire and water agree, yea, I had almost said Heaven and Hell, as their spirits and ours; for either they must grow better or we worse, before we can agree." My lord, I think there is little hope of their growing better; and, my lord, we have not grown worse. My lord, I shall trouble you no further: I shall use nothing of aggravation; but as justice is blinded, so let the Evidence appear to you in pure nakedness. My lord, you have heard the Evidence (as I humbly conceive) in the same language, in the same habit, in the same words, as spoken by the Witnesses: And, my lord, having heard those, and the laws, and the Charge against him, upon the whole I shall humbly leave him to stand or fall by your justice and judgment.

Love. My lord, I humbly crave leave to speak but one word: Mr. Attorney-General hath replied to my Defence, as to the Matter of Fact. Concerning his Reply I shall not insist upon it; yet I shall humbly crave leave to insist upon two Particulars.

Att. Gen. If I have given any new Evidence, Mr. Love ought to be heard: But, my lord, I have declined it. And for those Passages in his Sermon, I do not urge one word of Evidence against him; and for the rest, they are his own words, which he hath said the last day; and I have brought nothing new before you. And if the Sermon preached at Uxbridge should be an occasion, I shall cast it aside.

Love. I humbly conceive there are new suggestions expressed in Court by those worthy gentlemen, whose names I know not, nor their employments neither. But as to those I shall humbly crave leave in a word or two; and then, as to the whole matter of the Depositions, I shall humbly offer some matter of law, arising upon the whole matter given in.

Att. Gen. I shall crave leave too, my lord, and leave it to you: For any suggestions, they are but suggestions, as Mr. Love says himself; and that is nothing for the evidence. Mr. Love, my lord, had the last day, and I should have thus. Had he said he had any thing to say, or if he had had any thing more, he might have said it; I did wait if he would have said any thing: But, my lord, then the whole was closed, and no new evidence. I did not answer all the suggestions of Mr. Love the last day: his evidence and depositions will conclude the Court, that it is not suggestions and insinuations; the Court are above these. When the evidence is closed for the Commonwealth, let it be concluded there: If they offer any new evidence, Mr. Love may have liberty to answer.

Love. Though I dare not tax Mr. Attorney General for discharging his duty in his place; yet for the preservation of my own life, I must not be wanting to myself, if your lordship and the Court will give leave; and that is humbly to beseech your lordship to take notice that Mr. Attorney General, in the relation of the matter of fact in the Depositions, is pleased to raise the correspondency, as he is pleased to call it, as high as Jersey; and so makes me to be particeps criminis, that I should be judged by you upon the whole matter. Now Alford upon oath did declare, That Drake and Titus held correspondency; and that the ministers knew nothing of it.

Att. Gen. I do not say you did.

Love. Therefore I beseech you I may not be judged upon that matter: and then I beseech your lordship to observe that Mr. Attorney General is pleased to say he would not insist upon inferences, nor strains of wit; but truly I have discerned both.

Lord President. You totally err from the way you ought to walk in, and take upon you to judge others. The Court will consider whether he hath offered any thing or not: We have notaries, and so have you. You spent the last day only in making comments and collections; yet that you might have some liberty of discourse, we sat here patiently two hours; and did hear that which we ought not, nor you ought to have spoken. And now you are entering the same way of Inferences and Collections, as though we did not sit here to take notice of what was done, but we must receive the last word from you and your comment. If you had new matter the last time, you might have been heard: We expected you would have brought new witnesses; but they were in the same crime with yourself; and you would rather betray yourself than them, and God and the truth than them. But we will be as careful of any comments as you yourself can be. And I think that we have so much piety and charity, that we sit here with as good affections of justice and piety, as are in your own breast. This book was not given as evidence against you: and all that is in your comments, we shall understand it.

Love. My lord, I have only one motion: I have some matters in law to offer to your lordship, to consider by way of Exception to the Charge, and also to the Depositions of the Witnesses. I have a Paper that I humbly desire might be read in Court as Matter in Law, arising from the Charge, and from the Depositions of the Witnesses.

Att. Gen. Why did you not this before?

Love. I am ignorant of the customs of the Court.

Lord President. I believe you have wronged your own breast in many things you have said; and you have said you have been ignorant in many things that you have known very well: It is not good to dally. You will be ignorant at one time, and at another time more knowing than others.

Love. I beseech your lordship, it is a new suggestion of the Attorney General, That concealment of treason for a tract of time is treason.

Lord President. There is no new words of suggestion: If Mr. Attorney hath not spoken it, nor read it according to the truth, we will examine it.

Love. He hath done it with disadvantage to me.

Lord President. If we have, he shall not do it with disadvantage to us; for we will be as indifferent as your own breast: Therefore be not you a commentator of that. We understand so well as God enlightens; for whether he hath done it with advantage or disadvantage, that is our part to consider.

Love. I desire to have Counsel upon this Matter of Law arising from the Evidence, That concealment of Treason, by your acts, suppose it be for continuance or tract of time, yet by the law it is not Treason. And my Counsel informs me, That the Act of the 26th of March, that constitutes this Court, gave you power to inquire into Treason, but could not take cognizance of Misprision of Treason till there was a subsequent Act. Therefore I desire this favour, That seeing it is so much suggested in Court, and seeing the Witnesses none can prove a personal act of mine, to bring me under your law, as to treason, I desire my Counsel to clear this, That Concealment of Treason, though for never so long a tract of time, is not Treason by the law of the land.

Att. Gen. I will out Mr. Love of that scruple: He is not charged for Misprision of Treason, though I could have done it; but that I insist upon, is flat Treason. It is true, sir Thomas Witherington was pleased to express it in the way of argument, That concealment of Treason long, comes to be Treason: But here are acts, and I insist upon the Evidence; and the Court will judge, for they have heard the Evidence.

Love. I beseech your lordship that the Paper might be read, the exceptions that I have against the Indictment, and the matters of law arising from the evidence.

Att. Gen. My lord, truly I profess, I hope I am not in my nature cruel, that I should do injury to Mr. Love: but, my lord, I cannot favour him, to do injury to the law of the nation. My lord, he hath one by him that hath taken every word of the Charge.

Love. I did plead upon your lordship's promise that I should have a fair and indifferent hearing; and if Matter of Law did arise from Matter of Fact, which could not, you said, be known till the Witnesses were deposed, I had your lordship's promise, and I think the Court's, that I should have counsel to plead to Matter of Law.

Att. Gen. My lord, I think here is no legislative power in this Court to change laws. My lord, I appeal to all here, whether the Evidence we gave were not closed upon Saturday, and all the Depositions; whether Mr. Love did not take care and pains to make his own Defence, as to Matter of Fact, and spent so many hours on Wednesday last. My lord, he had all before that; if he had Matter of Law, it was more proper to move then: but when he hath gone so far, and we have closed all, do but consider the consequence, that when this is done, and all the evidences heard, then to come with Matter of Law.

Lord President. Mr. Love, that you have said hitherto, is nothing but of the same nature of that you said the last day; and the Court will take it into consideration, and judge of it: but if you have any thing in your Paper that is so included upon the Evidence; for I tell you the Evidence was ended the last day, and your Reply; and if you had any thing, you should have offered it the last day. Here hath been nothing new offered concerning you, but as it is usual for the counsel for the State to state the Matter of Fact to the Court; for they have the last word: but you had fully ended before; and shall we go out of the way for you, more than for a whole generation which the law runs unto? I do not know how to do it: you had this Paper in your pocket; you might have pulled it out; and you have had time in a nearer degree to it; yet the Court is willing, if you can out of your Paper, by advice of counsel, shortly read what you insist upon for Matter of Law, they will hear it, if such exceptions are not of your own, but by the advice of counsel.

[Mr. Love gives in his Exceptions.]

EXCEPTIONS taken by Christopher Love, clerk, to the Charge of High Treason, and other High Crimes and Offences, exhibited to the High Court of Justice against him by Edmond Prideaux, Esq.; Attorney General for the Commonwealth of England.

[These Exceptions are not here printed, for that they come in more properly afterwards; being again in substance given into the Court, and signed by Mr. Love's Counsel, and the Substance of them then debated in Court by Mr. Hale, a Counsel for Mr. Love.]

Att. Gen. My lord, you have now some fruits of the notary. By the law of England, he that is impeached of High-Treason, is not to have the copy of the Indictment: it is said the Court are judges for the prisoner, and counsel for him. To you all things be substantially charged. That there is a substantial Charge, the Evidence makes out. But this precedent being admitted, and the former of Lilburne's cited, I shall have little encouragement to go on with any charge of Indictments.

Ld. President. Though it be more than the law permits, yet the Court will take consideration of it.

Att. Gen. He did read his papers; I think it is more than ever was heard of in any court in the world. But to take his papers in by your clerk; I hope this is no Replication to the Charge: I hope he answers not that way; then we shall dispute that way again. If he gives papers, I may; and, as ambassadors, treat by papers.

Ld. President. Mr. Love, we have gone out of our way for you; and whatever hath been suggested by the counsel this day is nothing, unless they had offered new matter; and they have offered none; and therefore it is against any law that was ever yet practised in England. You were concluded before, though haply the neglecting of it might have been a prejudice to you: yet you have offered a Paper, which the Court will take as a Paper to consider of.

Lord President. Mr. Love, our long absence

upon this account may seem to you and others, that we have had something of great difficulty among us, which we have considered of. That which hath been upon your Papers last offered, in which you have set down the parts of the Charge, and the statutes, and your Exceptions; these we have considered of. But to these, though you do affirm it here to us, that it is by advice of your counsel, yet it is not under your counsel's hand, nor your own, which in order it should be. We have considered of them; and our examining of them hath taken up a great deal of this time we have been absent. We find that there may haply be some mistakes in your Notes: therefore it is resolved, though there seem not much difficulty to us, yet you shall have counsel, thus doing, That they shall set it down under their hands, what Matter of Law they will argue to, and bring it under their hands, upon Tuesday next at eight o'clock, to this place, or to the Painted Chamber.

Love. Shall the Counsel have only bare liberty, or will the Court assign them me?

Lord President. If you desire it, and name them, they shall be assigned you.

Love. I desire Mr. Maynard, Mr. Hale, Mr. Waller, and Mr. Archer.

[The Clerk was called upon to read the Order.]

Clerk. "Friday, the 27th of June, 1651. Ordered by the High Court of Justice, That if the Prisoner's Counsel shall under their hands assign any Matters of Law, fit to be argued and presented to this Court, on Tuesday next at eight o'clock in the morning, this Court will take the same into further consideration."

Love. I would know whether they are assigned to plead here in Court, or to bring a Paper under their hands.

Lord President. If they will, under their hands, set down what they will stand to for law, it shall be considered, and they shall plead.

Love. I humbly thank your lordship's favour, and the favour of the Court.

[Mr. Love is commanded away. The Court adjourns.]

The Fifth Day's Proceedings, July the 1st, 1651.

These Exceptions following, signed by Mr. Love's Counsel, were delivered this morning by Mr. Love's Solicitor into the Court, sitting in the Painted Chamber.

EXCEPTIONS to the Charge of High-Treason, and other High Crimes and Offences, exhibited to the High Court of Justice, by Edmond Prideaux, esq. Attorney-General for the Commonwealth of England, against Christopher Love, clerk; and Matter of Law, humbly presented to the said High Court, according to the Direction of an Order hereunto annexed. [For this Order, see above.]

First, The Charge is, "That Christopher Love, as a false traitor and enemy to the court monwealth of England, and out of a traitorous and wicked design to stir up a new and bloody war, and to raise insurrections, sedition, and rebellion within this nation in several days and times, that is to say, in the years of our Lord God 1648, 1649, 1650, 1651, at London, and in divers other places within this Commonwealth of England, and elsewhere, together with William Drake, and divers other persons, did traitorously combine, confederate, and complot together, to stir and raise forces against the present government of this nation, since the same hath been settled in a commonwealth and free state, without a king and house of lords, and for the subversion and alteration of the same."

The Act of the 17th of July, 1649, is, "That if any person shall maliciously or advisedly plot, contrive, or endeavour to raise forces against the present government, or for the subversion or alteration of the same, and shall declare the same by open deed, that every such offence shall be Treason."

Exception 1. The words 'Maliciously' or 'Advisedly' are left out of the Charge.

2. That the words of the Act are omitted, which are, "Plot, Contrive, or Endeavour." 3. It is not Treason within the Act to plot, contrive, or endeavour to stir up or raise forces against the present government, or for the subversion or alteration of the same, unless the same be declared by some open deed. But the Charge is, "That Christopher Love did combine, confederate, and complot to stir and raise up forces against the present government, &c." And it is not charged that he the said Christopher Love did declare the same by any open deed.

Secondly, Whereas the said Christopher Love is by the said Articles charged, "That for the subversion and alteration of the same, and to carry on the said traitorous Design, that he did traitorously and maliciously declare, publish, and promote the eldest son of the late king to be king of England, (meaning this Commonwealth) without the consent of the people in parliament first had, and signified by Authority or Ordinance to that purpose."

The Act of the 30th of January, 1648, is "That no person do presume to proclaim, publish, or any way promote Charles Stuart, son of the late king Charles, commonly called the prince of Wales, or any other person, to be king or chief magistrate of England, by colour of inheritance, succession, election, or any other claim whatsoever."

Exception. It is not expressly charged that the same was done after the said Act made; neither doth the Charge pursue the words or intent of the Act.

Thirdly, The Charge is, "That to accomplish the said traitorous and wicked Design, the said Christopher Love, on several days and times in the years aforesaid, at London, &c. together with William Drake and other persons, did traitorously and maliciously invite, aid, and assist the Scots, being strangers, to invade this commonwealth of England, and hath adhered to the forces of the enemies, raised against the parliament."

The Act of the 17th of July, 1649, is, "That if any person shall procure, invite, aid or assist any foreigners or strangers to invade England or Ireland, or shall adhere to any forces raised by the enemies of the parliament or commonwealth, or keepers of the liberties of England, every such offence shall be taken to be Treason."

Exception 1. That it is not alledged in his Charge who in particular were the strangers that were invited to invade England. 2. That it is not alledged that at the times of the Invitement, Aid and assistance, laid in the charge, the Scots were strangers. 3. That it is not alledged particularly in the Charge, to the forces of what enemies, raised against the parliament, Christopher Love did adhere. 4. It chargeth the Prisoner for a treasonable assistance in some years that were before the said Act of the 17th of July, 1649, was made. 5. To advance the said traitorous and wicked Design, is uncertain to what Design it shall have reference, several charges of treason being before expressed.

Fourthly, The Charge is, "That Christopher Love, divers days and times between the 29th of March, 1650, and the first day of June, 1651, at London, &c. did traitorously and maliciously give, hold, use, and maintain correspondence and intelligence by letters, messages, instructions, or otherwise, prejudicial to this commonwealth, with Charles Stuart, son of the late king, with the late queen his mother, and with Henry Jermin, Henry Piercy, and divers other persons, being of counsel, and abiding with Charles Stuart."

By the Act of the 26th of March, 1650, the Matters charged herein are only prohibited, but are not made Treason.

Exception 1. That this Charge is mislaid, being charged to be done traitorously. 2. The Charge is uncertain, being alledged in the disjunctive, 'or otherwise,' and shews not in what other manner.

Fifthly, The Charge is, "That Christopher Love, within the times and at the places aforesaid, did traitorously and maliciously use, hold and maintain correspondence and intelligence with divers persons of the Scottish nation; that is to say, with the earl of Argyle, and others of the Scottish nation, and with divers other persons of other nations, whom Christopher Love well knew to adhere to the said Scottish nation in the war against the parliament."

The Act of the 2d of August, 1650, is, "That all and every person that shall use, hold or maintain any correspondence or intelligence with any person or persons of the Scottish nation, residing in Scotland, without the licence of the Parliament, the Council of State, or the Lord General; or with any person or persons of the Scotch, or any other nation, whom they shall know to adhere to the Scottish nation in this war against the parliament.

Exception 1. That it is not laid, that the persons of the Scottish nation mentioned in the Charge were residing in Scotland, nor expressly alledged that they did adhere. 2. That it is not averred, that such correspondence was holden without the licence of Parliament, Council of State, or the Lord General, nor in what war the correspondence or intelligence was held. 3. It is not laid, with what particular persons of any other nation adhering to the Scottish nation, correspondence or intelligence was holden, nor of what nations. 4. This correspondence and intelligence is not laid to be after the 5th of August 1650, mentioned in the said act of the 2d of August 1650, but refers to a time preceding that act.

Sixthly, The Charge is, "That Christopher Love, within the times and at the places before-mentioned, did traitorously and maliciously abet, assist, countenance and encourage both the Scottish nation, and divers other persons adhering to them in this war against the parliament: And did send and convey, or cause to be sent and conveyed, moneys, arms, and ammunition, and other supplies to Scotland and other places, and to the said Titus, &c. in confederacy against this nation, without licence of the parliament of England, or Council of State, or General of the Army."

The Act of the 2d of August, 1650, is, "That no person that shall abet, assist, countenance or encourage the Scottish nation, or any other person or persons adhering to them in their war against the parliament and commonwealth of England; or shall go or send, or cause to be sent, &c. any money, horse, arms, ammunition, or other supplies into Scotland, &c. or to any person under their power, or in confederacy with them against this nation, without the licence of the parliament of England, Council of State appointed by their authority, and of the captain-general of the parliament's forces as aforesaid."

Exception 1. That there are no particular persons named, who were abetted, assisted, countenanced, or encouraged, neither of the Scottish nation, nor of any other persons adhering to them. 2. In the Charge, the sending of money, &c. is not laid to be done without the licence of the parliament of England, or of the Council of State, or General of the Army. The words of the act are, "Without the licence of the parliament of England, or Council of State appointed by their authority, or of the captain general of the parliament's forces." 3. The time to which this refers, is between the 29th of March 1650. and the 1st of June 1651; and so it takes in the time between the 29th of March 1650, and the 2nd of August 1650, which is before the making of the act.

Seventhly, The Charge is, "That the said Christopher Love, at the times and places before-mentioned, did traitorously and voluntarily relieve the said Syllas Titus, and one Sterks a Scotchman, which then were and yet are, under the power of the Scottish nation, and in arms against the parliament of England, with moneys, arms and ammunition.

By the Act of the 26th of March 1650, the Matters charged herein are only prohibited, but not made Treason.

Exception 1. That this Charge is mislaid, being charged to be done traitorously. 2. It is laid to be at the times before mentioned, whereas there are several times before mentioned: so as it is uncertain to which of those times this Charge relates. 3. And of these times, sundry of them are laid to be in several years before the making of the Act upon which this Charge is grounded.

ALLEGATIONS by Christopher Love, touching the Matters and Proof upon the Charge.

Though I do not conceive any sufficient Proof is made of the Charges against me, yet I shall be ready to make it appear upon proof: That one of the principal Witnesses hath deposed against me upon promise of reward, and upon menace of punishment. That one hath received extraordinary rewards for his deposing. That divers of the Witnesses against me have been by their own confession detected of contributing of Supplies and Assistance, sending and receiving letters contrary to the late acts. That no two lawful Witnesses produced prove any one Treasonable Act. That no Witness doth depose farther than Concealment, or Misprision of Treason at the most.

CHRISTOPHER LOVE.

As this Case is stated, we conceive these Questions may arise:

1. Whether in this Case there be lawful and sufficient Witnesses, as by law is required? 2. Whether here be two lawful Witnesses? 3. Whether any Concealment of Treason be Treason within the late acts? We have not seen any authentical Copies of the Charge or Evidence; but upon the Copies we have seen, we humbly conceive fit to tender these Matters and Exceptions to the consideration of this High Court. And we shall be ready to speak to them, or any of them, or to any other Matters arising upon the Case, as we shall receive further directions.

MATTHEW HALE.

JOHN ARCHER.

THOMAS WALLER.

After the Court had received the precedent Exceptions, and were sat in Westminster-Hall, Mr. Love was commanded to the bar.

When Mr. Love appeared at the bar, he desired the Court that his Counsel might be heard to these Exceptions. And when Mr. Archer and Mr. Waller, who were of his Counsel, appeared in Court, the Court demanded of them, whether they were of Mr. Love's Counsel? they answered, they did understand they were assigned to be of his Counsel by the Court. Then the Attorney-General demanded of them, whether or no they had subscribed the Engagement? they answered, they had not done it; and spake further to this purpose, That they were by the Court assigned to be of Mr. Love's counsel, and were sent for into the Court, and in obedience thereunto they had appeared, and were ready to speak, if they might be heard. It was demanded of them by the Court, whether or no they would subscribe the Engagement? They answered, That they desired time to consider of it; and so withdrew.

After they had withdrawn, Mr. Love moved the Court that Mr. Hale, another of his counsel, might be sent for.

[Upon the coming in of Mr. Hale, the Lord President said;]

Ld. Pres. You come as counsel for Mr. Love; the gentlemen that were here, are brought into an incapacity of doing him service that way; we asked them whether they have engaged: we doubt not you, but tell you the reason why we did it.

Mr. Hale. My lord, I have done it.

Ld. Pres. Therefore you are assigned.

Mr. Hale. I had very late notice of this business, it was Saturday night late before I had notice of it, and the next day was not a day to think of those things. Yesterday was Monday, and the most part of that day I spent in looking over those things that had been, I think, presented to your lordship and the Court; we did not know what command your lordship would put upon us, whether you would admit us to speak, and to what you would admit us to speak, and when you would admit us to speak. It is impossible, my lord, I must deal plainly, I profess it is impossible for me, in a business of this great consequence, to undertake to speak any thing for the present, till such time as I know your lordship's directions: and this was that we acquainted this gentleman with, as soon as ever I saw him, and the first time that ever I saw him, which was but this day.

Att. Gen. I think that Mr. Hale hath put somewhat under his hand.

Mr. Hale. We have done so.

Att. Gen. Nay, you must stand single, the other two are set aside, it must be you only; I suppose Mr. Hale knows what he is to speak to.

Mr. Hale. Truly we know what we are to speak to; but to speak upon such a business on such a sudden, when we did not know what directions the Court would give, that I could not undertake, and I think Mr. Attorney-General will not press it upon us, it were a hard case if he should.

Att. Gen. Mr. Hale knows as well as any man what is to be done in these cases, none better than himself; the Court useth not to assign counsel to pick flaws, but those that are just Exceptions: and the Court is doubtful too, how they will allow counsel to debate them, and stand to the Judgment of the Court. I suppose he comes to speak to that that the party hath alledged.

Mr. Hale. It is true, we do so: but Mr. Attorney-General knows likewise, that when matters of law are assigned, that there is some reasonable time, we expect not long, but some reasonable time is assigned also for the parties to prepare themselves; for truly otherwise I should not do that duty I owe to the Court and my client, if I should speak ex improviso, in such a manner as I have done; for the first time I saw any thing of it, was on Saturday night, between eight and nine o'clock.

Ld. Pres. Though that was the first sight of this Paper, as it is now set down, it was not the first notice you had to be of his counsel, but himself hath declared it here long ago, that the former paper was by your advice.

Mr. Hale. No, my lord, if he did so, I will plead Not Guilty.

Ld. Pres. I will not say your name, but when he gave us in his Paper before this, the last day, you said it was the advice of your Counsel.

Mr. Love. Not Mr. Hale.

Ld. Pres. Then haply we shall ease you a great deal: that that is under your hand, is very short, and we shall ease you of some of that too; and you know that upon all assignments in the Upper Bench and Common Law, when they first open it, they shew some causes upon which they will argue it; and when you have had time already, now shew something that may be worthy of it, and we will consider of it.

Att. Gen. Before he speak, my lord, I desire that he will give it under his hand positively, not queries, but positive, that this in his Judgment he thinks fit to be Matter of Law, and to be argued.

Mr. Hale. My lord, we think that these things are such.

Ld. Pres. Then you must upon the first sight open it so far, that it may be your judgment.

Att. Gen. But not suffer it to be debated unless you think it doubtful.

Mr. Hale. We are here assigned counsel for him, and if your lordship will please to give us that time that may be convenient for us to do our duty for him; if not, we shall do but your lordship wrong, and our client wrong, if we should speak.

Ld. Pres. You may have some convenient time, but you must open it now, that we may judge what time is proportionable; if you will not open it, that this is the point you will argue upon, we can say nothing.

Mr. Hale. Then the reading of that which we have exhibited to the Court, will be as much as possibly I shall be able to do at this time, for we have had no copy of the Charge.

Ld. Pres. Nor must have.

Mr. Hale. And we have taken a copy at random, according as it hath been offered to us by those that have taken Notes, and we have presented upon those notes, and we have applied ourselves to Mr. Attorney for a copy of the Charge, and he conceived that it was not fit for him to do it without direction of the Court; but for a copy of the Charge, when Exceptions are taken, it is usual to have it granted: and for us to speak and spend your lordship's time upon matters that are contained in a Charge, whereof, for my own part, I never heard, and which is usual upon Exceptions offered to be granted, it would be very——

Ld. Pres. It is an excellent thing to speak to men of understanding: Did you ever know an Indictment in this nature, a copy of it delivered upon the Prisoner's prayer?

Mr. Hale. Yes, I have known it very often.

Ld. Pres. He shall, as his memory serves him, speak to the substance; but to have a Copy of the Charge, I take it, you have not known.

Mr. Hale. Thus far I have known it. I have been commanded to be of Counsel with persons that have been impeached of Treason by the Parliament; I know that the archbishop of Canterbury, when he was impeached of Treason, had a copy of his Charge, that I know he had; I know this is the usual course, that if a person takes Exceptions to a matter contained in an Indictment, though it is true he shall not have the copy of the whole Indictment, yet he shall have a copy of so much whereupon his Exception grows; that hath been done, and will not be denied: but for the other matter, I know that in the archbishop of Canterbury's case there was a copy of the whole Charge granted, and the like was done in the case of the lord Strafford.

Att. Gen. I shall give that Answer a little more than I did: Parliamentary proceedings are no rule for other courts to walk by; besides my lord, you sit here upon a known published law, and the offence charged is against those laws. I believe Mr. Hale well remembers that both my lord of Strafford's Case, and the archbishop of Canterbury's Case, were both of them for many several facts several times a long time committed; which several facts being judged by parliament, were judged to be Treason not against any settled positive law: And for Strafford's case you know how the judgment at last was given by act of parliament, king, lords, and commons. And for the archbishop of Canterbury's Case, you know what the several complaints against him were, many of them not treason, but so many of them together, that in parliament they thought fit to judge him guilty of treason; but those privileges are not to be paralleled, he knows very well it was not against such and such a law, to make those offences treason. Having given thus much favour, I may say to the prisoner, that he may by memory exhibit his Exceptions, he hath done it; if you judge that those Exceptions are worth the debating, be worthy of it, you may (as Mr. Hale saith) give directions for so much to be given him, otherwise (for my part) I did never give it unto any; but those that have been in my place before, did never give it but by immediate warrant from the king, or the parliament; now, but for so much as the court thinks fit, for so much as concerns the exceptions.

Sir Tho. Witherington. For that that Mr. Hale objects to the Indictment, it stands with a great deal of justice; for if a prisoner lays hold of part of an Indictment, and says there is a mistake in it, there is reason it should be so, because the court must judge it whether it be so or not, therefore there is necessity of it that there should be a copy of so much; but I think he never knew that all the indictment was, but that part, and that is of necessity for the court, that they may see whether the exceptions accord with the indictment or no: If there be any exceptions to an indictment, if that exception remains not as a doubt or question, there shall be no copy of so much of the indictment given. If he shall raise a doubt that there is any doubt in law, or any question and variance between the acts and the charge, if he shall raise any such doubt, then I think according to the old law he may have that part of the Charge; but we desire he may raise some doubt to the Court.

Mr. Hale. My lord, we have raised the doubts, and we are ready to deliver in those that we conceive to be Exceptions to the Charge; if we be over-ruled in them, we have no more to say: but if your lordship, upon the view of these things we have offered, think them worthy to be spoken to before your lordship, then surely that is agreeable with that very rule which the Counsel of the State is pleased to state; that is, that in case we alledge that which the court shall think fit for us to debate before them, that then we may have that whereby it may appear whether we debate upon that which is, or is not.

Att. Gen. Mr. Hale saith he hath given them in, but I have seen none of them, my lord.

Ld. President. Whether their memory be perfect or imperfect, that we shall help you withal; and then I will tell you what you were best do, for time goes away: we will, before you take it, take the several statutes and the Charge, and your Exceptions, and compare them all together before you, and you shall except to every one as you go.

Att. Gen. I desire the Exceptions may stand as they are.

Ld. President. Ay, but we shall see whether there be any material variance between the Notary and the Charge.

Att. Gen. That notary was upon favour too, Mr. Love will acknowledge it.

Mr. Love. I do with all thankfulness acknowledge it, my lord.

Att. Gen. I desire it may be no precedent for after-times.

The Clerk. If you please, read your Exceptions.

Mr. Hale. My lord, we begin with the first, and these are the Exceptions: We take it, that the Charge is grounded upon the Act of the 17th of July 1649, and we take some Exceptions to that first part of the Charge; that is concerning what offences shall be adjudged Treason.

Ld. President. Read your Exceptions, and then you shall hear the Charge.

Mr. Hale. Our Exceptions are these; first, That whereas the words of the Act are, "That if any person shall maliciously and advisedly plot, contrive, or endeavour to stir up, or raise forces against the present government, or for the subversion or alteration of it;" that the words "maliciously" or "advisedly" are left out of the Charge, which we conceive are material words.

Att. Gen. Read.

The Clerk. "That he the said Christopher Love, as a false traitor and enemy to this commonwealth and free state of England, and out of a traitorous and wicked design to stir up a new and bloody war, and to raise insurrections, seditions, and rebellions within this nation, did several days and times in the several years of our Lord 1648, 1649, 1650 1651, at London, and in divers other places within this commonwealth of England, and elsewhere; together with William Drake, late of London, mercer, Henry Jermin, late of London, esq., Henry Piercy, late of London, esq., Richard Graves, late of London, esq., Edward Masser, late of London, esq., John Gibbon, late of London, gentleman, &c. and other their complices yet unknown, did traitorously and maliciously combine and confederate themselves together, and plot, contrive, and endeavour."

Att. Gen. What say you, Mr. Hale?

Mr. Hale. Now we find what the inconvenience is, of coming to put in our Exceptions, when we have not a clear copy of the Charge; and that was the cause why we did submit this, that in case any mistake arise by mistake of the copies, that we may amend: it is true, we find 'maliciously' is in.

Att. Gen. Traitorously will be enough.

Mr. Hale. I think not. That is over; for if it be maliciously alledged, that is over. Then the next thing we except to, is "he traitorously combined, confederated, and conspired together": it is true, there is 'Plot' in it, but there wants the words 'contrive' and 'endeavour'; but that is not the principal matter we stand upon.

The Clerk. They are in.

Mr. Hale. Then that is answered too. The next Exception that we take to the Charge, is, That the Act upon which this part of the Charge is grounded, says, that he must manifest it by an Overt-act, by an open deed: now we say, there is (as we conceive) nothing charged upon him in pursuance of this act, that is, there is no overt or open deed laid in the Charge; for the words of the Act are so, "That if any man shall maliciously plot, contrive, and endeavour to stir up or raise forces against the present government, and shall declare the same by open deed, that then every such offence shall be treason."

Att. Gen. If Mr. Hale hath read the copy of the Charge as it was taken, I think he finds divers of them in the Charge of open acts.

Mr. Hale. The business is not, whether there be open deeds, but whether they are applied to this act, or be substantive charges of themselves.

Att. Gen. I would ask him whether that open act must be in the indictment, or in the evidence?

Mr. Hale. In the indictment: it must be expressly laid in the indictment, or else it is no good indictment.

Att. Gen. But for that, that we may not dispute upon those things, my lord, there are the several charges against the several acts; there are several open acts that are laid in the indictment, and (I think) if he look upon it, he will find that they are laid to every one of them, and relate and refer to every one of them.

Sir Tho. Witherington. There is writing of letters, contributing of money, and receiving of messages.

Mr. Hale. That will appear by the subsequent parts of the Charge.

Ld. President. The subsequent parts of the Charge will make that appear, for if he did lend money, &c. if they be really there, we shall hear it by and by.

Mr. Hale. I take it, that the law is very plain, that the act must be mentioned in the indictment.

Att. Gen. But we will not debate that when we are express in the thing; we are not so tied to form, as to pin them to every word of it.

The Clerk. "And farther to carry on and accomplish the said wicked practice and design, he the said Christopher Love, divers days and times between the 29th of March 1650, and the 1st of June in the year of our Lord 1651, at London, and other places as foresaid, did traitorously and maliciously give, hold, use and maintain correspondency and intelligence by letters, messages, instructions, and otherwise."

Ld. Pres. These are open acts.

Mr. Hale. Then favour us in this: we take it that between this, and the first Charge, there comes a particular Charge, that relates to Charles Stuart, that is intervenient between the first Charge and this that is now read, or else we are misinformed by the prisoner; and if there be so, then we think our Exceptions will take place.

Sir Tho. Witherington. It is all contained in one indictment, and then that explains the Overt-act follows afterwards, as a distinct thing in the indictment; and so it was in my lord Cobham's Case in that indictment, and in my lord of Essex's Case.

Ld. Pres. He may make overtures.

Mr. Hale. We confess it; but we suppose it very certain, that both as this act is penned, and as the act of ——— is penned, which are much at one as to the manner of penning them, there is of necessity an overt-act to be laid, to make good that general charge: that, we conceive, will be plain; and that is admitted and agreed by the lord Coke in his Collections of the Pleas of the Crown, fol. 12, 13, where he saith, "The Indictment of the earl of Somerset, in the time of Edward 6, and all other of the like form, were against law:"* Because he said, that he did not follow the Words of the Act, and that he did it per apertum factum, and shows not what the open deed was; that was not a good Indictment; for the fact must be set forth in the Indictment; that must be done. Then the question is, Whether this be so done here or no? We conceive by this charge it is not so done here, upon this ground; we say, there follows after this a particular charge concerning his promotion of Charles Stuart: and then subsequent to that, there follows this that the court hath now read. We say, that in this case here is not a charge of an overt-act, neither by the one nor by the other; there is not a charge by the former, because that is a distinct treason, made distinctly treasonable by another act: and therefore that which is made a distinct charge of treason by another act, shall not be an overt-act within the former; that is one thing we say. And another thing we say is this, That in this case, the second, that is that which the court hath been pleased to direct to be read to us concerning his holding correspondence, that shall not be an overt-act relating to the first charge: for it is an uncertain relation: for there be two designs mentioned before, the one is a design contained in the first charge, the other a design contained in the second charge, for the promoting of Charles Stuart; and we say, the third shall not be coupled up to the former, because it is a distinct charge of treason in itself, and because it is uncertain to which it relates: for it refers not more to the first charge than to the second concerning the promoting of Charles Stuart, that is called the Prince of Wales.

Ld. Pres. For this I take it for the present, that the charge is founded upon four statutes; if he lay the offence against the first, second, third, and fourth, and he shall come and conclude it without relation to any particular of these treasons, he did thus and thus by letters and correspondencies, that will relate to them every one, though it comes but in the conclusion; and though the statutes be various, yet the indictment is but one, and he may put in this of the overtures in one place sufficiently, to be a sufficient overture to every one: and therefore though to one of them there should be no overture in it all, but valet ut valere potest, it will hang upon so much, as it will bear an Overt-act, and then you will not deny but that those words are overtures.

Mr. Hale. It is true, they are so; but yet still we conceive this third, which we call the third charge, that is concerning holding correspondence, the third or fourth, I cannot tell which it is, but it is one of them; we say, that that is not an overt-act applied to the first charge. When we come to the substance of that charge as it stands by itself, then our exceptions will rise upon it, as it stands singly by itself; but we conceive that shall not be a supplemental charge to make good that first charge, that is concerning endeavouring to subvert the state as it stands established, it shall not be used as an overt-act to make good the first charge. When we come to that particular charge, that is concerning the maintaining of correspondence, whether it be a good substantive charge of itself, then we shall offer our exceptions to that; but in the meanwhile we are but upon debate of the first, whether the first containeth such a charge, as by the act of the 17th of July, 1649, is required.

Att. Gen. My lord, we are heard before you concerning it; Mr. Hale will find, that after all these laws are repeated, and after all his offences against those laws are repeated, it is concluded that all are against the several acts of parliament in such cases made and provided. If Mr. Hale will single them, the impeachment, doth not, but relates to all of them; and, I think, that in this way of impeachment, we are not tied to those very nice and strict formal rules upon indictments: but if substance doth appear, it doth appear to you, my lord, that in substance the acts are pursued, and that upon the whole impeachments there are, even this that is required, the expression of an open deed, an overt-act; those are laid, and it will be acknowledged by Mr. Hale, that they are in themselves sufficient, being thus expressed and concluded, that those several practices, and designs, and treasons, are against the form of the several statutes in that case made and provided, not in relation to the 17th of July, nor the 2d of August, but to all of them. And I believe that all of these facts, all of this treason, all of this design, whether with the Scotch nation, or members of the Scotch nation, or those adhering to the Scotch nation, had all but one foundation, the subversion of this present government, that was the foundation and treason of the whole, that was it that was intended: for to bring one in, and not to cast out the other, would have done no good; but upon the whole, that was the treason. And upon all these circumstances and open deeds and designs, the sum, though it be a treason to hold correspondence, though it be a treason to promote Charles Stuart, though it be a treason to do other things; yet the treason is in this, the Scotch nation to come in with intent to subvert the government, Charles Stuart to be made king to subvert the government. So that the grand work at heart, at root, was the subversion of the present government; and as for that, I wish heartily, for Mr. Love's sake, there were not so many open deeds expressed by him.

Sir Tho. Witherington. Mr. Hale speaks of the charge; the words are these: "and further to carry on and accomplish the said traitorous and wicked practice and design, he the said Christopher Love" (now this I take to be the overt-act) "divers days and times between the 29th of March 1650, and the 1st of June 1651, at London and divers other places, as aforesaid, did traitorously and maliciously use and hold correspondence and intelligence by letters," (those are open acts) "messages, instructions, and otherwise, to the prejudice of the commonwealth:" and these are laid within the time, and not a distinct charge, as Mr. Hale would infer; but they do directly set forth an overt-act done by Mr. Love.

Mr. Hale. Is it your lordship's pleasure I should reply any thing, because I come utterly unprovided for it, I must profess?

Att. Gen. We may give him this, and one or two more.

Lord President. Go on, master Hale; if you have that that is material for another reply, do; but take this, master Hale, I take it very strong both in grammar and logic too, as well as in law, that when all the whole charge is radically and fundamentally but one treason, though there be many branches of it, the charge hath knit them all together, and made but one act of so many complicated treasons as are here; and when he comes to the latter end, if some of them were de facto, not by an overt-deed published, yet if he come and prove, that it was so done by the proofs, that there was correspondence, and these things de facto done, and that charge de facto done, you cannot break it there, to say that this fact did not reach to all: for if there be any one, it is sufficient; but here it is to all, even to that one that you speak of.

Att. Gen. My lord, I shall read a word to Mr. Hale; "All which treasons, and traitorous and wicked practices and designs of him, the said Christopher Love, were, and are to the apparent hazard of the public peace of this commonwealth and free state, parliament and people of England," [Mr. Hale findeth not these in any indictment.] "And to the manifest breach, contempt and violation of the laws of this land, and contrary to the form of divers statutes and acts of parliament in such case made and provided;" in general, my lord.

Mr. Hale. We conceive, under favour, and we think that it cannot be denied, that such a conclusion will not serve the turn.

Att. Gen. No, not in an indictment.

Mr. Hale. If there be a substantial part of the Charge omitted, that ought to be alledged in fact, it is not in the conclusion, "That contrary to the form of the statutes in this case made and provided," will help it. My lord (I come unprovided) the Case of my lord Dyer; that known case upon an indictment for recusancy, or for a wilful or knowing harbouring of a jesuit or priest: saith my lord Dyer, "It is not enough to say he did harbour him contrary to the form of the statute, but he must say, he did it knowingly: he must alledge and pursue the substantial words of the act of parliament." And so again, an Indictment for absenting from church; it is not enough to say, He did it 'contrary to the form of the statute;' but that he did it 'obstinately.' Therefore that general conclusion, that this was 'to the hazard of the commonwealth;' (it is true, it is an ill thing for a man to do such a thing that is to the hazard of the commonwealth) but those words serve not the statute neither: and then to say at the conclusion, 'contrary to the form of divers statutes,' that will not help it, under favour, in case of an indictment. Then Mr. Attorney makes a difference between the case of an Indictment and this Charge. I conceive that in this case there is no difference; the matter is the same, the one concerns the life of a person, and so doth the other: the offence is the same; the one is a Charge of high treason, and so is the other. It is true, those formalities that concern the manner of the trial, those (it is true) are laid by, because here is no jury to come before your lordship; but your lordship trieth upon the hearing of the testimony, and according to things alledged and proved. But for other matters that especially are substantially required by the act of parliament, we conceive that those shall be supplied no more by an intendment in case of a Charge before your lordship, than in case of an Indictment for treason. To this I shall say no more, but leave a word or two to your lordship's judgment. For the other thing (we are still but upon the first Charge, the first Article) it hath first of all been insisted upon, that an overt-act is not necessary to be alledged, because supplied by the words of the conclusion, "contrary to the form of the statute." To that I have answered, I conceive, it is not, nor can it be supplied, because it is a substantial thing in the very words and bowels of the act, and cannot be supplied by a general conclusion. Then it hath been said by sir Thomas Witherington, the state's serjeant, that in this case those subsequent matters and charges shall be an overt-act within the statute; that is that which he hath read to you; it is in the fourth Article (as I take it) "That Christopher Love divers times between the 29th of March 1650, and the 1st of June 1651, did traitorously and maliciously hold and use correspondence and intelligence by letters and messages." But that cannot be; I may say it, that is not a sufficient manifestation of an overt-act, because there do precede it these particular charges of treason within particular acts of parliament. Why then, if so be (to maintain his design, for the carrying on of his design aforesaid) this should be said to relate to the first design, why not to the second design of promoting Charles Stuart to be king? And why not to the third design? So that where there are three several designs before, all made treason by the acts of parliament, that cannot be an overt-act to make good the first part of the Charge, with submission to your lordship's judgment. And then another thing we say, that this Charge which sir Thomas would carry up to the first Charge, and make it as an enforcing an overt-act within the first Charge, that cannot be, for this other reason; because it is charged as a traitorous distinct act in him. Now we have this learning delivered by sir Edward Coke in his comment upon this, in the 25th year of Edward the third; that is where there are several acts made treason, the one is an act for levying of war: now there the case was treason against the person of the king, queen, prince, &c. that one part shall not be an overt-act in case of an indictment, shall not be construed as an overt-act for the making good of another part; because where all are made equally traitorous, and all are charged as equally traitorous, we think, with submission, those parts shall not be made an Overt-act to another treason. So when here is a treason made by the act of the 17th of July, and another by a subsequent act, that which is charged as a treason in the subsequent act, shall not be said to be an overt-act for the making good of the former; if the former be not a treason, able to maintain and support itself, this subsequent act shall not serve as a bolster to uphold it, and to supply that which is laid as a distinct treason of itself. Now these are the three things we insist on: first, that an overt-act is necessary to be laid. Secondly, That it is not supplied by the general conclusion, nor can it be. Next of all, That this Act that is here laid to be done traitorously, to hold correspondence and intelligence, it refers no more to the first design, than to the second or to the third design, which are charged as three distinct treasons; and this is charged as a distinct and positive treason of itself, and therefore shall not be carried over as a Supplement to another.

Att. Gen. We granting that an Overt-Act is necessary to be expressed; grant it should be so, but no more but in evidence: and then granting in the next place, that the general conclusion will not be sufficient to maintain it, when it is requisite an open deed should be expressed. Then for the third, I cannot be of his judgment in this way of impeachments; but as we see one person may commit four or five treasons, and one act may be an offence against four or five acts of parliament; and this is the truth: for where the several acts are repeated, that (my lord) are those laws against which this treason, and this treasonable practice and design is laid to be; then follows the several enumerations of those practices, designs and open acts of his, now applied by us: but Mr. Hale would take them and apply them to one singly. But I observe to your lordship, that those open acts of his, are offences by an open act against the several acts of parliament; but it serves his turn for his client to apply them so: but I hope you will not apply them so; but when they come between the offences, and the overt-acts follow it, and the conclusion upon the whole, that all those traitorous and wicked practices and designs are against the several acts of parliament: and if there be an open act, so expressed, in the impeachment, that in law is an open act, suppose it should be required to be expressed, if there be an open act, then I hope you will be satisfied, when it has been well proved, if it be expressed in the indictment an open act, that I hope will satisfy your judgments and consciences; especially when open acts shall appear to you to be an offence against the acts of parliament. I shall leave this to your judgment, and trouble you no further; and you will find in its place whether it be requisite or not.

Lord President. That that Mr. Hale said, if it were a thing of absolute necessity in an indictment, then the conclusion will not help; if the thing were of absolute necessity there charged, and not charged contra formam statuti, will not do it: but if I understand it right, it is fully laid in this Charge, that he did by open and overt-act do the thing; it is laid so: the words of open acts are not, but the value, that is, that he did by writing, by words, by messages, by money; and these are really overt-acts, though he did not call these overt-acts; these are laid fully in the Charge: and then, if they be laid fully in the Charge, and we satisfied in the full proof of that Charge, that we have heard overt-acts to maintain it, then I think this cannot come within any of those cases, that when an essential thing is left out of an indictment, there the conclusion will not help: this I conceive so far. Then the next, what method or order this can be, by setting down the statutes, and then withal these overt-acts of letters, of messages, of money, will reach to every one of the qualities, that these treasons are manifested by this act? but if it were a treason of such a nature, that none of these could reach to the manifestation of it; then you say well: but when these words reach to the manifestation of every charge laid in the Charge, then it is effectual and real, and the conclusion is sufficient.

Att. Gen. Before he goes to the next, I shall crave your direction in it; for I profess, my lord, to you, that I, in drawing the impeachment, take not myself to be so strictly tied to the forms of indictments in letters and syllables; and the forms I have taken and do take, are those that have passed heretofore, and I follow them; and till I receive your direction to the contrary, I take not myself bound but to express the substance of that which is laid to his Charge, by which he may know his offence, and give an answer: But to forms, and quiddities, and niceties, I conceive I was not bound to that.

Mr. Hale. I press not forms, nor quiddities, nor niceties in this business. The next is concerning the Charge of promoting the prince of Wales.

Att. Gen. No, there is no such thing in it; your copy is amiss again; read it.

Mr. Hale. Our Exception is this (we have been but upon the first all this while, I take it so) the next is, "That he did traitorously publish the son of the late king of England, to be king of England, (meaning this commonwealth) without the consent of the people in parliament first had or signified by Ordinance to that purpose." I think we shall not trouble your lordship much with that; for if that be as our copy is, it is true, it is not well laid: but if it be never so well laid, I conceive, as I am informed, there is nothing of that endeavoured to be proved.

Att. Gen. That we leave to the Court, Mr. Hale.

Mr. Hale. Then the next is, "That to accomplish the said traitorous and wicked Design, Christopher Love did at several days in the years aforesaid, traitorously and wickedly advise the Scots." Our Exception to that is this: There is a treasonable assistance charged, in some of the years that were before the making of the act that did prohibit it.

Att. Gen. And afterwards too, Mr. Hale.

Mr. Hale. It lays it in some of the years before the making of the act, and that is sufficient to invalidate this Charge.

The Clerk. "And further, to carry on and accomplish the said traitorous and wicked practices and design, he the said Christopher Love several days and times in the respective years aforesaid, at London, and divers other places within this commonwealth of England, and elsewhere, as aforesaid, together with the said William Drake, Henry Jermin, and other their complices aforesaid, did traitorously and maliciously invite, aid and assist the Scots, being foreigners and strangers, to invade this commonwealth of England, and hath adhered to the forces raised by the enemies of the parliament and commonwealth aforesaid, and keepers of the Liberties of England, as aforesaid."

* Att. Gen. You will find this in a Statute before this.

Mr. Hale. Not before the 17th of July 1649, and then your charge is repugnant; you charge us for an offence which is precedent to the statute.

Att. Gen. For that, you go and take them and pick them; but we lay them all together: there were treasons he committed in 1648, and that which I pitch upon still is this (that Mr. Hale thought was waved) That this man did not promote the interest of Charles Stuart late king, or that he had not endeavoured a subversion of this government; I say that against this act made in 1648. Then by consequence to maintain that, he did it to promote his interest, and to subvert the government; and there was a law in 1648 that did inhibit that: there is a law inhibits the calling in of strangers; and it follows by that, that he who calls in strangers, may promote the interest of Charles Stuart too: and that foundation is to this purpose, that he did promote him to have been king of England: and you know what he expressed to you, what tenderness of conscience he had to take care that he might not go elsewhere.

Mr. Hale. If it be so, then we must desire that part of the Charge may be read.

Att. Gen. I have not charged them, nor until I receive command, shall I vary from what I have received formerly, that I shall charge this to be against this, and that against that; but I have laid down the acts of parliament that have made things treason, and the offences severally, and upon the whole conclude, that these are treasons against several acts of parliament severally; if one or all together serve turn, I hold it well enough. If you put me to every one of them particularly, I must have more time, and better clerks to draw the indictments.

Mr. Hale. Still the same objection meeteth (with submission to the Court and Mr. Attorney, the same objection meets) with them; we say then, he will make this a kind of an additional charge to the first or to the second, or to both; but we know not to which.

Att. Gen. Yes.

Mr. Hale. But we say, That that is not sufficient upon these reasons, because it is a charge of Treason in itself, and therefore shall not be made an additional and supplemental Charge to make out another. And then we say, that this is uncertainly charged, whether you will make it supplemental to the first charge of treason, that is, the endeavouring of the subversion of the commonwealth; or to the second charge of treason, which is a distinct charge of treason, of the promotion of the interest of Charles Stuart.

Att. Gen. I cannot divide them.

Lord President. Are not these as perfect as before? Doth not the subversion of this Commonwealth promote the interest of Charles Stuart? And doth not the promotion of Charles Stuart subvert the interest of this commonwealth? If he hath laid it, that he did both of these by assuming it by a double or multiplied act; and all these multiplied acts are but one subversion: if I subvert it by one, or by twenty acts, both of them are the same in nature; for the subversion of the one, is the bringing in of the other; and the bringing in of the one is the subversion of the other; and so they are relatives fully one to the other, and there cannot be more expressed in the Charge than this. And notwithstanding all these acts, though that act hath made the treason, cannot it be by another act? You may prosecute by virtue of this subsequent act, any thing that was understood to be general treason by the law of the land.

Mr. Hale. My lord, this is that we insist upon. It is true, we do conceive, though the promotion of the interest of Charles Stuart is not consistent with the preservation of the interest of this commonwealth, yet every destruction of the interest of the commonwealth is not therefore a promotion of the interest of Charles Stuart; for then there could be no treason against the commonwealth, but it must be a promotion of the other's interest. Now there may be a treason against the commonwealth, without the promotion of the other's interest. I urge it to this purpose, to make it appear, that they are several charges bottomed upon several acts; and therefore the reference here made to promote the design aforesaid, is uncertain to which it shall relate : it may fall out the party may be guilty upon the first article ; it may fall out that he is not guilty upon the second article, and then it is uncertain to which article it relates, that he is guilty of, or not guilty of : and here may be the consequence of it, then you will make a treason, which to this third clause is a substantive, and contained in itself, to be an overt-act to another charge of treason, and that you cannot do ; you cannot make a treason which is so charged, to be an overt-act, or exposition, or a declaration of that which is contained in the former ; like that case I instanced in before, of the 25th of Edw. 3, that no man shall go about to destroy the person of the king, nor to raise war against his people : so that we use it not in any other reference, but only to explain and bring the reason of that ancient law to this law. In that case a man cannot charge the overt-act of going about to destroy his person, which is a distinct treason of itself, to be an overt-act to the charge of levying war, which is another distinct treason. And if he alledge, such a one did go about to destroy the prince, or the consort of the king, or the king, and to make the levying of war to be an overt-act to it, this he cannot do ; because though it is true, it might be an overt-act to it, yet notwithstanding it being made a distinct treason, it cannot be an overt-act to another treason : and so here, this very assisting and inviting of forces is made a distinct treason. And so if you take it substantively, it is insufficiently laid : and if relatively, you may not do so, because it is a treason of itself, and shall not be brought in relation to another treason laid before it.

Att. Gen. For that, I hope Mr. Hale will leave me to that liberty I have ; that is, that if one act be an offence against several acts, I may aggravate it so, as to make him know it is so. And I take it for an aggravation of his offence, when he hath offended against so many several laws, which he hath done ; and that I may have liberty to say so, though perhaps that subversion of this government is not in every respect a promoting of the interest of Charles Stuart : But the subversion of this government, as it is here laid in this indictment, is a promotion of the interest of Charles Stuart. And so it is here. And I have done now with that.

Id. President. Then, Mr. Hale, I will add a word, because that you did put the case of a man destroying the person of a king, and levying of war. If it be laid : those very acts, if they be laid as a continued, or a medium, or an enterprize, that he had taken up a war to destroy the person of the king : those words in one sense, if it had been laid solitarily by itself, and destroying the king in another ; but if he shewed that by levying of war, he endeavoured it, then the denomination is from the end in that place : and though they be two treasons substantively, yet when they are laid as one continued act, they are but one. And so it is in this case : all these, though there are several statutes, and several treasons, these multiplied acts make up but one complete in the conclusion. If there want one of these, if there be sufficient in the other, it is treason enough, and too much too, (I would it were not so :) If they be laid in subordination, as all these are, every one of them further to promote this, and to promote that, so they are laid in promotion of it to every one : And then they are contiguous, and depend one upon another, and are substantive ; and so substantial, as that they may be relatives one to another. And so are these.

Att. Gen. The next, Mr. Hale.

Mr. Hale. The next is the fourth Charge ; and that is concerning holding correspondence by letters and messages with Charles Stuart, and the late queen his mother : We say that this part of the Charge is ill laid also. It is laid in nature of a felony by the Act, and laid to be done traitorously in the Charge ; and that a substantial (not a mere formality, but a substantial) mistake : For if so be a woman be indicted of petty treason, because it is Proditoria, yet in truth it amounts but to felony. Now, in case where she is an accessory to a felony, the indictment is nought. If a man be accused that he did traitorously such an action, which in itself amounts but to a felony, that Charge is nought. And so it is here ; it is mislaid : For by the Act of the 29th of March, 1650, the matters therein charged are not made treason, at most but capital, but we think it only prohibited, and then we say it is an uncertain Charge. And so it is, under favour : for though the Act saith no man shall hold correspondence by letters, messages, or otherwise ; yet when we come to inform upon it, or to indict upon it, it is not enough to say he held correspondence by letters, messages, or otherwise : but, if you will ground your deed upon that act, you must shew what that 'otherwise' is. And that is the exception to that part of the Charge.

The Clerk. " And further, to carry on the said traitorous and wicked practice and design, he the said Christopher Love divers days and times, between the 29th of March, 1650, and the 1st of June, 1651, at London and other places, as aforesaid, did traitorously and maliciously give, hold use, and maintain correspondence and intelligence by letters, messages, instructions, and otherwise."

Mr. Hale. 'Or otherwise' was our Notes ; then that is out of doors : But our Exception is, That it is alledged to be done traitorously.

Lord President. And the Statute saith it shall be treason.

Mr. Hale. No, it saith not so : The Act lays it only in nature of a felony, and in the Charge it is laid to be done traitorously ; and so the Charge is mislaid.

Att. Gen. I confess it is expressed so in the 29th of March, 1650, and it is not said what the offence is ; but I conceive, in the first place, that by the law of England he that holds correspondence with a traitor will go very near it, my lord. And then I humbly conceive that still, he going upon the first act, it is laid to be with Charles Stuart, and the queen and counsel with him, I think, it is a promoting of his interest: he to hold a correspondence with him whom the Parliament hath said, You shall in no case promote his interest.

Mr. Hale. I must be bold still a little, to crave Mr. Attorney's favour, to reply upon him in this kind of way; for I have not had time.

Att. Gen. You have had more time than I; for I heard not of it till now.

Mr. Hale. We say the Charge is not good, because it is made felony only by the Act, and laid in the Charge to be done traitorously; and then we say that Charge is uncertain to what design it relates: If it relates to the business concerning the promoting of Charles Stuart's interest, if it be so, we conceive it is not proved: for the proof I mention not; but that is not insisted upon, that Master Love did promote the interest of Charles Stuart, contrary to the act of parliament; that, I think, is not insisted upon.

Att. Gen. O, yes.—Mr. Hale. I conceive no.

Att. Gen. I conceive very much otherwise, Mr. Hale.

Mr. Hale. I desire that Charge once more may be read, concerning the promoting the interest of Charles Stuart.

The Clerk. "And the better to carry on and accomplish the said traitorous and wicked practice and design, he the said Christopher Love, with the said William Drake, &c. (since the death of Charles Stuart, late king of England, who, for his notorious treasons, and other tyrannies and murders by him committed in the late unnatural and cruel wars, was by authority, derived from the parliament, justly condemned to death, and executed) several days and times, in the respective years aforesaid, at London aforesaid, and sundry other places within this Commonwealth, and since this nation was settled in the way of a Commonwealth, or a free state, as aforesaid, did traitorously declare, publish, and promote Charles Stuart, eldest son to the late king, to be king of England."

Mr. Hale. We are informed that there is nothing of any particular act of his concerning that: but we have nothing to do with the fact. But we conceive that no subsequent thing, by way of construction or interpretation, shall make a publishing and promoting in such a manner as this is, it must be such a thing as expressly publisheth and promotes him to be the chief magistrate of England, according to the words of the act, and not by way of dilation: We say this is not a thing to be applied to serve the turn, upon this reason; we say that the holding of correspondence and intelligence with Charles Stuart, eldest son to the late king, cannot be coupled to the promotion of the interest of Charles Stuart, to be king of England, seeing that is but by way of interpretation to bring it within the first part of the act.

Att. Gen. For that, I shall crave your direction.

Lord President. It is not interpretative, but positive.

Att. Gen. But I shall crave your pleasure; Whether I shall in my impeachments afterwards put in all my evidence? What is charged, and evidence proves, that you will judge upon, I hope.

Mr. Hale. Then the next part of the Charge, and that is the fifth, That he did hold correspondence with divers persons of the Scotch nation. Our Exception to that is plain: we conceive that part of it is not well laid neither; it is not laid in pursuance of the act of parliament, as our Notes are. This is that we say, That it is not expressly alledged, that they were persons residing in Scotland, our Notes are.

Att. Gen. Like enough so, Sir.

The Clerk. "And further, to carry on and accomplish the said traitorous and wicked design, he the said Christopher Love, several days and times in the respective years aforesaid, at London aforesaid, and divers other places within this Commonwealth of England, and elsewhere, as aforesaid, did traitorously and maliciously hold and maintain correspondence and intelligence with divers persons of the Scotch nation, viz. with the earl of Argyle, London, Lothian, Hailey, Balcarras, and divers other persons of the Scots and other nations, whom he well knew to adhere to the Scotch nation in this war against the Parliament and Commonwealth of England."

Mr. Hale. This we conceive is not a good Charge; for the words of the Act of the 2nd of August, 1650, upon which this is grounded, are, That no man shall hold correspondence with the Scotch nation residing in Scotland.

Att. Gen. You were best read farther, Mr. Hale.

[Then Mr. Hale read part of that Act, beginning at these words, "Be it enacted, ordained, and declared by this present Parliament," and ending with these words, "Without the allowance, licence," &c.]

Mr. Hale. It is true, there is no residing; for that yet comes not home, we conceive, to part of the Charge. There are two parts of the Charge; the one, "That he did maintain correspondence with divers of the Scottish nation; and with divers other persons of divers other nations, whom he well knew to adhere to the Scotch nation in this war against the Parliament." As to the first, that is out of doors: Then here is no full charge of holding any correspondence with any of the Scotch nation; for that part of the Charge rests upon this, that it must be with holding of correspondence with any such persons as are residing in Scotland, and with any other person residing there. Then as to the other part—

Ld. Pres. It is a continued speech; Not with the Scots, nor any other.

Mr. Hale. Then here is another thing in it: That it is not averred that such a correspondence and intelligence was held without the licence of parliament.

Att. Gen. You are mistaken in that; your Notes are not true.

The Clerk. "And he the said Christopher Love, within the times, and at the places before mentioned, did traitorously assist, encourage, without the special licence of the Council of State, or Parliament, or Captain-General of the Parliament Forces."

Mr. Hale. We say then, these are two distinct Charges, and grounded upon two distinct parts of an act. But there is more in it, which we conceive is not to be answered, with submission; under favour, it is said he did it within the times aforesaid: The times that are aforesaid are between the 29th of March 1650, and June 1651. Now this act, whereby this is made traitorous or treasonable, takes not place till the 5th of August, 1650: So that it might be done within the times aforesaid, that is, between the 29th of March 1650, and June 1651, and yet not contrary to the act of the 2nd of August, which was 1650.

Sir Tho. Witherington. We lay it within all the times aforesaid: And I suppose the matter of the Evidence hath told you the times, which now we are not to dispute.

Mr. Hale. Whatsoever is done between the 29th of March 1650, and the 2nd of Aug. 1650, is not done contrary to the act of the 2nd of August 1650, upon which act this Charge is grounded: There is a time between them, and between the time of exhibiting of these Articles. Whatsoever is said to be done between the 29th of March 1650, and the exhibiting the Articles, is not said to be done after the 2nd of August, 1650. For if it be done between the 29th of March and the 2nd of August, it is done within the time aforesaid, that is, between the 29th of March 1650, and June 1651; and yet not done contrary to the act of the 2nd of August, because done before the act came forth.

Att. Gen. Though Mr. Hale will not consent to it, we will strike out the 29th of March; and then he will not deny but that is good enough, with that stricken out, before the first of June, 1651. Whether it be not good enough, and no time laid before it?

Mr. Hale. No indeed, it is not good enough.

Att. Gen. Why not? It is after the offence committed.

Mr. Hale. Because it may as well be before the act, as after the act.

Att. Gen. If we lay it after the offence committed, I suppose it is well enough; and the wisest will think so. Lay it to be the 1st of June 1651; Suppose it were in September before, it is good enough.

Mr. Hale. If you lay it upon the 1st of June, it is a year: before it is not good enough.

Att. Gen. That that Mr. Hale insists upon, he may say it is before the 1st of June, 1651, so long since; but in a just and reasonable indictment, when we insist upon that law that makes it treason to hold it after such a time, and we say that before the first of June, 1651, he did commit treason in holding correspondence, and sending provisions of war before that law, though it were before the second of August, 1650, that were not against that law.

Mr. Hale. Still we say, That "contrary to the form of the statute, or contrary to the form of the law," which is but the conclusion, shall not supply that which is material to be alledged. Now when here is an act laid to be done, certainly it is material to alledge that it is done in such a time as may appear to be after the time of the prohibition of it to be done. The prohibition runs to the 2nd of August, 1650, That no man after the 5th of August shall do such an act: Then it must be laid to be an act done after the 5th of that August. But it is not laid so here; but laid so as may be intended to be done before the 5th of August: For here is a time laid between the 29th of March, 1650, and the time of the exhibiting the Articles, which is in June 1651, and that he did this within the time aforesaid. Now he that saith he did it the 30th of March, saith he did it within the time aforesaid; and yet saith not that it is within the act.

Sir Tho. Witherington. We have given an answer to that: We have laid it within and without the time. That is within the time, the Witness doth prove it: and Mr. Hale speaks not to what we have proved, and cannot speak to it.

Mr. Hale. The Proof shall never supply the insufficiency of the Charge: For we may as entirely offer you an exception to this matter after you have heard the Proof, as before you have heard it; for it stands no ways upon the Charge singly; so that it shall not be supplied out of matter that appears in the Proof, but it must be considered whether the Charge can supply itself, or not: for that that is alledged against the Charge before the Proof made, is alledged as well afterwards. If it were not good before the Proof, the Proof shall not be supplemental to it: For upon that reason, if an indictment did want time or certainty, then after the party were heard upon his Defence, it might be said, when this Exception was taken to the Indictment, all this might appear upon the Evidence. But that will not supply the defect of the Indictment.

Att. Gen. I am sure we have laid it late enough, the first of June, 1651, before that time; and Mr. Hale's Exception is still upon that way of proceedings upon indictments: He must have that positive and strict certainty in each particular. I must give it that answer still, that if you do in these cases put me to it, to express every particular circumstance of every particular fact, and every particular time, and that it must conduce in the conclusion of it, I must make you impeachments that will not be fit for you to read, nor hear: But, under favour, if that it contains in it this way of charge that convenient certainty, that conveniency that may put the prisoner to the knowledge of it, and to prove it. For this relates not singly: For if I should go that way

Mr. Hale hath laboured to draw me, that is, to take every one of these severally, and that I must make a distinct charge upon one, and upon the other, and a distinct evidence upon one, and upon the other: I conceive these run quite through all the laws, every one of them. Had I confined this now between the 5th of August, 1650, and June, 1651, then what had become of all the laws before that time? Therefore to make them relative to all, I have expressed such a time as may relate to all: For had I confined it singly upon this or that act, whereas I humbly conceive that these acts, and these offences of Mr. Love, are relative to more than one act of parliament, and go to several acts: And therefore I cannot confine myself to one act, and say it was done at such a time, and there limit it, and let it die. But my endeavour hath been, and upon this particular we debated it, when we did draw it: we put it so that the several acts may have the several effects, and Mr. Love's treasons look upon every one of them, and they upon every one of his treasons; and as his offences run through, and against all the acts, so must our laying it upon him run, and the evidence also. And though we took care to lay it back far enough, that was, to the 1st of June, 1651, and so laid it high enough to the other, that it might reach the rest. And in this way we are not tied so to express it in every particular, as other indictments run.

Mr. Hall, Attorney of the Dutchy: He would charge it upon the times between the 29th of March, and the 1st of June; that be not the times that we have expressed in this; for it is that within the times aforesaid we have positively laid, that it was in the year 1651: For we have laid before, that in the years 1648, 1649, 1650, 1651; then in the times aforesaid we have positively laid that this fact was done in the year 1651, which of necessity must be since that act concerning the Scots was made: And that I conceive is an express positive time mentioned in the Charge, and gives a full answer to that objection; for it is not within such a time, but in the year 1651.

Mr. Hale. That Charge is within the times aforesaid, which is last mentioned, between March 1650, and 1651.

Mr. Hall. That we shall submit to the court, whether in the same times aforesaid shall not relate to all the times beforementioned, as well as the particular times he hath picked out; for we mention that in the year 1651, these things were done.

Att. Gen. For that I have given you, that that is the general answer, if I be put to it: Whereas Mr. Love had transgressed against those several acts of parliament, we have put it so, that we conceive his offences run through them all; and so we have laid them: And (I hope) we are not upon those niceties, that we must express the direct days and times, as Indictments run: But here is enough to make him know his offences.

Ld. Pres. I conceive it is much better as it is too, and more obvious to every understanding, and their interpretation, than as you would have it, a great deal: For the necessities of the day, it is not material, that you will agree; nor the week, if they lay a time so many months before, or after, if the proof come and fall within the compass of the charge. As the Proof is laid, so is the fact; The proof determines whether it were within the times without the law, or within the times aforesaid; for it is not within that time, and every of them, but within the times generally laid, all those acts were done. And those must be laid in particular which was at one time and at another, which were two years a-brewing, and are by the proofs laid in general; that is best to say one fact was done at one time, and another at another time, and at such a time, and not at such a time. It can be no man's judgment to be so laid in an indictment or charge: but they must be laid thus in general, and the evidence must make it particular, that it was within the times that are laid; as when there are no times, as from March to June and Aug. and after, if they be both laid, if the fact be within such a time that is within the law, all the other is out of doors.

Mr. Hale. My lord, thus, if it please your lordship, I think with submission to your lordship's judgment, that in such a case it is not in the proof to make good a charge; if the charge do not contain a sufficient certainty, it is not in the proof to make it good. My lord, I insist now upon the necessity of a day to be precisely laid. I know (though it is true, it hath been otherwise held in some cases), yet in a case of this nature, the day is now material; for now we are upon act of parliament. As now, if so be the statute of the 29th Eliz. enacts that every man that shall knowingly entertain a Jesuit, that that man shall be a traitor, shall stand guilty of treason; if so be a man would say in an indictment, that such a man between the 28th Nov. in the 28th year of the queen, and the 28th Dec. in the 29th year of the queen, did entertain such a Jesuit, this indictment would be naught, not upon the uncertainty of the day, but because it takes in a time which is not prohibited by the statute. The indictment may be true, that he did receive a Jesuit within that time, and yet that he did not receive him contrary to the form of the statute; and to say in the conclusion "contrary to the form of the statute," will not help it. For that is our objection, that it is not done contrary to the form of the statute, because it takes in such a time, as that it might be done before the statute came forth. We say that when there is a time laid between the 29th of March 1650, and June 1651, and that within that time he did do thus and thus, there is the fault; it doth over-reach the time of the prohibition of the statute, for any thing appears to the court: The court may find the indictment or information true, that he did it within this time, that is, between the 29th of March 1650, and June 1651, and yet for all that the party not in fault to be impeached, because he might not do it contrary to the act; for he might do it between the 29th of March 1650, and June 1651, and yet do it before the act came forth, which was in August 1650.

Mr. Hall. My lord, I conceive Mr. Hale hath not answered that I alledged; But now, if there were no other times mentioned in all the Charge, but only between the 29th of March and June 1651, then it were somewhat; but when the times are expressed before, though that it was in the year 1651, and then we say 'in the times before said,' I conceive that 'in the times aforesaid' shall relate expressly to that time in the year 1651, and then it must be within the act.

Mr. Hale. That cannot be; that will make the Charge worse.

Lord President. That I conceive you are upon, is this, The very letter of the Charge: For you say, at this time that is laid he could not be a traitor, and you join it with a time in which he might be a traitor. This, you say, they lay in the indictment, That he did in such a time of March, and afterward; and at that time there was no law to prohibit it, and so that could not be a crime against him; and this you say, no proof will help it; I take it, Mr. Hale, this is the substance. But if this be thus laid, and the proof doth come in, this is very essential in my judgment, when upon the matter, if this be, as you see it appears upon the face of the thing, that the proof must go to that time within the law; and therefore that will not vitiate at all such an indictment, if it were so as you say. But I take it, that this being complicated with more laws, as I said before, though he were not guilty upon this, yet in the conclusion he is found guilty of that which is as to other offences.

Attorn. Gen. I shall say but this; We all know that a time is expressed but for formality; and that time that is expressed, is not material, so it be laid far back enough. But if I say it in June, and prove it in June twelve-months, it is time enough for this, as your lordship was saying. That which I do say is, That I cannot confine this very act that is supposed to be, and yet not laid to be against that act of the 2d of August 1650, from this clause, in express terms, not singly. But that which I humbly insist upon is this, That never a one of these offences singly transgress one single law, but is an offence against several laws. I conceive I had done myself and the commonwealth wrong, had I limited it to any one; for his complying with the Scots, and joining with them, and contributing with them, and receiving intelligence, it is more than against that single act. It is promotion of his interest, and subversion of the government, and against every one of the laws. And therefore, I conceive, I had not done right to the place I am intrusted with, if I should have laid it singly. But he is indicted, That as a false traitor he hath done these things; that is the preamble. And then we instanced the particulars, and give a time; which time he will acknowledge is not positively necessary to be true, that that time must be the day the fact was committed; but if it be before, it is enough. But he infers, because this seems to be an offence within the statute of the 2d of August 1650, and is laid between the 29th of March 1650, and the first of June 1651, and so whether this can relate to that act: And by evidence you know it is afterwards. But this being an offence against several laws, I cannot charge it to be against one law; But the art is now, as Mr. Love began, to take it asunder and singly, and then it is nothing; And Mr. Hale takes it singly. It is not against this, nor against this: but it is against every one of them; and not against this singly, but against the rest of them.

Sir Tho. Witherington. My lord, it cannot be contrary to the form of the statute, unless it be done after the time, so that the conclusion shews it was laid within the time. But for the case, as Mr. Hale instanced in: He puts a case of one act of parliament; we are now upon offences against several acts of parliament. In that case, of retaining a jesuit, he is a traitor by the act of the 29th Eliz.; so that if he lays it between the 28th of the queen, and the 29th, if the jury find that he did retain him knowingly on the 10th of May 29, then it will not be denied but that it is an offence against the statute.

Mr. Hale. But still we say the indictment is naught in that case, because it takes in a time which was before the act came forth: so that the party might do it within the time expressed in the indictment, and yet not do it contrary to the act: And this is our case.

Attorn. Gen. My lord, you have heard us for that.

Mr. Hale. The last thing is concerning contribution to Silas Titus, and Sterks, a Scotchman. And to that we have the same exception: That that is not made treason by any act of parliament: And therefore it is mislaid to be done traitorously; for the statute of the 26th of March 1650, only prohibits it, and so makes it penal, but not treason. But then we say again, it is laid very uncertainly too, that is, at the times before mentioned. If Mr. Attorney of the Dutchy's constructions should stand, that is, that the times before mentioned refer to the time past, then he may refer to a time before the act. But we conceive the thing itself is not treason by the act, but only prohibited; and we conceive, under favour, still, that by way of reduction to any of the former Charges, this shall not be made as an instance or an overt-act, by way of reduction to any of the former Charges, because it is charged particularly to be traitorously done, because there are several charges of treason before; And that which Mr. Attorney was pleased to observe upon another occasion, That in this case the Charge is against several acts of parliament, it is true; but though it be against several acts of parliament, yet it must bind and pinch upon one; For we say one treason is not to be made an instance to another, and so be made accessory, and depending, and accidental to another. And then we say in this case, that this being not a treason in itself, and being as uncertain to which of the former treasons it is applyed, it cannot be well laid, nor well applyed, that is, to the last, that he did voluntarily relieve Silas Titus, it is not made treason.

Attorn. Gen. It is against the act of the 2d of August 1650, in express words: read the Impeachment.

The Clerk. "And further to carry on and accomplish the said traitorous and wicked practice and design, be the said Christopher Love, within the times and at the places last aforesaid did traitorously and voluntarily relieve the said Silas Titus, Edward Massey, col. Bamfield, one Mason late of London gentleman, and one Sterks late of London gentleman, who then were, and yet are under the power of the Scotch nation in arms against the parliament and commonwealth of England, with moneys and ammunition. Which treasons and traitorous and wicked practices and designs of him the said Christopher Love, were and are to the apparent hazard of the public peace of the commonwealth and free-state, parliament and people of England, and to the manifold breach, contempt, and violation of the laws of this land, and contrary to the form of divers statutes and acts of parliament in such case made and provided."

Mr. Hale. Then we say, it is uncertainly alledged, and uncertainly laid; but we take it, it is not within the words of the act; we desire that act may be read.

The Clerk. "That shall from and after the 5th of August 1650, use, hold, and maintain any correspondence," &c.

Mr. Hale. Then this is not within this act, because that this is concerning sending to persons that are in Scotland; I observe not that it is charged that they were in Scotland.

Attorn. Gen. "Or shall abet, assist, countenance or encourage the Scotch nation, or any other person or persons adhering to them in their war against the commonwealth." What think you of relieving, is not that abetting and encouraging?

Mr. Hale. It should be laid so then. I desire that part of the Charge may be read again.

The Clerk. "And further to carry on," &c.

Hale. My lord, we think this is not fully charged according to the act.

Att. Gen. I will read you another, of the 26th of March 1650.

Mr. Hale. That makes it not treason.

Att. Gen. It comes very near it; but I insist upon it, it is under the other, relieving them with money, buying of arms.

Mr. Hale. Still the same exception lies upon it, within the times aforesaid, which certainly cannot be acknowledged.

Att. Gen. We acknowledge the same exception; and the same answer lies to it, that of the 26th of March 1650; it is, he shall suffer death: and upon this it is treason upon both together, we cannot divide them, but must express them so.

Mr. Hale. Under favour, the one makes it felony, and the other a treason.

Att. Gen. But it is a deadly one.

Lord President. If a statute law makes a thing felony that was not felony, or recites a thing that is felony, and saith it shall be punished with death, being a petty larceny, therein you say well; but if the statute recites that that is treason in itself actually, and saith that they that do these things shall suffer death, according to the nature of that offence that is formerly recited, and limits it so in the recital, if the recital be treason in the beginning, and then say, that that traitor shall suffer death without mercy.

Mr. Hale. We have shewed our Reasons in the case, my lord; it is as much as we can say upon this sudden, concerning this Charge; there are some other things that are mentioned here by Mr. Love, as how far forth there be sufficient witnesses, admitting the Charge were good; how far forth the witnesses are sufficient in themselves; and then whether here be two concurring witnesses to any one act, and whether any thing be more proved than misprision of treason, and concealment of treason: These are things Mr. Love takes upon him in fact to say. And now for those, when the case is made, we shall be ready to speak to these things; for truly it is sudden and new to me, for these matters came not to my knowledge till this morning after eight o'clock; that is, concerning the last Paper he offers to your lordship, and that is, exception to witnesses, proof, and matter of the proof, whether the bare concealment (for thus it is stated unto us, the 'Concealment') of any thing that is treason, whether that be treason or no in the party that conceals it; these are things that if we were prepared for, we should speak to. First, we conceive by the statute of 1^o & 5^o Elizabethæ, there is a necessity in this proceeding before your lordship, to have two lawful and sufficient witnesses. Next of all, we think, that if the witnesses be such as he hath stated them to be; which whether they be or no, we know not, for we are utterly unacquainted with the evidence, yet we should think they are no sufficient witnesses: And then admitting they were sufficient witnesses, yet if so be one witness speaks to one fact, another to another, we conceive these are not sufficient witnesses within the statute, nor sufficient to convict him. And then if that which they have witnessed be nothing that amounts to treason, haply committed by others, that makes him not guilty within the acts. If we had time to understand, and digest, and consider, what were the matters that are alledged, we should be able to say somewhat to it. My lord, that which we have said, we have said of a sudden; and so it appears, because we had not that clear understanding of the Charge, as otherwise we might have had, and so have saved much of your time.

Att. Gen. For that that hath been said suddenly by Mr. Hale, I shall suddenly give it this Answer: He hath had more time than I, he hath said from Mr. Love, and not from himself: He saith when the case is made; I think it will appear then, that these exceptions have been made to the court, that the witnesses have not been competent neither in quality nor number, they have been spoken to. For the witnesses, the exception to the quality, because they were of the same gang, they had a hand in the same treason, that was the exception; I think that will not be allowed to be a legal exception; they are persons that (as Mr. Love pretended) had a hand with him in this fact, and therefore they should not be competent witnesses; that I shall appeal to Mr. Hale's judgment, before conviction, and upon a proceeding, whether they may not discover (and after conviction) if they be approvers. For the next, for two witnesses; when the case is made, you will find one, two, three, four, five, six, and to most of them two, three, and four, for so I may make bold to say, for so I read them to you the last day. And then for the last exception, that was for the concealment of treason, it is far from it, for I know not what a concealment Mr. Love may intend; I am sure Mr. Hale will not think that a concealment, to run one, two, or three years, and run on, and send letters; that when he acts along with them, and hath the meetings at his house continually, moves them to receive money, and contribute; I think he was the highest actor amongst them, for the meetings were continually at his house, the advices were there resolved upon debates, there he gave his advice one way, and they another way: I think he will not think this is but misprision of treason; and we never did charge it, nor intended it so, but went a little higher.

Mr. Hale. If that be declined to be insisted upon, that the non-revealing of treason, though it be a month or two, or a year or two, can be no treason, then we have done with that question; for that it will rest singly upon the fact before your lordship, whether there be any thing more proved than such a concealment, then it is true we are discharged of that question. But then concerning the proof, if master Attorney will please to admit, that the proofs are such as master Love hath stated in this Paper.—

Att. Gen. That I shall not do before-hand, but to debate upon the proof, I shall crave your lordship's direction; I have gone over them already, and it hath been trouble enough to me; if it be your lordship's pleasure I must go over the proof again, I shall submit to you, but not to him.

Ld. President. Mr. Hale, there are no witnesses that have been heard, but they have been of the said confederacy, that was one exception Mr. Love made; it was debated at the producing, and over-ruled, and I believe your judgment will go well with us, that it was no exception. Another was, that they have been promised rewards; that was likewise moved and over-ruled, the court was of opinion that they may do it; that if there be a treason, and there be many correspondents in it, and one out of remorse, as some of these did say, that when they had been there they did not like their ways, but went from them, and came to them no more; if this man, or any other man afterwards shall come and reveal this, it is in the power of the State either to reward him with monies, and to promise him life too, if he shall faithfully do it: And this, we say, is a stronger case than the case of an approver, which afterwards when they became approvers, they must confess the fact, and say they are guilty of the fact plainly and openly; and yet then they are good witnesses to discover this, as it was plotted in hell, for this was no other, though they had a vizard upon them, which was no otherwise: I say, if any one will discover such; nay, haply it was offered to Mr. Love himself, if he would have done it; I believe there were some overtures made to him. But this is law too, by the law of this land, which is the law of God; for we have no law practised in this land, but is the law of God: and so did the lawyers maintain it before the king in Henry the 8th's time, the pope's legates, and chief archbishops and bishops of England; and did then prove it to them, that there was no law practised in England but the law of God, which our ministers are loth to touch, and busy themselves to study, but study the ceremonial laws of the Jews, which are Mortue Mortifera, which are not to be practised by any other nation, till they be established by a law: and that which is the law of God in this land, that hath so much preserved it, these they are wilfully ignorant of, and say, it is civil; but I say, it is Christian law. And therefore never distinguish in a Christian nation, that the laws are moral and ecclesiastical, with that feigned distinction; but all the laws of this nation are Christian, and stand with evangelical truth, as well as with natural reason, and they are founded upon it; and therefore, Master Hale, we are here now to go on by these laws, which are the laws of God, and we must walk in them, as we would walk to heaven. And for that you speak of now, Mr. Attorney hath answered all the exceptions every one; and I think for that matter of fact, every one of them particularly. Mr. Love did take his exceptions too, and they were over-ruled. Now to come, whether these are lawful witnesses over again, when it is in matter of fact and over-ruled by the judgment of the court, Master Hale will not think that is regular. And then, whether there be two to one point or not, that is another of your exceptions; that, I take it (Master Hale), is not matter of law, but for the judges to consider of it: That which should be matter of law, is this, whether that single proofs, some to one, and some to another, joined all together do issue out all this treason? We want not precedents for that, for this is a heterogeneous treason; every particular that these statutes make a treason, they are all of them complicated, he hath gone through them all in his act, and we must pass through them all in our judgments : though every one is particular treason, had it been singularly laid by itself ; yet now being laid as one concatenated treason, they all of them make but one. For the next, for that of misprision, he is not charged here with misprision at all, but direct treasons; and if it be but misprision, we shall not for misprision judge him a traitor upon this charge. But then, what is in his judgment misprision? If this be nothing but a concealment, I think that the court upon the evidence will judge that it is more than a bare concealment ; and whether Mr. Hale will think, if I be a promoter and concealer from one to another, and have so many continued meetings, whether two or three years together acting with them, and concealing them, for it is not a bare concealment, but a complicated act : for if it were but a bare notion of it, we should have much ado to prove it ; but (I think) the court is satisfied, it is more than notion.

Sir Tho. Witherington. I shall speak a word to that Mr. Hale moved last, whether you will be pleased to hear any more of counsel in these three particulars ; for, under favour, these three particulars concerning the witnesses, concerning their quality and number, and the treason itself, these are matters of another kind of nature than all the rest he insisted upon, for the rest are mere matters of law, upon the formality and insufficiency of the Charge: These questions of the witnesses are questions that are mixed ; for they depend upon the matters in fact, and cannot be otherwise stated. Now Mr. Love, tho' he had no counsel appointed before, yet he had in his Defence all these objections too ; as of the incompetency of them, because they were Participes criminis, and for that I think (under favour of your lordship's judgment) he had a full and clear answer to it : in case of an approver, he is Particeps criminis, and accuseth men that are Particeps criminis ; yet that man, even ex merito justitiæ, he shall be pardoned, saith our law : and therefore that objection that is made against the witnesses, that they are promised rewards and pardon, that is no objection, for in that case the approver shall have his pardon ex merito justitiæ. Then for the other point, that is, whether by two witnesses in such a plot or no, to prove a treasonable act, that is, consisting merely upon the matter of fact ; that I shall not take upon me to repeat, you have heard it ; but this I said then, and this I humbly offer now, that if there be two witnesses, though they concur not in the same individual act, yet if they concur in two acts, concurring to the same treason, they prove the same treason, * if one prove the sending of letters, and another the sending of money, I take it these are two witnesses, though they speak of two distinct acts : but in our proof we have gone on to two witnesses, three or four in most points. But then for the Misprision of Treason, we did apprehend that that which Mr Love himself hath confessed, is treason itself ; but Mr. Love is pleased to make his own collection upon his own confession : " For I confess my presence and silence after these meetings and consultations, but this I take to be Misprision of Treason." To this I replied, we took it to be treason itself ; for our books say, a man must not sleep, nor look back, but go presently to a magistrate to reveal it : but when a man will not only sleep upon it, but keep it back, and act in it, this is more than misprision. But our charge is for treason itself, and truly treason comprehends a misprision of treason in it ; but this point I think neither will come in question now : for we say and charge, that it is a treason itself, not misprision ; and that collection Mr. Love makes, it is his own, but the judgment is yours, whether it be a treason or not.

Mr. Hale. If it be your lordship's pleasure, we are ready to say what we can in the shortness of time ; but if it be not your lordship's pleasure, we shall not say it.

Att. Gen. If your lordship please to declare what he shall speak to.

Mr. Hale. These points, I shall only mention them, I cannot argue them now. This is that I conceive ; first of all, according as the case is stated, that is, Whether a person menaced, that he shall lose his life, if he discover not a particular person, and that he shall have his life, if he do discover him ; whether such a person be a competent witness or no.

Att. Gen. Hear a word ; I appeal then to you, whether any such person were produced before you.

Mr. Hale. First, we only go upon what supposition Mr. Love makes.

Mr. Love. I humbly crave leave to that effect, to prove that particular.

Att. Gen. No, not now, Sir.

Mr. Hale. We conceive such a person is not a competent witness : then that is out of the case, it should, seem, Sir. Truly, then the case that is put concerning an approver, comes not to the question, under favour ; for though it is true, an approver at common law might

* " In the case of Mr. Love, Hale, who was counsel for him, insisted, that two witnesses are necessary upon the trial in case of Treason, upon the foot of the statutes of Edw. 6, not repealed, he saith, in point of testimony by the statute of Philip and Mary ; and one of the counsel on the side of the prosecution, who upon the whole argued with candour, admitted, that the statutes of Edw. 6 are not repealed by that of Philip and Mary, and that two witnesses are still necessary ; but insisted, that one witness to one overt act, and another to another overt act of the same species of treason are two sufficient witnesses within the acts. This gentleman was the first I have met with who considered the point in this light ; in which, as I shall shew presently, it hath been considered ever since the Restoration." Foster ch. 3. s. 8. where is given a history of the opinions and practice upon this point. See, too, East, as cited in the next Note.

be an accuser, yet we are not now upon a proceeding at the common law, when we talk of witnesses now, but we are upon a proceeding how far forth warranted for the witnesses, by the statute of the 1st and 5th of Edw. 6. So that what is said concerning an approver comes not to this question; he that may be a competent witness at common law, he is not a competent witness upon those statutes, for the words of the statute are expressly, "That he shall be a lawful and a sufficient witness." And if so be that such a case were now, it is not to sample this case that is before you with the case of an approver, which is a bare accusation at common law, and where the jury likewise are to have other evidence: For either the defendant may wage his battle, or put himself upon his country; and then it is at the pleasure of the jury, whether they will believe the approver or no. But by the act of the 1st and 5th of Edw. 6, it is expressly said, "There shall be two sufficient witnesses in case of treason:" So that that hath made an alteration of what was in the common law before; one witness was enough before, now two witnesses are requisite: And we conceive, the words "lawful and sufficient" conclude such persons. If there be not any such, we are to say we know, or know not: But if so be any person is drawn to make such a testimony for the preservation of his life, and shall make such an expression, we think, that though it is true he is not a person that is attainted, yet he is a person that is thus drawn; and we think he is not such a witness as is intended, especially in such a case as this is, where the trial of the fact is before your lordship, which is both jury, and judge to try the fact, and determine the law; and therefore perhaps here will be a more rigorous expectation who should be, and who should not be a sufficient witness, than in case it were a bare trial by jury: There may be those exceptions alledged against a witness when the trial is as now it is, that may not be when a trial is by a jury; and therefore if so be that a party be thus drawn to testify for the preservation of his life, we think that this is not such a lawful and sufficient witness as is required in such a case. Next of all it is said in the paper, that they have detected themselves, being parties of as deep a guilt as the person that is accused. I will not dispute that at this time; for it is not the case, whether a person that is a plotter and confederate with one that commits treason, may be a witness; but when a person is detected by lawful authority, before the Charge exhibited, whether such a person who is so detected, whose life is in the hands of the State, be one of these competent witnesses, we must leave it to your judgment in that: But we think he is not a competent witness; for there is not a bare accusation of a person, but (as the case is stated to us) by a person that should be examined, and confess himself guilty of those things whereof Mr. Love is impeached, and that before the Charge is exhibited. My lord, the next matter is concerning the plurality of Witnesses, the number of them; we think, under favour, with submission, that in this case suppose the Charge had been singly upon one act of treason, we conceive, that in that case there is a necessity of two persons to prove that Charge: If the Charge be upon several acts of treason, be the Charge so: yet if you will bring them within any one of the acts, you must have two witnesses to bring them within that act. For suppose a man were indicted of treason heretofore for levying of war, and another treason for adhering to the enemies, and another treason for counterfeiting of the coin, or those kind of things; these are several Treasons, though they are all put into one information, and haply may be put, in case of necessity, into one indictment, as here are several acts put into one Charge. But now a proof of treason within one of the acts by one witness, and a proof of a treason within another of the acts by another witness, will not be esteemed and accounted a proof by two witnesses; for it must be a proof, not that he is within the Charge, but within that part of the Charge upon which he is to be arraigned: And here is not a proving each distinct part of the Charge by two witnesses, as the statute requires. And then to come nearer, suppose the Charge were but upon one act, as that he held correspondence with the Scots, and did invite them, &c. I conceive that in this case, under favour, that that particular act with which you will charge him to be a traitor within any one law, must be proved by two witnesses. The Star-Chamber course, I know what it was, that in case there were one general Charge, and when it did descend to several particulars; one witness would serve for one, and another to another, and a third to a third, and these should make up two witnesses to convict the party: But we are not now in a proceeding of Star-Chamber, that is laid by, it was not altogether so regular in all things: and then we are not in a thing barely criminal, but in a case of life; and not in the case of life ordinarily, but in a case wherein a party is accused of treason, wherein the statute doth provide that there shall be two witnesses (as I conceive) to swear to the same thing, by which you would bring him within it; otherwise they stand as single witnesses, every one apart. I have heard of a case (I have not had so much time as to look into it) concerning Mr. Rolph, indicted at Winchester; I will not so much as repeat over the case upon my credit to the Court; but I take it, it was thus: he was indicted for somewhat about the person of the king; one witness deposed about the presenting of a pistol, or that he said he would; another about poisoning, or that he said he would: these two things did conclude in one and the same act; and though they concluded in one and the same as evidences, complicated evidences to make good one Charge, and either of them had been sufficient, if proved by two; yet as I am informed (this is the inconvenience, upon the sudden we cannot offer it upon the confidence of our own knowledge, which a little time would make us wholly decline the mentioning of it, or affirm it upon our credit; but this I am informed) was not held a case proved by two witnesses: and if that be so, then I conceive these steps; the first will be agreed, that the proof of several charges by several witnesses, against several acts, will not make a proof by two witnesses; it must be a proof by two witnesses against one act. Therefore the proof of any thing against the act of the 17th of July, 1649, and another proof of a thing done against the act of the 30th of January, 1648, and another for a thing done against the act of the 2d of August, 1650; here the offences are several, the treasons several, and the witnesses to either stand singly by themselves. How the case of the fact is upon the proof, I cannot tell; that is, whether this falls out to be the case. But again, if the Charge were single, as now upon the act of the 30th of January, 1649, for proclaiming of the king, or promoting the prince of Wales's interest to be king of England; we think, with submission (which we shall leave to your judgment), that in that case there is a necessity of two witnesses to speak to one thing; and not one to supply one part, and another to supply another: that shall be as much as I shall say concerning that; and I could wish that we had had so much time as to look into it, to enquire what the truth of that case was which was tried at Winchester, as I take it. Now for the other matter, that is, Whether misprision of treason, concealment of treason, be treason? if that be not insisted upon.

Att. Gen. No, no.

Mr. Hale. Under favour, the law is, That concealment of Treason is not treason; but if that be not insisted upon, then the question of the fact is, whether there be any more than a proof of a concealment, or of a misprision of treason? Which if so be it be not, I can say no more.

Att. Gen. Truly, my lord, I did intend to speak to that of Mr. Love's case, and as of his making, but not now of his making, but as he hath made it formerly; surely, it is a great deal of patience and favour you have afforded him, that for matter of fact and law you have heard it all over again. As for that first, of the competency of the testimony, I shall remember his own division; first, of the Charge; secondly, of the Witnesses and the Testimony; the third, concerning himself; and the fourth, his humble Proposals to the Court. One part of his Defence was concerning the witnesses and testimony, that he made a long defence to; and if it be not good evidence, that parties that are of the same rubberies may not accuse their fellow-thieves, I think some must be unchanged that have been hanged: but that I shall not speak to, for I think not that Mr. Hale's judgment leads him to it; but if they were threatened, and should be made afraid of their lives, that were somewhat, but that is not the case here. The next is for two witnesses: I might say, that by the common law of England one witness was enough before the law of 5 E. 6 was made; for else it was not needful to be made.* And Mr. Hale knows again, that as to trial, those laws are repealed. But not to trouble you with these things, or to say wherein they must concur, I did crave the favour of you to read the witnesses as they deposed, and I did tell you when it was by hear-say, and when upon knowledge, and when by two, three, and four, to several acts of Mr. Love's own acting, two, three, four witnesses, I think they are number enough to accuse, and detect a person of as high quality. And for the last, for misprision of treason, Mr. Love hath said that which never came into my thoughts, that such actings done by Mr. Love could be judged misprision; he that acted with them, consulted, and debated, and plotted, gave his judgment one way, moved to raise money, received intelligence, all brought to his house, and transacted there: I would appeal to Mr. Hale's judgment, whether this could be misprision of treason, when a party acts in it, hath the meetings at his own house, and hath there debates of Commissions, and Instructions, and Letters; I think this goes as far beyond misprision, as treason is beyond misprision. But seeing these are new cases before you, you have spent enough of your time, I shall not spend more to argue the cases that are not.

Love. I humbly crave leave, that seeing my counsel some of them are rejected by the court, as not fit to plead before you; and seeing another of them, Mr. Maynard, the necessity of his affairs is such, he could not be here this day to plead here; and seeing this worthy gentleman came here unprepared, whose face I never saw till this morning; therefore I humbly pray there may be more time and counsel assigned me, with your favour and leave, that they may fully debate the argument before you, those matters of the law which are under his hand, and the hands of the two worthy gentlemen rejected by you to plead here, that others may be added to Mr. Hale to plead the matters of law before you, and that I may have a copy of the Charge.

Att. Gen. I hope we have had delays enough; it is with the court, now we have done.

Love. And, Sir, there are witnesses here present that will prove that which Mr. Attorney-General thought none could prove, to wit, not only general threats, if they would not confess in the general, but promises of favour, and threatening of death if they would not testify against me in particular: and I have manifold exceptions touching the incompetency not only of number, but quality. One witness said, he could not in conscience, and did not swear till he was threatened, nay, fined by you, and drawn out of the court: another witness had money laid to him by Cobbet, which was given to his wife, which did seem to conceal the bribery the more; but he confessed himself, that the money was laid down in his house; and given him to make use of, and to be the price of my blood (Sir) to testify against me. I have witnesses to produce, major Adams said, he should be hanged, if he did not testify against me; for he had given information, and had been in hire for many months together. Major Cobbet and three other messengers have come to him, and offered him preferment, for four months together, if he would reveal what he calls a design against the commonwealth; and he hath not revealed this, till he had these promises of preferment, and did not declare against me till he was threatened by death if he did not do it: therefore I beseech you, hear what witnesses I can bring in, to invalidate the testimonies of these men.

Att. Gen. My lord, it seems I must be for all. Now Mr. Love begins with the court, that you threatened them, and punished them: I appeal to all here, whether a witness brought into a court in matter of property, and refuse to take his oath, whether that court be not bound in justice to punish him; and yet if he shall see his error, and submit himself to do that which to justice belongs, then (I think) it is justice and mercy in you to remit him of both: and that is the case of this gentleman; in conscience he could not swear against him, a conscience well-wrought upon; he could not in conscience swear against him: for him it was done in the court, and by the court, and (I think) undeniably justified.

Love. He is not under an oath to this day, he hath declared it himself.

Att. Gen. This is to satisfy other men, but it is not so regular and orderly to be done: but my lord and the court are pleased to give you a fair hearing and proceedings, that no exceptions may be taken to it. There was another that was as good as his word, that he could not find in his conscience to swear against Mr. Love, and that was a minister; that conscience deserved to be rectified more than 500*l.* come to, and perpetual imprisonment: that man that cannot find in his conscience to judge him that was a godly person (as he thought), and against him he must not give witness, not for treason, not to save a commonwealth; and he hath had your sentence, and most justly: I think all that was, was too little, my lord. Then for the rest, this is a discourse to satisfy people, the spectators here; for surely these are extravagancies, and total irregularities; he hath had his time to except, and heard to except, and said all that he hath said now; and so there is nothing more to be done, but now for us to rest in your judgments what you will do further.

Love. I beseech you, I acquainted your lordship and the court, that some of the witnesses were not well, others I could not get them here present, but did make offer to bring witnesses to prove against major Adams, that he hath confessed himself he was threatened with death if he did not inform against me; and he said these words, he could not tell whether he should in conscience think rather better to be hanged, than to come in against me; and he could swear only generals; and could not swear that ever I did write or receive letters. And Mr. Jaquel himself, since he was sent away from the court, hath said he was not under an oath.

Att. Gen. What course shall we hold? If you will not be regular, let the court be regular: had you not time for to do it then? Did he not demand indemnity for them? And rather than he would produce others to hurt themselves, he would rather die himself first.

Love. But these are not under a crime; I beseech you, the court would be tender in matters of blood.

Att. Gen. Be tender of justice.

Lord President. I would you had been so too.

Love. This man declares himself he is not under an oath to this day; he did but put his hand upon his buttons.

Lord President. Those were your very words, and very uncivil and indiscreet; you have not spoke at any time yet, but you have hurt yourself more than any body else hath; and yet your language is so liberal, that no man shall escape the lash of your tongue.

Love. I fear no man, my Lord.

Att. Gen. That is a bold word.

Lord President. You have as ill comments as any man that wears a cap; your guiltiness appears in this you say; we have heard all this that you require before: those very words that you say of this man now particularly, go to them first, that he was saying, he was not under an oath: it was said so again and again, and again at that time we brought him, and before he was examined, holding up his hand, we asked him it, and he said, he did; and put it to him again and again, Are you under an oath? till at last he did conclude and testify he was under an oath. I testify this before all the company here, this is noised abroad again by many people, the care we had of that very man you speak of; you asked him three or four times then, and at the last, upon the conclusion, he confessed himself he was under an oath: he did not do as you do; you will say things are truth, but you will not speak those truths before God in a testimonial way; though some of your witnesses that proved it, said it was true in the presence of God, what they gave under their hands: these men that do thus, are no better than Jesuits in reality, though not in name. You made a confession of misprision of treason, you said, but you have confessed treason. I will tell you who did the like in the very words almost that you did, and that was father Garnet; when he came to see the evidence produced so full against him by those that were participes criminis, as you are, himself confessed when he came to the last. Had I thought, said he, that the State had had such clear proof against me, I would have ingenuously confessed it, and not trifled with them as I have done. So you said, you did not think it would have been proved so far as misprision: but when it was proved sufficiently in your apprehension, and convicted, and your counsel had informed you it could not be less than misprision, then you would ingenuously confess; so did Garnet. The other witness that was threatened, it was testified by a worthy captain; I speak it again, was it not debated as much as the wit of man could. Did you not object that then, that you do now? And did not the court then satisfy you, or at least satisfy themselves that it was not so? For I tell you, in that very thing wherein you say he was threatened, it was told you, That the captain that was here then, deposed what he had done, and how he had done it, and at what time it was delivered; for you were discovered long before that, and your examinations taken long before that. Upon this, now when your treason was discovered and declared by several witnesses, and that such a one was in confederacy; and I think the State might safely promise him life, and reward too; for there is more in the plot yet, than is yet found out, and that some are like to hear of within this fortnight, that were here, which is a dangerous thing; but this you did declare, and the court was satisfied, that all that was promised as a reward, was for discovering of a Plot against the State; and that was lawful by the laws of God and man. And now you bring witness; you were at first demanded, whether you would bring them or no? and you asked indemnity for them; and the next time you denied, you would bring none; and now you asked, What you have to offer to the court? and after all this time, what come you to do now? To prove that that was acted here in this court; you say we threatened them; true, that we did threaten some; and I think we went thus far, that if he would not, we would set 500*l.* fine upon his head; but he would none of that, but came in again, and delivered his knowledge. But you had another of your own robe too that came in, and he would not testify; and why? His conscience was tender; his science was perfect enough to speak against you, for he was confederate with you, and hath confessed enough of it; but his conscience was tender. No man can tell here whose conscience is crazy and tender: conscience is a thing betwixt God and man only; and they that lay nothing upon their consciences to prove their integrity, they had as good say nothing before a judge. For though we have a law of conscience in England, yet that law is judged by rules; and therefore he, whoever he be, that pretends conscience, there are so many consciences as there are men; and no men have power to judge of it, but God. But, Sir, for that cause that he would not for his tender conscience we did set a fine of 500*l.* upon him, and sentenced him to the Fleet till he paid it. We call not this terrifying, neither doth the law; nor any reward, favour, or affection for the discovery of a traitor, is no illegal act; this we told you before, but you must have it again, and again, and again; so that you may delay, no time shall be omitted by you.

Love. I have but a few words more: your lordship was pleased to say, that you could justify promising rewards to those that would discover, and threatening punishments to those that would not; but you said, if I could prove promising of rewards or threatenings to them that would not testify against me, they should be heard: now I produce not witnesses in general, that they were promised favour, or threatened if they would or would not; but I offer to produce witnesses that can witness against some of the particular witnesses that said, they should be hanged, if they did not witness against me: and this, as your lordship promised, I humbly crave.

Att. Gen. Truly, he will not want suggestions, he hath had his time to prove it; and one favour I shall beg of the court, that this your patience to Mr. Love, your just favour toward him, may be no precedent hereafter; but for this, when we closed the evidence Saturday was se'nnight for the Commonwealth, he had till Wednesday following to make his defence. For his witnesses he offered them, you offered to receive them; he said, he would have none; now he comes to offer: we produce you no new witnesses, nor offered nothing since Saturday was se'nnight; if we come to witnesses again, we shall come to an aspersing one another; we shall make it a pretty endless work: we have done our parts, and followed the rules of justice; and Mr. Love hath had his full liberty to justify, to say what he could, and prove what he could for himself; if he neglect his own time, to his own peril be it; the court, I hope, will not be guilty of it, to alter the ways of justice.

Love. I could not compel witnesses, there was no subpoenas; but they must come when they offer themselves.

Lord President. You were asked, and you would produce none.

Love. They were not in a capacity to come, my lord.

Att. Gen. There is nothing resting more to be done, but now all being done (if you please, my lord, all being done) for the issue of the fact, all his Exceptions to the Impeachments, which are matters of law, we are now humbly craving your Judgment upon this Impeachment between the Keepers of the Liberty of England, and master Love the prisoner at the bar. I now humbly demand your Judgment.

Love. I humbly pray, that since I never saw the face of this worthy gentleman till this morning, and so could have no particular advice from him, that there might be longer time allowed to this gentleman, and an addition of three gentlemen more, and a copy of the Charge.

Att. Gen. You have had more than ordinary prisoners have had before, I will assure you, Mr. Love.

Lord President. Mr. Hale, you have heard a little opened of our passages and proceedings, which you did not before, but every man else hath lift up his voice; you have gone over a great deal of the fact: now for matter of law, for that of misprision, that will rest, I think, in the judgment of the court; there is no misprision laid, but treason: and I think the court will find treason upon the proofs that are before them; they will not need to have any argument of misprision, if the court think there is sufficient treason laid; then that argument, we need not desire more time for that; and if it be misprision, that the court shall judge it so, then upon the matter there is no Charge against him for us to proceed upon; so that by that Charge, I cannot see what you can ground your argument upon.

Mr. Hale. The Charge is not only for treason, but for treason and other high crimes and misdemeanors.

Att. Gen. But not Misprision.

Mr. Hale. Though the word be not in, we think it will reach it.

Lord President. It will not indeed.

Att. Gen. We insist upon it for the commonwealth, for the Charge is as it is laid.

Lord President. For the two next, so I told Mr. Love before, and he spent two hours at the least in recapitulating the evidence of the state, not any thing of his own, for he gave no witnesses; but he did go over the whole evidence of the state from point to point, and made, I think, himself (as he said) the exceptions that were made against them: these he went over, though we might have shut him up at the first. For him to sum up that which was the duty of the court, when he had no evidence, to sum up the evidence of the state, which we might not have let him: but this he did; and it is our part to examine the evidences, and the nature of them, and what the nature of the thing is, and how many witnesses are to every point; whether there be two witnesses to a point or no, cannot fall under dispute of law, it is matter of fact.

Mr. Hale. It is true, we are here only to do that duty which your lordship enjoins us to, my lord. It is true, for us to dispute whether this evidence proveth such a thing or no; haply it may not belong to us to do that. But thus far, if your lordship think fit, this may haply be allowable (with submission to the court), that is, whether, if the proofs be admitted, this man positively proves thus, the other man proves positively thus; whether that these two proofs do make a proof of one act? Haply, if your lordship shall think so fit, there may be somewhat of law in that; that is, whether it make a double testimony within the statute of 1 and 5. For, with submission to your lordship, the statute of 1 and 5 is not repealed as to point of testimony; it is repealed as to the place from whence the trial is to come, but not in point of witnesses; therein it may come in, questionless, if your lordship shall think fit. But truly, I have not seen one word of the evidence from the beginning to the end: and if so be that any matter should rise, that the court should think fit as well as proper for me to offer in the defence of this gentleman, I must profess I cannot, unless I had seen the things; for I have not seen one word.

Lord President. For seeing the evidence further than memory, you, nor no man else ought to know, though we have given you leave to write; and therefore though we have given leave to take notice of them, yet that is more than ever any court did, or we need to have done, but only to trust to their own memories. But in that you speak of now, for you to have day to argue, when you are not able to say, nor we neither, that there is any such thing: did you ever hear such a thing, to pray day to argue, that you do not know positively it is so?

Att. Gen. We have spent a great deal of time, and all that can be said, will be to run a round; what is to be done, is your own consultation among yourselves.

Lord President. Withdraw your prisoner.

Love. I beseech you, allow me time for counsel.—(The Court adjourns.)

The Sixth Day's Proceedings, July 5, 1651.

There was but little said this day besides the Sentence. When Mr. Love appeared at the bar, the Attorney-General spake to the Court to this purpose: That there had been much time spent, and Mr. Love had had a fair Trial, and therefore he desired the court to proceed to Sentence. Upon which the Lord President spake to Mr. Love to this effect: That he had heard what the Attorney-General desired in the behalf of the commonwealth; and therefore demanded of Mr. Love what he had to say why Sentence should not be passed upon him? Mr. Love answered, that he had somewhat to say, and desired longer time, and more counsel to argue those matters of law contained in that Paper that he had formerly given in to the court: But the court would not yield to him in it. Then Mr. Love would have spoken further, but the Lord President told him, he would speak ad populum. Mr. Love answered, no, he would speak ad magistratum. But the court presently over-ruled him in it, and would not suffer him to speak. Then the Lord President told Mr. Love, that he had gone out of his place and calling in what he had done. Then speaking something about an elder, that an elder was one that was so, either in respect of his age, or in respect of his office, with some other things about Presbytery; and when he had done, he commanded the Clerk to read the sentence, which was in this manner: The Clerk read over the whole Charge, beginning thus: "Whereas Christopher Love, the prisoner at the bar, stands charged on the behalf of the keepers of the liberties of England, &c. of High Treason, and other High Crimes and Offences, &c." [and so he read on as it is in the Charge; and ending thus] "For all which treasons and traitorous and wicked practices of him the said Christopher Love, this Court doth adjudge him to suffer the pains of death, by having his head severed from his body."

Love. My lord, I would speak a word.

Lord President. You cannot be heard now, Mr. Love.

Love. But a word, my lord, and it is this, in the words of the Apostle: "I have received the Sentence of death in myself, that should not trust in myself, but in God, which raiseth the dead." And, my lord, though you have condemned me, yet this I can say, that neither God nor my own conscience doth condemn me.

Mr. Love withdraws, and the Lieutenant of the Tower takes him into custody.

Mr. Love's Execution.

Mr. Love was ordered for execution the 15th of July*, but by the favour of the Parliament it was respited till the 15th of August, and from thence to the 22d, during which time, (it is said) such application was made to Cromwell, that he granted him a Pardon†, but the express who brought it from Cromwell, then in the North, fell into the hands of some Cavaliers, before he arrived at London: and they, considering that Mr. Love had been a great incendiary, and had pursued the king's friends with great violence, detained the express, till the execution was over, which was on the said 22d of August.

Mr. Love was then brought from the Tower by the sheriffs of London to the scaffold on Tower-hill, about 2 o'clock in the afternoon:

* "July 15. Mr. Love petitioned the Parliament, and divers other Petitions were presented on his behalf for pardon of his life; but after much debate upon the question, it passed in the negative. On the day appointed for his Execution, a Petition was presented by divers ministers in and about London, to the Parliament, "earnestly and in the bowels of Jesus Christ, who when we were sinners died for us, if not totally to spare the life of our dear brother, that yet you would say of him, as Solomon of Abiathar, That at this time he should not be put to death." Upon this Petition the Parliament respited the Execution of Mr. Love for a month." Whitelocke.

† In Nichols's "Original Letters and Papers of State addressed to Oliver Cromwell," published at the end of the 7th vol. of Thurloe's State Papers, there are in pp. 66, 75, 84, two Letters from Geo. Bishoppe, and one from sir Harry Vane to Cromwell, very bitter against Love and his associates. "To what end," asks Bishoppe, "serves all the providence of God in the field and at home, the blood costs and miseries of war, and the finger of God in bringing these designs to light, if so be such a malefactor as Mr. Love escape?"

The ministers that accompanied him were Mr. Ash, Mr. Calamy, and Mr. Manton. When he was upon the Scaffold, sheriff Tichburn shewed him the Warrant for his suffering, telling him, that he took no pleasure in this work, but it was a duty laid upon him.

Love. I believe it, Sir.

Sheriff Tichburn. I have done my duty for you.

Love. The Lord bless you!

Lieut. of the Tower. The Lord strengthen you in this hour of your temptation!

Love. Sir, I bless God my heart is in Heaven, I am well. Then turning to the sheriff Tichburn, said, May I have the liberty to speak and pray?

Sheriff Tichburn. Yes: But I desire you to consider, we have the other [meaning Mr. Gibbons] to execute afterwards, and 6 o'clock is our hour; but we will give you as much time as we can.

Love. I shall be the briefer. Then he put off his hat two several times to the people, and spake as followeth;

"Beloved Christians,

"I am made this day a spectacle unto God, angels, and men: And among men, I am made a grief to the godly, a laughing-stock to the wicked, and a gazing-stock to all; yet blessed be God, not a terror to myself. Although there be but little between me and death; yet this bears up my heart, there is but little between me and Heaven. It comforted Dr. Taylor the martyr, when he was going to execution, that there were but two styles between him and his father's house: there is a lesser way between me and my father's house; but two steps between me and glory; it is but lying down upon the block, I shall ascend upon a throne. I am this day sailing towards the ocean of eternity, through a rough passage to my haven of rest; through a Red Sea to the promised land. Methinks I hear God say to me as he did to Moses, 'Go up to Mount Nebo and die there;' So to me, 'Go up to Tower-hill, and die there.' Isaac said of himself, that he was old, and yet he knew not the day of his death; but I cannot say so, I am young, and yet I know the day of my death, and I know the kind of my death, and the place of my death also. I am put to such a kind of death as two famous preachers of the gospel were put to before me, John the Baptist, and Paul the apostle, they were both beheaded; you have mention of the one in Scripture story, and of the other in ecclesiastical history. And I read in Rev. xx. 4. 'The Saints were beheaded for the word of God, and for the testimony of Jesus.' But herein is the disadvantage which I lie under in the thoughts of many; they judge that I suffer not for the word of God, or for conscience, but for meddling with State matters. To this I shall briefly say, That it is an old guise of the devil, to impute the cause of God's people's sufferings, to be contrivements against the state, when in truth it is their religion and conscience they are persecuted for: The rulers of Israel would have put Jeremy to death upon a civil account, though indeed it was only the truth of his prophecy that made the rulers angry with him; and yet upon a civil account they pretend he must die, because he fell away to the Chaldeans, and would have brought in foreign forces to invade them. The same thing is laid to my charge, of which I am as innocent as Jeremy was. Yea, I find other instances in Scripture, wherein the cause of the Saints' sufferings were still imputed to their meddling with state matters. Paul, though he did but preach Jesus Christ, yet he must die, if the people might have their will, under pretence that he was a mover of sedition. Upon a civil account my life is pretended to be taken away, whereas indeed it is because I pursue my Covenant, and will not prostitute my principles and conscience to the ambition and lusts of men. Beloved, I am this day making a double exchange, I am changing a pulpit for a scaffold, and a scaffold for a throne; and I might add a third, I am changing this numerous multitude, the presence of this numerous multitude on Tower-hill, for the innumerable company of Saints and angels in heaven, the Holy Hill of Sion; and I am changing a guard of soldiers for a guard of angels, which will receive me, and carry me into Abraham's bosom. This scaffold is the best pulpit that ever I preached in; in my church-pulpit, God through his grace made me an instrument to bring others to heaven; but in this pulpit he will bring me to heaven. These are the last words that I shall speak in this world, and it may be I shall bring more glory to God by this one speech on a scaffold, than I have done by many sermons in a pulpit.

"Before I lay down my neck upon the block, I shall lay open my cause unto the people that hear me this day, that I might not die under all that obloquy and reproach that is cast upon me; and in doing it, I shall avoid all rancour, all bitterness of spirit, animosity and revenge; God is my record, whom I serve in the spirit; I speak the truth, and lye not; I do not bring a revengeful heart unto the scaffold. This day, before I came here, upon my bended knees I have begged mercy for them that denied mercy to me, and I have prayed God to forgive them who would not forgive me; I have forgiven from my heart the worst enemy I have in all the world; and this is the worst that I wish to my accusers and prosecutors, who have pursued my blood, that I might meet their souls in heaven.

"I shall divide my Speech into three Parts: I shall speak something concerning my Charge, and a word concerning my Accusers and touching my Judges, without any animosity at all; and then something concerning myself, for my own vindication, and then a word of exhortation, and so I shall commit my soul to God.

"Concerning my Charge, it is black and hideous, many things falsely suggested, hardly a line of it true, and nothing capital sufficiently proved against me by any one act that I am conscious to myself I did. The Charge is high and full, but the proof empty and low; though there were eight witnesses that came in against me, yet none of them did prove that ever I writ any letter, or directed any man to write a letter into Scotland, or into foreign parts; no man did prove that I sent away any letter, that I received any letter, that I collected or gave, or lent any money to assist or promote the Scottish war: This is all that is sworn against me, that I was present where letters were read, and that I made a motion for money to give to Massey; so that (beloved) my presence at, and concealment of letters that were received and sent from foreign parts, is that for which I must die.

"As concerning my Accusers, I shall not say much; I do forgive them with all my heart, and I pray God forgive them also. Yet what the Evangelist said concerning Christ's accusers, I may (without vanity or falsehood) say of mine, That they did not agree amongst themselves: one witness swears one thing, and another the quite contrary; yea, not only did they contradict one another, but sometimes a single witness contradicted himself. And though their testimony did condemn my person, yet I have condemned their testimony. And truly there are many remarkable circumstances that I might take notice of, either in, or before, or since the trial, that might be worthy observation; but I will not insist upon it, only in the general (for I shall name none of my accusers) some of them have sent to me, to pray me to forgive them the wrong they have done me: And one of them hath written to me under his own hand, to pray me to forgive him the wrong that he hath done me: and told me withal, that that day I should die a violent death, his life would be no comfort to him, because he was an instrument in taking away of mine. Others of the witnesses were some terrified before they would testify; some were hired, some fined before they would bear witness against me. But I will be off of this. As concerning my judges, I will not judge them, and yet I will not justify them: I will say but this of them, I believe that what moved Herod to cut off John Baptist's head, that moved them to cut off mine; and that was for his oath's sake: Herod, to avoid perjury, would commit murder; whereas if John's head had been upon his shoulders, he would have been guilty of neither.

"I have something in the second place to speak concerning myself, and then I shall come briefly to a conclusion. Concerning myself, I have gone through various reports; there are many sons of slander, whose mouths are as open sepulchres, in which they would bury my name, before my friends can bury my body; but my comfort is, there will be a resurrection of names as well as bodies at the last day; God will not only wipe off all tears from my eyes this day, but he will also wipe off all blots and reproaches from my name before many days be over; and though my body will soon rot under ground, yet my hope is my name will not rot above it. I am not ignorant what calumnies are cast upon me, and more likely to be after I am dead and gone. The very night before my intended execution, the last month, there was an insulting letter written to me, to tell me, that after my death there should be something published against me to my shame. I hope you will have so much charity as not to believe reproaches cast upon a dead man, who will be silent in the grave, and not able to speak a word in his own justification. I am aspersed both as to my practice, and as to my principles. I shall begin with the first. There are five aspersions, as to my practice, that are laid upon me, That I am a liar, an extortioner, an adulterer, a murderer, and a turbulent person: crimes scandalous in any man, but much more abominable in a minister. Now I hope you will believe a dying man, who dares not look God in the face with a lye in his mouth; I am accused of lying, that what I denied before the High Court of Justice, that that afterwards I should confess, or else was proved against me. Now, in the presence of God I tell you, as I would confess nothing that was criminal, so I did deny nothing that was true; and that I may seal it to you with my blood, the same protestations I made before the High Court, I shall make briefly now. 1. That I never writ letter to the king, queen, church or state of Scotland, or to any particular person of the Scottish nation, since the wars began, to this day. 2. That I never received any letter writ to me, either from the king, or from the queen, or from the church or state of Scotland, or from any particular person of the Scottish nation, since the wars began, to this day. 3. That I never collected, gave or lent one penny of money, either to the king, queen, church, or state of Scotland, or to any particular person to send into Scotland, to any person of the Scottish nation, to this day. It is true, I did confess, though it was not proved (and haply upon that ground the mistake might arise), I did give money to Massey, and I did also write a letter to him; but he is of the English, not of the Scottish nation. That for which I come here, is only for moving for money for him, and that not upon a military account, but merely to relieve his personal necessities, and for being present where letters were read from him and others. And although man hath condemned me, yet I am so far from thinking that either God or my own conscience condemns me, as sinning in what I am condemned for, that both God and my own conscience doth acquit me. And what I said at the bar, when I received my Sentence, that I shall say upon the scaffold, That for those things for which I am condemned, neither God nor my own conscience condemns me.

"Again, I am accused to be an extortioner; and this is in the mouths—I am loth to name them, because I would avoid all rancour: But I am charged as if I should be a grievous extortioner, to receive 30*l.* for the loan of 300*l.* besides 8*l.* per cent. for interest, which in the presence of God, and of you all, I do declare to you, is a most notorious and abominable falsehood.

"I am accused likewise to be an adulterer, and this report is not in the mouths of mean men, but in the mouths of those that sit at the stern: As if I were a debauched person and were guilty of uncleanness. Now I tell you, as Luther said of himself in another case, that he was not tempted to covetousness; so through the grace of God I can say, I have not been tempted in all my life to uncleanness. It doth not much grieve me, though these slanders be cast upon me: I know my betters have been worse accused before me: Athanasius was accused by two harlots, that he had committed folly with them; and yet the man was chaste and innocent. Beza was charged not only with drunkenness, but with lasciviousness also; and many others have been accused with the same, if not with worse slanders than I have been.

"But (that which goeth nearest my heart) I am accused to be a murderer also; and this is a charge high indeed; I am charged with the guilt of all the blood of Scotland; whereas, did I lie under the guilt of one drop of blood, I could not look upon God with so cheerful a countenance, and I could not be filled with so peaceable a heart and conscience as I have at this day. I bless my God, I am free from the blood of all men: Those who lay this to my charge, they do to me as Nero did to the Christians; He set Rome on fire, and then charged the Christians with it: So they put England and Scotland into a flame, and yet charge me with the guilt of that blood, who have poured forth tears to God night and day, to quench the burning which these men's ambitions and lusts have kindled: And I would fain know of any man what act is it that I have done? Or what is it that was proved in the High Court against me, that makes me guilty of Scotland's blood? Did I ever invite the Scots to invade England? What man doth lay that to my charge? Did I ever encourage the English army to invade Scotland? What action is it that I have done that makes me guilty of that blood; Indeed this I have done, and this I have, and this I do stand to; I have, as a private man, prayed unto God many a day, and kept many a fast, wherein I have sought God that there might be an agreement between the king and the Scots, upon the interest of religion and terms of the Covenant: Now, by what consequence can this be strained, to charge me with Scotland's blood? For my part, I was but only at one meeting where the question was proposed (fasts only excepted), what should be thought fit to be done to promote the agreement between the king and the Scots? and that was moved in my house: And to that end, when there were some things there proposed which they called a Commission or Instructions to send to Holland; as soon as ever I heard them, I did declare against them. I did declare that it was an act of high presumption for private persons to commissionate; an act of notorious falsehood, to say it was in the name of the Presbyterian party, when none knew of it (that I know of) but only those few then present. Now this is only a political engine to make the Presbyterian party odious, who are the best friends to a well-ordered government, of any sort of people in the world.

"I am accused likewise to be a man of a turbulent spirit, to be an enemy to the peace and quiet of the nation. Now, as to this, let my congregation and my domestical relations judge for me, whether I am not a man that would fain have lived quiet in the land: I am, as Jeremy was, 'born a man of contention;' not actively; I contend, I strive with none: But passively, many strive and contend with me. God is my witness, my judgment hath put me upon endeavouring after all honourable and just ways for peace and love among the godly. The grief of my heart hath been for the divisions, and the desire of my soul for an union among God's people. But when I speak of an union, I would not be misunderstood, I do not mean a state union, to engage to the present power, that is against my principles; that is to say, "A Confederacy with them that say, A Confederacy:" That is rather a combination, than a gospel union: O join not with them, lest ye be consumed in their sins; they who get power into their hands by policy, and use it with cruelty, will lose it with ignominy. It was said of pope Boniface, He did enter into the popedom like a fox, reigned like a lion, but died like a dog. Beloved, the union for which I plead, is a church union; to wit, love among the godly; for this the desires of my soul have ever been, that those that fear God might walk hand in hand in the fellowship of the gospel, both in truth and love: If this union be not, I am afraid, through our divisions, a company of loose libertines will arise, who will endeavour not only to overthrow the doctrine of faith, and the power of Godliness, but even good manners also. I remember an observation of holy Greenham's: giving his judgment upon the state of England, saith he, 'There is great fear that popery is coming into England, and I fear it too: But,' says he, 'I fear more the coming in of atheism into England, than the coming in of popery;' and truly, that is my fear also. Thus as to my practice: A word now as to my principles.

"I am accused to be an apostate, to be a turncoat, to be this to be that to be any thing but what I am: In the general, I will tell you, I bless my God, a High-Court, a longsword, a bloody scaffold, have not made me in the least to alter my principles, or to wrong my conscience: And that I might discover to you my principles, I hope I shall do it with freedom; I will irritate and provoke none: what I shall say, shall not be an irritation or provocation of others, at least not intended by me; but only as a genuine and clear manifestation of my own principles how they stand.

"First then, my principles, as to civil and religious affairs, I do declare that I die with my judgment set against malignity, I do hate both name and thing; I still retain as vehement a detestation of a malignant interest as ever I did; yet I would not be misunderstood: I do not understand, nor count the godly party, our covenanting brethren in Scotland, to be a malignant party; nor the Scots defending their nation and title of their king to be a malignant interest, but an honest and justifiable cause.

"Secondly, Though I am against malignity yet I am not against, but for a regulated monarchy; a mixt monarchy, such as ours is, I judge to be the best government in the world: I did, it is true, in my place and calling, oppose the forces of the late king, but I was never against the office; I am not only against court-parasites, who would screw up monarchy into tyranny, but against those who pull down monarchy to bring in anarchy.

"Thirdly, I was never for putting the king to death, whose person I did promise in my covenant to preserve: it is true, I did in my place and calling oppose his forces, but I did never endeavour to destroy his person. There is a scandal raised of me that in a sermon at Windsor I should have these words, that "It would never be well with England, till the king were let blood in the neck vein:" which speech I utterly detest, professing, as a dying man, in the presence of God and of you all, I never spake such words as relating to him: though my judgment was for bringing malignants, who did seduce him and draw him from his parliament, to condign punishment; yet I deemed it an ill way to cure the body-politick, by cutting off the political head.

"Fourthly, I die with my judgment absolutely set against the Engagement; I pray God forgive them that impose and subscribe it, and preserve those that refuse it.

"Fifthly, I would not in the next place be looked upon, now I am a dying man as a man, owning this present government; I die with my judgment against it: It is true, in a case of life I did petition the present power, and did give them the titles they take to themselves, and that others give them; but herein I did not wrong nor thwart my principles; there are many instances in Scripture to justify this; Hushai did give the title of king to Absalom, though Absalom had no right to that title; for David was the lawful king: And David himself gave him that title as well as Hushai. And Calvin he gave the title to the French king, calling him "the most Christian king," yet we know he was a papist: And we gave a title to king Henry VIII, and call him "the Defender of the Faith," and yet he had no right to that title; for he was an opposer, not a defender of the faith; that title was given him upon an evil ground, because he opposed the faith; he opposed the doctrine of Luther, therefore the pope gave him that title, "the defender of the faith;" and yet none did scruple to give him that title that was then commonly given him.

"Sixthly, In the next place (I discover my judgment, I provoke none, only tell you what my own thoughts are, that so after I am dead and gone, I might not be belied, for I dare not now belie my principles), my judgment is against the invasion of the Scottish nation by the English army. They who gave us a friendly assistance, who are joined with us in the same Covenant, who drew a sword with us in the same quarrel, should I live a thousand years, I should never draw a sword against them; but the English army have forgot the brotherly Covenant: So that Scotland may say as Edom, "The men of my confederacy, who were at peace with me, have risen up and prevailed against me." Because Scotland will not be a commonwealth, they shall not be a people; because they will not break Covenant, some men would have them broken: because they will not lay their consciences waste, their land must be laid waste.

"Lastly, And so I have done, (only with a word of exhortation) I die cleaving to all those oaths, vows, covenants, and protestations that were imposed by the two houses of parliament, as owning them, and dying with my judgment for them; to the protestation, the vow and covenant, the solemn league and covenant. And this I tell you all, I had rather die a covenant-keeper, than live a covenant-breaker.

"I am now come to the third and last part of my Speech, and so I shall have done, and commit my soul to God who gave it. My Exhortation first shall be to this great city, unto the godly ministry of it; and unto my own congregation, from whom death parts me, which nothing else could.

"To the City I wish an affluence and confluence of all blessings upon it; and yet I fear grey hairs, as the sad symptoms of a declension, are here and there upon London, and yet she knows it not. O London, London, God is staining the pride of all thy glory. Thy glory is flying away like a bird; contempt of the ministry, opposition against the reformation, general apostacy, covenant-breaking have brought London low, and I fear will yet bring it lower; I tremble to think what evils are coming upon it; This city, it is the receptacle of all errors; that as your commodities are vented and spread from hence into every corner of the land, so have heresies and blasphemies had their first rise from this great and populous city, and from hence are spread into all countries.

"To the Inhabitants of this City I commend but these few particulars: First, let me beg you to love your painful and your godly ministers: If they be taken away, you are like to have worse come in their rooms. I know the Presbyterian ministers are the great eye-sore, who have formerly been counted the chariots and horsemen of Israel: But I will say of London (as was said of Leyden, 'That after Junius, an Orthodox minister, was taken away, Arminius, that pestilent Heretick, came in his room), If your godly ministers (and there have been ten already at one blow taken from you), if they be taken away, Arminians, Anabaptists, nay Jesuits, are likely to supply their rooms, if God in mercy prevent not. 2. Submit yourselves to church-government; that would lay a curb and restraint upon your lusts: It is a golden and easy yoke, to which if you do not submit, God may lay a heavy and an iron yoke upon your necks. 3. Take heed of those doctrines that come under the notion of New Light: Those doctrines you ought to suspect, whether true, which the broachers of them say are new; for truth is as old as the bible: A remarkable passage I would suggest unto you, in Deut. xxxii. ver. 17. It is said there, 'They chose them new Gods that were newly come up;' and what were these new Gods? The next words tell you, they were old Devils; 'for they sacrificed to Devils and not to God.' Now their sacrificing to old Devils is called a 'sacrificing' (to deceive the people) 'to new Gods, that were newly come up;' yet their new Gods were but old Devils. Why, so I say, though many things go under the notion of New Light, yet they are but old Darkness, old heresies raked out of the dunghill, and which were buried in former ages of the church, with contempt and reproach, many hundred years ago. 4. Bewail your great loss which you have, in taking away so many ministers out of your city: there are ten ministers (if I mistake not) that have been taken away and removed at one blow, who were burning and shining lights in their several candlesticks, and bright stars in their several orbs; though I am not worthy of the world, and therefore am taken out of it; yet as for my suffering brethren, who are now in bonds and banishment, the world is not worthy of them. 5. Again, in the next place, take heed of engaging in a war against your brethren of the Scottish nation: For my part, I have opposed the tyranny of a king, but I never opposed the title. — Take heed what you do.

"I have something in the next place to speak to the godly Ministry of this City: Were it not that I am a dying man, I would not speak to such reverend and grave men; I would say as Elihu did (being but a young man), 'multitude of years should teach wisdom,' and I would hold my tongue; but the words of a dying man take, whether they be discreet or no; or so well ordered or managed, or no: As to them, I would first desire God to shew them mercy, who have begged mercy for me; now at the day of my death I would beg out this of them, that as they have not been ashamed of my chain, so they would now wax confident by my bonds, and by my blood I know they are maligned and threatened, yet my prayer for them is that in Acts iv. 29. 'And now, O Lord, behold their threatnings, and grant that thy servants may preach thy word with all boldness.' Though I am but young, yet I will offer my young experience to my grave fathers and brethren, and that is this: Now I am to die, I have abundance of peace in my own conscience, that I have set myself against the sins and apostacies of this present age. It is true, my faithfulness hath procured me ill-will from men, but it hath purchased me peace with God: I have lived in peace, and I shall die in peace: That which I have to beseech of the ministers is this, to beg them to keep up church-government; whatever God doth with the governments of the world, turning kingdoms upside down, yet the government of the church shall stand; and of all governments, I die with this persuasion, that the presbyterian government makes most for purity and unity throughout the churches of the saints. I would beg them therefore to keep up church-government, that they would not let their elderships fall, that they would take heed of too general admissions to the Lord's Supper, that they be not too prodigal of the blood of Christ, by too general admissions of men to the supper of the Lord, that sealing ordinance. And now I am speaking to them, I shall speak a word of them, and so I have done: I have heard many clamours since I came to prison, as if all the city-ministers were engaged in the plot (as it is called) that I am condemned for: Now, as a dying man, I tell you, that all the ministers that were present at the meetings, and had a hand in the business for which I am to be put to death, are either in prison, or they are discovered already; and therefore I do here, upon my death, free the ministers of the city, who are not yet in trouble, nor discovered to the Committee of Examinations; none of them had a hand in the business in which I was engaged; in which my conscience tells me, I have not sinned. I have done immediately, for I would fain be at my father's house.

"I have but a word to speak to my own Congregation; I return praises unto God, and thankfulness to them, for the love I have had from them; I found them a solid, judicious, and many of them a religious people. The ministry of that learned man, Mr. Anth. Burgess, did much good amongst them; though I have cause to be humbled, that my weak ministry did but a little. They afforded me a great deal of love, and a liberal maintenance; and this is all I desire of them, that they would choose a godly, learned, and orthodox minister to succeed, such an one as may keep up and carry on church-government: it would be a great comfort to me before I go to heaven, if I had but this persuasion, that a learned, orthodox, godly man should fill that pulpit. And for encouragement to any godly minister, whose lot may be to succeed me, I will say this, that he will have as comfortable a livelihood, and as loving a people, as are any people in London, a few only excepted: I had as much satisfaction among them as ever I had in any condition in all my life, and should never have parted from them, had not death now parted us; to which I do submit with all Christian meekness and cheerfulness, I am now drawing to an end of my speech, and to an end of my life together; but before I do expire my last breath, I shall desire to justify God, and to condemn myself in all that is brought upon me. Here I come to that which you call an untimely end, and a shameful death; but (blessed be God) it is my glory, and it is my comfort: I shall justify God, he is righteous, because I have sinned; he is righteous, though he cut me off in the midst of my days, and in the midst of my ministry: I cannot complain that complaint in Psalm xlv. 12. 'Thou sellest thy people for nought, and dost not increase thy wealth by their price.' My blood it shall not be spilt for nought; I may do more good by my death, than by my life, and glorify God more in dying upon a scaffold, than if I had died of a disease upon my bed. I bless my God, I have not the least trouble upon my spirit; but I do with as much quietness of mind lie down (I hope I shall) upon the block, as if I were going to lie down upon my bed to take my rest. If men hunger after my flesh, and thirst after my blood, let them have it; it will hasten my happiness, and their ruin, and greaten their guiltiness: though I am a man of an obscure family, of mean parentage, so that my blood is not as the blood of nobles, yet I will say it is a Christian's blood, a minister's blood, yea, it is innocent blood also: my body, my dead body, it will be a morsel, which I believe will hardly be digested, and my blood it will be bad food for this infant-commonwealth (as Mr. Prideaux called it) to suck upon: mine is not malignant blood, though here I am brought as a grievous and notorious offender. Now, beloved, I shall not only justify God (as I do without a compliment; for he were very just, if my prison had been hell, and this scaffold the bottomless pit; I have deserved both; so that I do not only justify God) but I desire this day to magnify God, to magnify the riches of his glorious grace, that such an one as I, born in an obscure country (in Wales) of obscure parents, that God should look upon me, and single me out from amongst all my kindred, to be an object of his everlasting love; that when as the first 14 years of my life I never heard a Sermon, yet in the 15th year of my life God (through his grace) did convert me. And here I speak it without vanity (for what should a dying man be proud of?) though I am accused of many scandalous evils, yet (I speak to the praise and glory of my God) for these 20 years God hath kept me, that I have not fallen into any scandalous sin; I have laboured to keep a good conscience from my youth up, and I magnify his grace, that he hath not only made me a Christian, but a minister, and judged me faithful to put me into the ministry: and though the office be trodden upon and disgraced, yet it is my glory that I die a despised minister; I had rather be a preacher in a pulpit than a prince upon a throne; I had rather be an instrument to bring souls to heaven, than to have all the nations bring in tribute to me: I am not only a Christian and a Preacher, but whatever men judge, I am a martyr too, I speak it without vanity; would I have renounced my covenant, and debauched my conscience, and ventured my soul, there might have been hopes of saving my life, that I should not have come to this place : but blessed be my God, I have made the best choice, I have chosen affliction rather than sin, and therefore welcome scaffold, and welcome ax, and welcome block, and welcome death, and welcome all, because it will send me to my father's house: I have great cause to magnify God's grace, that he hath stood by me during mine imprisonment ; it hath been a time of no little temptation to me, yet (blessed be his grace) he hath stood by me and strengthened me ; I magnify his grace, that though now I come to die a violent death, yet that death is not a terror to me ; through the blood of sprinkling, the fear of death is taken out of my heart ; God is not a terror to me, therefore death is not dreadful to me : I bless my God, I speak it without vanity, I have formerly had more fear in the drawing of a tooth, than now I have at the cutting off my head : I was for some five or six years under a spirit of bondage, and did fear death exceedingly ; but when the fear of death was upon me, death was not near me ; but now death is near me, the fear of it is far from me : and blessed be my Saviour that hath the sting of death in his own sides, and so makes the grave a bed of rest to me, and makes death (the last enemy) to be a friend, though he be a grim friend. Further, I bless my God, that though men have judged me to be cast out of the world, yet that God hath not cast me out of the hearts and prayers of his people ; I had rather be cast out of the world, than cast out of the hearts of godly men. Some think me (it is true) not worthy to live ; and yet others judge I do not deserve to die : but God will judge all, I will judge no man.

" I have now done, I have no more to say, but to desire the help of all your prayers, that God would give me the continuance and supply of divine grace to carry me through this great work that I am now about : that as I am to do a work I never did, so I may have a strength I never had : that I may put off this body with as much quietness and comfort of mind, as ever I put off my clothes to go to bed : and now I am to commend my soul to God, and to receive my fatal blow, I am comforted in this, ' Though men kill, they cannot damn me ; and though they thrust me out of the world, yet they cannot shut me out of heaven.' I am now going to my long home, and you are going to your short homes ; but I will tell you, I shall be at home before you ; I shall be at my father's house, before you will be at your own houses : I am now going to the heavenly Jerusalem, to the innumerable company of angels, to Jesus the mediator of the new covenant, to spirits of just men made perfect, and to God the judge of all ; ' in whose presence there is fulness of joy, and at whose right hand are pleasures for evermore.' I conclude with the Speech of the Apostle, 2 Tim. iv. 6, 7: ' I am now to be offered up, and the time of my departure is at hand ; I have finished my course, I have fought the good fight, I have kept the faith, henceforth there is a crown of righteousness laid up for me ; and not for me only, but for all them that love the appearing of our Lord Jesus Christ,' through whose blood, when my blood is shed, I expect remission of sins and eternal salvation. And so the lord bless you all !"

Then turning to the Sheriff, he said, " May I pray ?"

Sheriff Titchburne. Yes, but consider the time.

Love. I have done, Sir. Then turning to the people, he said, " Beloved, I will but pray a little while with you, to commend my soul to God, and I have done." After which he prayed with an audible voice :

" Most glorious and eternal Majesty, thou art righteous and holy in all thou dost to the sons of men, though thou hast suffered men to condemn thy servant, thy servant will not condemn thee. He justifies thee, though thou cuttest him off in the midst of his days, and in the midst of his ministry, blessing thy glorious name, that though he be taken away from the land of the living, yet he is not blotted out of the book of the living: Father, my hour is come, thy poor creature can say without vanity and falshood, He hath desired to glorify thee on earth, glorify thou now him in heaven; he hath desired to bring the souls of other men to heaven, let his soul be brought to heaven. O thou blessed God, whom thy creature hath served, who hath made thee his hope, and his confidence from his youth ; forsake him not now he is drawing nigh to thee: Now he is in the valley of the shadow of death, Lord, be thou life to him: Smile thou upon him whilst men frown upon him: Lord, thou hast settled this persuasion in his heart, that as soon as ever the blow is given to divide his head from his body, he shall be united to his head in heaven ; blessed be God that thy servant dies in those hopes ; blessed be God, that thou hast filled the soul of thy servant with joy and peace in believing. O Lord, think upon that poor brother of mine, that is a companion in tribulation with me, who is this day to lose his life as well as I ; O fill him full of the joys of the Holy Ghost, when he is to give up the ghost. Lord, strengthen our hearts that we may give up the ghost with joy and not with grief. We intreat thee, O Lord, think upon thy poor churches ; O that England might live in thy sight ! and O that London might be a faithful city to thee ! that righteousness might be among them ; that so peace and plenty might be within their walls, and prosperity within their habitations: Lord, heal the breaches of these nations, make England and Scotland as one staff in the Lord's hand, that Ephraim may not envy Judah, nor Judah vex Ephraim, but that both may fly upon the shoulders of the Philistines. O that men of the Protestant Religion, engaged in the same cause and covenant, might not delight to spill each others blood, but might engage against the common adversaries of our religion and liberty ! God shew mercy to all that fear him: The Lord think upon our covenant-keeping brethren of the kingdom of Scotland, keep them faithful to thee, and let not them that have invaded them, overspread their whole land. Prevent the shedding of more Christian blood, if it seem good in thine eyes. God shew mercy to thy poor servant who is here now giving up the ghost: O blessed Jesus, apply thy blood, not only for my justification unto life; but also for my comfort, for the quieting of my soul, that so I may be in the joys of heaven before I come to the possession of heaven. Hear the prayers of all thy people that have been made for thy servant; and though thou hast denied prayer as to that particular request concerning my life; yet let herein the fruits of prayer be seen, that thou wilt bear up my heart against the fear of death. God shew mercy to all that fear him, and shew mercy to all who have engaged for the life of thy servant; let them have mercy at the day of their appearing before Jesus Christ. Preserve thou a godly ministry in this nation, and restore a godly magistracy, and cause yet good days to be the heritage of thy people, for the Lord's sake. Now Lord, into thy hands thy servant commits his spirit; and though he may not with Stephen, see the heavens open, yet let him have the heavens open: and though he may not see upon a scaffold the Son of God standing at the right hand of God, yet let him come to the glorious body of Jesus Christ, and this hour have an intellectual sight of the glorious body of his Saviour. Lord Jesus receive my spirit, and Lord Jesus stand by me thy dying servant, who hath endeavoured in his life time to stand for thee: Lord hear, pardon all infirmities, wash away his iniquity by the blood of Christ, wipe off reproaches from his name, wipe off guilt from his person, and receive him pure, and spotless, and blameless before thee in love. And all this we beg for the sake of Jesus Christ. Amen and Amen."

His Prayers being ended, Mr. Ash said, You make a Christian end, I hope.

Love. Ay, I bless God.

Then turning to Mr. Sheriff Tichburn, he said, "I thank you for this kindness, you have expressed a great deal of kindness for me. Well, I go from a block to the bosom of my Saviour."

Love. Where is the Executioner?

When the Executioner came forward, he said, Art thou the Officer?

Executioner. Yes.

Love. (Lifting up his eyes) O blessed Jesus, that hath kept me from the hurt of death! O blessed be God! blessed be God!

Then taking leave of the Ministers, he said, The Lord be with you all!

And taking leave of sheriff Tichburn, he kissed his hand; then kneeling down, he made a short prayer privately.

Rising up he said, "Blessed be God, I am full of joy and peace in believing: I lie down with a world of comfort; as if I were to lie down in my bed: my bed is but a short sleep, and this death is a long sleep, where I shall rest in Abraham's bosom, and in the embraces of the Lord Jesus."

And then saying, "The Lord bless you!" he laid himself down upon the scaffold with his head over the block; and, when he stretched forth his hands, the Executioner cut off his head at one blow.

"I know," says Heath, "some scruple will be made against these persons, [Love and Gibbons] as Presbyterians and sufferers upon another account than of the fifth commandment, as having their own, and the king's interest interwoven with it: but all things considered, without much reconciliation of the different opinions; in this case we may venture to register, and enroll them in this Martyrology. For without all doubt, the bottom of their design was the king's restoration, and however it was clogged with salves and conditions for themselves and their party (which abates something of the lustre, though not of the worth of this crown) yet the main was loyalty, which they hoped to vindicate and evince to the world, who had hard thoughts of them in the matter of the king's death in the previous method thereunto.

"This confederation was therefore begun just upon the conclusion of that horrid murder, that what they could not remedy in that, they might compensate in this, and by a timely application to his present majesty, redeem themselves into his good opinion and favour, forfeited by their former averseness to their duty towards him.

"To this purpose, most of the eminent ministers of that way in London, had several meetings and conferences: in consultation and debate of the manner of their proceeding in this affair. Among them Mr. Love appeared to be most active and stirring, whether out of conscience of some unwarrantable, undutiful demeanor towards the king during the war, I take not upon me to determine. The rest were Mr. Jenkins, Mr. Robinson, Dr. Drake, Mr. Watson, and others. Of the lay-part captain Titus, Mr. Potter, an apothecary in Black-friars, Mr. Gibbons, and some else. These held intelligence both with the king and the parliament of Scotland, then not agreed, but in expectation of a treaty, which was the first thing endeavoured by these men here to be promoted, and with desired effect concluded.

"Their chief meeting-place was Mr. Love's, where their intelligence was communicated, letters read, and advice given upon the several emergencies of that business; which proceeded so far, that the king and his subjects of Scotland, having ended the treaty, and his majesty arrived in Scotland, whether Cromwell with the English army was also advanced, and had worsted the Kirk's army at Dunbar; they concluded of raising an army in this kingdom to the assistance of that nation, and the recovery of this from the slavery and tyranny it suffered under.

"This passed through so many hands, engaged in it, and was so publicly owned, that the Council of State had very early notice of the whole design, so that they dained most part of the while in the net; information being given of every day's proceedings, and of what additions or accesses of persons to the design: which soon after, when they had let it run as far, as without danger they might trust it, they drew the curtain, and apprehended most of the aforesaid persons, and brought them to trial before a high court of Justice, which was yet standing, and had not yet put off their blood-died robes, in expectation of this grand contrivance, which should make them farther work.

"Mr. Love being one of the chief, was first tried, afterwards some others, who recanted, and humbly besought the parliament's mercy, as Mr. Jenkins and Potter, but Mr. Love's submission (such as it was, for they required confession and discovery too) came too late, and to no purpose; so that he, and this Mr. Gibbons a taylor, was condemned by that high court for the same business, lost their heads on Tower-hill, as aforesaid."

Lord Clarendon mentions the Execution of Love thus: "Scotland being subdued, and Ireland reduced to that obedience as the parliament could wish, nothing could be expected to be done in England for the king's advantage. From the time that Cromwell was chosen general in the place of Fairfax, he took all occasions to discountenance the Presbyterians, and to put them out of all trust and employment, as well in the country as in the army; and, whilst he was in Scotland, he had intercepted some letters from one Love, a Presbyterian minister in London (a fellow who hath been mentioned before, in the time the treaty was at Uxbridge, for preaching against peace) to a leading preacher in Scotland; and sent such an information against him, with so many successive instances that justice might be exemplarily done upon him, that, in spite of all the opposition which the Presbyterians could make, who appeared publicly with their utmost power, the man was condemned and executed upon Tower-hill. And to shew their impartiality, about the same time they executed Brown Bushel, who had formerly served the parliament in the beginning of the rebellion, and shortly after served the king to the end of the war, and had lived some years in England after the war expired, untaken notice of, but upon this occasion, was enviously discovered, and put to death.

"It is a wonderful thing what operation this Presbyterian spirit had upon the minds of those who were possessed by it. This poor man Love, who had been guilty of as much treason against the king, from the beginning of the rebellion, as the pulpit could contain, was so much without remorse for any wickedness of that kind that he had committed, that he was jealous of nothing so much, as of being suspected to repent, or that he was brought to suffer for his affection to the king. And therefore when he was upon the scaffold, where he appeared with a marvellous undauntedness, he seemed so much delighted with the memory of all that he had done against the late king, and against the bishops, that he could not even then forbear to speak with animosity and bitterness against both, and expressed great satisfaction in mind for what he had done against them, and was as much transported with the inward joy of mind, that he felt in being brought thither to die as a martyr and to give testimony for the covenant; 'whatsoever he had done being in the pursuit of the ends,' he said, 'of that sanctified obligation, to which he was in and by his conscience engaged.' And in this raving fit, without so much as praying for the king, otherwise than that he might propagate the Covenant, he laid his head upon the block with as much courage as the bravest and honestest man could do in the most pious occasion."

"Mr. Love, together with one Mr. Gibbons, suffered death together on Tower Hill at the earnest suit of Cromwell, protesting he would not march into Scotland unless they were cut off." History of Independency, part 4. p. 17.

189. The Trial of Mr. JOHN GIBBONS, before the High Court of Justice, for High Treason: 3 CHARLES II. A. D. 1651.

POTTER and Gibbons were both brought to the bar together. Potter's Charge was first read, unto which he pleaded Guilty, and made a large narrative of all his crimes against the state: very much was he examined against Master Gibbons, but no hurt at all he did him. After they had done with him, the Charge of master Gibbons was read; which when he heard he spake in this manner:

Gibbons. My Lord, this Charge is very new to me; I have been a prisoner under close imprisonment for many weeks together, and never knew before this time what it was, in particular, that was laid to my Charge: And now I do hear my particular accusation, it is so strange to me, that I do not know what to say to it at the first hearing; therefore I humbly beseech your lordship that I may hear it read again.

Att. Gen. (Mr. Prideaux) My Lord, Master Gibbons heard Potter's Charge read, which was very like to his own; so he hath heard it twice already: however, my lord, he may hear it read again; for he may hear it twice.

Ld. President Hable. Come let him hear it again; he is a young man, let him have what favour he may have : mark it well, now you hear it again.

After reading, Master Gibbons spake in this manner :

Gibbons. My Lord, I am brought hither by an Order of this Court, which Order mentions a Charge of Treason exhibited against me ; I should betray the liberty I am born unto, if I should not desire a trial, according to the fundamental laws of this nation, which is by a jury of my neighbourhood: the benefits and advantages are exceeding great, therefore I do earnestly crave to have them.

Keble. The State hath thought of another way of trial, which you must have, and submit to; this is best for your advantage, and more honourable, than any other you can have, therefore you must plead Guilty or Not Guilty.

Gibbons. My Lord, I shall never be so prodigal of my blood, as to throw away my life by refusing a trial before you, though I am not satisfied in this new way of trial ; yet I shall not refuse to plead in confidence of my own innocence, and in hope of your tenderness in matters of blood. But before I plead, and answer to my charge, I have this humble motion to make.

Here he spake very much on the first day of his trial, moving very much for counsel ; but after he had used many arguments to persuade the court to incline to it, and could not have it, he desired the court to be the counsel for him, and take care of his life, and not suffer him by his own ignorance to weave a web for his own ruin and destruction. After much said of this nature, he pleaded Not Guilty: the which being entered in the book, they proceeded to Trial.

Att. Gen. The Attorney-General began with a long speech, how Master Gibbons had plotted and contrived these treasons; named the meetings and the places where he said it began presently after the late king's death, under the pretence of getting the king to Scotland ; but the truth was, they intended to settle him upon this commonwealth. And further, That he the said John Gibbons, as a false Traitor, and out of a malicious and wicked purpose and design to raise insurrections in this nation, did several days and times in the years 1648, 49, 50, and 51, and at divers other times in divers places within this commonwealth, together with Christopher Love, Piercy, Jermin, Massey, &c. and other their complices, being false traitors to this commonwealth, traitorously, maliciously, complot, contrive and endeavour to raise forces against this commonwealth, settled in way of a free state, without King or House of Lords ; and for the subversion of the same, did raise and collect divers great sums of money, and did hold intelligence by letters, messages and instructions, with Charles Stuart, son of the late king, and with the queen his mother, and divers other persons, being false traitors to this commonwealth.

And further, he the said John Gibbons, together with Christopher Love, William Drake, Piercy, Jermin, &c. and other their complices' since the death of the late king, several days and times in the years aforesaid, within this commonwealth of England, and elsewhere, did traitorously and maliciously declare, publish, and promote Charles Stuart, son of the late king, commonly called the prince of Wales, to be king of England, meaning of this commonwealth.

And further to carry on the said Design, he the said John Gibbons several days and times in the respective years aforesaid, together with Christopher Love, William Drake, Piercy, &c. did endeavour to procure the Scots to invade this commonwealth of England.

And further, That he the said John Gibbons on the 6th of April, 1650, and on divers other days and times between the 29th day of March, 1650, and the 1st day of June, 1651, at London, and elsewhere, did give, use, and hold correspondence with the said Charles Stuart, son of the late king, and the queen his mother, Jermin, Piercy, &c.

And further, to accomplish the said Designs, he the said John Gibbons, on the 6th day of April, 1651, at the places afore-mentioned, did hold and give correspondence and intelligence with divers persons of the Scottish nation, as Argyle, Lowdon, Lothian, &c. enemies to this commonwealth, and adhering to the king in the war against them.

And further the said John Gibbons did traitorously and maliciously abet, assist, countenance, and encourage the Scottish nation, and divers other persons adhering to them; and did convey great sums of money, arms, and ammunition into Scotland, and elsewhere. All which wicked practices and designs of him the said John Gibbons were against this commonwealth, parliament, and people ; and in manifest contempt of the Laws of this nation, and acts of parliament, in such cases made and provided.

[After he had ended, the Witnesses were called: The first was major Adams; the second col. Barton; the third was capt. Hatsel; the fourth col. Bains; the fifth major Alford; the sixth capt. Far; the seventh was master Jaquel; the eighth was major Huntington; the ninth master Harvey; the tenth was major Corbet. Adams being first examined, his testimony was to this effect.]

Adams's Testimony.

That the correspondence of John Gibbons with the rest aforesaid, was to endeavour an agreement between the king and the Scots. The first meeting was at the Swan in Fish-street, where Master Gibbons was. At that place there was only a consideration how to carry on the correspondence. There was also a petition to be sent to the king (as I was informed); and the meeting in this place was in reference to that also. There was letters written to Scotland, and some received thence; which Mr. Gibbons was privy to. After Master Drake went away, we met at Master Love's house, where Master Gibbons met also. There were letters read; and I think Master Gibbons did hear them, and did confer about them. The letters sent to Jermin, Piercy, &c. at one time or other Master Gibbons was present, and heard them read. This was before Titus's going away. Then after there were letters sent from the king, which were read at Master Love's house; where Master Gibbons was present, and heard them read. Master Gibbons brought likewise a rough draught of the instructions that were to go to Holland. Also there was a Letter read at Mr. Love's from alderman Bunce, where Master Gibbons was present. Also a letter after Dunbar fight from Scotland, relating how affairs stood there, (and that letter, as I now remember, was for arms and money) was read at Master Love's house; where Master Gibbons was present at the reading of it. Master Gibbons was a constant man at all meetings. A letter was sent from Massey, read at Master Love's, for arms and money: Master Gibbons was present. And three or four hundred pounds agreed to be sent. A letter was written to the estates of Scotland, to procure Massey and the English to be in esteem. Master Gibbons sometimes acquainted me where we were to meet.

Lieutenant-Colonel Baine's Testimony.

A little while after the death of the late king, there was a meeting at the Swan at Dowgate, where several persons were: but whether Mr. Gibbons was there, I know not. But captain Titus was there, and gave a large commendation of the young prince; and moved that a petition might be drawn up, and sent to the prince from the Presbyterian party here. There was a debate upon it: and this design was looked upon as the only visible way to preserve the Presbyterian Party, and to bring the prince to the crown.

Colonel Barton's Testimony.

A while after the death of the late king I was going into Cannon-Street, and at Dowgate I met with William Drake, who desired me to meet him at the Swan at Dowgate. When I came there, I found captain Titus, lieutenant-colonel Baines, and divers other persons: I believe Mr. Gibbons was not there. I came in while they were in discourse, and I could not well hear them. But at their rising, I asked Mr. Drake what was the occasion of their meeting; and he told me that captain Titus had given a good report of the prince, and did desire that some addresses might be made to him, that thereby he might be taken off from his cavaliering counsellors. After a while William Drake came to me for 10*l.* which he said was to furnish a friend of his which did want 100*l.* He desired I would not deny him; and because he was a good customer to my house, I did lend it him. And after I heard it was for captain Titus. As for the prisoner, I think he was not at the Swan at Dowgate; for I did not know him till afterwards, Major Alford's Testimony.

At the meeting at the Swan at Dowgate, where divers were, captain Titus made a large narration of the prince's deportment, declaring how inclinable he was to cast off his cavaliering adherents, if he were but assured there was a people in England that stuck to their covenant; he was weary of his other counsels, and was ready to apply himself to the ends of the covenant.—A Petition was brought to the Bear in Bread-Street, where it was read, and debated among us, and agreed to be drawn up; and captain Titus and Drake were sent away with it.—I do not remember that Master Gibbons was at either of these meetings.—There was money raised for Titus: Drake had 10*l.* of me; he had it in private. Captain Titus had 30*l.* for his journey. He went over twice, I think; and if so, the second time Master Gibbons was there. The second time I saw Master Gibbons, he brought me to his chamber; and the third time he and I went with some papers to Gravesend, agreed on at Master Love's. These papers were either a commission, or instructions, or both together in one. But this was the substance, that the lord Willoughby, and others, should go to the treaty at Breda, and to press the king concerning this Agreement with Scotland.—Master Gibbons was at Master Love's house when the commission and instructions were agreed upon. He and I went to Gravesend; and (I think) he carried the papers. But of this I am sure, that he knew the end of our going. We tarried there all night; and delivered the papers to Mr. Mason.—I did go to Calnis when I came back; but I do not know whether the papers that I brought over (being read at Master Love's house) were read all at one time, or not: If they were, then Master Gibbons was there.—I was present when the letters came, after Dunbar fight, at Mr. Love's. The letters came from colonel Massey: they gave an account of the fight there, and of the state of affairs: and withal, writ for money and arms, to be sent by way of Holland. I cannot say Mr. Gibbons was present. There was money agreed upon there to be raised for Massey and Titus. Mr. Gibbons was many times at the Swan at Dowgate; he was constant at the club. But after Mr. Drake fled, we did take in other men into the club: Mr. Gibbons was as little absent as any man.—Mr. Gibbons did put me upon it: to shew friendship to Mr. Mason; and he gave me this reason, that so, Mr. Mason might represent our good affections to the king: and Mr. Gibbons did desire me to defray the charges of that night's expences at Gravesend; where Mr. Mason was telling me, that if I were not allowed it by our friends, he would do it.

Master Harrey's Testimony.

I came to the knowledge of this design at several meetings and places. Mr. Gibbons told me of 2,000*l.* which was to be sent into Scotland; and that Massey was to land forces in the West: And concerning my lord general's soldiers, that many of them were run away: And concerning the trained bands of the North, he said they waited but for one blow to be given in Scotland. He told me also of a town that was to be delivered.

Major Huntington's Testimony.

The first that made me acquainted with this design was Mr. Gibbons: who told me, that if I would come to Mr. Love's house, I should hear the news. I went to Mr. Love's: And when I came there, that which I heard was a paper sent from Massey, Graves, and Titus, brought by Drake, and read by him. Mr. Gibbons was there then: There was many more there in Mr. Love's closet; but I cannot say well who they were.

[The Testimonies of the rest of the witnesses could not be well heard; neither can they be had, the books being so close kept. After all was ended, Mr. Keble desired Master Gibbons to speak for himself.]

Gibbons. My lord, I have now stood here near five hours, and am both spent in my body and spirit; and that I am as unable in body to speak for myself, as I am disabled to make my Defence without the Court grant me time, a copy of my Charge, the Depositions of the Witnesses, and assign me counsel. And therefore, before I plead or answer to my Charge, I have this humble motion to make, (I being a man altogether ignorant and unacquainted with the laws), That this court would be pleased, as I said before, to assign me counsel to advise me in my chamber, and to plead for me in the court; and that your lordship and this Court would be pleased to give me a copy of my Charge, and to assign me a solicitor, to solicit my business for me.

Keble. Mr. Gibbons, you must proceed to make some general Defence for the present.

Gibbons. My lord, I hope you will do as God use to do, allow some grains of allowance, that a man that hath nothing but weakness and ignorance may help himself.

Upon this motion the Court adjourned, and Mr. Gibbons was taken away by the keeper of Newgate; and thereafter came a warrant to bring him to the bar the Wednesday following.

In the mean time there were several friends that went to mediate and speak for him to the Judge, who did lay out his simplicity and innocence, labouring what they could for the saving of his life. The Judge answered, That he was not so simple as he was set out by them; and that he doubted not but he was a servant to greater persons, who had employed him: But if he would be ingenuous, and discover the parties that were in that design, he would labour to save his life, and do him good; but if he would not confess, he could not help him. Yet still they interceded for him, until at last the Judge told one of them, That verily he was persuaded that he was innocent: But nevertheless, if he did not reveal all those whom he knew to have any knowledge of the business besides himself, nothing could be expected but death. He was extremely desirous to have a discovery of some persons of quality: But Mr. Gibbons constantly affirmed he knew of none; neither would he accuse any; for he had rather die than be a means to scandal or hazard any good man. This he constantly affirmed with an undaunted resolution to the last.

Wednesday, the second Day's Trial, July 23.

Master Gibbons being brought before the court, my lord Keble spake as followeth:

Keble. Master Gibbons, the Court out of abundance of favour to you, have given you time from Friday till now, whereby you may be able to make your Defence: Therefore it is now expected you shall proceed, and plead what you have to say.

Gibbons. My lord, the last time I was before this honourable Court, after I had desired a jury, and was denied it, I did, in confidence of my own innocency, and your tenderness in matters of blood, submit to a trial, though I was no way satisfied in this new way of trial: But before I could plead, I made this humble motion, perceiving the charge against me for high treason, was against several statutes, laws, and acts of parliament, which I never saw, heard, or read them in my life. My life and estate being thus drawn into question, my lord, it did very much concern me to be well advised, there being many things in the statutes which made for my advantage, both in my plea and defence; Therefore I did humbly beseech your lordship and this High Court that I might have counsel in law assigned me, both to advise me in my chamber, and plead for me in this court, that so I might be able to take all those lawful advantages which the statutes and acts of parliament afford me; which I was not able to do myself, being ignorant of the laws. This being denied, and I seeing I could no way obtain counsel to preserve my life, as I did see the state had got great counsel against me, to prosecute me for my life; I did humbly beseech your lordship, and this High Court, that you would be so far of counsel for me, a poor prisoner standing at the bar, drawn in question before the justice for my life, that you would not let the learned counsel of this commonwealth take any advantage against me, through my ignorance or want of skill in the laws; but that if the statutes and acts of parliament, and laws of the land, did afford me any advantage, which I might over-slip through my ignorance, that your lordship and the Court, out of your bowels of compassion to a poor prisoner, would stand for me, that I might not have wrong done, nor law denied me, which by right was due unto me. Upon these considerations, my lord, I did plead Not Guilty. I do humbly thank your lordship and the Court for the time you have given me; but am as unable to answer or speak for myself now, as I was the last time I took my leave of this Court, being wholly unfurnished, and altogether disabled to make my Defence: For when I came back to my prison at Newgate, with an expectation of meeting both the copy of my Charge, and the deposition of the witnesses, I found all was taken away from my notary, whom I brought on purpose to this place to help me therein. Seeing myself thus totally deprived and cut off from all helps and hopes of making my Defence, I could not tell whither to go or send, but to your lordship, whom I thought, upon my humble petition, might have granted both a copy of my Charge, and the Depositions of the Witnesses: But seeing that could not be granted, I am left without all possibilities of pleading, or making any Defence. Therefore I do now again, with all humility, address myself to your lordship and this honourable Court, and do most earnestly desire a copy of the Charge, also the Depositions of Witnesses, and counsel assigned me to come to my chamber to advise me there; also counsel to plead for me before this Court, and a solicitor assigned me, to follow my business. And if God shall not incline your hearts to shew this mercy, I do not look upon myself as able to make my Defence, as to stand before a company of armed men.

Keble. The Court will be very tender of your blood; and they must and will be as tender to preserve the blood of the Commonwealth, in execution of justice upon traitors, that seek to destroy them. You have had a great deal of favour, and time given you; therefore now you must make your Defence.

Gibbons. My lord, if ever prisoner that came before this Court had reason to cry and call for all possible helps and advantages that may be allowed them, much more have I cause to do the same; verily believing never until now there was ever any brought before justice so unable to help or answer for himself, as I am. Therefore I humbly beseech your lordship, and this High Court; and I do withal earnestly desire counsel, a copy of my Charge, the Depositions of the Witnesses, without which I am never able to plead, or make any Defence for my life: And the rather am I invited to crave and desire the same, for that I have both heard and seen precedents before mine eyes of this nature. Major Rolle, that was accused for High Treason, had counsel assigned him; by whose assistance he saved his life. Sir John Gell, before this Court of Justice, had his brother Master Gell, to speak for him. And since, Mr. Love had counsel to plead for him in this very place.

Keble. Mr. Gibbons, you will not be denied counsel, or any thing else, that may help you, if there be found matter of law. Go on, and make your Defence; and make it appear to the Court that there is matter of law, and you shall not be denied counsel, and whatever else may do you good.

Gibbons. My lord, had I the several advantages the others have had, to offer such matters of law, I should be as ready as any else to do it: but being deprived of all these helps by the officers of the Court, who took away the book from my notary, after he had written the Charge; therefore, my lord, without a copy of the Charge, and the Depositions of the Witnesses, it will be in vain for me to trouble this honourable Court, when I never had sight of the Charge, nor Depositions of the Witnesses; the want of which have so disabled me, (seeing I could not have help of counsel to advise me) that I cannot tell what in the world to say myself.

Keble. Mr. Gibbons, you must proceed to plead, or else you will incense the Court more than you are aware of: for you to stand out thus, and plead for that which cannot be granted, will do you no good; therefore I advise you no longer to stand out, but make your Defence.

Gibbons. My lord, if I should begin to proceed, and make my Defence, being, as I said already, totally ignorant in all the laws, and utterly unable both in memory and parts to take all just and clear objections against the advantages of the Charge and evidences; if I should make my Defence when all means are thus taken away, I should certainly throw away my own life, and become guilty of shedding my own blood: Therefore I had rather a hundred times, leave myself to the mercy and justice of the Court, who, I hope, are very sensible how much the life of a man is worth; and withal consider the hard measure I had in taking away the books of those that wrote for me, that so I could never have sight of the Charge, nor Depositions of the Witnesses, which all others have had, nor no counsel to advise me. Thus being left naked and destitute of all helps, I had rather submit to the mercy of the Court, than ever plead to save my life. My lord, I am persuaded I stand to be judged by a Court, where I see the faces of those that truly fear God; and that they will seriously weigh and consider that the blood of any for whom Christ hath died, is exceeding precious in the sight of God, who will not take any advantage against any for their ignorance; and that you also do remember that all your judgments will be judged over again at the tribunal of Christ, who will both be a counsel and advocate for me, prisoner now standing at the bar. Thus hoping that you will reckon the life and blood of the meanest person, for whom Christ hath died, as much worth as the life of the greatest, I will rather submit to your mercy than plead, if I cannot have what I do desire. But being very unwilling to have any hand to destroy myself, and so become guilty of my own death, therefore though for want of help I be not able to make my Defence, yet I shall make an appeal to the Court; which is all I can do. And therefore I desire you seriously to weigh and consider how far short the evidences come, and how full of contrarieties and contradictions. By the law there ought to be two lawful and sufficient witnesses to make a man guilty of treason; These witnesses must agree punctually in their testimony, and the treason they prove must be against the express words of the act. Also the law will not suffer those that are guilty and convict of the same crime by their confessions, whereof they accuse me, to give evidence against me: These witnesses therefore cannot be lawful and sufficient against me, they having confessed thus much against themselves, and so do either witness against me out of fear of death, or promise of reward. This I am certainly informed will be proved against major Adams, and was declared in the face of the Court at Mr. Love's Trial, concerning the testimony of major Adams, which is the most material witness against me. I hope your lordship and the Court will look upon it, as not only he hath been offered, received, and taken money to discover the design, and witness against me; but also in regard to whatsoever he swears, as that I should bring in the rough draught of Instructions to Mr. Love's: And as to my presence at the Swan at several meetings, was both contradicted, and positively sworn against by several other of the witnesses. None but he doth say that I was present at the reading of any letters of the fight at Dunbar; nor none but Adams saith I was present at Mr. Love's house, when any moneys was debated: nor none but Adams saith I was a constant man at meetings; that ever I invited any to a meeting. I hope your lordship and the Court will consider, that though there are ten witnesses produced against me, besides several questions asked captain Potter at the bar concerning me, yet many of them neither said nor swore any thing that touched me at all; and of those that do reach me in their testimony, not any two did agree in proving the same fact. As concerning the particular testimony of Mr. Harvey, unto which no one witness but himself either said or swore the least tittle of it to be true; being struck with wonder, and amazed to hear these things given in against me, which my heart never thought, nor my tongue never spake: I do both before your lordship and this High Court, and presence of all the people, lay it before the righteous God to plead my cause, and judge between me, a prisoner at the bar, and Mr. Harvey, that falsely accused me. I did further desire, that this appeal might be set upon record, and meet me before the tribunal seat of Christ, and that both your lordship, and them that sit in this honourable Court, might follow this my appeal to the judgment seat, and there witness it before the presence of the Lord against me when I am pleading for mercy, if ever I spake or heard of these things which he hath accused me of. My lord, I shall go further, and did offer unto the court, that if in all England they could find a man that could say any of these things Mr. Harvey accused me of, then I said more particularly, if any whom I had most frequently conversed withal, or any of those that kept me company, would say they ever heard me say any of these words, the next time I came before this honourable Court, I would come and plead guilty. And I do now say, if it please your lordship and the Court to give me time, I shall be able to produce witnesses, I shall make it appear Mr. Harvey is as unfit to be a witness in any Court of Record, as he was unfit to be a justice of peace in Essex, where he was indicted for many and notorious offences. If I might have time, I should produce witnesses that Mr. Harvey was the original reporter of some of those things he accused me of. And concerning major Corbet's testimony, I know little in it, but that I shall call God to witness I knew not Mason. I did then in the face of the Court declare how much he had wronged me; for that I had acquainted the committee who examined me, that I both knew Mason, and told them the place, and how I came to know him. Besides, there is a copy of my examination abroad that doth confirm the same, that Corbet came to me more like a murderer than a Christian; and because I did call God to witness against these untruths he charged me withal, he did in effect judge my soul to the devil, and my body to the gallows, and so he left me. For which unchristian carriage of his, I both complained to Mr. Price, clerk to the warden in the Fleet, my keeper, and some others. My lord, I am charged with being a solicitor, and represented as a man that had nothing else to do but follow such businesses as here I am accused of; which is a life so unlike an Englishman, and so ill-becoming a Christian, that I have all the days of my life walked a contrary course: If it were necessary, multitudes of witnesses will testify the same for me. I was entertained by my master to wait upon him in his chamber: After he was gone to the house, I had constant occasions to go into the city, either to lay out, pay, or receive money. So much experience had I gained, as I entered upon a merchant's trade, dealt with many and several merchantable commodities; having a wife and children then living, that was the trade I resolved to follow. My wife dying, I went over to France some little time after with my master, and carried many merchantable commodities with me, where I found liberty to increase my experience. My master returning to England, where he staid not a year, but went back again into France, I was left behind to wait upon my lady. My employment in my lady's service is sufficiently known to be such as daily led me to go into the city. The 19th of July 1650, my lady went from the city; there was a necessity one man she must leave behind in London, which fell to my portion. And my business called me daily into the city; sometimes to go to counsel, sometimes to shew bills of exchange, sometimes to pay monies, sometimes to lay out money, and buy several things which both my master and lady did daily send for to me: There was some letters that came constantly every week from my lady, some out of France, to one Mr. Charboner's, whose house was in Tower-Street. I missing these letters often on the Monday, went on the Tuesday for them, which was the day we met at the club, which was the main reason of my being so constantly there. Where I met for no other end than to see the faces of my friends, and to discourse of the news of the town. Most of whatever I heard there discoursed on, I found in the printed books: Nothing do I know was ever said or done there prejudicial to the State. But since it is looked upon as a crime, I would I had never come there. Concerning my master, were it necessary, I would here make a declaration that he never left me to do any business but to wait upon his lady, and to provide, buy, and send those things into France that were necessary for him. For letters, I never received any from him, but such as might have looked all the world in the face; neither, think I, I need say much to clear this, for that the state have seen most of those letters that my master sent, before they ever came to my hands. My lords, this is all I can say, being unwilling to trouble the court any longer; but must declare how much I am amazed to be indicted by so high a charge of treason, as I dare say never looked any such man as I am, in my condition, in the face till now; and do fully persuade myself that your lordship will rather pity my ignorance and sad condition, than look upon me as a man either fit for plots, or any such matter I am charged with. I do protest, that if I would make a declaration of every act I have done, of every word I have said, of every line I have written, I never knew it came up to the border of treason, whatever is laid to my charge. And whereas major Adams charges me of being at several meetings presently after the late king's death, I did not see them in nine months after the death of the king; and after that, I came acquainted with Alford, and all that he lays to my charge is going down to Gravesend, but he did not say whether he or I carried the commissions or letters he speaks of. It is hard for me to remember what the discourse was a year and a half since, but I dare say he doth most falsely charge me that I should bid him shew kindness to Mason, that so he might represent the Presbyterian party considerable to the king; and that I should bid him disburse some money, and pay all the charges, and if it was not paid him by the company again, I would; this, to the best of my remembrance, is all false. Capt. Far, who is another of the witnesses, who went along with me, and Alford, did declare in the face of the court, that he knew no such thing, and that major Alford was the man that invited him to Gravesend; and so I do protest he did me, or else I had never gone.

For letters, I do not remember that ever I touched any; nor did major Alford in the least swear positively I did; only he saith, either he or I did deliver them. Alford doth not swear that ever I wrote, that ever I saw them opened, or ever heard them read. All this, my lord, was done above a year and a half ago; and I hope if there shall be any thing found done amiss in that journey, the acts will clear me; for that it is said, if a man be not indicted within a year, he is not to be arraigned or questioned.

All that major Huntington says, is, he saw me at master Love's when the Instructions were read, but whether I heard them, he could not swear; but he saw me go out of one room into another; and since he says, I met him in the street, and asked him if he would not go to Mr. Love's to hear news; and when we came there, after prayer half an hour, Will. Drake pulled a letter out of his pocket, neither swore he what it was, nor that I heard it read. My lord, upon the whole, I do say, among all the ten witnesses, there is not one that doth say or swear that ever I wrote letter, sent letter, or received letter; that I ever collected money, paid money, or received money; or that ever I discoursed any thing prejudicial to the state; not any one witness doth lay any one thing to my charge done for more than this year and half, besides major Adams: and all that ever he swears, is, being present at letters read; he neither says I heard them, or ever discoursed any thing concerning them. So, my lord, except it be one single witness, there is nothing laid to my charge done this year and a half. So, my lord, the utmost that the whole proof against me doth amount unto, is but hearing of letters read at the second hand; and all this but in the utmost were but misprision of treason; if fully proved; but being but one single witness to swear this, I cannot imagine it will ever hurt me. For Potter, Jaquel, Far, or Alford, (who knew as much by me as Adams) did not say any such thing; and all that Adams did say, is but hearing of letters, he doth not say that ever I sent means to the king: though I never did this, yet I have weakened myself, and opened my purse to help the State. About the time the king and Scots were agreed, I furnished my brother with a considerable sum of money, and sent him into Ireland to do the State service, where he gained a command under my lord, and did very good service for the state. My lord, had I ever such a mind to the war in Scotland, I could have sent my brother thither, and not into Ireland. Thus, my lord, I have gone as far as I can, in making my appeal to the court; being utterly unable to make any Defence, I hope there will be no advantage taken by my ignorance, but you will be pleased to take my condition into your consideration, and yet grant me both time and counsel, and give me a copy of my Charge, and the Depositions of the Witnesses, which is no more favour than was allowed to the archbishop of Canterbury, and deputy of Ireland; I crave leave of your lordship and the Court, that I may not suffer for want of experience, nor that my ignorance may be made use of to work my ruin and destruction. From my youth I have studied the Scripture, but never have studied the laws in my life; and therefore all that I have to help myself with, is from the Scripture, where I find that ignorance bath constantly the plea at the bar of Heaven, and so I am certain should have at all the bars of all the courts of justice. Abimelech that committed a very great sin in taking another man's wife from him, he pleaded his ignorance, and God did spare him, because he knew it not. God hath always been wonderful tender of the life of a man, and that in the time of the most strict laws; so much care did he take to preserve the life of man, that he provided cities of refuge to fly unto, if any killed a man by accident, or unawares. Murder is a great crying sin, yet were it done unawares, God made a city of refuge to fly unto, that the man might be safe, and out of danger of the revenger. My lord, whatever I have done amiss, I do profess it is out of ignorance; I never knew I broke any of the acts of parliament, nor that I offended the laws of England; and therefore I hope my ignorance shall have the plea at your bar, as I am sure it shall have at the bar of God. I have often heard that the law of England is the law of mercy, and that there is no law in the world looks with more tenderness and compassion upon a man's life; therefore I say as David concerning the sword of Goliath, 'There is none like that, give it me.' The same I do say this day, no law is like to our English laws, therefore let me enjoy them: I know the benefits and advantages thereby is wonderful great. I do verily believe I am before a court that are fully persuaded that the strict beholding eye of God looks upon them, and beholds all your intentions, and the thoughts of your heart towards me, and sees whether you do deny me any help or advantage that may save my life. Therefore I earnestly beseech your lordship, and this honourable court, to look upon the laws of England, and see whether there be not some helps, some city of refuge to fly unto, where I may be out of danger of all that I am here charged with. My lord, this is the first time that ever I was brought upon a stage, the first time that ever my name was heard of, or I known to be an offender against the State: And whatsoever shall now be found in me amiss, I desire there may be a favourable construction made of it, and not to be strained beyond what my intention was, who have always abhorred from my very soul all designs that have tended to blood. I have always stood firm to the cause of liberty and religion, and all the interests thereof: these are the principles I first took up, these are the principles I have always held; from which principles I never yet departed. I have always had a bleeding heart when the church hath been in a suffering condition; I have never been of a bitter spirit, but have always carried a most tender and Christian respect towards those that were of an unblamable life and conversation: And where I thought there was truth of grace, however contrary to me in judgment, yet I have loved them, and embraced them as Christians. I have always lived peaceably, never no disturber of the church or state, either by writing, or printing books, or any thing else. May it please your lordship, it is my desire you should do as God did, when the cry of Sodom came up before him; 'I will 'go down,' saith he, 'and see whether they have done altogether according to the cry which is come up to me: if not, I will know.' The Lord that knows all things, knew before what Sodom had done: but after the manner of men he came down, to teach all courts of what they should do before they proceed to judgment. My lord, here hath been a great charge against me, a great cry come up unto your ears; I desire you to do as God did, that is, to know whether it be according to the cry, that you would seriously weigh all that the witnesses have said, gather all the circumstances together, and see the utmost that it doth amount unto: and then I am sure you will see the evidences to come so infinite short of what the charge and cry hath been against me, that you will find arguments to incline to mercy; and if I might not be quitted, yet at least you will let me have those helps and advantages that the laws afford me, and God hath commanded you to give me; that you will not keep any thing from me, that I, according to justice, have demanded, and for the want of which see me destroyed before your faces. Therefore I do once more with all earnestness desire you will not deny me a copy of my Charge, also the Depositions of the Witnesses; and assign me Counsel to come to my chamber, and plead for me at the bar, without which you take from me all those helps that should enable me to make my Defence; without which it is impossible for me to go any further, and must declare that I want all the material things that should help me to save my life, when I see before my eyes all possible advantages to undo me. My lord, I am able to say no more: if this my just request, shall be denied, I have gone as far as I can without them, both to clear my innocency, and vindicate myself from that which is laid to my charge; and am most confident, if you would let me have what you cannot justly deny me, a copy of my Charge, and the Depositions of the Witnesses, I should stand as clear in the eyes of the law, in the eyes of your lordship, and all this Court, as I am clear in the eyes of God, and my own conscience, from what is unjustly charged upon me. And thus much I have done, and am able to do no more; therefore if you do deny me, I shall be abundantly satisfied, howsoever it shall please God to suffer you to deal with me. Concerning the witnesses, I have little further to say, but desire that the Lord would forgive them, as I do freely; I would not change conditions with them, though I were sure to die in fire flaming, or in the mouth of lions, even in the worst condition that could be imagined. I both pity and desire to mourn for them, who have so desperately wounded their own souls and consciences to destroy my life. And the Lord grant, that not one drop of my blood, which they have endeavoured to shed, may stand betwixt them and mercy, when they are upon their dying beds a crying for it. And this is the worst hurt I wish them for all the wrong they have done me. Now the Lord of heaven direct your lordship, and this honourable Court, that you may not suffer the witnesses testimonies to be strained, for me to lose my life upon circumstances, or what is supposed to be, or in conscience thought, but according to clear proof and evidence. Do that which may give you comfort upon a dying bed, and no more than you dare look God in the face withal, and answer to me his poor servant, who am innocent, at the bar of the Lord Jesus Christ, where I shall have free liberty to speak, and you must and shall hear me. The Lord of heaven direct you, that you do no more than what the law will allow; and that what you do, may be according to the mind of God, and most for his glory, and the good of me a helpless prisoner at the bar. And so let it go which way it will, I shall submit with abundance of content and satisfaction, and with a quiet spirit say, 'The will of the Lord be done.'

Thus having ended his Speech, the Court adjourned until Friday next; and so Mr. Gibbons was carried back by his Keeper, and ordered to be brought before them again on Friday after.

Friday, about twelve o'clock, Mr. Gibbons was brought to the bar.

Keble. Come, Mr. Gibbons, what have you to say?

Gibbons. My lord, I have not much to say, being totally disenabled, and cut off from those means that might help me to save my life; which the last time I was here, I fully declared, and as earnestly desired both a copy of my Charge, and the Depositions of the Witnesses, and counsel assigned me: this I pleaded for, until your lordship told me the court would be incensed, if I did not proceed to my Defence. Which made me dare to go no further, but rather choose to submit to the mercy of the Court, and make an appeal to their justice; where I desired that you would seriously weigh and consider how wonderful short the whole evidences come; there was not any two agreeing: Adams, the material witness, most what he said, was disapproved by the other several witnesses that came after. I hope the court is very sensible how little is laid to my charge by major Adams, after so great an inquisition, as he daily set upon me, inviting of me to his house in the city, to his house in the country, going from one shop to another, where he thought I did come; to Aldermanbury church, and all other places where he did hope to find me: after all this sifting, and trying, what was it he got out? nothing, but the hearing of letters read, which none but himself swears. My lord, all that I have to say, is to desire both your lordship, and this court, to consider with what great aggravation the Attorney-General did multiply, and aggravate against me beyond all that ever the witnesses said, leaving out all what might serve for my advantage. My lord, how the Attorney-General could bring major Alford and major Adams together, and so make them double witnesses against me, that is not possible for me or any man else to understand. First, what Adams says, is concerning of my bringing in of the rough draught of Instructions, which I wholly deny, and so do all the witnesses that came after him, to the best of my remembrance: and some of them swear positively that Drake brought it in; none but himself says that I brought it in. To testify unto this, major Alford says nothing: but all that he says, is, That I went down to Gravesend with him, and did not say or swear that I either carried the Instructions, or delivered them, or that ever I heard them read: all that he can say, is, that I went with them, but whether he or I delivered them, that he cannot tell. He speaks of some discourse concerning shewing of kindness to Mason; it being a year and half ago, I am not able to charge myself with what I said then, but dare say he hath falsly accused me. What major Alford says more, is only that I should bring them to Mason's chamber in the Strand, delivered not, nor says that we had any discourse at all, but took our leaves, and came away presently. Another time, said Alford, I brought Mason to Titus to Mr. Whitarr's a bookseller's, and that Mason and Titus went up to the chamber, where they had private discourse together: he did not say, that I went up to the chamber, or heard, or knew any thing what their discourse was. Now, my lord, I hope by this time both your lordship and the court are satisfied what slender testimony there is against me. First, my lord, I was never heard of till I came to Gravesend with major Alford; only something that major Adams saith of me, meeting at the Swan, which all the other witnesses do acquit and clear me from. Now, my lord, to what major Alford saith, is nothing but giving a visit to Titus and Mason, which I hope will never be thought any crime; for that neither of them both were declared enemies to the State, and therefore certainly it could be no hurt for me to see them. And besides, whatever major Alford charges me withal, is a year and half since, therefore am acquitted by your own acts. So that it cannot enter into my thoughts, by what act of parliament or law you can pass any sentence against me: for all that is ever laid to my charge done within this year, is nothing but hearing of letters read: which not any one but major Adams says, and he neither saith what these letters were, and that I ever discoursed, or said any thing concerning them. Thus, my lord, you see there is but one single witness throughout. My lord, I waited upon a gentleman that led me to two or three meetings, by which means I gained a nearer acquaintance, which now proves part of my unhappiness, seeing it is become a crime to meet friends at the club, and other places, and hear letters, and other news read, which is all that I am charged with. My lord, I hope I am before a court that doth consider, that all those days works will be judged over again; therefore I cannot imagine that any court of justice in the world will proceed to sentence upon so slender a testimony that lies before you, but that you will rather allow me those helps that may enable me to end the difference that is betwixt the State and me: that is, to let me have a copy of my Charge, the Depositions of the Witne-ses, and counsel assigned me; without which, it is as impossible to defend myself, as for a little child to encounter an armed man with a drawn sword in his hand. My lord, I have no more to say, but shall submit to God, whatsoever comes; and as I said before, so I say again, I do freely forgive the witnesses, but do desire that the Court will not proceed upon so slight and slender testimonies, which never can, nor will hold water in the sight of God, or law.

Keble. Mr. Gibbons, most of what you have said now, you said before, only you made some little addition. The Court hath debated your business and life, with as much care as if you were the greatest nobleman in England; and upon the debate, they are persuaded in their consciences that you deserve to be sentenced.

Att. Gen. My lord, Mr. Gibbons pleads for his life, and I for Justice in the behalf of the Commonwealth, therefore I desire you will proceed to Sentence according to the judgment of the Court.

Whereupon Sentence was read. After that, all the whole Charge was read, and Mr. Gibbons sentenced as a false traitor, to return to that place from whence he came, so to suffer death, by having his head severed from his body.

After Sentence, Keble spake in this manner. "Mr. Gibbons, you have nothing to do, but to prepare yourself for God; you have a great acquaintance among the ministers, you should do very well to send for them, and reveal what you know, and so do the State what good you can before you die. Have you any thing more to say?" But Mr. Gibbons said not one word more, but took his leave of the Court, humbly bowing to them; and after that, he bowed to the Attorney-General, and took his leave of him, and so came down the stairs with abundance of cheerfulness, speaking to his friends, and shaking them by the hands. And in this manner he went along the Hall, until he took coach to go to prison.

Mr. Gibbons's Execution.

He was afterwards executed, in pursuance of the Sentence, on Tower-Hill, the same day with Mr. Love, the 22d of August. Being come upon the Scaffold, he spoke in the following manner:

"Gentlemen; I am brought here to the stage, where I am made a spectacle to God, to angels, and to men; an object of pity and compassion to my friends, where they see before their eyes a man in the prime of his years and in the flower of his youth cut off as an untimely fruit, and as a tree that burdeneth the ground, therefore they are sorry; but this is no new thing, it is God's ordinary way to suffer men to be cast out, that he may receive them to mercy; the poor blind man was thrown out, but he was received to Jesus Christ; the three children were thrown into the furnace, but they were received to God; that was the way that he delivered them: do not stand wondering at God's proceedings, whatsoever the men be, yet I bless God to eternity; I take it well at his hands, though it seem strange: it is God's ordinary way, and if it be, Christians should not shun any extremity, if it bring them to Jesus Christ, and therefore I bless God, I come to this scaffold, to this place, with as much willingness as ever bridegroom did to receive his bride: I know the passage of blood is but short, and the way to the crown; though my head be severed from my body, yet my soul to all eternity shall be joined to the Lord Jesus Christ; and I in the presence of you all, desire you to witness, that I from my soul desire that the present power and court that is set up, have done themselves no more hurt than they have done me; for I am assured that all that ever their sentence hath done, hath put me in the way that I am going; from earth to heaven, from friends, and comfort, and creature-relations, that of necessity ere-long must be left; and it were a great deal of folly to desire that that we cannot keep; I am going to receive the end of my faith, the reward of my hope, the comfort of my prayers, and of all the prayers, and tears of God's people; where I shall enjoy the society of all believers, the sight of God, the fellowship of the saints, and embrace God to all eternity; these things none can take from me; therefore why should I desire to keep these things that the providence of God calls for? And therefore I need not stand grumbling and repining at God's will: and I freely submit.

"I come not hither to tell a long story, or to make a discovery of my sins; the Lord knows (upon the examination of my heart) how many thousands and hundred millions of sins I have, and I desire to pour out floods of tears for them; and I desire that through the merit of Christ, the atonement might be made to God for them. From my childhood I must needs say, I have been such; I have seen a father buried in the grave, and a sister, and a wife, and a child laid in the grave; but all that ever I could do to this day, could never put my sins into the grave, with all my endeavours and all the afflictions and mercies I have had: it is an infinite comfort, though I enjoy nothing else; after this day I shall assuredly never sin any more, nor grieve the spirit of God any more, nor dishonour God any more; I profess, though I should not come to heaven, it is a comfort to me that I shall not sin and grieve the spirit of God any more; blessed be God to all eternity, I shall be out of the power of sin.

"This is not all, but further, since I can remember that I set my face towards God; from my childhood I have hedged in my way with thorns, that I might go the strictest and straitest way, my way to bring me to the Lord Jesus Christ; it is a wonderful comfort, and blessed be God for this day's work; I profess

I would not change my condition for ten thousand worlds : I bless God I find the reward and benefit of the prayers of good people in a wonderful manner ; they have more cause to go home and seek days of rejoicing and days of praise, than to mourn and repine. In the Bishops' time I was one that was a mourner, that lamented the time and the state, and desired to shed tears when the church was under affliction.

"And truly, I further declare, that I have always been and gone upon gospel principles ; I have always desired to apply particular promises to my particular condition : I know ten thousand generals will do me no good, only particular faith and application will do me good and strengthen and support me this day : I have always engaged upon pure principles of religion to the best of my knowledge, and the utmost of my endeavours ; I have always engaged upon those principles, from those I never departed ; and in those principles by God's grace this day I shall die and come to seal with my blood ; I always owned the ways of God, when they were most persecuted ; I think an hundred, nay (I may say) a thousand can tell, that I did never dare to save my life, or my skin, or any thing, to quit religion, though it were never so much clouded, and despised, and disdained ; I do now this day rather a thousand times willingly lay my neck on the block ; believe it, I am a dying man, I chuse it, and had rather have it, than enjoy the most glorious life and liberty with those that are betrayers of the truth of God and a good conscience ; O Sirs, believe it, carry it from a dying man : in the time of afflictions a good conscience will stand you in more stead, and more comfort, than a thousand worlds : I bless God more that he now smiles on me, than if all the emperors and princes of the world did own me.

"I have never been without a trembling heart, since the spouse of Christ was clothed in mourning ; I always thought it my duty, and the least I could do, to be in tears when the church rolled in blood ; and the Lord grant that every Christian soul may make it his work : it is the great breaking of my heart, that I could never get my heart to break enough, to see the church of Christ in misery : though God have called, and Christ have called, and there was never such calling ; it wounds my soul that I could never mourn more for the church's afflictions, and the Lord keep all that fear the Lord and his name, keep those from days of rejoicing and thanksgiving for the death of those that God owns, and will wipe all tears from their eyes, and those God accounts their blood precious : have a care of being of the number of those that rejoice over the heaps of the carcasses of God's people.

"I am now at the last brought to suffer death as an enemy to the State, though my conscience tells me I am a friend to the Lord Jesus Christ, his church and members ; and though the Jews heretofore told Pilate, if he did let the Lord Christ go, he was no friend to Cæsar : must I not say truly, my conscience bids me say it in the case I am in, whosoever desires to keep the Lord Jesus, to keep integrity of heart, and innocency of life, and desires to walk in an unspotted life and conversation, whosoever desires to let these old broached heresies go, and draw their sword for Christ, are not these declared to be enemies to the State, and are against them that desire to keep a good conscience ; and if there be no law of God to condemn us, (as the Jews said) there is a law found out, and by that law he ought to die.

"I will not make a discourse of the manner of my Trial ; ten thousand men, and angels, yea God himself can witness the hard measure I had. I am in charity with all the world, the Lord of heaven forgive them ; I say nothing myself, only I will tell you what a gentleman said that was an eye-witness at my trial, that knows all the actions and laws as well as any man in the place ; he professeth that he saw so much, that he would not have a hand in my Sentence for all the gold that could lie in Westminster-Hall. I must say for mine own part, and in my conscience I believe it, if they do not repent, the Lord will call them to an account for this day's work, I believe they have gone against God, and his laws, and the laws of nations ; I believe so, I speak not this from a bitter spirit ; the Lord of heaven forgive all them that ever had a hand in it, as now I shall desire mercy when I shall come before the Lord ; I look upon them as a company of poor instruments that the Lord knows how to deal with, and will call to account ; it will be time enough when they come to lie upon their dying beds : the Lord grant that my blood may not stand between them and mercy when they put up their prayers, that nothing concerning me may stand in the way of all the mercy that their souls shall stand in need of : truly, if you will believe me, I would not leave this scaffold to enjoy all the pleasures that this world can give, I would not change my condition with them ; not with my witnesses, not with my judges I would not change my condition ; my conscience tells me, and so I speak, I forgive them, the Lord of heaven lay not this great sin to their charge ; let all the people of God so pray ; they will one day see what it is to lose a good conscience ; and that it is better a great deal to have the light of God's countenance, than to have a conscience upon the rack : they will one day see, that there is nothing to be feared but sin and wrath ; and what a comfort and happiness the peace of a good conscience is, the Lord shew it you.

"I am brought here to die for Treason ; so plotting against the state : and this is such a treason as is proclaimed to all the world ; such a plot as was never before : blessed be God, I am of another mind ; I should appear sadly before God, if my conscience told me what hath been represented : but I must needs declare my opinion without offence to any ; it is a pretended plot, to beget a greater plot :

God grant that it be not so; a plot, I fear, to destroy all church-government, and the faithful of the Lord and the godly: for other plots I understand none; I profess in the presence of God. I know of no plot, or had a hand in any plot: I would not for ten thousand worlds be guilty of the blood of any man: I am sensible how many thousands, and ten thousand thousands of sins I have committed, as the number of minutes of one hundred thousand thousands of days; that I am sensible of, and desire to bring them before the Lord to stone them to death, and to pour out floods of tears for them before this that I am to die: but I am put now to appeal to the righteous God, whither I am going, to stand before the bar of an imperial judge, that knows the intents and thoughts of my heart, and what all my endeavours have been, I never had any other thought than the honour of the gospel and religion, and to bring these precious things into the channels that the Lord would have them in. This was my desire.

"Not long since I told a gentleman (now in heaven) that so great is the wound that it breaks my heart, to see the wonderful scorn and contempt that lies on the face of religion in the eyes of Papists, Turks and Heathens, and all reformed nations, that I profess I have sometimes wished to have swimm'd out of my chamber in tears, and said to the gentleman, that it was a mercy if ever the Lord would find a means to wash away the stain of scorn and contempt of the gospel, though it were with the blood of his ministers and faithful servants: who knows what this day's work may do? who knows what God hath for this land? Let none despise the day of small things; if it be clay and spittle, if God take it in his hand, it shall cure the blind: what do we know what the blood of two men may do to fill up the measure of blood? What the blood of two men may do towards all the prayers and endeavours of God's people? Therefore be not troubled. But I pray give me leave: whatsoever is written concerning me, or the blessed servant of God who is gone before me, and now singing Hallelujahs to all eternity, this day's work will be written in heaven, it will be written by the Lord Jesus: suffering for God and religion, confident I am you will find it so. I can look in the face of God (excepting my weakness and failings) that in all this business I had no ill intention: you are to believe a dying man: I am sensible what it is to die to God, to the ocean of eternity; to go to stand at his bar: believe me, believe me; I profess before God, angels and men, I know not what I die for this day: whatever reports do say, believe the words of a dying man: I am confident the odium of this day's work (were an angel of heaven to write a book) will never be washed off; that this day's work will lie upon some: the Lord grant they may see their sin, and repent in time.

"But let me say a little further: I confess I cannot but wonder, how the men now in power can look any Christian in the face, my conscience tells me, that it is the original of all plots, that hath torn the nation asunder, and the kingdom, and the liberty, and the profits asunder: whatsoever belongs to Christians and rational men, is all torn from us; have they not thrown the three kingdoms into that misery, that I am confident all the enemies of the church could not have done the like? But rather how shall they be able to look the great God in the face, when he shall make inquisition for blood? To whose door shall all the blood of England, and Scotland, and Ireland return? Who knows not, that within these three years there was the most glorious promising morning that ever looked England in the face? How comes it to pass that we have such days of trouble and misery? God knows who hath had a hand and been instruments in it. He knows that these are the plotters with a witness: these are the Egyptians that all the people of God groan under: and all——

[Then the People interrupted him, and some said 'He is a going to die with a lye in his Mouth, Mr. Sheriff.' When they were quiet he went on thus:]

"I must needs say, that the blood that was shed in queen Mary's days was a delightful sight and persecution, and it was a pleasant sight to Antichrist in the Bishops time, and there have been many delightful sights of late that I will not speak of, because it gives offence, but the most joyful sight that ever Antichrist saw, he beholds this day in the blood of the faithful ministers and servants of God: and now I come upon the scaffold to fight this bloody field, the Lord grant I may be enabled to overcome it.

"I confess, I believe it is a sad sight to the people of God, to see all their prayers, fastings, and tears come to this, to see the piercing sword thrust into their bowels; but I desire them to take heed of repining and murmuring: look who stands on the top of the ladder, and not on the next step; see God ordering and contriving all; look not at the hammer, but God; God is the best contriver, he knows what is the best for you, and us, and blessed be his name; I am come hither to witness of his glory, there is none knows what glory a suffering condition brings to God, and to his saints, how many flowers it adds to their garland, we should see as many run to it, as now shun it. When Christ shall come, and all shall call to the mountains and rocks to fall on them and cover them, what a blessed sight will it be for Christ to put forth his hand to them? If they saw but the infinite reward Christ hath for them in heaven, it would be sufficient to invite them to come in and suffer for the Lord; nay we may be ashamed we have done no more, nor looked after the gaining of that precious eternal mansion, where we shall see God, and be in the arms of Jesus Christ, where we shall suffer no more, but enjoy an infinite weight of beatitude and glory.

"Let the word of a dying man prevail; for the Lord's sake hold to the Truth, part not from the truth; it were better that Heaven should fall, and the world be on fire, than that God should be dishonoured. The least error is as a barrel of gun-powder that will blow up the church and kingdom; Error draws a sword against Christ and his truth; take heed of error, lest you fall into a gulf that you can never come out of. Ask your own experience, how many ministers and professors have fallen into error, and have gone away with guilt upon their conscience, and a blot upon their names: Error is like a chain, if the soul would go to Christ, it cannot: Error is as a partition, under what gloss soever it come: though in the habit of a saint or angel, it is dangerous poison; be like Athanasius, own the truth, though all the world were against it; or as Martin Luther, who set himself against all the power and force of Antichrist: own the truth, though eminent ministers and professors that seem eminent in faith and grace fall from it, as many do.

"I shall now suddenly conclude; I am very unwilling in my condition to speak any thing that may be offensive to any, I have only this to say, and I have done; whatsoever chargeth me nearest, I am confident the Lord will one day clear my innocence; he hath written down the actions and proceedings, and he will one day shew it, and vindicate my name in the sight of all; there will be a resurrection, and all men shall be called to an account for all the reproaches that have been cast upon the faithful of the Lord.

"All the churches of Christ are now in the furnace; the church of Scotland, England, and Ireland; the Lord grant that all may mourn, and never dare to keep a joyful day, till the church of Christ be delivered; for God calls, and Christ calls, and the church calls; and I had rather be (and let all that fear God chuse rather to lie) in the den of Dragons, than to be of the number of those that rejoice when the churches of God are in sorrow. The sun shined upon Sodom a little while, but presently a shower of fire and brimstone came and destroyed them all; so the prosperity and flourishing state of the wicked is like that: the children of God may sit in darkness for a while, but they shall have light to eternity: wicked men may rejoice for a moment, but there is an eternal night that will follow, that shall never be blown over: A child of God had rather that all the lions in the wilderness should roar, than to have God angry. What were it for a man, though like Alexander, he had prosperity, and had as much peace and glory as Pompey, and did ride in as much state as Cæsar, when he is under the frowns of God that hates wicked men, as much as he is hated of wicked men? The bush may burn, but it shall never be consumed; the church hath been 5600 years under burning, and persecution, and flame, but the church shall remain to the end of the world.

"Thus I have endeavoured to declare myself and my conscience, though with much brokenness and distemper: and now I am to take my leave of the world, I have only this word to say, that you bear me witness, that whatsoever may be charged on me, or may be said after my death, I am confident God will own me for an innocent person; I never to the best of my remembrance had a hand or a heart, I had rather die a thousand deaths than ever to have a hand in the blood of any of God's people; and now God hath brought me hither and not men, it is his hand; I again desire to forgive all the world, every man's person; the Lord grant that they may have mercy, and I desire, as now I desire mercy, the Lord to forgive all their sins. I know all things are under God's dealing and commission, and this condition had never come to me if God had not seen it good; and though the ax be so near, if I had more to do for God, and for his church and people, he would do with the ax, as he did with that of Abraham, God would take hold of it, and could, and blessed be his name that he takes the ordering of it to himself, therefore I have a quiet spirit, I have no discontent in the world: and now not to speak of death, alas that is nothing; but of eternity that my soul is now launching into: I am now to enter into eternity, where to stand with a naked soul before God, whose eyes are ten thousand times brighter than the sun, that cannot endure to behold iniquity: I am now going to God, that will be as a consuming fire, and as armed thunder against me, if I did not see his infinite mercy, and my blessed Saviour standing between me and the Lord, presenting all that I do: if I had all the righteousness of all the angels in heaven this day to go to God the Father, woe, and ten thousand woes to me, if I had not interest in the Lord Jesus Christ; if I had the sin of all the persons that are here, and that have been ever since the creation, if I come and stand clothed this day with the righteousness of the Lord Jesus, I am confident I should have pardon from them all, as for one; there lies my strength and my hope, and my happiness. All my righteousness, and all my prayers, and all my performances, are but as filthy rags; and should God draw out the best Sabbath that ever I kept, and the best prayer that ever I made, and the best syllable of that prayer, it would be a sin; I have scarlet sins, sins of all sorts and ranks, I desire you that you would all mourn and help me this day. Blessed be the Lord of Heaven for the benefit and support of the prayers of God's people; I am persuaded that there was never any man in my condition, that went to heaven upon the wings of so many prayers: Be ye all content, and go home and rejoice before the Lord, be certain that you keep a day of thanksgiving for this day's work; and our souls shall bless God to eternity for this day's work; there is not one drop of blood could be spared, if it could, it should have been kept; God knows how to answer your prayers and tears, though we must not be heard, he hath summoned us to come to the arm of his mercy, why do I stay from God longer? I bless God I am coming.

"Now I shall only desire as Samson when he made his last request, only this once help me; my call to you all is, that you would pray and mourn for me, this once help me; after a little while your prayers will do me no good, nor your tears will do me no good; therefore now for the Lord's sake help me off the scaffold, lift up a prayer to God for me, let there be some compassion, you know not what fightings may be in me; but I bless God, I hope to walk triumphantly to God presently, but do you act your parts, your strength, and your interest, whatever your prayers and tears can do, help me, I beseech you now, for I shall never more need your help.

"And now is Christ taking notice what was cast into the church's treasure, he looked upon the widow's two mites, Christ is looking this day who helps me a poor creature, and supports me, and saith Christ, is there none will help him? O pray help me to commend all my conditions to God, that he would rebuke Satan, and make me die sincerely as a Christian, that I may willingly lie down on the block, as I would to lie down on a feather-bed after I am weary, that I may be willing to come to him; pray for me, that all the graces that my soul wants they may be strengthened.

"Most glorious God, I now into thy hands commend my spirit, and all that is in me; O blessed God, I never was in want but thou didst relieve me, I was never in distress but thou helpedst me, never, never, and I am confident thou wilt not leave me, till thou see my soul in heaven. O blessed Saviour! thou wentest up and down on the earth, thou knowest what it is to suffer, what it is to be betrayed, what it is to be scorned and tempted; blessed Saviour, thou sawest me when I was running from thee; wilt thou leave me now I come to thee? Lord Jesus, I commend all into thy hands, hoping that after this day I shall never suffer more, nor never pray more."

His Prayer being ended, he put off his doublet, and asked for his friend Dr. Bastwick, and embraced him: after that he embraced his uncle, and others of his friends on the scaffold; then laying his head on the block, Dr. Bastwick came to him, and wished him to take off his rings, which accordingly he did, by raising himself upon his knees, and gave them to his uncle; which done, he laid his head on the block, and holding up his left hand, the Executioner at one blow and a small rase severed his head from his body.

From the Sommers' Tracts.

ON Wednesday being the 1st of this instant month, the earl of Derby was brought to his Trial, before the Court-Martial holden at Chester, in the year of our Lord God, 1651.

* Lord Derby was one of those taken in the flight to the North after the battle of Worcester, Sept. 3, 1651, "from which," says Clarendon, "Cromwell returned in triumph; was received with universal joy and acclamation, as if he had destroyed the enemy of the nation, and for ever secured the liberty and happiness of the people; a price was set upon the king's head, whose escape was thought to be impossible; and order taken for the trial of the earl of Derby, and such other notorious prisoners as they had voted to destruction.

"The Earl of Derby was a man of unquestionable loyalty to the late king, and gave clear testimony of it before he received any obligations from the court, and when he thought himself disobliged by it. This king, in his first year, sent him the Garter; which, in many respects, he had expected from the last. And the sense of that honour made him so readily comply with the king's command in attending

By virtue of a Commission from his excellency the lord general Cromwell; grounded upon an act of parliament of the 12th of August last, intituled "An act prohibiting correspondence with Charles Stuart, or his party, directed to him, when he had no confidence in the undertaking, nor any inclination to the Scots; who, he thought, had too much guilt upon them, in having depressed the crown, to be made instruments of repairing and restoring it. He was a man of great honour and clear courage; and all his defects and misfortunes, proceeded from his having lived so little time among his equals, that he knew not how to treat his inferiors; which was the source of all the ill that befel him, having thereby drawn such prejudice against him from persons of inferior quality, who yet thought themselves too good to be contemned, that they pursued him to death. The king's army was no sooner defeated at Worcester, but the Parliament renewed their old method of murdering in cold blood, and sent a Commission to erect a High Court of Justice to persons of ordinary quality, many not being gentlemen, and all notoriously his enemies, to try the earl of Derby for his treason major gen. Mitton, &c." The said Court being assembled together, after silence proclaimed, the names of the officers were called over; where were present as followeth:

A List of the Names of the Officers at a Court-Martial holden at Chester, on the 1st of October, for Trial of the Earl of Derby, Sir Timothy Fetherstonhaugh, and Captain Benbow.

Col. Humphry Mackleworth, President.
Maj. Gen. Mitton.	Samuel Smith.
Col. R. Duckenfield.	John Downes.
Col. H. Bradshaw.	Vincent Corbet.
Col. T. Croxton.	John Delves.
Col. G. Twistleton.	John Griffith.
Lt. Col. H. Birkenhead	Tho. Portington.
Lt. Col. Simon Finch.	Edward Alcock.
Lt. Col. Newton.	Ralph Pownall.
Captains;	Richard Grantham.
James Stepford.	Edward Stelfax.

After the Court was proclaimed, the President gave order for the prisoner to be brought to the bar; and accordingly he was guarded from the Castle to the said Court, where Judge Mackworth read the act of parliament, prohibiting correspondence with Charles Stuart, or his party. And when his lordship came to the latter clause of the said act, viz. "That whosoever shall offend against this act and declaration, shall or may be proceeded against by a Council of War, who are hereby authorised to hear and determine all and every the said offences; and such as shall by the said Council be condemned to suffer death shall also forfeit all his and their lands, goods, and other estate, as in case of High Treason." Upon which words, the earl of Derby said, "I am no Traitor, neither"—"Sir," replied the President, "your words are contemptible: You must be silent during the reading of the Act, and your Charge." After his lordship had read the said Charge of High Treason, &c. the earl pleaded, That he had quarter given him for his life by one captain Ege, which (said he) he conceived a good bar to avoid trial for life by a Council of War, unless he had committed some new fact since quarter given, that and rebellion; which they easily found him guilty of; and put him to death in a town of his own, against which he had expressed a severe displeasure for their obstinate rebellion against the king, with all the circumstances of rudeness and barbarity they could invent. The same night, one of those who was amongst his judges, sent a trumpet to the Isle of Man with a letter directed to the countess of Derby, by which he required her "to deliver up the castle and island to the Parliament:" nor did their malice abate, till they had reduced that lady, a woman of very high and princely extraction, being the daughter of the duke de Trimouille in France, and of the most exemplary virtue and piety of her time, and that whole most noble family, to the lowest penury and want, by disposing, giving, and selling, all the fortune and estate that should support it." Clarendon might bring him within the cognizance of a Court-Martial. Hereupon the Commissioners took the matter into consideration, and after a long and serious debate, they agreed to over-rule him in his Plea, and finding him Guilty of Treason, passed Sentence upon him in these words:

The SENTENCE against James, Earl of Derby.

1. Resolved, by the Court, upon the question, "That James, earl of Derby, is guilty of the breach of the said Act of the 12th of Aug. last past, entitled, 'An Act prohibiting correspondence with Charles Stuart, or his Party,' and so of High-Treason against the Commonwealth of England, and therefore is worthy of death."

2. Resolved, &c. "That the said James, earl of Derby, is a Traitor to the Commonwealth of England, and an abettor, encourager, and assister of the declared traitors and enemies thereof, and shall be put to death, by severing his head from his body, at the market-place, in the town of Boulton in Lancashire, upon Wednesday, the 15th of this instant October, about the hour of one o'clock of the same day."

No sooner was Sentence denounced, but immediately he was remanded back to the place from whence he came; and in hope of mercy, hath voluntarily writ a letter to his lady for the surrender of the Isle of Man, and to submit to the present government; but it is believed, that his lines are not effectual, though life be sweet, and his lordship exceeding desirous thereof. Yet the fatal blow is expected to be given at Boulton.

Wherein the just judgment of God upon this man is very remarkable, that in the same country where he first raised arms, drew the first blood, and had done so much mischief, yea, and in the very same town, where by his means so much blood had been spilt, when he caused Rupert's tragic march that way, it should be so brought about by his righteous providence, that he should now come to have his own blood shed there upon a scaffold before all the world; by the hand of public justice: but that he would had torn the bowels of his country by a pernicious war, should be censured by a court of war, to be made an example of divine vengeance in the midst of his country.

And now as to his plea of Quarter, it appears very clear, that the Commissioners had good reason to over-rule him, as they did, in that plea; because quarter for life belongs only to such as are Hostes, i. e. Enemies, not to such as are Perduelles, Traitors to their Country, the earl is a native of England, and therefore being taken fighting against England, cannot be accounted a competent enemy, nor in reason expect an exemption by quarter, which in this present cause is to be esteemed only a mere suspending of a present military execution, that the offender might be brought to punishment by due course of law: So that if the earl had well consulted the Act of the 12th of August last, whereupon he was tried, which authoriseth a Council of War to try delinquents against it, and considered himself an offender against that act, as guilty of High Treason against the land of his nativity, and this state and government, then he and his friends must needs have understood, That crimes of so high a nature, cannot be exempted by any particular officer, (who is only employed to attach and being such malefactors to trial, before the magistrate that set him on work) but are to be taken cognizance of by any persons, power or judicatory, appointed by the supreme authority against whom such delict is committed; and such was the Court Martial now in this case, they being persons empowered and designed by the parliament, to hear and determine cases of Treason, according to the tenor of the fore-mentioned Act.

But the earl's next plea was the ignorance of the Acts of Treason set forth by the Parliament. This was more slight than the former; for, every man being bound to take notice of the laws of this Commonwealth, under which he lives, or under whose power he comes, no man's ignorance can excuse, but rather aggravate his offence; besides, the very light of nature and common reason must needs have instructed him so far, as to know that it is the highest of all crimes, and treasons, for a man to lay designs, bear arms, and join with the declared enemy of his native country.

The honourable Court having proceeded to Sentence against the earl of Derby; in order to the further executing of justice, began with sir Timothy Fetherstonhaugh, and captain Benbow, and being brought to the bar, the President likewise caused the act of parliament to be read; as also their Charge, consisting of High Treason: and after a short speech by them made, touching the grounds and reasons of their Engagement, the Court proceeded to Sentence, and accordingly resolved as followeth.

The SENTENCE of the Court against sir Timothy Fetherstonhaugh.

1. Resolved upon the question, "That sir Timothy Fetherstonhaugh, is likewise guilty of the breach of the said Act of Parliament, of the 12th of August last past, and so of High-Treason against the Commonwealth of England, and is therefore worthy of death.

2. Resolved, &c. "That the said sir Timothy Fetherstonhaugh, as a Traitor to the Commonwealth of England, and an abettor, encourager, and assister, of the declared traitor and enemy thereof, shall be put to death by severing his head from his body, at some remarkable and convenient place in the city of Chester, upon Wednesday the 22nd of this instant October."

The SENTENCE of the Court against Captain John Benbow.

1. Resolved by the Court upon the question, "That captain John Benbow, is also guilty of the breach of the said Act of the 12th of Aug.

last, and so of High Treason against the Commonwealth of England, and is therefore worthy of death.

2. Resolved, &c. "That the said captain John Benbow, as a traitor to the Commonwealth of England, shall be shot to death at some convenient place in the town of Shrewsbury, upon Wednesday, the 15th of this instant October, about one of the clock the same day."

The earl of Derby's Confession, that they expected a general rising of the Presbyterians in Lancashire, they being provided both with arms and ammunition, and that they had laid a plot for the surprising of Liverpool.

He confesseth also, that when himself landed lately here in England, both Ashurst and Massey told him, they had a letter signed by the Scots king, and the ministers in his army, directed to the ministers of Manchester, which (he saith) their king himself also told him, to bestir themselves in the Scots behalf.

There hath been a Summons sent into the Isle of Man, by captain Young, for the surrender thereof to the Parliament of England; Whereupon the countess of Derby returned this Answer: "That she was appointed to keep the Isle of Man by her lord's command; which in duty she was bound to obey, and that therefore without his order and appointment she would not deliver it up to any."

Her ladyship is strongly fortifying Peson Castle, where the leaden crown is kept. It is situated upon an exceeding great rock, and thought to be impregnable.

The Parliament have given directions and instructions to the High Court of Justice, for the trial of divers gentlemen who stand accused for High Treason; a list of their names followeth:

Col. J. Vaughan.	Mr. Case.
Lt. Col. Jackson.	Mr. Jackson.
Capt. H. Massey, [brother to Col. Massey].	Mr. Jenkins.
Ministers.	Mr. Watson.
Dr. Drake.	Mr. Robinson. And
	Mr. Herrick.

The true SPEECH delivered on the Scaffold by James, Earl of Derby, in the Market-place at Boulton in Lancashire, on Wednesday last, being the 15th of this instant October, 1651. With the manner of his deportment and carriage on the Scaffold: his Speech concerning the King of Scots. And his Prayer immediately before his head was severed from his body. As also his Declaration and Desires to the People. Likewise, the manner how the King of Scots took shipping at Gravesend, on the 4th of this instant October, with Captain Hind, disguised in seamen's apparel, and safely arrived at the Hague, in Holland.

On Wednesday last, being the 15th of this instant October, the earl of Derby was brought to the Place of Execution (the Scaffold) being erected and set up in the place where the Cross formerly stood) attended by divers gentlemen and others: And where were present many hundreds of people, who came from several parts adjacent to behold this object of compassion. As soon as his lordship came upon the Scaffold he took up the block, and kissed it, saying; "I hope there is no more but this block between me and heaven; and I hope I shall never tire in my way, nor go out of it." Then turning to the people and putting off his hat, he spake as followeth:

"Christian gentlemen and people; Your business hither to day, is to see a sad spectacle, a peer of the land to be in a moment unmanned, and cut off by an untimely end: And though truly, if my general course of life were but enquired into, I may modestly say, there is such a moral honesty upon it, as some may be so peremptory as to expostulate why this great judgment has fallen upon me: But know that I am able to give them and myself an answer, and out of this breast (laying his hand upon his heart) to give a better account of my judgment and execution than my judges themselves or you are able to give; It is God's wrath upon me for sins long unrepented, of many judgments withstood and mercies slighted; therefore God hath whipped me by his severe rod of correction, that he might not lose me: I pray join with me in prayer, that it may not be a fruitless rod, that when by this rod I have laid down my life, by this staff I may be comforted and received into glory.

"As for my accusers, I am sorry for them, they have committed Judas's crimes; but I wish and pray for them Peter's tears, that by Peter's repentance they may escape Judas's punishment, and I wish other people so happy, they may be taken up betimes, before they have drunk more blood of Christian men possibly less deserving than myself.

"It is true, there have been several addresses made for mercy, and I will put the obstruction of it upon nothing more than upon my own sin, and seeing God sees it not fit (I having not glorified him in my life) I might do it in my death, which I am content to do: I profess in the face of God no particular malice to any one of the State or parliament, to do them a bodily injury I had none.

For the cause in which I had a great while waded, I must needs say, my engagement or continuance in it hath laid no scruple upon my conscience, it was on principles of law, the knowledge whereof I embrace, and on principles of religion, my judgment satisfied, and conscience rectified, that I have pursued those ways for which I bless God, I find no blackness upon my conscience, nor have I put it into the bead-roll of my sins.

"I will not presume to decide controversies; I desire God to honour himself in prospering that side that hath right with it, and that you may enjoy peace and plenty, when I shall enjoy peace and plenty, beyond all you possess here: in my conversation in the world, I do not know where I have an enemy with cause, or that there is such a person to whom I have a regret; but if there be any whom I cannot recollect, under the notion of Christian men I pardon them as freely as if I had named them by name, I freely forgive them, being in free peace with all the world, as I desire God for Christ sake to be at peace with me. For the business of death, it is a sad sentence in itself, if men consult with flesh and blood: But truly without boasting, I say it, or if I do boast, I boast in the Lord, I have not to this minute, had one consultation with the flesh about the blow of the axe, or one thought of the axe, more than as to my pass-port to glory.

"I take it for an honour, and I owe thankfulness to those under whose power I am, that they have sent me hither to a place however of punishment, yet of some honour to die a death, exceeding worthy of my blood, answerable to my birth and qualification, and this courtesy of theirs, hath much helped towards the pacification of my mind.

"I shall desire God that those gentlemen in that sad beadroll to be tried by the High Court of Justice, that they may find that really there that is nominal in the act; An High Court of Justice, a Court of High Justice, high in its righteousness, though not in its severity. "Father forgive them, and forgive me as I forgive them."

"I desire you that you would pray for me, and not give over praying till the hour of death, nor till the minute of death, for the hour is come already; that as I have a very great load of sins, so I may have the wings of your prayers, to help those angels that are to convey my soul to heaven, hoping this day to see Christ in the presence of the Father, and myself there to rejoice with all other saints and angels for evermore.

"One thing more I desire to be clear in. There lieth a common imputation upon the king's party, that they are Papists, and under that name we are made odious to those of the contrary opinion. I am not a Papist, but renounce the pope with all his dependencies; when the distractions in religion first sprang up, I might have been thought apt to turn from this church to the Roman, but was utterly unsatisfied in their doctrine, in point of faith, and very much, as to their discipline. The religion which I profess is that which passeth under the name of Protestant, though that be rather a name of distinction, than properly essential to religion. But the religion which was found out in the Reformation purged from all the errors of Rome, in the reign of Edw. 6. practised in the reigns of queen Elizabeth, king James, and king Charles, that blessed prince deceased, that religion before it was defaced, I am of, which I take to be Christ's Catholic, though not the Roman Catholic religion: in the profession and practice whereof, I will live and die, that for my religion."

Then he turned himself unto the Executioner, "I have no reason to quarrel with thee, thou art not the hand that throws the stone

‘———there is three pound for thee. Now tell me what I lack.’

Executioner. ‘Your hair to be turned up, my lord.’

Derby. ‘Shew me how to fit myself upon the block.’

After which his doublet being off, and hair turned up, he turned again to the people, and prayed a good while. Before he laid down upon the block, he spake again to the people, viz: ‘There is not one face that looks upon me, though many faces, and perhaps different from me in opinion and practice, but (methinks) hath something of pity in it, and may that mercy which is in your hearts, fall into your own bosoms when you have need of it; and may you never find such blocks of sin to stand in the way of your mercy, as I have met with. I beseech you join with me in prayer.’ Then he prayed (leaning on the Scaffold) with an audible voice for about a quarter of an hour; having done, he had some private conference with Dr. Green, then taking his leave of his friends and acquaintance, saluting them all with a courteous valediction, he prepared himself for the block, kneeling down said, Let me try the block, which he did, after casting his eyes up, and fixing them very intently upon heaven, he said, ‘When I say, Lord Jesus receive me, Executioner do thine office,’ then kissing the axe he laid down, and with as much undaunted, yet Christian courage as possibly could be in man, did he expose his throat to the fatal axe, his life to the Executioner, and commended his soul into the hands of God, as into the hands of a faithful and merciful Creator, through the meritorious passion of a gracious Redeemer, saying the forementioned words, his head was smitten off at one blow.

The Earl of Derby his FUNERAL SERMON:
Preached by Doctor Green, on Tuesday, in the afternoon before his lordship was executed.

Beloved, when we come to die, we shall be stript naked of three things. 1. We shall be stript naked of all our worldly honour, riches, and greatness. 2. We shall be stript naked of our bodies. And 3. Which is above all, we shall be stript naked of our sins. And that is the happiness of a child of God, he shall put off, not only his mortal body, but the body of sin.

4. In the fourth place observe, as no man knoweth the time when he falls asleep, a man falls asleep before he is aware: So no man can tell the certain time when he must die. There is nothing so certain as that we must die, nothing so uncertain as the time when we shall die; Death comes suddenly even as sleep comes upon a man before he is aware.

5. When a man goeth to sleep, he goeth to sleep but for a certain time, in the morning he awakes out of sleep. So it is with the sleep of death; and therefore death is called a sleep, because we must all awake in the morning of the resurrection. We are in the grave, as in our beds, and when the trumpet of God, and the voice of the archangel shall sound, we shall all rise out of our grave, as out of our beds. Death is but a sleep for a certain time.

6. Sleep is a great refreshing to those that are weary and sick, and when the sick man awakes, he is more lively and chearful than he was when he fell asleep; and therefore sleep is called, “Medicus laborum redintegratio virium recreator corporum.” The great physician of the sick body, the redintegration of man’s spirits, the reviver of the weary body. And so it is with death, when God’s people awake out of the sleep of death, they shall be made more active for God than ever they were before; when you lie down in the grave, you lie down with mortal bodies; “It is sown a mortal body, but it shall rise up an immortal body, it is sown in dishonour, but it shall rise up in honour; it is sown a natural body, but it shall rise up a spiritual body.”

7. When we rise out of our beds, we then put on our cloaths, so in the morning of the resurrection, we shall put on a glorious body, like to the glorious body of Jesus Christ, we shall put on Stolam immortalitatis, the garment of immortality.

8. As no man when he layeth him down to sleep, knoweth the direct time when he shall awake. So no man can tell when the resurrection shall be. They do but cozen you, who say, that the general resurrection shall be such or such a year; for as no man can know the minute when he shall awake out of his natural sleep, no more can any man know when we shall arise from the sleep of death.

9. It is a very easy thing to awake a man out of sleep, it is but jogging of him, and you will quickly awake him.

10. As when a man ariseth in the morning, though he hath slept many hours: nay suppose he could sleep 20 years together, yet notwithstanding, when he awakes, those 20 years will seem to be but as one hour unto him. So it will be at the Day of Judgment, all those that are in their graves, when they awake, it will be tantum somnus unius horæ, but as the sleep of an hour unto them.

Lastly, and most especially, as sleep seizeth only upon the body, and the outward senses, but doth not seize upon the soul, the soul of man is many times most busy, when the man is asleep: And God hath heretofore revealed most glorious things to his children in dreams, when they have been asleep; God appeared unto Abraham and many others in dreams, the body sleeps, but the soul awakes. So it is with the sleep of death, the body that dies, but the soul doth not die. There are some men that are not afraid to teach you, that the soul sleeps as well as the body, and that when the body dies and falls asleep, the soul likewise continues in a dull lethargy extremum somno correptus, neither capable of joy nor sorrow, until the resurrection. Beloved, this is a very uncomfortable, and a very false doctrine. They endeavour to prove it from my text, they say that Stephen when he died fell asleep; It is true in regard of his body, he fell asleep, but his soul did not fall asleep, that which was stoned fell asleep, which was his body only; for when he was stoning, he saw Jesus Christ standing ready to receive his soul into heaven; 'Lord Jesus,' saith he, 'receive my spirit.' Stephen's soul could not be stoned, though his body was stoned. So when Jesus Christ was crucified, his soul was not crucified. I mean, when his body was killed his soul was not killed, indeed he did endure torments in his soul, which made him cry out "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" But yet his soul did not die. So when Stephen died, his soul went to Christ. It is true when a child of God dies, the soul goes to sleep; How is that? The soul goes to sleep in a Scripture-sense, that is, it goes to rest in Abraham's bosom (O blessed sleep) it goes to rest in the embraces of God, it goes into the arms of its Redeemer, it goes to the heavenly Paradise, it goes to be always present with the Lord. But take heed of that wicked opinion, to say that the soul sleeps in an Anabaptistical sense; that is, that it lies in a strange kind of lethargy, neither dead, nor alive; neither capable of joy nor sorrow, until the resurrection. Though Stephen's body fell asleep, yet his soul did not fall asleep, but immediately went unto Jesus Christ in heaven. Thus I have given the explication of the words.

Now give me leave to make some application of all unto ourselves.

If the death of God's children be nothing else but a falling asleep, then let this comfort us against the deaths of our godly friends, though they die unnatural and violent deaths, though they be stoned to death, though they be burnt to ashes, though they be sawn asunder, &c. Here is a message of rich consolation, which as a minister of Christ I hold out unto you this day, viz. That the death of a child of God, let it be after what manner soever it will, it is nothing else but a falling asleep; he goes to his grave as to his bed; and therefore our burying places are called 'xominetèria, domitoria,' our sleeping-houses. A child of God when he dies he lies down in peace, and enters into his rest.

Dr. Green, being upon the scaffold, spake as followeth to the earl of Derby:

You have this morning in the presence of a few, given some account of your religion, and under general notions or words, have given an account of your faith, charity, and repentance.

To those on the scaffold if you please to hear the same questions asked here, you shall find that it may be a general testimony to you all, that he died in the favour of God.

Now Sir, I begin to deal with you: you do acknowledge that this stroke you are by and by to suffer, is a just punishment laid upon you by God, for your former sins.

Derby. I dare not only not deny it, but dare not but confess it, I have no opportunity of glorifying God more, than by taking shame to myself, and I have a reason of the justice of God in my own bosom, which I have put to your bosom.

Doctor. You acknowledge you deserve more than this stroke of the ax, and that a far greater misery is due to you, even the pains and torments of hell that the damned there endure?

Derby. I know it is due in righteous judgment, but I know again, I have a satisfaction made by my elder brother Christ Jesus, and then I say it is not due, it is due from me, but quitted by his righteousness.

Doctor. Do you believe to be saved by that mediator and none others?

Derby. By that and that only, renouncing all secondary causes whatsoever.

Doctor. Are you truly and unfeignedly sorry before God, as you appear to us, for all those sins that have brought you hither?

Derby. I am sorry, and can never be sorrowful enough, and am sorry I can be no more sorry.

From Heath's Royal Martyrs, p. 338.

A true Copy of the SPEECH of the Right Hon. JAMES EARL OF DERBY, upon the Scaffold at Bolton in Lancashire, together with his Deportment and Prayer before his death, on Wednesday Oct. 15th 1651.

The earl of Derby, according to the order of the court-martial held at Chester, by which he was sentenced to die at Bolton in Lancashire, was brought to that town with a guard of horse and foot of col. Jones's, commanded by one Southley, who received his order from col. Robert Duckenfield, betwixt 12 and 1 of the clock on Wednesday the 15th of October, the people weeping, praying, and bewailing him all the way from the prison at Chester, to the place of his death.

He was brought to a house in the town near the Cross, where the scaffold was raised: and as he passed by, said, Venio Domine. 'I am prepared to fulfil thy will, O my God: this scaffold must be my cross: Blessed Saviour, I take it up willingly, and follow thee.' From thence going into a chamber with some friends and servants, he was advertised by the commander in chief, that he had till 3 o'clock allowed him to prepare for death, for indeed the scaffold was not ready; the people of the town and country generally refusing to carry so much as a plank, or strike a nail, or to lend any assistance to that work, their cry being generally in the streets: 'O sad day, O woful day! shall the good earl of Derby die here? Many sad losses have we had in this war, but none like unto this; for now the ancient honour of our country must suffer here.' And to add to his trouble, most of the timber that built the scaffold, was of the ruins of Latham-house; but nothing could alter his lordship's resolution and courage: for with a steadfast composed countenance, and a cheerful, he called the company which were present to prayers with him, wherein he shewed admirable fervency, and a kind of humble importunity with Almighty God, that he would pardon his sins, be merciful to his soul; and be gracious to this land, in restoring the king, laws and liberty; and that he would be a husband to his wife, a father to his children, and a friend to all those that suffered by his loss, or that had been friends to him.

"Rising from prayer, he sat down with a very pleasant countenance; and assured the standers by, that God had heard his prayers, which the blessed spirit of God witnessed unto him, in the present comforts he now felt in his soul. Then he entered into a discourse of his life, and beseeched God to forgive him the days and time he had mis-spent; and said, it was his comfort, that although he had not walked so circumspectly as he ought to have done, yet he ever had a sense of his sins, and a tender respect to all the services, servants and ordinances of his God; and that he knew God had mercy for him, that he had strengthened and comforted him against all the terrors of death.

"After these, and some other words to this purpose, he desired his friends and the people by to pray with him again; which when he had ended, rising from his knees, he appeared fully satisfied of a gracious return to his prayers, and never after shewed any sadness in his countenance.

"His next business was with his son the lord Strange, whom he publicly charged to be dutiful to his sad mother, affectionate to his distressed brothers and sisters, and studious of the peace of his country; But especially, said he, son, I charge you upon my blessing, and upon the blessings you expect from God, to be ever dutiful to your distressed mother, ever obedient to her commands, and ever tender how you in any thing grieve or offend her; She is a person well known to the most eminent personages of England, France, Germany and Holland, noted for piety, prudence, and all honourable virtues; and certainly the more you are obedient to her, the more you will encrease in favour with God and man.

"Then desired to be private in the room himself: where he was observed to be about half an hour upon his knees with frequent interjections of groans and sighs before his God. Then when he called the company in again, his eyes witnessed to us, that he had abundantly mixed tears with his prayers; he told us that he was very willing to leave the world, being assured by the testimony of God's spirit, that he should be carried from trouble, to rest and peace, from sorrow to joy, from life to death, and that death had no other bitterness in it to him, but that it took him from his dear wife and children; whom he humbly commended to the protection and providence of a better husband, and a better father; and that he did not doubt, but that the general, and they who sat in the seat of authority, would make provision for them, hoping that his death might satisfy all those who sought his life, whom he freely forgave, and desired God to do the like. Then calling for his son, he took his leave of him, and blessed him; which indeed would have grieved any one's heart, though never so hardened, to see the parting of him now with his son, and with his two daughters, the lady Catharine, and lady Amely Stanley, upon the road betwixt Chester and Bolton the day before.

"This ended, he called the officer, and told him he was ready. In his way to the scaffold, the people prayed, and wept, and cried aloud; to whom his lordship with a cheerful countenance, and courteous humbleness, said, 'Good people, I thank you, and I beseech you still pray for me, and our blessed God return your prayers back into your own bosoms: The God of mercies bless you, the Son of God establish you in righteousness, and the Holy Ghost fill you with all comforts.' Coming near the scaffold, he looked up and said, 'God I thank thee, I am not afraid to go up here, though I am to die there; there are but these few steps to my eternity.' Then kissing the ladder, he went up and saluted the people: he walked a turn or two upon the scaffold, then went to the east-end of the scaffold, and pulled off his hat again and saluted the people with a cheerful countenance, said:

"I am come by the will of my heavenly Father to die in this place; and I thank God I do with all willingness and readiness submit to his most blessed will.

"It is a place I desired to see when I was last in the country, both for the mutual obligations that have been betwixt this town and my family, as also for your particular respects to me, whom I have understood to be ready to clear me from that foul imputation, That I was a man of blood; and that particularly, I killed one Bootle here in cold blood: I doubt not but there are here many men present, both that day this town was taken, and divers other times during this war, that can justify I preserved many lives, but I know there is not any one present, that can lay the blood of any man whatsoever to my charge, unless what might casually happen in the fury and heat of a battle; and why I die in this town, I know not; unless it be to persuade the Nation that I fall as a sacrifice for that blood, which some said I shed here, from which I am acquitted before you, and from which I had also cleared myself before my grand judges at Westminster, had they pleased to hear me, before they had destroyed me; that report being hastily brought up among them, by some that I hope God hath forgiven, and too readily drunk in by others, whom I pray God to forgive. As for my crime (as some are pleased to term it), which was objected against me by the council of war (for Bootle's death was never mentioned against me there, that being only secretly used to raise a prejudice against me in the judgments of such as did not know me), my crime (I say) though I hope it deserves a far better name, was, That I came into my own country with my own lawful king; I came in obedience to his majesty's call, whom both by the laws of God, and the laws of this land, I conceived myself obliged to obey; and according to the protestation I took in parliament in the time of that blessed prince his father; so, if it be my crime, I here confess it again before God, angels, and men, That I love monarchy as the best government, and I die with love and honour: and for the love and honour I bear to my master that now is, Charles the Second of that name, whom I myself in this country proclaimed King: the Lord bless and preserve him, and incline the hearts of those that have power in this nation, to accept him to his father's throne with honour and peace, for certainly, as I believe, this nation will never be well contented, never thoroughly happy without a king; so I believe also, that king Charles the Second, our now lawful king, were he a stranger to this crown, were the most fit, and most accomplished prince that this day lives, to take the government of this people; his admirable piety, virtue, justice, great valour and discretion, far above so few years, doth now make him in all places he comes highly beloved, and will hereafter make him honourable among all nations: and I wish the people of this nation so much happiness (when my eyes are closed) that he may peaceably be received to the enjoyment of his just right, and then they shall never want their just rights, which till then, they will always want.

"As for my being in arms in the beginning of this war, I profess here in the presence of my God, before whom in a few minutes I must make an account for this profession, I only fought for peace, and settling the late king my master in his just rights, and maintenance of the laws of this land, and that I had no other design, intent or purpose for my then taking up arms: and for this last engagement, I profess here again in the presence of the same God, that I did it for the restoring of my lawful sovereign into that throne, out of which his father was most unchristianly and barbarously taken, by the most unjust Sentence of a pretended Court of Justice, and himself against law and all justice kept out and dispossessed of; and this was all my reason. For as for estate and quality, I wanted not a sufficient competency, neither was I ever ambitious to enlarge either: for by the favour of my king's predecessors, my family was raised to a condition well known in this country: and now it is as well known, that by his enemies I am adjudged to die, and that by new and monstrous laws, as making me an enemy to my country: as fighting for my country, as a traitor to the laws, for endeavouring to preserve laws: But, Oh! God give me grace to consider him who suffered such contradictions of sinners, and O my God, assert the king to his father's throne, assert the laws to their former honour, and restore thy own religion in its purity, that all these shadows and false pretences of religion may vanish away, and our children's posterities may serve thee in spirit and in truth.

"Good friends, I die for the King, the Laws of the Land, and the Protestant Religion maintained in the Church of England, all which as I was ready to maintain with my life, so I cheerfully suffer for them; in this welcome death."

[At which words 'King' and 'Laws,' a trooper said aloud, 'We will neither have King, Lord, nor Laws;' and upon a sudden the soldiers being either surprised with fear at a strange noise that was heard, or else falling into mutiny, presently fell into a tumult, riding up and down the streets, cutting and slashing the people, some being killed and many wounded: his lordship looking upon this sad spectacle, said thus, 'Gentlemen, it troubles me more than my own death, that others are hurt, and (I fear) die for me; I beseech you stay your hands, I fly not, you pursue not me, and here are none to pursue you.' But being interrupted in his speech, and not permitted to go on further, (for which the officers were very much troubled) he turned aside to his servant, and gave him the Speech into his hand, saying, 'I will speak to my God, who I know will hear me, and when I am dead, let the world know what I would have said.' Here his lordship was interrupted; but it was as follows, in his own copy under his own hand.]

"I am sentenced to death by a Council of War, after quarter for life, and assurance for honourable and safe usage by captain Edge, I had reason to have expected the Council would have justified my plea, which hath been ancient, honourable, sacred and unviolable, until this time that I am made the first suffering precedent; for I dare affirm it, that never gentleman before in any Christian nation was adjudged to death by a council of war after quarter given; I am the first, and I pray God I may be the last precedent in this case: I must die, and I thank God I am ready for it; death would be now my choice, had I the whole world in competition with it. I leave nothing behind me which I much care for, but my king, my wife, my children, my friends, whom (I trust) the never-failing mercies of my God will provide for: I beseech God shew mercy to those who neither had mercy nor justice for me: My blessed Saviour taught me by his example and command, both to pray for my enemies, and to forgive my enemies: I forgive them freely, even those that contrived my ruin, and pursued me to death; I thank God I never personally offended them to my knowledge in my life, and let me not offend against them at my death: I forgive them freely, and pray God for Christ's sake to forgive them also.

"Of my faith and religion, I shall not (I hope) need to say much, herein I hope my enemies (if now I have any) will speak for me. I profess my faith to be in God only, from whom I look for my salvation through the precious merits and sufferings of my blessed Saviour, Jesus Christ, which merits and sufferings are applied to my soul, by the blessed spirit of comfort, the spirit of God, by whom I am assured in my own soul, that my God is reconciled unto me in Jesus Christ my blessed Redeemer.

"I die a dutiful son to the Church of England, as it was established in that blessed prince my late master's reign, which all men of learning and temperance will acknowledge to be the most pure, and agreeable to the word of God, and primitive government of any church within 12 or 1300 years since Christ, and which (to my great comfort) I left established in the Isle of Man; God preserve it there and restore it to this nation.

"And O blessed God, I magnify thy name, that thou gavest me the happiness and mercy to be born in a Christian nation, and in a nation where thy truth was professed in purity: With honour to thy name, and comfort to thy people, I ascribe the comforts of thy Holy Spirit which I feel in my bosom, to the ministry of thy word and sacraments conveyed unto me in thy church, and made effectual by the operation of the same blessed spirit. In this faith, good people, I have lived and in this I die: pray for me, I beseech you, and the God of mercies hear your prayers and my prayers, for mine and your salvation.

"Presently after the tumult was over, his lordship called for the Headsman, and asked to see the axe, and taking it in his hand, said 'Friend, I will not hurt it, and I am sure it cannot hurt me;' and then kissing it, said, 'Me thinks this is as a wedding ring, which is as a sign I am to leave all the world, and eternally to be married to my Saviour.' Then putting his hand in his pocket, said to the Headsman, 'Here friend, take these two pieces, all that I have, thou must be my priest, I pray thee do thy work well and effectually.' Then handling the rough furred coat the Headsman had on, 'This' (says he) 'will be troublesome to thee: I pray thee put it off, and do it as willingly as I put off this garment of my flesh, that is now so heavy for my soul;' then some of the standers by bid the Headsman kneel and ask his lordship pardon; but he did not, but was surly and crabbed: but his lordship said, 'Friend, I give thee the pardon thou wilt not ask, and God forgive thee also.' Then turning up his eyes to heaven, said aloud, 'How long Lord? how long?' then gently passing over the scaffold, and seeing one of his chaplains on horseback among the people, 'Good Sir' (said he) 'pray for me, and the Lord return your prayers into your own bosom, and I pray remember me kindly to your brother, and God remember him for his love to me and mine.

"Then turning towards his coffin, 'Thou art' (said he) 'my bridal chamber, in thee I shall rest without a guard, and sleep without soldiers.'

"Then looking towards the block, he asked if all were ready. 'That' (said he) 'methinks is very low, and yet there is but one step betwixt that and heaven;' then turning his eyes to the people he saluted them, and desired again their prayers; then said, 'I see your tears, and hear your sighs and groans and prayers: the God of heaven hear and grant your supplications for me, and mine for you, and the mediation of Christ Jesus for us all.'

"Here his lordship caused the block to be turned, that he might look upon the church, saying, 'Whilst I am here, I will look towards thy holy sanctuary, and I know that within a few minutes, I shall behold thee my God and king in thy sanctuary above, under the shadow of thy wings shall be my rest till this calamity be overpast;' then he pulled off his blue garter, and sent it to his son, and pulling off his doublet, with a very religious cheerfulness, he said, 'I come, Lord Jesus, and O come thou quickly,' that I may be with thee for ever: upon this he said, 'Pray tell me how must I lie, I have been called a bloody man, yet truly I never yet had that severe curiosity to see any put to death in peace:' then laying himself down on the block, after a few minutes he rose again, and caused the block to be a little removed; then said to the headsman, 'Friend, remember what I said to thee: and be no more afraid to strike than I to die; and when I put up my hand, do thy work;' so looking round about his friends and the people, he said, 'The Lord bless you all, and once more pray for me and with me;' at which words he kneeled down, and prayed privately within himself, with great sighings, about half a quarter of an hour, concluding with the Lord's Prayer, then rising up again, he said, smilingly, 'My soul is now at rest, and so shall my body be immediately. The Lord bless my king, and restore him to his right in this kingdom, and the Lord bless this kingdom, and restore them to their rights in their king, that he and they may join hand in hand to settle truth and peace; and the Lord bless this county, and this town, and this people. The Lord comfort my sad wife and children, and reward all my friends with peace and happiness, both here and hereafter; and the Lord forgive them who were the cause and authors of this my sad end and unjust death, for so it is as to mankind; though before God I deserve much worse, but I hope my sins are all bathed in the blood of Jesus Christ.' So laying his neck upon the block, and his arms stretched out, he said these words: 'Blessed be God's glorious name for ever and ever. Let the whole earth be filled with his glory. Amen, Amen.'

"At which words, he gave the headsman the sign; but he either not observing it, or not being ready, stayed too long, so that his lordship rose up again, saying, 'Why do you keep me from my Saviour? what have I done that I die not, and that I may live with him? Once more I will lay myself down in peace, and so take my everlasting rest.' Then saying, 'Come Lord Jesus, come quickly,' he stretched out his arms, and gave the sign, repeating the same words: 'Blessed be God's glorious name for ever and

'ever. Let the whole earth be filled with his glory. Amen, Amen.'

"Then lifting up his hand, the Executioner did his work at one blow, all the people weeping and crying, and giving all expressions of grief and lamentation.

"When the corps were carried off the scaffold, they carried them to a house in the town, where was thrown into his coffin in a piece of paper these two lines:

Upon JAMES, Earl of DERBY.

'Bounty, Wit, Courage, all (here) in one lie dead.

'A Stanley's hand, Vere's heart, and Cecil's head.

From Whitlocke's Memorials, p. 486.

October 6. 1651. Letters, That the earl of Derby was tried at a Court-Martial at Chester, at which were 20 officers, captains, and above that degree, five colonels, major-general Mitton, and colonel Mackworth the President. That the Earl confessed the Plot for a general rising of the Presbyterians in Lancashire, to join with the King; but it was disappointed by the apprehending of Mr. Birkenhead. That sir Tho. Tiddesly, major Ashurst, and major-general Massey, were principal actors in that Conspiracy. He confessed the matters of Treason charged against him, and submitted to the mercy of Parliament. And for plea, 1. He alleged 'he had quarter given him, and therefore was not to be tried by a Court-Martial for life;' but this was over ruled by the Court. 2. He pleaded 'ignorance of the acts of treason set forth by the Parliament;' which plea was also over-ruled; and the Court sentenced him to be beheaded for his treasons at Bolton, where he had killed a man in cold blood. The Earl seemed very desirous of life, and petitioned the Lord General upon the point of his having quarter, but had no relief from him. The Court sentenced sir Tim. Fetherston to be beheaded for the same treasons; and capt. Benbow to be shot to death.

Oct. 8. Letters, That captain Young, who commanded the President frigate, coming to the Isle of Man, summoned it for the Parliament; but the countess of Derby being there, returned answer, 'That she was to keep it by her Lord's command, and without his order she would not deliver it up, being in duty bound to obey her Lord's commands.'

Oct. 13. Letters, That the earl of Derby attempted to escape, and was let down by a rope from the leads of his Chamber, but some hearing a noise, made after him; and that he was re-taken upon Dee Bank. He wrote a handsome passionate Letter to his lady to comfort her, and advised her, as then matters stood, to surrender the Isle of Man upon good conditions.

Oct. 20. Letters of the particulars of the earl of Derby's death; who carried himself with stoutness and Christian-like temper.

Nov. 1. Letters, That sir Tim. Fetherston was executed at Chester, according to the sentence of the Court-Martial, and used only a few prayers out of the Common-Prayer-Book.

From 2 Collins's Peerage, 46. Edit. 1735.

James the seventh earl of Derby, was a person highly accomplished with learning, prudence, loyalty, and true valour; whereof he gave signal proofs on several occasions in the civil wars, especially in that memorable encounter in Wigan-Lane, where with 600 horse he maintained a fight of two hours against 3000 horse and foot, commanded by col. Lilburne; and though in that action he received seven shot on his breast-plate, thirteen cuts on his beaver, five or six wounds on his arms and shoulders, and had two horses killed under him, yet he made his way to king Charles at Worcester; whence, upon the loss of the day there, Sept. 3, 1651, he fled with him into Staffordshire, where, leaving the king secure, and shifting for himself, he had the misfortune to be taken in Cheshire by col. Edge, who had him tried by a court-martial, which voted him guilty of the breach of an act of the 12th of August 1651, entitled, An Act for prohibiting all correspondence with Charles Stuart or his party; and accordingly he was sentenced to death, and beheaded at Bolton in Lancashire, Oct. 15, 1651, and buried at Ormskirk.

His behaviour and Speech on the scaffold were very remarkable, which having not yet been published, I shall here insert.

A true Relation of the Death of this great man, given by Mr. Bageley, who attended on him.

Upon Morday Oct. 13, 1651, my lord procured me liberty to wait upon him, having been close prisoner ten days. He told me the night before, Mr. Slater, colonel Duckenfeld's chaplain, had been with him from the governor, to persuade his lordship, that they were confident his life was in no danger; but his lordship told me, he heard him patiently, but did not believe him, for, says he, 'I was resolved not to be deceived with the vain hopes of this fading world.' After we had walked a quarter of an hour, he discoursed his own commands to me, in order to my journey to the isle of Man; as to his consent to my lady, to deliver it on those articles his lordship had signed. With many affectionate protestations of his honour and respect for my lady, both for her birth and goodness as a wife, and much tenderness of his children there.

Then immediately came in one lieutenant Smith, a rude fellow, and with his hat on; he told my lord he came from colonel Duckenfeld the governor, to tell his lordship he must be ready for his journey to Bolton. My lord replied, 'when would you have me to go?' 'Tomorrow about six in the morning,' said Smith. Well, said my lord, 'commend me to the governor, and tell him, by that time I will be ready.' Then Smith said, 'Doth your lordship know any friend or servant that would do the thing that your lordship knows of? It would do well if you had a friend.' My lord replied, what do you mean? Would you have me find one to cut off my head?' Smith said, 'Yes, my lord, if you could have a friend.' My lord said, 'Nay, Sir, if those men that would have my head, will not find one to cut it off, let it stand where it is. I thank God, my life has not been so bad, that I should be instrumental to deprive myself of it, though he has been so merciful to me as to be well resolved against the worst terrors of death. And for me and my servants, our ways have been to prosecute a just war by honourable and just means, and not by these ways of blood, which to you is a trade.' Then Smith went out, and called me to him, and repeated his discourse and desires to me. I only told him, my lord had given him an answer. At my coming in again, my lord called for pen and ink, and writ his last letter to my lady, to my lady Mary, and his sons in the isle of Man. And in the mean time Mons. Paul Moreau, a servant of my lord's, went and bought all the rings he could get, and lapped them up in several papers, and writ within them, and made me superscribe them to all his children and servants. The rest of the day, being Monday, he spent with my lord Strange, my lady Katharine, and my lady Amelia. At night about six I came to him again, when the ladies were to go away. And as we were walking, and my lord telling me he would receive the Sacrament next morning, and on Wednesday morning both, in came the aforesaid Smith, and said, 'my lord, the governor desires you will be ready to go in the morning by seven o'clock.' My lord replied, 'lieutenant, pray tell the governor, I shall not have occasion to go so early; by nine o'clock will serve my turn, and by that time I will be ready, if he has not earnestest occasions he may take his own hour.' That night I staid, and at supper my lord was exceeding cheerful and well-composed; he drank to Sir Timothy Featherstone (who was a gentleman that suffered at Chester a week after in the same cause) and said, 'Sir, be of good comfort, I go willingly before you, and God hath so strengthened me, that you shall hear (by his assistance) that I shall so submit, both as a Christian and a soldier, as to be both a comfort and an example to you.' Then he often remembered my lady Mary, with my lady his wife, and his sons, and drank to me and all his servants, especially Andrew Broom; and said, he hoped that they that loved him, would never forsake his wife and children, and he doubted not but God would be a father to them, and provide for them after his death.

In the morning my lord delivered to me the letters for the island, and said, 'Here, Bagaley, deliver these with my tender affections to my dear wife, and sweet children, which shall continue with my prayers for them to the last minute of my life. I have instructed you as to all things for your journey. But as to that sad part of it (as to them) I can say nothing. Silence and your own looks will best tell your message. The great God of Heaven direct you, and prosper and comfort them in this their great affliction.' Then his lordship took leave of sir Timothy Featherstone, much in the same words as over night. When he came to the castle-gate, Mr. Crossen and three other gentlemen, who were condemned, came out of the dungeon (at my lord's request to the Marshal) and kissed his hand, and wept to take their leave. My lord said, 'God bless and keep you, I hope my blood will satisfy for all that were with me, and you will in a short time be at liberty; but if the cruelty of these men will not end there, be of good comfort, God will strengthen you, to endure to the last, as he has done me. For you shall hear I die like a Christian, a man, and a soldier, and an obedient subject, to the most just and virtuous prince this day living in the world.'

After we were out of town, the people weeping, my lord with an humble behaviour, and noble courage, about half a mile off, took leave of them, then of my lady Katharine and Amelia, upon his knees by the coach side (alighting for that end from his horses) and there prayed for them, and saluted them, and so parted. This was the saddest hour I ever saw, so much tenderness and affection on both sides.

That night, Tuesday the 14th of October 1651, we came to Leigh; but in the way thither, his lordship, as we rode along, called me to him, and bid me, when I should come into the isle of Man, to commend him to the archdeacon there, and tell him he well remembered the several discourses, that had passed between them there, concerning death and the manner of it; and he had often said the thoughts of death could not trouble him in fight, or with a sword in hand, but he feared it would something startle him, tamely to submit to a blow on the scaffold. But said his lordship, 'Tell the archdeacon from me, that I do now find in myself an absolute change, as to that opinion; for I bless God for it, who hath put this comfort and courage into my soul, that I can as willingly now lay down my head upon a block, as ever I did upon a pillow.'

My lord supped a competent meal, saying 'he would imitate his Saviour; a supper should be his last act in this world;' and indeed his Saviour's own supper before he came to his cross, which would be to-morrow. At night when he laid him down upon the right side, with his hand under his face, he said, 'Methinks I lie like a monument in a church, and to-morrow I shall really be so.'

As soon as he rose next morning, he put on a fresh shirt, and then said, 'this shall be my winding-sheet, for this was constantly my meditations in this action. See,' said he to Mr. Paul, 'that it be not taken away from me, for I will be buried in it.'

Then he called for my lord Strange to put on his Order, and said, 'Charles, once this day I will send it you again by Bagaley, pray return it to my gracious sovereign, when you shall be so happy as to see him; and say, I sent it in

‘all humility and gratitude, as I received it ‘spotless, and free from any stain, according to ‘the honourable example of my ancestors.’

Then we went to prayer, and my lord commanded Mr. Greenhaugh to read the Decalogue, and at the end of every commandment made his confession, and then received absolution, and the Sacrament; after which, and prayers ended, he called for pen and ink, and wrote his last speech, also a note to Sir E. S.

When we were ready to go, he drank a cup of beer to my lady, and lady Mary, and Masters, and Mr. Archdeacon, and all his friends in the island, and bid me remember him to them, and tell the archdeacon he said the old grace he always used, &c. Then he would have walked into the church, and seen Mr. Tildesley’s grave, but was not permitted, nor to ride that day upon his own horse; but they put him upon a little nag, saying they were fearful the people would rescue his lordship.

As we were going in the middle way to Bolton, the wind came easterly, which my lord perceived, and said to me, ‘Bagaley, there is a ‘great difference between you and me now,
‘for I know where I shall rest this night in ‘Wigan, with the prayers and tears of that poor ‘people, and every alteration moves you of ‘this world, for you must leave me to go to ‘my wife and children in the isle of Man, and ‘are uncertain where you shall be; but do not ‘leave me, if possibly you can, until you see ‘me buried, which shall be as I have told ‘you.’

Some remarkable Passages in my lord’s going to the Scaffold, and his being upon it, with his last Speech and dying Words.

Betwixt twelve and one o’clock on Wednesday, the earl of Derby came to Bolton, guarded with two troops of horse, and a company of foot; the people weeping and praying all the way he went, even from the castle, his prison at Chester, to the scaffold at Bolton, where his soul was freed from the prison of his body. His lordship being to go to a house in Bolton, near the cross, where the scaffold was raised, and passing by, he said, ‘This must be my cross.’ And so going into a chamber with some friends and servants, had time courteously allowed him by the commander in chief ‘till three o’clock that day, the scaffold not being ready, by reason the people in the town refused to strike a nail in it, or to give them any assistance: many of them saying, that since these wars they have had many and great losses, but none like this, it being the greatest that ever befell them, that the earl of Derby should lose his life there, and in such a manner. His lordship, as I told you, having ‘till three o’clock allowed him, I spent that time with those that were with him, in praying with them, and telling them how he had lived, and how he had prepared to die, how he feared it not, and how the Lord had strengthened him, and comforted him against the terrors of death; and after such like words, he desired them to pray with him again, and after that giving some good instructions to his son the lord Strange, he desired to be in private, where we left him with his God, where he continued upon his knees a good while in prayer. Then he called for us again, telling how willing he was to die and part this world, and that the fear of death was never any great trouble to him, never since his imprisonment, though he had still two or three soldiers with him, night and day in the chamber. Only the care he had of his wife and children, and the fear what would become of them, was often in his thoughts. But now he was satisfied, that God would be a husband and a father to them, into whose hands he committed them; and so taking leave of his son, and blessing him, he called for an officer, and told him he was ready. At his going towards the scaffold, the people prayed and cried, and cried and prayed. His lordship with a courteous humbleness said, ‘Good people, I thank you all, I beseech you to pray ‘for me to the last. The God of heaven bless ‘you, the Son of God bless you, and God the ‘Holy Ghost fill you with comfort.’ And so coming near the scaffold, he laid his hand on the ladder, saying, ‘I am not afraid to go up ‘here, though I am to die there;’ and so he kissed it and went up, and walking awhile upon the scaffold, settled himself at the east end of it, and made his address to the people thus, viz.

‘I come, and am content to die in this town,
‘where I endeavoured to come the last time
‘when I was in Lancashire, as to a place
‘where I persuaded myself to be welcome,
‘in regard the people thereof have reason to ‘be satisfied in my love and affection to them;
‘and that now they understand sufficiently. I ‘am no man of blood, as some have falsely ‘slandered me, especially in the killing of a ‘captain in this town. Whose death is de‘clared on oath, so as the time and place now ‘appears under the hand of a master in Chan‘cery, besides the several attestations of a gen‘tleman of honour in the kingdom, who was in ‘the fight in this town, and of others of good ‘report, both in the town and country; and I ‘am confident, there are some in this place,
‘who can witness my mercy and care, for ‘sparing many men’s lives that day.

‘As for my crime (as some are pleased to ‘call it) to come into this country with the ‘king, I hope it deserves a better name; for I ‘did it in obedience to his call, whom I hold ‘myself obliged to obey, according to the pro-‘testation I took in parliament in his father’s ‘time. I confess I love monarchy, and I love
‘my master Charles, the second of that name, ‘whom I myself proclaimed in this country to ‘be king. The Lord bless him and preserve
‘him, I assure you he is the most goodly, virtu‘ous, valiant, and most discreet king that I ‘know lives this day; and I wish so much hap‘piness to this people after my death, that he ‘may enjoy his right, and then they cannot ‘want their rights. I profess here in the pre' sence of God, I always fought for peace, and ' I had no other reason; for I wanted neither

' means, nor honours, nor did I seek to enlarge
' either. By my king's predecessors, mine ' were raised to a high condition, it is well ' known to the country; and it is as well ' known, that by his enemies, I am condemned ' to suffer by new and unknown laws. The ' Lord send us our king again, and our old laws
' again, and the Lord send us our religion
' again.

' As for that which is practised now, it has ' no name, and methinks there is more talk of ' religion than any good effects of it.

' Truly to me it seems I die for God, the ' King, and the Laws, and this makes me not to ' be ashamed of my life, nor afraid of my ' death.'

At which words, 'the King and Laws,' a trooper cried, 'We have no King, and we will ' have no Lords.' Then some sudden fear of mutiny fell among the soldiers, and his lordship was interrupted, which some of the officers were troubled at, and his friends much grieved, his lordship having freedom of speech promised him. His lordship seeing the troopers scattered in the streets, cutting and slashing the people with their swords, said, 'What is the mat' ter, gentlemen, where is the guilt, I fly not,
' and here is none to pursue you?' Then his lordship perceiving he might not speak freely, turned himself to his servant, and gave him his paper, and commanded him to let the world know what he had to say, had he not been disturbed, which is as follows, as it was in my lord's paper under his own hand:

' My Sentence upon which I am brought hi' ther, was by a Council of War, nothing in ' the captain's case alledged against me; which ' Council I had reason to expect would have ' justified my plea for Quarter, that being an ' ancient and honourable plea amongst sol' diers, and not violated (that I know of) till
' this time, that I am made the first suffering
' precedent in this case, I wish no other suffer
' in the like case.

' Now I must die, and am ready to die, I ' thank my God with a good conscience, with' out any malice, or any ground whatever;
' though others would not find mercy upon ' me, upon just and fair grounds, so my Sa' viour prayed for his enemies, and so do I for ' mine.

' As for my faith and my religion, thus much
' I have at this time to say.

' I profess my faith to be in Jesus Christ, who ' died for me, from whom I look for my salva' tion, that is, through his only merit and suf' ferings. And I die a dutiful son of the church ' of England, as it was established in my late ' master's time and reign, and is yet professed in ' the Isle of Man, which is no little comfort to ' me.'

' I thank my God for the quiet of my con' science at this time, and the assurance of ' those joys that are prepared for those that ' fear him. Good people pray for me, I do for ' you, the God of heaven bless you all, and

' send you peace, that God, that is truth it' self, give you grace, peace and truth. Amen.'

Presently after the uproar was ceased, his lordship was walking on the scaffold, called for the Headsman, and asked to see the axe, saying, 'Come, friend, give it me into my hand, I ' will neither hurt it nor thee, and it cannot hurt
' me, I am not afraid of it;' but kissed it, and so gave it the Headsman again. Then asked for the block, which was not ready, and turned his eyes and said, 'How long Lord, how long? Then putting his hand in his pocket, gave him two pieces of gold, saying, 'This is all I have, take it, and ' do thy work well. And when I am upon the ' block, and lift up my hand, then do your ' work; but I doubt your coat is too burly,' (being of great black shagg) 'it will hinder you ' or trouble you.' Some standing by, bid him ask his lordship's forgiveness, but he was either too sullen, or too slow, for his lordship forgave him before he asked him. And so passing to the other end of the scaffold, where his coffin lay, spying one of his chaplains on horseback among the troopers, said, 'Sir, remember me
' to your brothers and friends, you see I am ' ready, and the block is not ready, but when I ' am got into my chamber, as I shall not be ' long out of it,' pointing to his coffin, 'I shall ' be at rest, and not troubled with such a guard
' and noise, as I have been;' and so turning himself again, he saw the block, and asked if it was ready, and so going to the place where he began his speech, said, 'Good people, I thank ' you for your prayers, and for your tears, I ' have heard the one, and seen the other, and
' our God sees and hears both. Now the God ' of heaven bless you all, Amen.' And so bowing, turned himself towards the block, and then looking toward the church, his lordship caused the block to be turned, and laid that ways, saying, 'I will look towards the sanctuary which ' is above for ever.' Then, having his doublet off, he asked, 'how must I lie, will any one shew
' me, I never yet saw any man's head cut off;
' but let me try how it fits;' and so laying him down, and stretching himself upon it, he rose again, and caused it to be a little removed, and standing up, and looking towards the Heads-man, said, 'Remember what I told you, when ' I lift up my hands, then do your work.'

And looking at his friends about him, bowing said, 'the Lord be with you all, pray for ' me;' and so kneeling on his knees, made a short and private prayer, ending with the Lord's Prayer. And so bowing himself again, said,
' the Lord bless my wife and children, the Lord
' bless us all.' So laying his neck upon the block, and his arms stretched out, he said these words aloud:

' Blessed be God's glorious name, for ever
' and ever, Amen.

' Let the whole earth be filled with his glory,
' Amen.'

And then lifting up his hands, was ready to give up the ghost, but the Executioner not well observing, was too slow. So his lordship rose again, saying, 'What have I done that I die not? Why do not you your work?' (to the Headsman.) 'Well,' says his lordship, 'I will lay myself down once again in peace, and I hope I shall enjoy everlasting peace.' So laid him down again, with his neck to the block, and his arms stretched out, saying the same words,

'Blessed be God's glorious name for ever and ever.

'Let the whole earth be filled with his glory, Amen.'

And then lifting up his hands, the Executioner did his work, and no manner of noise was then heard but sighs and sobs*.

The following Article is extracted from the European Magazine, for January, 1795, p. 44.

SIR,
I send you a Pamphlet little known, though, from the manly spirit which breathes through the whole of it, well worthy of remembrance. "Among the sufferers for King Charles the First," says Lord Orford, in his Catalogue of Noble Authors, vol. i. p. 218, under the article of James Stanley, Earl of Derby, "None cast a greater lustre on the cause than this heroic Lord, who seems to have been actuated by a true spirit of honour and disinterestedness. Some contracted great merit from their behaviour in that quarrel; the conduct and brave death of this Lord were but the conclusion of a life of virtue, accomplishments, and humanity." This Nobleman was beheaded at Bolton, Oct. 15, 1651. The Declaration which I solicit you to insert appears to have been unknown to Lord Orford, who takes no notice of it; and indeed, that

* "Charlotte, daughter to Claude, duke de la Tourville, the conjugal counterpart of this gallant peer, behaved with exemplary prudence, dexterity and honour; and her defence of Latham-house for a whole month against an army of 2,000 men, may be recorded among the bravest actions of those times. She formed her garrison, appointed her officers, and commanded in chief during the whole siege, till it was raised by her royal lord. Having in the course of her command received a summons to surrender from colonel Rigby, she replied, in the spirit of her husband, 'Tell that insolent rebel Rigby, that if he presumes to send another summons within this place, I will have the messenger hanged up at the gates.' This circumstance is commemorated by a picture at Knowsley, in Lancashire. See Peck, Desid. Cur. lib. xi. p. 44, and Pennant's Tour to Alston Moor. Mr. Granger mentions her as the last person in the British dominions, who yielded to the Republican party." 3 Orford's Noble Authors, 41. Park's edit. A. D. 1806.

it should be suppressed is not to be wondered at, when the time in which it was printed is considered. The Letter to General Ireton, which Lord Orford calls "a model of brave, natural eloquence," has been often printed, but always, even by his lordship, incorrectly. By a mistake in the Pecrage, this Letter is supposed to have been addressed to Oliver Cromwell. I am, &c. C. D.

LETTER to GENERAL IRETON, in answer to his Summons of the Isle of Man.

SIR; I have received your letter with indignation, and with scorn return you this answer, that I cannot but wonder whence you should gather any hopes that I should prove, like you, treacherous to my sovereign; since you cannot be insensible of the manifest candour of my former actings in his late majesty's service, from which principles of loyalty I am no whit departed. I scorn your proffer, I disdain your favour, I abhor your treason; and am so far from delivering up this Island to your advantage, that I shall keep it with the utmost of my power to your destruction. Take this for your final answer, and forbear any further solicitation; for if you trouble me with any more messages of this nature, I will burn the paper, and hang the messenger. This is the immutable resolution, and shall be the undoubted practice, of him who accounts it his chief glory to be his majesty's most loyal and obedient servant,

From Castletown,

DERBY.

July 12, 1649.

A DECLARATION of the right honourable JAMES Earl of DERBY, Lord STANLEY STRANGE, of Knocking and of the Isle of Man, concerning his Resolution to keep the Isle of Man for his Majesty's service against all force whatsoever.—London: A. D. 1649.

Plausible beginnings are not always the forerunners of good ends. They may promise fair, but it is the end that either crowns all undertakings with reputation or brands them with shame; making a most exact discovery of the undertaker's intentions, whether good or evil. Many honest-meaning men, who eight years since viewed the face of the Parliament's actions, and judged of their integrity, their protestations and declarations, entertained a very charitable and honourable opinion both of them and their cause, and therein thought not too much to hazard both their lives and estates with them, who are long since sat down in the chair of repentance, having by sad experience found their large pretences to prove but the shadows of weak performances, and their greatest labours to produce no other effects than to burden this distracted nation with unheard-of tyranny and miserable oppression. But they that beheld their actions, even in their primitive and best times, with a considerate and judicious eye, did easily perceive them to pursue their own ambitious ends more than the welfare of this miserable land; that they were men whose thoughts were filled with blood, and judged them through pretence of zeal to be wolves in sheep's cloathing: and what better could be expected from the illegal proceedings of those men who presumed from servants to become masters, but that they should endeavour to bring in Democracy, and abolish Monarchy; their actions being altogether such as must needs produce strange effects, and set open the flood-gates of ruin to overflow this kingdom.

For my own part, I have with my utmost power and skill taken most perfect and exact notice of all their proceedings, from their first beginning of entrance into action unto this day; and therein can find nothing but a large comment upon that text of Samuel, "Rebellion is as the sin of witchcraft." I sat in their house of peers more than a full year, till finding their courses to be so strangely unparliamentary, I was constrained, with divers others of the loyal nobility, to forsake the house, and repair into my country, being truly ashamed to bear any part in their rebellious enterprizes, wherein they have proceeded with such impudent violence, that they have plundered and ruined all the ancient nobility and gentry of this kingdom; fought many desperate and bloody battles against their sovereign, his children, and subjects; imprisoned his sacred person; and not only so, but, that they might outgo all their predecessors in rebellion, and become unprecedented therein, they clouded the very rays of sacred majesty, in bringing the royal owner of the throne to their Bar of Injustice; and beyond all that, upon a scaffold, at high noon-day, in the face of the world, as a malefactor, before his own court-gate, in his usual place of recreation, after a most shameful manner, by the hands of the common hangman, inhumanly murdered their sovereign, unheaded the Lord's anointed; and not contented with his blood, in prosecution of their most deadly and implacable malice, have since, to the utmost of their power, endeavoured to stain the candour of his royal name, in fixing thereon the ignominious brands of Tyrant, Traitor, and Murderer: styling him, in all their prints, the grand and capital Enemy of the kingdom, and laying their guilt of all the blood that hath been shed upon his innocent shoulders: and beyond all this, have quite discarded, banished, and cashiered, all the royal issue, and solemnly proclaimed our present dread sovereign lord, King Charles the Second, and his princely brother the Duke of York, Traitors, in the usual places, to the amazement and detestation of the whole world.

And whereas there hath been of late some overtures made to me by one Henry Ireton, who stiles himself Commissary General of their army, whom his manners stiles the Parliament of England, in whose name and for whose service, he demands that I deliver up this Isle of Man; and for a grateful acknowledgment of that service, he engages on their part that I shall have an act of indemnity for all that I have done, and my lands to be restored to me without composition, and upon my engagement not to oppose the proceedings of the Parliament in their present government, I shall peaceably and quietly enjoy the same; in answer to which I declare, that according to the dictate of my own conscience and reason, and according unto the obligation I stood engaged unto his majesty my late dread sovereign, as well by my common allegiance as by my more particular duty of personal service, in the beginning of these unhappy differences and divisions of the kingdom, I engaged myself on his majesty's party, wherein I have constantly persevered, either in acting or suffering, until this day; concurring with those of the contrary party only in hating detestable neutrality.

According to my best ability I did diligently execute all such commissions as I did receive from his majesty; and did always use my utmost endeavour to retain the people in their due obedience unto him, as I shall ever faithfully practise towards my present sovereign, his son, holding myself bound unto him in the same bonds of allegiance and loyalty as I was to the late king, of ever-blessed memory, his father; and do hereby declare, that I do from my very soul abhor all base compliance with any of his majesty's enemies, whether foreign or domestic: and particularly if I could endure to be treacherous, I would never do it with the prevailing party in England, whom I know to have renounced all principles of civility, honour, honesty, and conscience; and whose engagements, vows, protestations, and oaths, I would not take as security for the least atom of dust on which I tread. And I do protest, in the presence of God and the whole world, that in balance to my allegiance, honour, and conscience, I scorn their pardon in reference to any thing I have acted or shall act hereafter: and I value my estate no more than the most contemptible mote that flies in the sun.

And I do hereby declare, that, to the utmost of my power, I shall faithfully endeavour to hold out this Island to the advantage of his majesty, and the annoyance of all rebels and their abettors, and do cheerfully invite all my allies, friends, and acquaintance, all my tenants in the counties of Lancaster and Chester, or elsewhere, and all other his majesty's faithful and loyal subjects, to repair to this Island as their general rendezvous and safe harbour, where they shall receive entertainment, and such encouragement as their several qualities and conditions shall require, where we will unanimously employ our forces to the utter ruin of these unmatchable and rebellious regicides, and the final destruction of their interest both by land and sea. Neither shall any apprehension of danger, either to my life or estate, appal me; but I shall on all occasions (by God's assistance) shew myself ready to express my duty and loyalty with the hazard of both: and this I shall adventure for the future with more alacrity, soasmuch as, in all my former actings in his majesty's service, I never did any thing, with reluction to the trust reposed in me, that awakens my conscience to repentance. DERBY.

"What reward his son had for this famous Earl's loyalty, will appear by the following Inscription, fixed by the present Earl of Derby on a building erected at Knowsley, his seat in Lancashire :

'JAMES EARL OF DERBY, LORD OF MAN AND THE ISLES, GRANDSON OF JAMES EARL OF

'DERBY, AND OF CHARLOTTE DAUGHTER OF 'CLAUDE DUKE DE LA TREMOUILLE, WHOSE 'HUSBAND JAMES WAS BEHEADED AT BOLTON, XV. OCTOB. MDCLII. 191. The Trial of Major RICHARD FAULCONER, at the Upper Bench Bar in Westminster-hall, upon an Indictment for Perjury : 5 CHARLES II. A. D. 1653.

THIS Trial, in the former Editions, appears to have been extracted from a Tract, entitled,

A true and perfect NARRATIVE

Of the several Proceedings in the Case concerning the LORD CRAVEN, before the Commissioners for Sequestrations and Compositions sitting at Haberdashers-hall, the Council of State, the Parliament : And upon the Indictment of Perjury, preferred and found against Major RICHARD FAULCONER, the single and material Witness against the Lord Craven, concerning the Petition to the King of Scots, which as the said Faulconer pretended, was promoted at Breda by the Lord Craven, and wherein, as the said Faulconer deposed, the Parliament, of England was stiled by the name of

"Barbarous and Inhuman Rebels."

Shortly after which Oath, the Lord Craven's Estate was voted by Parliament to be confiscated.

London : Printed by R. White. 1653.

The whole of this Narrative, together with the Preface to it, is here given.

To the READER.

At the Trial of Richard Faulconer, upon an Indictment of Perjury at the Upper Bench bar in Westminster-Hall, in the Case of the Lord Craven, it was there publicly pleaded on his behalf : "That there was nothing objected against the credit of Faulconer, so long as there was any other stone to torn, though there were endeavours in Parliament before the Lord Craven's Estate came to be sold, to prevent the sale thereof : And therefore when all refuges failed, if they can undermine the credit of this man, then they hope to undermine the Act of Parliament : And that after many transactions, and settlements grounded upon this man's Information, now must he be blasted by an artificial Indictment a great while after."

These passages thus let fall by those who

(it seems) had not perfect knowledge of the proceedings in Parliament, in the Lord Craven's Case, might with some of the auditory, at so great a Trial, pass as certain truths : it is therefore thought necessary to publish a Narrative, to clear those mistakes ; and yet it must be acknowledged that no exception was taken either to the person of Faulconer, or to the matter contained in his deposition against the Lord Craven, before the Votes of Confiscation of the Lord Craven's Estate did pass ; for that it was impossible for the Lord Craven, being near 800 miles distant in Germany when those Votes did pass, to be here upon an hour's warning, to make his exception to Faulconer's Deposition : the Parliament passing the Votes of Confiscation the same day Faulconer's Deposition was reported and read in parliament : neither the Lord Craven, nor any on his behalf being then heard or summoned to be heard, nor could any on his behalf procure a copy of the Depositions, before the Votes of Confiscation : it is therefore held requisite more particularly to make known the several transactions in this business, and what application hath been made from time to time unto the Parliament, by, and on the behalf of the Lord Craven, after the confiscation, and before the Bill for Sale of the Lord Craven's Estate did pass, that the falsity of this man's Oath might be examined in Parliament, or such other way as the Parliament should please to direct and appoint ; which the Parliament, after many applications to that purpose, not thinking fit to give way unto ; an indictment of Perjury was preferred in London against the said Faulconer, the Parliament sitting, and the Indictment found by the Grand-Jury, and the parliament made acquainted therewith before the Bill for Sale of the Lord Craven's Estate did pass ; and at the Sessions when the said Indictment was found, Faulconer might have been also tried, had not the principal witness against Faulconer been committed by captain Bishop, after he was served with a Subpœna to give testimony against Faulconer, and kept in prison from the first day of the sessions, till the sessions was over, and then set at liberty : and before the next sessions the Bill for Sale of the Lord Craven's Estate did pass.

And forasmuch as the said captain Bishop (the prosecutor of the Lord Craven, and a contractor for a good part of his Estate) appeared more than a witness at the Trial of Faulconer, and hath since that Verdict endeavoured to obstruct Judgment upon the same, against so notorious and infamous a person : it is further thought necessary to publish the proceedings at the Trial of the said Faulconer, that the world (as well as the Jury) may judge of the credit of this man's testimony against the Lord Craven, upon which so heavy a Judgment as that of Confiscation was grounded : and with what indifferency the said proceedings at the Trial are related, it is submitted to the Judgment of the gentlemen of the several Inns of Courts, and practisers of the law then present in Court, and to all others who heard and took Notes at the said Trial.

ANTH. CRAVEN.

A NARRATIVE of the Proceedings in the LORD CRAVEN'S Case.

Major Richard Faulconer being employed as a spy into Holland, at his return gave information to captain George Bishop, then Secretary to the Committee of the Council of State for Examinations, against William lord Craven : which information being prepared and reduced into writing by captain Bishop, the Commissioners at Haberdashers-Hall were sent for to White-Hall, to administer an oath there unto the said Faulconer, who came accordingly : and upon the 10th of February 1651, the said Faulconer was sworn before the said commissioners to the Information following, viz.

The INFORMATION of major Richard Faulconer of Westbury in Hampshire, taken before Samuel Moyer, James Russel, Edward Winslow, Josias Barners, and Arthur Squib, esquires, Commissioners for Sequestrations and Compositions, upon Oath.

Who saith, That about a fortnight before the conclusion of the Treaty at Breda, the lord Craven, the queen of Bohemia and her two daughters, came to Breda to the Scots king Charles, and went not thence till the king went to Honsleike, a house of the prince of Orange's. That during that time, this informant saw the Lord Craven divers times in presence with the said king, and every day with the said king at the court there, he being there with the queen of Bohemia and her two daughters, to take 'their leave' (as they said) of the king of Scots before he went to Scotland : that several officers, about 30 in number, made a Petition to the said King, to entertain them to fight for him against the commonwealth of England, by the name of "Barbarous and Inhuman Rebels," either in England or Scotland, for the recovering of his just rights, and reinstating him in his throne, and deputed this Informant and colonel Drury to present the said Petition, who indeed drew the same. That when the informant and some other officers came to the court at Breda, intending to present the said Petition immediately to the king's hand, but finding the lord Craven very near to him, likewise the marquis of Newcastle, who presented his brother sir Charles Cavendish to kiss the said king's hand the evening before the said king's departure, who this informant saw kiss the king's hand accordingly ; the lord Wilmot, the earl of Cleveland, the queen of Bohemia, the lord Gerrard, &c. and a great bustle of business ; this informant, with colonel Drury, applied themselves to the lord Craven, intreating him to present the Petition to the queen of Bohemia, to present it to the king of Scots ; the said lord Craven taking the Petition, and reading the same cheerfully, said to colonel Drury and this informant, "There is the queen of Bohemia, deliver it to her, and I will speak for you;" upon which they applied themselves to the said queen, and she presented the Petition ; after which the king of Scots, the lord Craven, the marquis of Newcastle, the queen of Bohemia, with some other lords, went into a withdrawing room, where this informant and company could not enter ; but the lord Craven came forth of the withdrawing chamber, and told this informant and company, "That they should receive an answer, from the queen of Bohemia to their Petition, and that he had spoken to the queen of Bohemia in their behalf," who afterwards came and told this informant and company that she had delivered their Petition, and that the king had taken order for it. The next morning at three of the clock the king departed, but this informant and company had their quarters satisfied by the princess of Orange, according to the said king's order upon their Petition, and thereby to enable them to follow the said king in the prosecution of these wars against the parliament of England, which was the effect of their aforesaid Petition : that this informant saw the lord Craven very often and familiar with the said king, and enter with the said king into the withdrawing chamber, and stayed there, the last night the said king was at Breda, very late.

RICHARD FAULCONER.

Colonel Hugh Reyly was likewise sworn before the said Commissioners at the same time, whose Information was in these words :

The INFORMATION of Colonel Hugh Reyly, taken before Samuel Moyer, James Russel, Edward Winslow, Josias Barners, and Arthur Squib, esquires, Commissioners for compounding, &c.

Who saith, That during the late Treaty at Breda, this informant did oftentimes see the Lord Craven with the now king of Scots in his bed-chamber, and also walked abroad with him, there being no man more conversant with the king than he. That the said Lord Craven during the said treaty, did twice go to Rotterdam and Dunhagh, and back again, being employed, as was commonly reported at court there, by the said king. That the said Lord Craven had a charge from the king to look to one Mrs. Barlow, who (as is reported and he believes to be true) had a child by the King of Scots, born at Rotterdam; which he did: and after the king was gone for Scotland, the said Lord Craven took the child from her, for which she went to law with him, and recovered the child back again, as is reported.

Feb. 20. Captain Thomas Kitchingman was ten days after sworn before the said Commissioners, whose Information was as followeth, viz.

The INFORMATION of Captain Thomas Kitchingman, taken upon Oath before the Commissioners for Compositions, &c.

Who saith, That the said captain Thomas Kitchingman in April and May, 1650, saw the lord Craven several times with the king of Scots at Breda, and waiting upon the said king several times at his table at Breda; this informant also saw the earl of Oxford at the same time with the king of Scots at Breda, waiting upon the said king at his table, and saw the lord Craven, and the earl of Oxford, many times go into the withdrawing rooms after the said king; this informant also saw the lord Craven, and the earl of Oxford, in the bowling-ally in Breda Castle with the said king.

THOMAS KITCHINGMAN.

Jur. coram Commissionar. Feb. 20, 1651.

Sir William Craven having notice that the lord Craven's Estate was in danger of sequestration; and considering that himself and his children, by Elizabeth, daughter to Ferdinand, lord Fairfax, upon whom a great part of the said estate was settled, were like to be concerned therein; desired Mr. Rushworth to go with him to the Commissioners at Haberdashers-Hall, and to desire a copy of the Charge against the lord Craven, and accordingly a copy of the Depositions taken against the lord Craven was demanded by sir William Craven, and Mr. Rushworth; to whom Mr. Moyer in the name of the rest of the commissioners, answered; That they had not fully considered of the Informations against the lord Craven; but said that very speedily a copy of the Charge should be delivered, and power should be given to the lord Craven to examine and cross examine witnesses; whereupon at that time they departed, being confident that they should never be deprived by those commissioners of that common justice of being heard before condemnation.

March 4, 1651. The commissioners at Haberdashers-Hall, having taken into consideration the said Informations of Faulconer's, Revly's, and Kitchingman's, were not satisfied in their judgments that they could sequester the lord Craven thereupon; wherefore they presented their doubt in that case to the Council of State, which Doubt or Quere of theirs, as it is recorded, and recited in an Order of the Council of State, was as followeth:

"Tuesday, 4 Martij, 1651. At the Council of State at White-Hall. Upon perusal of the Depositions touching the lord Craven, presented to this Council from the Commissioners for Sequestrations, &c sitting at Haberdashers-hall; and of their Certificate, wherein they mention that they have given orders for the seizing and securing the said lord's estate, but offer it as a doubt, whether the parliament hath made it matter of Sequestration for any person living beyond the seas, to hold correspondence with, or repair to the person of the now king of Scots, when he was beyond the seas; and desire it may be offered to the parliament for a rule, which may enable them to proceed to sequestration in that and other cases of like nature: It is ordered by the Council, that Mr. Attorney General do report this matter to the parliament; and in respect the retarding of sequestrations, where persons may be esteemed justly sequesterable, tends much to the prejudice and disadvantage of the state, to desire that the parliament will be pleased to give some directions therein for the expediting of justice in this and the like cases.

Ex GUALTER FROST, Secr."

March 6, 1651. Mr. Prideaux, Attorney General, makes his report to the Parliament according to the directions of the said Order, which report of his is entered in the Journal Book, agreeing verbatim with the Order of the Council of State of the 4th March, and he also made a report of the three Informations before mentioned (viz.) Faulconer's, Revly's, and Kitchingman's, all which were distinctly read by the clerk, and after some debate these Votes following did pass against the lord Craven unheard, and not having any other charge against him.

"Resolved by the Parliament, 1. That the lord Craven is an offender against the commonwealth of England, within the Declaration of the 24 Aug. 1649, entitled 'A Declaration of the Commons assembled in Parliament, declaring all persons who have served the parliament of England in Ireland, and have betrayed their trust, or have or shall adhere to, or aid and assist Charles Stuart, son to the late king, to be traitors and rebels.' 2. That the estate of the lord Craven be confiscated accordingly. 3. That the commissioners for compounding be impowered and required to seize and sequester all the estate real and personal of the said lord Craven, and to receive the rents, issues and profits thereof to the use of the commonwealth. 4. That the Commissioners for compounding be impowered and required to seize and sequester into their possession, the real and personal estate of all such persons as shall appear to them to be offenders within the Declaration of the 24th August 1649, aforesaid; and to receive and take the rents, issues and profits thereof, to the use of the Commonwealth.

HEN. SCOBEL, Cler. Parl."

Which Declaratory Vote of the house of commons, of the 24th of August, 1649, followeth in these words, viz.

"Resolved upon the question by the Commons assembled in parliament, That this house doth declare that all persons, whether English or Scots, who have been under the pay of the parliament of England in the service of Ireland, and have revolted and betrayed their trust there, and all other persons who have or shall adhere to, or assist Charles Stuart, son of the late king; or any the forces in Ireland against the parliament of England, are, and he adjudged to be traitors and rebels to the commonwealth of England, and all their estates shall be confiscated, and their persons proceeded against as traitors and rebels; and that all such officers as have so betrayed their trust, be proceeded against by a court-martial there."

Sir William Craven and master Rushworth repaired again to the commissioners at Haberdashers Hall, and demanded a copy of the Informations against the lord Craven, to the end that he might be heard before he was condemned; for that they understood the Commissioners had seized and secured his Estate, and did purpose to sequester the same.

Master Moyer returned this answer: "That it was not usual with them to condemn any man unheard, that they had a full purpose to have given liberty to the lord Craven to make his Defence to the Informations given against him, but now their hands were tied up, for the Parliament had voted his Estate to be confiscated; and they were required to sequester all the Estate real and personal of the lord Craven's, to the use of the commonwealth."

Hereupon master Rushworth forthwith repaired to the Parliament, to inform himself of the proceedings against the lord Craven there: took a copy of master Attorney General's Report, the Informations aforesaid, and the votes of Confiscation thereupon; and immediately a Petition was drawn on the behalf of the lord Craven, in the name of sir William Craven, and James Pickering, esq. commissioners intrusted by the lord Craven for the management of his Estate, which from the 12th of March to the 12th of June 1651, they endeavoured by their friends to get delivered in parliament, but could not obtain it, until the said 12th of June, that the house took into consideration the first Bill of Sale of Delinquents Estates. When the lord Craven's name being propounded to be inserted into the bill, it gave a handsome opportunity to that member of the house, who had so long attended to deliver the said Petition, to get the same delivered; which Petition then presented and read, was in these words, viz.

To the Supreme Authority of this nation, the Parliament of the Commonwealth of England. The humble Petition of sir William Craven, knt., and James Pickering, esq. commissioners deputed by the lord Craven, for the managing of his Estate in his absence,

"Humbly sheweth, That your petitioners are informed that by a late Vote of this honourable house, the lord Craven is declared an offender within the Declaration of the 24th of August 1649. Whereby his Estate is made liable to confiscation, and the commissioners for compounding are impowered and required to seize and sequester all the estate real and personal of the said lord Craven; that the lord Craven being beyond the seas in Germany, at the time of the passing of these Votes, knoweth nothing of the Votes against him here in England, and your petitioners being desirous to discharge their trust, in giving his lordship timely notice of the said proceedings against him, do humbly pray on the behalf of the said lord Craven, that your petitioners may be permitted to send an express unto his lordship, to acquaint him with the said Votes; and that this honourable house would be pleased in the mean time, as to the confiscation of his estate, to suspend their former Order. And your petitioners shall pray, &c."

Upon the reading of this Petition the House thought not fit to make any Order to suspend the Votes of Confiscation, or to give leave to send an express.

The Parliament afterwards falling again upon the debate of the first Bill of Sale for Delinquents Estates, it was then propounded that the house would give leave to speak against the former Votes of Confiscation of the lord Craven's estate, upon which the house was divided; 24 were for resuming the debate, and 25 were against it; so it was carried by one Vote only not to resume the consideration of the said Votes of Confiscation. The Votes which passed that day in parliament were as followeth (viz.)

Thursday July 3, 1651. The question being propounded that leave be given to take the Vote touching the lord Craven into consideration again, it passed in the negative.

"Resolved by the parliament, that a Summons do issue forth for William lord Craven, requiring him to appear personally at such time as the parliament shall appoint, to answer such matters as shall be objected against him, on the behalf of the Commonwealth of England: That the place of his appearance be at the Parliament of the Commonwealth of England: That the day of his appearance be on the 3rd of Sept. 1651."

A draught of the Summons to be signed by Mr. Speaker was this day read and agreed unto in these words. "By authority of the parliament of the Commonwealth of England, These are to command and require William lord Craven, to make his personal appearance before the parliament of the Commonwealth of England, upon the 3rd day of Sept. 1651, there to make answer to all such matters as shall be objected against him on the behalf of the Commonwealth of England, whereof he is not to fail at his peril, dated at Westminster this 3rd day of July 1651. Ordered by the parliament that the sergeant at arms attending the parliament do proclaim this Summons in Westminster-hall.—Ordered that this Summons be likewise printed, and that the sergeant at arms do cause the same to be set up at the Old Exchange London, and other places convenient for the publication thereof. H. SCOBEL, Cl. Parl."

The said Vote of Summons being past 4 months after confiscation, whereof the lord Craven had no notice, yet having got information of some former proceedings, in the parliament, against him and his estate, when he was far remote in Germany, did thereupon send a Petition by the foreign post, under the cover of the Dutch packet, directed to the parliament, which was delivered the latter end of August 1651, by the Dutch agent, then resident at London, to Mr. Speaker, and by Mr. Speaker faithfully presented to the parliament before the 3rd of Sept. 1651, but the parliament thought not fit to permit the same to be read; by reason there was none present who could testify they did see the lord Craven subscribe the same, and give directions for the delivery thereof; which Petition remains in the hands of Mr. Scobel, clerk of the parliament, and was as followeth:

To the Parliament of the Commonwealth of England: The Humble Petition of William Lord Craven:

"Humbly sheweth; That the Petitioner, notwithstanding his care and endeavour to avoid giving any cause of offence to the parliament, hath nevertheless been so unfortunate, as to meet with those who by false and calumnious Informations have practised to beget an ill opinion in this honourable assembly of the Petitioner, and thereby as much in them lieth, to work his absolute ruin, with the falsity of their suggestions; The Petitioner doubteth not to make manifestly appear, by divers witnesses and circumstances conducing to the clearing of the truth; but in regard the present conjuncture of affairs here doth not permit him to come in person, he doth most humbly beseech the parliament, to be so favourable unto him, as to give way he may by his friends and counsel be permitted to answer and set forth the truth and circumstances, not doubting but by this means he shall be able to clear his innocency, and give satisfaction to this honourable house. And your Petitioner shall pray, &c.

WILLIAM CRAVEN."

The lord Craven hastens from Germany into Holland, and sends a duplicate of his former Petition by the hands of Mr. Peter Wilkin, a gentleman formerly of the Earl of Essex and lord Fairfax's life-guard, a person of very much merit and faithfulness to the parliament; who immediately after he had his dispatch, fell sick beyond sea, and died there: the lord Craven being much troubled at his disaster, frames a new Petition, and sends the same over into England in October 1651, subscribed with his own hand, which Petition, with the duplicates thereof so subscribed, as aforesaid, remained in the hands of several members of parliament, each of whom were desired to take the first opportunity that was offered to any of them, to present the same; Who from Octob. 1651, until 22d of June, 1652, though they often endeavoured it, and were daily attended therefore by Mr. Rushworth for above 7 months together, could not prevail to get the Petition read in parliament: And then the house falling into a debate of an additional act for sale of delinquent's estates, and the lord Craven's name being propounded to be inserted therein, gave a seasonable opportunity to have the lord Craven's Petition read; which was in these words:

To the Supreme Authority, the Parliament of the Commonwealth of England; The humble Petition of William Lord Craven;

"Humbly sheweth; That upon the Information of major R. Faulconer, who acknowledgeth, That himself and another drew the Petition to the king of Scots against the Commonwealth of England, and that the Petitioner promoted the delivery thereof, and upon the information of captain Thomas Kitchingman, and one Hugh Reyly, that the Petitioner was at Breda with the said king, and upon a vote of 24th of August 1649, whereby it was declared, that those who had been under pay of the parliament of England in the service of Ireland, and revolted and betrayed their trust, and all others who did adhere to the son of the late king, or any of his forces in Ireland, should be adjudged traitors, and their estates to be confiscate, and their persons to be proceeded against as traitors.—Thereupon the 6th of March 1651, it was voted in parliament, that your Petitioner is an offender within the Declaration aforesaid, and that his estate be confiscate, and that the commissioners for compounding be required to seize and sequester the same, which they have done accordingly, and have ever since received the rents and profits of all his lands, and have sold his cattle and goods.

"The Petitioner saith, he is not guilty of the matter charged upon him, and humbly desireth it may be taken into consideration. 1. That he went with consent of parliament beyond the seas before the war broke forth in England, and hath been there ever since attending his charge. 2. That he went not to the king of Scots into Holland, but that the king came to Breda, whilst he was there upon his employment, where his residence by command then was. 3. That the material information is upon a single testimony, of one who confesseth himself the principal contriver of that treason, whereof he accuseth the Petitioner to be an abettor, and besides is mainly disproved and contradicted in divers parts of his testimony, and proves not any word or deed of the Petitioner, not against the parliament. 4. That the Petitioner during all the time of these late wars and differences in England, did never engage, or in the least manner appear against the parliament of England. 5. That the persons that accuse him were utter strangers to him, and the promotion of their Petition no way concerned him. He humbly therefore offers to your honours' consideration, how unlikely it should be that your Petitioner should hazard himself and his estate in England, which was known to be considerable, in so unnecessary and unprofitable a business, and so much contrary to all his former deportments.

"Wherefore the Petitioner humbly begs the favour of this honourable assembly, that his case may be considered, and that this honourable assembly would be pleased to put his business into such a way, as that he may be heard by his counsel, not doubting but thereby this honourable assembly shall receive so good an account of your Petitioner's candid deportment, as may fully satisfy your honours. And your Petitioner shall ever pray."

At the same time a Member of the house delivered a Petition in the name of sir William Craven, and sir Edmund Sawyer, giving notice of some new Information to disprove Faulconer's testimony, which Petition the said member moved, that it might be read, and delivered it to the clerk accordingly to be read, immediately after the reading of the lord Craven's Petition, but the parliament thought not fit to permit the reading thereof, which Petition remains with Mr. Scobel, clerk of the parliament, and was in these words, viz.

To the Supreme Authority of this nation, the Parliament of the Common-wealth of England: The humble Petition of sir William Craven, and sir Edmund Sawyer, knights, on the behalf of William lord Craven,

Humbly sheweth, That they having been a long time trusted in the affairs of the said William lord Craven, have for these many months attended upon the parliament, to get a Petition of the said William lord Craven's presented, in which his humble desire is, that he may be heard; That of late it hath come to their knowledge that the Information given in by Faulconer (the single witness, and against the lord Craven in the material parts of his accusation), is altogether untrue, and that it will be so made appear by several witnesses then upon the place with the said Faulconer, and now in town; and particularly by col. Drury, whom the said Faulconer mentioned in his accusation to be deputed with him to deliver the said Petition; who, as your Petitioners are informed, can produce the first original draught of the said Petition, of the said Faulconer's own hand writing: whereby it will appear (as your Petitioners are likewise informed) that there was not the least mention of the parliament or commonwealth of England, nor any such expressions as are mentioned in the said Faulconer's Information, which your Petitioners thought themselves bound in conscience to acquaint the parliament with, that their justice might the more clearly appear in a thorough examination of this business, in such way as they in their wisdom shall think fitting. And your Petitioners shall pray, &c."

Afterwards the question being put upon reading the aforesaid Petition of the lord Craven, whether he should be put into the Bill of Sale, to have his estate sold, it was carried only by two voices, that his estate should be sold, there being 33 for the sale thereof, and 31 against it. The Votes which passed that day, are as followeth:

"Tuesday, June 22, 1652. The House this day resumed the debate upon the Amendments of the additional Act for Sale of Estates forfeited to the commonwealth for Treason. The question being propounded, That William lord Craven be put into this Bill for his lands to be sold, and the question being put, That this question be now put, it passed with the affirmative. And the main question being put, That William lord Craven be put into this Bill for his lands to be sold, it was resolved by the parliament, that William lord Craven be put into the Bill for his lands to be sold."

The Parliament not thinking fit upon the said Petition of sir William Craven's, and sir Edmund Sawyer's, to permit the business concerning the lord Craven to be put into a way of examination, and the Bill for Sale being likely to pass within few days, there was a necessity put upon the prosecutors on the behalf of the lord Craven, to resort to the good laws of England for remedy; And thereupon, and not before, an Indictment was drawn in order to the conviction of the said Faulconer of Perjury, which Indictment was the 12th day of July, 1652, delivered to the Grand Jury at Guild-Hall, London; The copy of which Indictment was as followeth:

An Indictment of Perjury against Faulconer.

Lond. ss. Be it remembered, that at the general quarter-sessions of the public peace holden for the city of London, at the Guild-hall of the same city, on Monday the 12th day of July, in the year of our Lord 1652, before John Kendrick mayor of the city of London, Thomas Atkin, Thomas Andrews, and Thomas Foot, aldermen of the same city, and others their fellow justices assigned to keep the public peace in the city aforesaid: And also to hear and determine divers felonies, trespasses and other misdemeanors committed within the same city, by the oaths of Robert Dawks, John Harvey, William Pitcher, Pelham Moore, George Boddington, Thomas Peirson, Joseph Ruthorn, Samuel Coleman, Richard Payn, John Drafgate, Robert Trollaffe, Richard Bartholmew, John Robinson, Robert Alkington, and Thomas Wilmer, good and lawful men of the city of London, then and there sworn and charged to inquire for the Keepers of the Liberty of England by the authority of parliament, and the body of the city aforesaid, it is presented that the Bill following is true.

Lond. ss. The Jurors for the Keepers of the Liberty of England by authority of parliament upon their oath do present, That Richard Faulconer of Westbury in the county of Southampton, gent. not having the fear of God before his eyes, but moved and seduced by the instigation of the devil, and minding and endeavouring to bring the right hon. William lord Craven, baron of Hampstead, marshal in the county of Berks, in danger of the loss of his life, and of the sequestration, confiscation, forfeiture of all his lands, goods, and chattels within this commonwealth of England, the 10th day of February, in the year of our Lord God, 1650, at the parish of Mary Stainings, in the ward of Cripplegate, London, before Samuel Moyer, esq.; James Russel, esq.; Edward Winslow, esq.; Josias Barners, esq.; and Arthur Squib, esq.; then being Commissioners for compounding with Delinquents, and for managing of all and every the Estates of Delinquents and Popish Recusants; that the 15th day of April, in the said year of our Lord, 1650, were, or then after should be under sequestration, did, upon the Holy Evangelists, corruptly, wilfully, falsely and maliciously, of his own proper act, consent and agreement, swear, and upon his corporal oath before the commissioners aforesaid on the said 10th day of February, in the said year, 1650, then having power to administer the said oath, then and there depose concerning the said lord Craven, in these English words following, that is to say; That about a fortnight before the conclusion of the Treaty at Breda, the lord Craven, the queen of Bohemia and her two daughters, came to Breda to the Scots king Charles, and went not thence till the king went to Honsleidike, a house of the prince of Orange's. That during that time, this informant saw the lord Craven divers times in presence with the said king, and every day with the said king at the Court there, he being there with the queen of Bohemia and her two daughters, to take their leave (as they said) of the king of Scots before he went to Scotland: That several officers, about thirty in number, made a Petition to the said king, to entertain them to fight for him against the common-wealth of England, by the name of 'Barbarous and inhuman Rebels,' either in England or Scotland, for the recovering of his just rights, and reinstating him in his throne, and deputed this informant and colonel Drury to present the said Petition, who indeed drew the same. That when this informant and some other officers came to the Court at Breda, intending to present the said Petition immediately to the king's hand, but finding the lord Craven very near to him, likewise the marquis of Newcastle, who presented his brother sir Charles Cavendish to kiss the said king's hand the evening before the said king's departure, who this informant saw kiss the king's hand accordingly; the lord Wilmot, the earl of Cleveland, the queen of Bohemia, the lord Gerrard, &c. and a great bustle of business; This informant, with colonel Drury, applied themselves to the lord Craven, intreating him to present the Petition to the queen of Bohemia, to present it to the king of Scots; the said lord Craven taking the Petition, and reading the same cheerfully, said to colonel Drury and this informant, 'There is the queen of Bohemia, deliver it to her, and I will speak for you;' Upon which they applied themselves to the said queen, and she presented the Petition; after which the king of Scots, the lord Craven, the marquis of Newcastle, the queen of Bohemia, with some other lords, went into a withdrawing room, where this informant and company could not enter; but the lord Craven came forth of the withdrawing chamber, and told this informant and company, 'That they should receive an answer from the queen of Bohemia to their Petition, and that he had spoken to the queen of Bohemia in their behalf,' who afterwards came and told this informant and company that she had delivered their Petition, and that the king had taken order for it. The next morning at three of the clock the king departed, but this informant and company had their quarters satisfied by the princess of Orange, according to the said king's order upon their Petition, and thereby to inable them to follow the said king in the prosecution of those wars against the parliament of England, which was the effect of their aforesaid Petition: That this informant saw the lord Craven very often and familiar with the said king, and enter with the said king into the withdrawing chamber, and staid there, the last night the said king was at Breda, very late; Which said oath, was the said 10th day of February, in the year of our Lord 1650, at the parish and ward aforesaid, reduced in writing, and taken before the said commissioners, then having sufficient and lawful power to administer the said oath, and to take the testimony and depositions of witnesses upon their oaths in such cases; Whereas in truth neither did the several officers, or any officer, make a Petition to the said king to entertain him or them to fight for him against the Commonwealth of England. Nor did several officers or any officer make a Petition to the said king to entertain him or them to fight for him against the Commonwealth of England, by the name of "Barbarous and Inhuman Rebels," either in England or Scotland. Nor did several officers or any officer make a Petition to the said king to entertain him or them to fight for him against the Commonwealth of England, by the name of, "Barbarous and Inhuman Rebels," either in England or Scotland for the recovering of his just rights, or reinstating him in his throne. Nor deputed he the said Richard Faulconer, and col. Drury to present the said Petition, in the said oath mentioned; Nor did the said Richard Faulconer, with the said col. Drury, apply themselves to the said lord Craven, entreating him to present the said Petition to the said queen of Bohemia, to present it to the said king of Scots. Nor did the said Richard Faulconer, with the said col. Drury, entreat him the said lord Craven, to present the said Petition to the said queen of Bohemia, to present it to the said king of Scots. Nor did the said lord Craven take the said Petition, or read the same; Nor said unto the said Richard Faulconer and col. Drury, 'There is the queen of Bohemia, deliver it to her, and I will speak for you. Nor did the said lord Craven tell the said Richard Faulconer and company, in the said deposition mentioned, that they should receive an answer to their said Petition, or that he had spoken to the queen of Bohemia in their behalf, as the said Richard Faulconer in and by the said deposition hath deposed. And so the jurors aforesaid, upon their oath aforesaid, do say, That the said Richard Faulconer, in manner and form aforesaid, corruptly, wilfully, falsely and maliciously, of his own proper act, consent and agreement, did commit wilful, false, and corrupt perjury; To the great dishonour of Almighty God, and to the great damage, loss and infamy of the said William lord Craven, and in contempt of the laws of this Commonwealth; To the evil example of all others in the like case offending, and against the public peace, &c. SADLER."

This Indictment upon the Testimony then produced upon oath, was accordingly found by the Grand Jury.

The same day that this Indictment was found, col. Drury, who had given evidence to the Grand Jury, repaired to Whitehall to captain Bishop, (having been formerly examined by him concerning the lord Craven,) and told him, that as he was that morning going down Holborn-Hill, he was served with a Subpœna to appear that day at Guild-Hall, London; and that he was examined there concerning the Information given by Faulconer, against the lord Craven; and that after he was sworn before the Lord Mayor, he gave the same evidence to the Grand Jury which he had formerly given to captain Bishop upon his examination: Whereupon the said captain Bishop took the writ under seal out of his hand, with which he was served to appear, and said to Drury, 'How durst you be examined against the Commonwealth, and not acquaint me first therewith?' and said further, 'Mr. Mayor,' meaning the Lord Mayor, 'had better have done something else, than to have suffered that Indictment to be found;' and immediately calls for a messenger, and commits the said Drury to the custody of one Middleton, a messenger to the Council of State, who forthwith carried Drury away prisoner into the Strand, to the house of the said Middleton, where the said Drury was kept by him in strict custody, from Monday that the Indictment was found, and the sessions begun, till Saturday, that the sessions was past; by which restraint of Drury, who had Faulconer's own hand-writing to produce against himself, and being otherwise the most material witness against Faulconer, there could be no further prosecution upon that Indictment that sessions, and before the next sessions the bill for sale of the lord Craven's estate did pass.

After the preferring and finding of this Indictment, several businesses of public concernment did interrupt the parliament's present passing of the bill for sale: So that the parliament had several debates upon the said act, and the 20th of July the said bill being committed to a committee to fill up the full number of 30 persons, and to present their names unto the house, Mr. Rushworth attended with a Petition in the names of sir William Craven, and sir Edmund Sawyer, and caused the same to be presented unto that committee then sitting in the Speaker's Chamber in the Parliament house, therein taking notice that the Indictment of Perjury was found; which Petition was as followeth:

To the Honourable the Committee of Parliament, appointed to consider of the Names of several Persons, to present to the Parliament, whose Estates may be forthwith sold. The humble Petition of Sir William Craven, and Sir Edmund Sawyer knights, who have been Commissioners long intrusted by the Lord Craven in the management of his Estate.

"Humbly sheweth; That your Petitioners in their Petition presented to the parliament about a month since, and remaining in the clerk's hand, did most humbly beseech them, that they would be pleased to permit such testimony to be produced, not only by witness, but by writing under the hand of Richard Faulconer (the single and material witness against the lord Craven, as to the Petition mentioned in Faulconer's Deposition) which they hoped would make it clearly appear unto the parliament; that the information given by the said Faulconer (upon which the vote which then passed for the confiscation of the lord Craven's estate, is chiefly grounded) is altogether false and true in all the material parts of his examination.

"That the parliament not thinking fit to permit the said Petition (presented as aforesaid) to be read, the said Faulconer is since indicted of Perjury, and the grand jury have accordingly found the same.

"That a Warrant was accordingly obtained to apprehend the said Faulconer, thereby intending to have brought him to his speedy trial, (all perjuries being excepted by the Act of Oblivion) but one of the chief witnesses against the said Faulconer, who gave evidence to the grand jury, being since restrained of his liberty, was the only obstruction, why in a legal course the law was not prosecuted against the said Faulconer this last sessions at Newgate.

"Your Petitioners humbly beseech you, that you would be pleased to present to the parliament the consideration of the whole matter, that this business may be further and speedily examined in parliament, or otherwise, as they in their wisdom shall think fitting, and that in the mean time the lord Craven may be omitted out of the present bill of sale. And your Petitioners shall pray, &c."

This Petition was delivered to Alderman Allen, then chairman to the Committee sitting in the Speaker's Chamber, upon the Bill for Sale; and word was sent up with the said Petition, that there were some attending at the door to avow the same, and accordingly the Petition was read at the Committee, but they thought not fit to take any notice of the information therein given, nor to report the same to the Parliament, that their pleasure might be known thereupon.

The Parliament again had in debate the said Act, upon a report thereof made by the lord Grey of Grooby, and passed many of the Amendments; whereupon it was much pressed by several members, that a Petition in the name of sir William Craven, and sir Edmund Sawyer, on the behalf of the lord Craven, might be read before the Act did pass; the house at that time thought not fit to hear the same, but declared, that before the bill was put to the question, the Petition should be read; and shortly after ordered the bill to be ingrossed, and to be brought into the house on Tuesday August 3.

Accordingly on that day the Speaker tendered the ingrossed Act to the house, to be put to the question, to pass as a Law, and the member of the house in whose hand the Petition remained, as he went into the house, was desired by the Petitioners to present the Petition, and to procure them to be called in to avow the same, for that they would make good every particular in the said Petition, and more, if need required, than what was therein contained; which said member went into the house, and accordingly presented the same, which was read by the clerk, and is remaining still in his custody, and was in these words:

To the Supreme Authority of this Nation, the Parliament of the Commonwealth of England: The humble Petition of Sir William Craven, and Sir Edmund Sawyer knights, who have been Commissioners long intrusted by the Lord Craven, for the managing of his Estate.

"Humbly sheweth; That your Petitioners in their Petition presented to the parliament above a month since, and remaining in the clerk's hands, did most humbly beseech them that they would be pleased to permit such testimony to be produced, not only by witness, but by writing under the hand of Richard Faulconer, the single and material witness against the lord Craven, as to the Petition mentioned in Faulconer's deposition, which they hoped would make it clearly appear unto the parliament, that the information given by the said Faulconer, (upon which the vote which then passed for confiscation of the lord Craven's estate is chiefly grounded) is altogether false and untrue, in all the material parts of his examination.

"That the parliament not thinking fit to permit the said Petition so presented, as aforesaid, to be read, the said Faulconer is since indicted of Perjury, and the grand jury have accordingly found the same.

"That a Warrant was obtained to apprehend the said Faulconer, thereby intending to have brought him to his speedy trial, (all Perjuries being excepted out of the Act of Oblivion) but one of the material witnesses after he gave evidence to the grand jury, was the same day committed at White-hall to the custody of one Middleton, a messenger of the Council of State, and by him kept in strict custody till the sessions was ended, which was the only obstruction why in a legal course the law was not prosecuted at that time against the said Faulconer.

"Your Petitioners take the boldness humbly further to inform the parliament, that it appears by search in the books kept at New Prison and Newgate, That the said Richard Faulconer was committed first to New Prison and then to Newgate in April sessions 1651. upon suspicion of Felony, where he should have been tried for the fact, but that (as your Petitioners are informed, and hope to prove) there was a stop made to the said proceedings, merely upon an Affidavit, That he was in the parliament's service; besides it is well known, that the said Faulconer was altogether a stranger to the lord Craven, and hath since his coming over, lately confessed to testimony of good credit, that the lord Craven's deportment at Brerda was altogether inoffensive as to the Commonwealth of England, and that he understood nothing of the said business, more than that a consideration was desired to be had of the present wants and great necessities of the Petitioners.

"All which your Petitioners humbly submit to the consideration of the parliament, beseeching you to omit the lord Craven out of the bill of sale, till this business be fully examined in parliament, or by a Committee, or such other way as you in your wisdom shall think fit, and until that other examinations taken by some, deputed by the Council of State, which (as is reported) tend to clear the lord Craven, be reported to the parliament, as well as those examinations have been, which seem to make against the lord Craven. And your Petitioners shall pray, &c."

After the reading of the said Petition, there was very great debate about the same, but none of the desires in the Petition were thought fit to be granted; and thereupon it was put to the question, Whether the lord Craven should stand in this bill, to have his land sold, and it was carried in the affirmative by three voices, there being 23 in the affirmative, and 20 in the negative. The votes which passed that day, were in these words following, viz.

"Tuesday August 3, 1652. A Bill for Sale of several lands and estates forfeited to the commonwealth for Treason, appointed to be sold for the use of the Navy, was this day read the third time.—The humble Petition of sir William Craven, and sir Edmund Sawyer knights, who have been Commissioners long intrusted by the lord Craven in the management of his estate, was this day read.—The question being put that William lord Craven do stand in the bill, it passed in the affirmative: Resolved by the Parliament that William lord Craven do stand in the Bill."

After the passing of these Votes, several members of the house were acquainted that a great part of the lord Craven's estate was entailed, and especially Comb-Abby, a manor of the lord Craven's worth 2500*l.* per annum, entailed by John lord Craven upon sir William Craven, and the heirs male of his body, the very next in remainder (at this day) after the now lord Craven; which entail was had in consideration at the marriage of sir William Craven, with Elizabeth, daughter to Ferdinando lord Fairfax, the lord Craven then engaging not to destroy the same.

Thus much being intimated to several members of the house, it was answered by some of them, that special notice was taken of the entailing of this estate, and that a clause was added to this act, which was not in the former Bill for Sale, which would resolve the question; A copy of which Clause being procured, and agreeing with that which was afterwards in the printed Act, was in these words:

"And be it farther enacted by this present parliament, and by authority thereof, That all reversions and remainders expectant upon any estate tail, upon any conveyance made by the said traitor or traitors, or any other person or persons, by or under whom they or any of them claim, of any the manors, lands, tenements or hereditaments of any the traitor or traitors in this act, or in the aforesaid act for sale of several lands and estates forfeited to the commonwealth for treason, named, not actually vested in the possession of such tenant in tail by the death of such traitor or traitors, before the five and twentieth day of March, one thousand six hundred and fifty two, which by fine and recovery might be docqued by any of the said traitor or traitors, are and shall be to all intents and purposes forfeited for their said treasons; and as well the said traitors and their heirs and assigns, and all other persons and their heirs in reversion or remainder upon any such estate, shall be for ever barred, as if such traitor or traitors had actually levied a fine, and suffered a recovery for doing thereof, any allowance, law, statute or usage to the contrary in any wise notwithstanding."

Wednesday August 4, 1652. The House again resuming the debate of the ingrossed Act for sale; A proviso was tendered by Mr. Strickland (on the behalf of sir William Craven) who was privy to the agreement of the said marriage of sir William Craven, viz. "Provided that this act, nor any thing therein contained, shall extend to make void any remainder, use or reversion settled upon sir William Craven knight, out of the estate of William lord Craven, or John lord Craven his brother, whose estate is since descended to William lord Craven, at or before this marriage with Elizabeth, daughter of Ferdinando lord Fairfax, deceased; any thing in this act contained to the contrary thereof, in any wise notwithstanding." But this Proviso after the reading thereof, and some debate thereupon, was rejected; and the bill for sale of the lord Craven's estate immediately thereupon passed, as a law.

The lord Craven shortly after having notice that the Bill was past for sale of his estate; and that the surveyors were sent down into the country to survey the same, in order to a present sale; and being desirous to preserve the same (though confiscated, yet) from being canonized into several hands; was desirous again humbly to petition the parliament, and thereupon retired out of Holland to Brussels in Flanders, and from thence did write a Letter to Mr. Speaker, all of his own handwriting, and therein inclosed a Petition, subscribed also with his own hand, submitting to such sum of money as the parliament should please to impose upon him; and also sent duplicates of that petition to his friends, to be presented to the parliament, in case the Speaker's Letter and Petition to the parliament should miscarry, and withal did signify to his friends his readiness to come over in person, and (though innocent of the charge against him) yet was resolved to submit unto, and satisfy such sum of money as the parliament should impose upon him; hoping they would rather choose that way, than utterly to ruin him in his estate and fortunes, by permitting his houses to be pulled down, his woods to be felled, and his lands to be sold to strangers; hoping also, that it would be considered he was a person innocent, as to blood, plunder, or violence in the late unnatural wars in England, Scotland, or Ireland, having gone beyond seas by leave of parliament, and resided there ever since, until now, being near twelve years together, attending his charge there, under the prince of Orange. Which Letter and Petition from the lord Craven, delivered by Mr. Speaker to the clerk to be read, were as followeth:

To the honourable William Lenthall, esq.
Speaker of the Parliament of the Commonwealth of England.

"Sir; Although I am altogether a stranger to your honour, yet as my misfortune is at present, I do not know how to avoid giving you the trouble of addressing this inclosed supplication to you, for the parliament of the Commonwealth of England; the which I shall humbly beseech you, out of your accustomed civility to all persons that have recourse to you in this kind, to present it with that advantage, that it may be permitted to be read, and taken into consideration of that honourable house, having been far other in my comportment, than what by misfortune I have been calumniated to have been; so that I hope their grace and favour will be afforded according to this my reasonable request; the which no person shall acknowledge with more respect towards them, nor your favour herein with greater value of your generosity and goodness, than what he shall do, that desires to have cause to be, Your most affectionate and obliged servant,

Sept. 3, 1652. WILLIAM CRAVEN."

To the Supreme Authority of this Nation, the Parliament of the Commonwealth of England: The humble Petition of William Lord Craven,

"Sheweth; That whereas it hath been your petitioner's sore affliction to fall into the displeasure of this honourable parliament, and to remain under your most heavy sentence, yet considering that the severity thereof was such, (reaching both life and estate) as might justly deter him from adventuring in person into England, and considering that it hath not been the manner of this honourable house of parliament, to execute their judgments to the ruin of families, where there hath been any hopes of rendering them serviceable to the Commonwealth.—In these respects he is encouraged in most humble manner to intreat your wonted clemency, in the remission of your heavy sentence against his life and person, and that paying a reasonable sum of money, he may be restored to his estate, whereby both he, and those who have just title in law to it after his death, (being preserved from ruin) will be obliged to be your honours in all respective demeanor and observances. And your petitioner shall pray, &c.

WILLIAM CRAVEN."

But the House was divided whether to permit the Petition to be read; yet afterwards resolved to read the same; whereupon the Petition was read; and his excellency the Lord General much pressed the house, that notwithstanding their Resolution to sell the lord Craven's estate, yet that they would rather impose a sum of money upon the lord Craven, for that he judged it to be more honourable, then to expose his estate to sale, and intimated a considerable sum indeed; besides the 30,000*l.* which had been already received out of his rents and personal estate, and by the damage done to his woods.

Sir William Craven, and sir Edmund Sawyer did attend at the door at that time, expecting to be called in, to give assurance to the parliament, that the sum of money which they should think fit to impose upon the lord Craven, should be speedily raised.

As the House was in debate of this business, the Danish ambassador was admitted to have audience to take his leave, which being done, and the ambassador gone, it was moved to resume the debate again; but the contrary was pressed by others; and the Speaker was required to propound the question, whether the house should any further resume the debate of that business; the house was thereupon divided; and it was carried in the negative by four voices, there being 34 against taking any further consideration of his Petition, and 30 for resuming the debate thereof; the Votes which passed that day, were as followeth.

"Friday Oct. 29, 1652. A Petition of the lord Craven being presented, Resolved by the Parliament, that his Petition be now read; and the Petition was now read accordingly, and was intituled, The humble Petition of William lord Craven. The question being put, That the house do proceed further in the debate upon the Petition of the lord Craven; it passed in the negative."

After this Vote there was no further application made to the parliament on the behalf of the lord Craven; for that surveyors were gone to the several counties to survey his estate; and some surveys were actually returned, and days appointed for sale. And the Members of the House stept in with the first to buy the flower of his Estate, to the value of 5 or 6,000*l.* per annum, as appears by the Contracts made at Drury-House in their own names, and in the names of others intrusted for the use of members.

That stately house of the lord Craven's at Causam near Reading, in excellent repair, was bought by some persons, who for greedy lucre and gain, utterly defaced the same, pulled down the wainscot, stair-cases, lead, iron, and all the materials about the house, which cost building 20,000*l.* they giving the Commonwealth little above 1,500*l.* in moneys (the price of debentures therein also included.)

It being now term time when the House was the last time divided about the lord Craven, and there being no hopes to have his case further heard, it was thought necessary and convenient however to expedite the Trial upon the indictment of perjury against Faulconer; whereupon course was taken to remove the indictment by a Certiorari into the Upper Bench, to the end the said Faulconer might be out-lawed for perjury; the record being accordingly removed, a Capias in order to an out-lawry was taken out against the said Faulconer, who for several sessions before had refused to appear: at last the said Faulconer was taken upon the said Capias, and carried to Newgate, where he lay for some time, and would not appear nor plead to the Indictment; Whereupon the prosecutors for the Commonwealth were enforced to move the court for a Habeas Corpus, to bring him to the bar, that he might be enjoined to plead, and accordingly the court required him to plead; whereupon he pleaded Not Guilty to the Indictment.

Hilary Term, 1653.

In Hilary term following a day was appointed for Trial upon the Indictment, at Guild-Hall London, before the lord chief justice Rolls, where the said captain Bishop, and Faulconer appeared, with their counsel and witnesses; and Mr. Rushworth also appeared in behalf of the Commonwealth with counsel and witnesses, and had given in the record to have the jury called, but it so fell out, that a person of integrity then in court, who had gotten certain knowledge when and where the said oath was taken, gave Mr. Rushworth notice, that the oath given to Faulconer, was administered unto him at White-Hall in Middlesex, and not at Haberdashers-Hall in London, and therefore the place being mislaid in the indictment, a London jury could not find a fact done in Middlesex: Whereupon Mr. Rushworth immediately withdrew the record for that time, and gave a stop to the Trial.

No time was mis-spent to recover this mistake: for within two days a new Indictment was drawn, and preferred to the grand jury in Middlesex, (Sir Henry Blunt being foreman) where the indictment was found: and was as followeth:

Hilary Term, 1653.

“Middlesex. Before this time, that is to say, upon Tuesday next after the morrow of the Purification of the Virgin Mary, this same term, before the Keepers of the Liberty of England by authority of parliament, in the Upper-Bench at Westminster, by the oaths of twelve honest and lawful men, it is presented, That Richard Faulconer late of Westbury in the county of Southampton gent. not having the fear of God before his eyes, but moved and seduced by the instigation of the Devil, and minding and endeavouring to bring the right honourable William lord Craven, baron of Hampstead, marshal in the county of Berks, in danger of the loss of his life, and of the sequestration, confiscation, and forfeiture of all his goods, and chattels, lands and tenements within this Commonwealth of England, the 10th day of February, in the year of our Lord God 1650, at White-Hall, in the parish of Martin's in the Fields, in the county of Middlesex, before Samuel Moyer, esq. James Russel, esq. Edward Winslow, esq. Josias Barners, esq. and Arthur Squib, esq. then being commissioners for compounding with delinquents, and for managing of all and every the estates of delinquents and Popish recusants; that the 15th day of April, in the said year of our Lord God 1650, were, or then after should be under sequestration, did upon the Holy Evangelists, corruptly, wilfully, falsely and maliciously, of his own proper act, consent and agreement, swear, and upon his corporal oath before the commissioners aforesaid, on the said 10th day of February, in the said year 1650, then having sufficient and lawful power to administer the said oath, and to take the testimony and depositions of witnesses upon their oaths in such cases, then and there deposed; That several officers, about 30 in number, made a Petition to the Scots king Charles, to entertain them to fight for him against the Commonwealth of England, by the name of 'Barbarous and Inhuman Rebels,' either in England or Scotland, for the recovering of his just rights, and reinstating him in his throne. And did also then and there corruptly, wilfully, falsely, and maliciously, before the said commissioners, swear, that the said officers deputed him, the said Richard Faulconer, and colonel Drury, to present the said Petition, who (as the said Richard Faulconer, then and there, corruptly, wilfully, falsely, and maliciously, before the said commissioners did swear, indeed drew the same; and did also, then and there, corruptly, wilfully, falsely and maliciously, before the said commissioners, swear, that he the said Richard Faulconer, with colonel Drury, applied themselves to the lord Craven, (meaning the aforesaid William lord Craven) entreating him to present the said Petition to the queen of Bohemia, to present it to the king of Scots: and did also then and there, corruptly, wilfully, falsely and maliciously before the said commissioners, swear, that the said lord Craven, taking the said Petition, and reading the same cheerfully, said unto colonel Drury, and him the said Richard Faulconer, There is the queen of Bohemia, deliver it to her, and I will speak for you: and that the said queen of Bohemia did present the said Petition; and did also then and there, corruptly, wilfully, falsely and maliciously, before the said commissioners, swear, that the said lord Craven after told him the said Richard Faulconer, and company, that they should receive an answer from the queen of Bohemia to their Petition, and that he (meaning the said William lord Craven) had spoken to the queen of Bohemia in their behalf: whereas in truth, neither did several officers, or any officer make a Petition to the said king to entertain him or them to fight for him against the Commonwealth of England. Nor did several officers or any officer make a Petition to the said king to entertain him or them to fight for him against the Commonwealth of England, by the name of 'Barbarous and Inhuman Rebels,' either in England or Scotland. Nor did several officers or any officer make a Petition to the said king to entertain him or them to fight for him against the Commonwealth of England, by the name of 'Barbarous and Inhuman Rebels,' either in England or Scotland, for the recovering of his just rights, or reinstating him in his throne. And whereas in truth, the said Richard Faulconer, and colonel Drury were not deputed by the said officers to present the said Petition, in the said oath mentioned; and whereas in truth, he the said Richard Faulconer, with colonel Drury, did not apply themselves to the said lord Craven, entreating him to present the said Petition to the queen of Bohemia, to present it to the said king of Scots. Nor did he the said Richard Faulconer, with the said colonel Drury, intreat him the said lord Craven, to present the said Petition to the said queen of Bohemia, to present it to the said king of Scots. And whereas in truth, the said lord Craven did not take the said Petition, nor read the same; nor say unto the said colonel Drury, and him the said Richard Faulconer, There is the queen of Bohemia, deliver it to her, and I will speak for you: and whereas in truth the said Lord Craven did not tell him the said Richard Faulconer, and company, in the said deposition mentioned, that they should receive an answer from the said queen of Bohemia, to the said Petition, nor that he the said lord Craven had spoken to the queen of Bohemia in their behalf, as the said Richard Faulconer, in and by the said deposition, hath deposed. And so the Jurors aforesaid, upon their oaths aforesaid, do say, that the said Richard Faulconer, in manner and form aforesaid, corruptly, wilfully, falsely and maliciously, of his own proper act, consent and agreement, did commit wilful, false, and corrupt perjury; to the great dishonour of Almighty God, and to the great damage, loss and infamy of the said William lord Craven, and in contempt of the laws of this Commonwealth; to the evil example of all others in the like case offending, and against the public peace, &c."

The reason wherefore this Indictment did not recite the oath in hæc verba, as in the former indictment, but assigned the perjury in the material parts of the oath; was by reason it came lately to knowledge, that the original oath could not be found, and therefore the oath was to be proved by the entries in the book of parliament, and at Haberdashers-hall, and by the testimony of the persons who administered the oath.

The next day after the Indictment was found, the prosecutors for the lord Craven moved the court for a Habeas Corpus, to bring Faulconer to the bar to plead to the indictment, who being brought into court, desired time to plead till the next term. Whereupon the Court made this Order.

"That the said Faulconer, having now in Court appeared unto the Indictment, should have time to plead unto the same, until the beginning of the next term, so that the issue thereupon may be tried at the bar in open court the same term."

Easter Term, 1653.

Faulconer having all this vacation neglected to appear, or plead to the indictment, the prosecutors for the lord Craven were enforced again to move for another Habeas Corpus, to bring Faulconer to the bar, to appear, or plead to the indictment; who appearing, desired longer time to attend his counsel, which the court granted accordingly, and the ordinary rules of court were given unto him for the peremptory days of pleading, or judgment to be entered against him; and the very last day, when the last rule was out, and not before, he pleaded Not Guilty. And the court ordered, that the issue upon the indictment of perjury against the defendant, be tried at the bar upon Friday in the morrow of the Ascension of our Lord; and that the sheriff of Middlesex do attend Andrew Broughton, esq. with the book of freeholders, forthwith, so that an indifferent Jury may be returned between the said Keepers, and the said Defendant, to try the issue aforesaid, by consent of the parties on both sides.

Mr. Broughton accordingly appointed the sheriff to attend him the next day in the afternoon, with the book of freeholders, who accordingly named the Jury, and notice was given by the sheriff, requiring them to appear at the day of trial.

THE TRIAL OF RICHARD FAULCONER,
Friday, May 20, 1653.

The Jury appearing according to summons, and Faulconer being brought in custody, the Court proceeded to Trial, and ordered the Indictment to be read; which being afterwards opened by Mr. Boynton, the Evidence was managed by Mr. Maynard, Mr. Hales, Mr. Twisden, Mr. Wilde, Mr. Philips, Mr. Baldwin, and Mr. Drury, who were of counsel for the Commonwealth against the said Faulconer.

Before the counsel for the Commonwealth proceeded to produce any witnesses, they offered unto the court and the jury something in general concerning the indictment. That the indictment was for the crime of perjury, wilfully and corruptly committed; that Faulconer makes an oath that there was a Petition delivered, in which there was a very sharp reflection (as he swears) upon the parliament, by the name of Barbarous and Inhuman Rebels; he swears he was deputed to deliver it, being drawn by himself and Drury, and subscribed by 30 officers; that in order to the delivery thereof, they did require the assistance of the lord Craven, that he promised to speak for them, and brought them an answer; but they hoped to prove unto the Jury, that this oath which Faulconer did take, was very false, that it was by design, a design for money, that the consequence of it was very notorious, the ruin of that gentleman, of his estate, fame and fortune; that witnesses will be produced to prove, what in truth the Petition was; there was a Petition delivered, but not a Petition to this effect at all, and Faulconer knew the contrary; we shall produce what it was, and that under his own hand, whereby it will appear that there was no such matter in it, as he hath deposed; the witnesses themselves will best speak the particulars.

For the opening of some things concerning this Oath of Faulconer, it is to be observed, he took this Oath before the commissioners of Haberdashers-hall at White-hall, and was there reduced into writing, and a transcript was made of the original: which transcript was sent to the Council of State, and they ordered the same to be reported to the Parliament, and being reported there, is entered in the Journal Book, and there remains a record in parliament.

The first thing therefore insisted upon by the counsel for the Commonwealth, was the proving of a true copy of Faulconer's Deposition, in respect the original was lost, or rather embezaled by Faulconer, to prove the same.

A copy thereof was produced in court; which agreed verbatim with that Deposition of his, which was filed upon record at Haberdashers-hall; (the proper Court where it ought to remain) and though that upon the file was but a copy, yet it was filed as evidence of that Deposition he was sworn unto by them; but this was opposed by the counsel for Faulconer, as not sufficient proof; and thereupon a copy of an Order of the Council of State of March 6, 1650, was produced unto the Court, whereby it did appear, that the depositions against the lord Craven had been transmitted to the Council of State, by the commissioners at Haberdashers-hall, and it appeared further by the said order, that Mr. Attorney General, was appointed by the Council of State, to report these Depositions to the parliament, so transmitted to that council by the commissioners at Haberdashers-hall; and the Attorney General being sworn in court, did declare that he reported no other Depositions to the parliament, than what he received from the Council of State; and that the Depositions produced to him in court, (whereof the said Faulconer's was one) was indorsed with the hand-writing of the lord Bradshaw, then lord president of the Council of State; and that the Votes of Confiscation of the lord Craven's estate did pass upon the report of the said Depositions, which he presented to the parliament from the Council of State.

Mr. Fermin, chief clerk to Mr. Scobel, clerk of the parliament, did depose in Court, that the very same Depositions shewed in Court to Mr. Attorney General, endorsed with the lord Bradshaw's hand-writing, were entered in the Journal Book, as read in parliament that day when Mr. Attorney General did make his report unto the parliament, which he knew the better to be true, for that he received the same from the hands of Mr. Scobel, or Mr. Darnel, the clerk assistant in parliament, the same day they were read in parliament, to be entered in the Journal Book; and that he did enter the same accordingly with the Votes of Confiscation, which passed upon the reading of those Depositions, and afterwards he and Mr. Darnel did examine the said Depositions, whereof the said Faulconer's was one, after the same were so entered into the Journal Book.

And for the further satisfaction of the court, he produced the Journal of parliament, wherein the said Depositions (and particularly that of Faulconer's) were entered, which were read in court, out of the Journal, whereby it did appear that the Depositions of the said Faulconer, Kitchingman and Reyly, were entered into the said Journal, and did agree verbatim with the copy of Faulconer's and their Depositions remaining at Haberdashers-hall, and with the copy reported by Mr. Attorney General from the Council of State to the parliament.

Mr. Winslow, one of the commissioners at Haberdashers-hall, being one before whom the said Faulconer was sworn, did testify upon oath in court, that the Deposition of Faulconer produced unto him, and whereupon there was an endorsement of the lord Bradshaw's hand-writing; was, as he did believe, a true copy of that Deposition to which the said Faulconer was sworn at White-hall, for that he findeth his own hand subscribed thereunto; (as examined by him to be a true copy) and said it was usual with the commissioners at Haberdashers-hall, when they take examinations concerning any person of quality, to appoint one of themselves to go from the table to examine the copy by the original: but whether when he subscribed his name unto the copy produced unto him, he did examine the same by the original Deposition before it was sent for away by the Council of State, or afterwards, or by the transcript remaining upon the file as a record at Haberdashers-hall, he could not positively remember; But conceives that the copy to which his hand is subscribed, as examined by him, to be a true copy, was taken when they had the original in custody; but cannot certainly say it.

Mr. Barners, another of the Commissioners at Haberdashers-hall, before whom also the said Oath was taken, did testify upon oath, that to the best of his remembrance, the particulars mentioned in Faulconer's Deposition, then read in court, were the same to which the said Faulconer was sworn unto by himself and the rest of the Commissioners, though he could not remember every syllable and letter.

Mr. Winslow, and Mr. Barners were again produced to declare what they did remember concerning this clause in the Deposition of the said Faulconer, viz. 'That several officers, about 30 in number, made a Petition to the king of Scots, to entertain them to fight for him against the Commonwealth of England, by the name of Barbarous and Inhuman Rebels, either in England or Scotland,' &c. and thereupon Mr. Winslow did declare unto the Court, that he did well remember that clause in Faulconer's Deposition when he was sworn thereunto, but whether the number of officers were thirty or no, he could not tell, but a certain number of officers were named.

Mr. Barners did declare the like, but whether the word 'Inhuman' was in, he could not positively say; but was certain that 'Barbarous Rebels' was contained in that clause; and that when Faulconer was sworn unto the same, it was first read unto him, and amended in several places, and then he swore it to be true; and Mr. Barners said, that he did remember his Deposition the better, for that himself and the rest of the Commissioners had several debates upon it at Haberdashers-hall, whether they should thereupon seize, sequester or secure the lord Craven's estate.

Having thus traced this Oath of Faulconer's, which was taken at Whitehall, and brought to Haberdashers-hall, afterwards brought from Haberdashers-hall back again to Whitehall, and from Whitehall to the Parliament, and there entered in the Journal Book, as the grounds upon which the Votes of Confiscation did pass, and having withal proved that particular clause of 'Barbarous and Inhuman Rebels, &c.' the counsel for the Commonwealth concluded as to that point, and left it to the Jury to judge, and to Faulconer to produce the original, which he hath got into his custody, if he can find any variance in it from the Deposition recited in the indictment.

And to prove that Faulconer had got the original Oath into his custody; Mr. Knight a witness was produced, who did testify upon oath, that being in the company of Faulconer, he did shew him a writing written with captain Bishop's own hand, (so far as he could judge one man's hand to be like another) and that Faulconer's name was subscribed thereunto, and that Faulconer told him the said Knight, that that writing was the original Deposition he was sworn unto, against the lord Craven, and which he kept on purpose to keep Mr. Bishop in awe (Faulconer being then in necessity and want) and that the said Faulconer further said unto him the said Knight, that he had received 20*l.* for the business of the lord Craven's, and was to have more, but said he deserved 2,000*l.* for what he had done.

In the next place the counsel for the Commonwealth did apply themselves to prove the falsity of the Oath, viz. That there was no such thing in the Petition mentioned by Faulconer in his Deposition [As that thirty officers did Petition to be entertained to fight for the king of Scots against the Commonwealth of England, by the name of 'Barbarous and Inhuman Rebels, &c.'] and being to prove a negative, they applied their proof to a certain time and place, which Faulconer in his own Deposition did prove for them, for he swears that the Petition was delivered the evening before the king of Scots went from Breda, and that the said king went away the next morning at three o'clock; he swears further, that he and Drury drew the Petition, and were deputed to deliver the same, accordingly they applied their evidence.

Proofs, as to the falsity of Faulconer's Oath.

Master Horsnell being produced, did testify; That the night before the king of Scots went from Breda, colonel Drury, captain Brisco, and divers others, were with a little short Petition to remember the king of a former Petition which they had delivered, that some course might be taken that their arrears which they owed in the town might be paid, that their landlords where they lodged might not suffer, for they were not able themselves to pay them; that he went along with them to the great window just over the moat, and there he the said Horsnell did set his hand unto the same, and that he was in the Chamber when Drury and Brisco came in to deliver the Petition, in which there was not a word that concerned any thing, but only the relief of their present necessities; Being asked by the court, if there were not a mention of 'Barbarous and Inhuman Rebels;' he answered, not any thing of that nature was in it; he further said, that this Petition had reference to a former Petition he was not acquainted withal, nor was his hand set to the former Petition.

Capt. Brisco being produced, did testify, that there were divers gentlemen in great distress met together in col. Drury's chamber at the time of the Treaty of the Scots king with the Commissioners at Breda, and among other things it was agreed to draw a Petition to the king, which was drawn in col. Drury's chamber, expressing their necessities, that the people of the town might be relieved, and that the Petitioners might not be left to perish: that going to deliver it, they met with secretary Long by the way, who told them that it was to no purpose, for that there was no monies come in: afterwards the petitioners had notice the king was to depart from Breda, whereupon they met together again, and went into the further end of the gallery to draw a short Petition, to put the king in mind of his promise to secretary Long, concerning the people of the town of Breda, that they might be satisfied, and the petitioners relieved, which paper he the said Brisco delivered to the Scots king, who threw it on a table; and doing so, they stood all amazed, being likely to be left in distress, and unexpectedly came in the lord Craven, whereupon he the said Brisco, having long served in the country, and knowing him to be a lover of soldiers, he spoke unto him, and said, Sir, we are a company of poor distressed gentlemen, likely to be left here in misery, he said, Well, and the next morning the king went away, without giving any relief unto the petitioners. The court demanded of Brisco whether there were no such matter in it as 'Barbarous and Inhuman Rebels;' he answered, that he read it, and was sure there was no such thing in it, the whole scope of it being to relieve their necessities, which was the occasion of that Petition; being demanded again by the court, if 'Barbarous and Inhuman Rebels' were not in the Petition; he answered, No, not any such words at all, nor so much as any mention of the parliament.

Col. Drury was in the next place produced, who testified, that being at Breda, lieut. col. Bardsey, major Faulconer, major Hall, capt. Kitchingman, and divers others, came to his lodging, and told him they were in a condition of starving, and desired him that he would assist them to draw a Petition to the king of Scots, to relieve their necessities, or else they must perish; that the said Drury being in their condition, consented unto it, and in his chamber, in his son's paper book the Petition was drawn, major Faulconer writ it with his own hand, which saith Drury, I have here to shew, and so presented the original under Faulconer's hand unto the court, in which Petition, said Drury, we desired some relief from his majesty, shewing how we had served the former king, and in what necessities we were in; that they were advised to deliver it to secretary Long, for that they were told that the king had not a pistole to relieve himself, and it would be a vain thing, said Long, to deliver it; that they followed secretary Long, and solicited him daily for three weeks together, and still he put them off; and the day before the king went from Breda, they drew a short Petition to mind the king of his promise to secretary Long, and to desire that the inhabitants of Breda that had relieved them, might not be undone, that Brisco was deputed with him to deliver it, and he accordingly delivered it to the king, that the king laid it down upon the table; in steps the lord Craven, then capt. Brisco, having trailed a pike under the lord Craven, went to him, and told him there were many gentlemen ready to starve, and desired him to speak a favourable word to the queen of Bohemia; to which the lord Craven answered, Well, as Brisco then told him: the next morning the king of Scots went away, and so nothing at all was done for the petitioners. That original Petition which Drury produced unto the court, of Faulconer's own hand writing, and in the presence of Faulconer, was publicly read in court, and was as followeth, viz.

"May it please your majesty; the great sense we have always had of your majesty's present condition, hath been the prime cause of our long silence; but now our necessities are grown so great and insupportable, that we are enforced either to petition or perish. Most humbly desiring your majesty, to take into your princely consideration, their extremities who have been ever ready to prostrate their lives in your majesty's royal father his service: Nor no less willing and ready to prosecute the same in what your majesty shall command: Most humbly petitioning your royal order, that some course may be taken for our present sustenance, that our future endeavours may not be buried in that unavoidable calamity, which our loyalty hath reduced us unto. And we shall cordially pray for your majesty."

The Court demanding of col. Drury, if the said Petition was Faulconer's own hand writing, he said yea, and looking back upon Faulconer, said, He cannot deny it: I did dictate it unto him, and Faulconer did write it in my chamber; and that is the very original that was so drawn, and being fair written, was afterwards delivered to secretary Long; the other that was delivered, was a memorial, to put the king in mind of his promise when money came in; and Drury further said, that when he was examined by Mr. Bishop, he did give in his examination, the contents of the first and latter Petition, and said, he did express himself at that time of his examination by Mr. Bishop, to the same effect which he had now done in court. Being asked by the Court, if the words 'Barbarous and Inhuman Rebels' were in that first Petition, the said Drury answered, that Faulconer moved to have 'Barbarous and Inhuman Rebels' inserted into that Petition so drawn by himself, but was answered by the Petitioners, that they were soldiers of fortune, it was uncivil language, and so they would not give way unto it; being demanded by the Court who was deputed to deliver the last Petition, he said capt. Brisco was one, in regard he had many wounds at Canon-Froom, that the king might commiserate his case the more, and that he the said Drury was also deputed with Brisco to deliver the same, because he was known to the queen of Bohemia, and some other persons of quality, and Faulconer was not at all deputed. Being asked if the lord Craven was present at the delivery of the first Petition: He answered No, the Petition was delivered three weeks before; but the lord Craven was present when the last Petition was delivered, to mind the king of his promise; the said Drury further informed the Court, that afterwards Faulconer being discontented that he got no monies, said, as he was going into the town, This is a horrid thing, that we should be in this case, to follow a thing they call a king, (God damn me) I will go into England, and do all the mischief I can.

Proofs as to the Credit of Faulconer.

In the next place the counsel for the commonwealth did apply themselves to offer Proof as to the credit of Faulconer.

Mr. Woolridge of Clements Inn, attorney at the common law, being sworn, did testify to this purpose; That being in his chamber at Clements Inn, about this time 12 months Faulconer came to him, asked how some of his countrymen near Petersfield did? That he asked Faulconer where he had been of so long a time? Who answered, he had been in the Low-countries, had seen some lords sit in counsel for the king, that he had been sworn against the lord Craven, which would bring a great deal of advantage to the state, that he had monies for the doing of it, and said that he had received already 80 £. (it was that sum here mentioned, said Mr. Woolridge, to the best of his remembrance) but Faulconer said, he did expect a greater reward; that the said Faulconer hath been as wicked a man as any in England; that he spent his estate and left the country, did wicked acts while he was there; that being at Petersfield, he drunk an health to the Devil in the middle of the street, of which information being given, we sent to the justice of the peace in the town, and had him bound over to the sessions for doing of it, but said, he did not see him drink the health to the Devil.

Mr. Jackson of Petersfield being produced, testified, about five years ago Faulconer was ranting and drinking of healths, that he did drink a health to the Devil, and said this, I have spent my brother's estate, and my own, I will never want money, for whilst there is any in the nation, I will get it one way or other, and I will do something of infamy to be talked of, that the name of Faulconer shall never die: Being asked in what manner he did drink the health, he answered, in the street, down upon his knees, that he was present, and thousands can witness it, that he was had before a justice of peace for it.

James Graham being sworn, did testify, that in May 1647, after the Siege of Exeter, it was his fortune to fall into the company of Faulconer, and as he was with him in the cellar, he was swearing, 'Damn him, blood and wounds,' takes a two and twenty shilling piece of gold, puts it into his hand, and said, 'God damn him, blood and wounds, he would bugger his soul to hell,' and these words he used frequently to man, woman and child, 'bugger, bugger, bugger;' and correct him for it, he would say, 'Damn him, blood and wounds, he would do it;' Being asked by the Court, if Faulconer did any thing upon him, he answered, 'No; he was able to deal with as good a man as he.'

Mr. Hughes hath often heard Faulconer swear, 'Damn him and sink him,' and such wicked expressions.

Mr. Bradley did testify, that he heard Faulconer say our Saviour Christ was a bastard, and a carpenter's son, and carried a basket of tools after his father.

Mr. Dyer being produced, did declare that Faulconer confessed to him, that he had 10*l.* of a man, by procuring one to personate captain Bishop; it was thus, (as Faulconer told him) That a citizen, as he remembered Faulconer said, did desire Faulconer to get captain Bishop to do a business for him, which citizen did promise him 20*l.* ten in hand, and ten afterwards; whereupon Faulconer said he got one to personate captain Bishop, and to go along with him to the citizen; which man so personating captain Bishop, promised the citizen upon the account of major Faulconer's good services for the public, to afford him his best assistance in the effecting of what was desired in his Petition, which story Faulconer himself told; and Faulconer further said, that captain Bishop had used him ill, in keeping him so low in money, that he had it one time in his thoughts, as captain Bishop came from the committee-chamber, through the guard-chamber, down the stairs, to have cut his throat; Being asked by the Court what monies Faulconer had of captain Bishop, he answered, he paid to Faulconer with his own hands, by captain Bishop's directions, 20*l.* at one time, and about 30*l.* more at other times, in several portions, that Faulconer confessed to him he had 20*l.* afterwards. Being demanded what it was for he gave that money, he said, I will not speak to that, I cannot speak to that.

Capt. Ballard being produced, did testify, that about three or four years ago, he came to Faulconer's lodging, and saw him write a letter in his chamber, and that he writ it as if it had come from colonel Burgess from Jersey, and set Burgess his name to it, and Faulconer would have had him the said Ballard to carry this letter to one captain Bishop that belonged to the Council of State, and to say he had the letter from one of Bristol, and get some money of Bishop for that intelligence mentioned in the letter, of which the said Ballard was to have half, but he the said Ballard refused to go with the same, knowing it to be unjust.

Mr. Powell, a justice of the peace of the county of Middlesex, did testify to the court, that this Faulconer was brought before him upon suspicion of felony, and committed, which mittimus he produced in court; that afterwards the Lord Chief Justice Rolls did send for him out of New Prison to Newgate; that Faulconer hath a common name for a robber upon the highway.

Mr. Goodman, gaoler of Aylesbury, did testify unto the court, that the said Faulconer, the 20th of March 1648, was committed to Aylesbury gaol by sir Thomas Sanders, Mr. Bulstrode and two other justices of the peace, upon suspicion of felony, robbery and murders, and tendered a Certificate thereof in writing unto the court.

The Defence made on the behalf of Faulconer.

1. The Evidence being given on the behalf of the Commonwealth, Mr. Windham, Mr. Latch, Mr. Lechmore, and Mr. Haggat, of counsel for Faulconer, did offer something to the consideration of the court before they did produce their witnesses, viz. That although it concerns every man that perjury should be punished; for every man's life, liberty, fortune and estate depends upon an oath, and in these times it is somewhat dangerous if they should be forsworn; So on the other side if Faulconer be not forsworn, it is but just he should be acquitted: That the counsel for the Commonwealth have endeavoured to prove that there was a Petition, but that there was no such words in the Petition as are suggested, and have endeavoured to impeach the credit of Faulconer: That they have produced a copy of Faulconer's oath, which ought not to be admitted, because it is but a transcript of a transcript, a copy of a copy, brought from Haberdashers-hall to the Council of State, and from the Council of State to the Parliament, and there the copy is entered in the Journal book: And the witnesses that have been produced, do not swear positively to the oath as it is in writing, and one particle may turn the whole sense of an oath: And though these words 'Barbarous and Inhuman Rebels' were in it, yet how it is applied, and how the sense of it falls, it cannot be judged, but by the original writing itself, and it concerns the Counsel for the Keepers to produce it: How it should come into Faulconer's hands, there is no account given, but by one Knight, who saith Faulconer shewed him a thing, which Faulconer said was his 'original' Deposition against the lord Craven, but the credit of Knight's testimony is left to the Jury: It is sworn that that copy produced in court was examined, but Mr. Winslow doth not positively say it was examined by the original, when in their custody.

That as to the Witnesses produced against the credit of Faulconer, they did hope to counterpoise his life to be, as of a man that might be credited; that in the Petition delivered at Breda, there is something of those words, though there be not 'Barbarous and Inhuman 'Uebels,' which was but a nominal thing; yet the prostrating of themselves to prosecute the cause, is desired may be observed, though the actual words be not there, yet the sense doth bear it; that the case is somewhat hard with Faulconer, who was employed at the court at Breda as an emissary, as a spy: And at his return in giving an account of his observations at Breda, let something fall concerning the lord Craven, without any design in him, and that what Faulconer delivered in his Deposition was with qualifications, 'as he did believe to his best remembrance, and the like.'

Hereupon captain Bishop was produced on the behalf of Faulconer, as a witness, whose discourse was long, and consisted of three parts.

1. It took notice how the Council of State sent for him from his habitation at Bristol, to be employed in matters of great trust, and afterwards what trust was reposed in him and Mr. Scot, in order to the safety of the nation.

2. By way of argument on behalf of Faulconer, he did declare what services Faulconer had done for the Commonwealth, and that Faulconer was one by whom this Commonwealth sat safe at this hour and by whom he enjoyed his life: and what an ill requital this was to be thus proceeded against.

The third part of his discourse, was, to declare what particular designs the state formerly had in hand, and what designs the enemy had against the state: and what service he did to countermine the enemy in their designs; the last of the three being not (as was conceived) so advisedly spoken in public, and which would be more unfit to be in print: Shall therefore here be past over in silence, as also what captain Bishop said at large concerning the two first particulars. In respect they are no proofs pertinently to be applied, as to the perjury in question.

A brief account only shall be therefore given what captain Bishop properly spoke as a witness.

As a witness, captain Bishop said, he had never seen Faulconer in drink or misbehave himself, but ever observed him as a sober man, that he did draw Faulconer's information 'which Faulconer did deliver as the substance,' and that he must say, that the words 'or to that effect' should have been put in, and that it was his fault they were not in, and he could not tell but that they were in; that the commissioners at Haberdashers-hall were desired to come to White-hall to administer an oath to the said Faulconer privately, lest danger should befall the witnesses if they were discovered.

That Horsnel was formerly an agent for the prince, and was to receive orders from Tom Cook in the Tower, and was ordered to be tried by the High Court of Justice: That colonel Drury was a papist in arms, and being brought before him to be examined, still had the lord Craven in his mouth, before he was asked a question.

The like of Brisco. He said, that before Drury and Brisco came from beyond seas, his agent gave him notice of their coming, and thereupon he laid wait for them, and caught them; that Drury said, when he was examined, that he had not a penny of money, that he did not commit him to prison, but took his parole, and in commiseration gave him 2s. 6d. for his supper: he said further, that Drury did contradict himself in what he had formerly informed the Council of State, and to that end produced in court the copy of Drury's Information, which being read in court, agreed with the testimony which Drury then gave to the Jury.

[By way of Digression observe, That Drury's and Briscoe's Informations which captain Bishop had taken, above 12 months since, and which tended to clear the Lord Craven, he concealed till this hour that he produced the same in Court, and never transmitted those two men's Examinations to the Parliament; Though before the Bill of Sale did pass, he did transmit Bardsey's and Kitchingman's re-examination taken by himself, and which he apprehended made against the Lord Craven.]

Captain Bishop further said, That whereas it was objected that Faulconer had money: he answered, that it is great reason he should have monies, for there was a real effect of the safety of the Commonwealth by his services; that notwithstanding any thing hath been sworn against Faulconer, he believes what he swore was truth.

Captain Bishop speaking again of Faulconer's Deposition, that the words 'or to that effect' should have been added: the Court asked him whether Faulconer gave any directions to express these words in his examination: to which captain Bishop made answer, that the Deposition he made, was the substance of things, and he put it in words, and that 'or to that effect' if they were not in, should have been in. The Court again asked him if Faulconer did direct him to put in these words 'or to that effect'. He replied again, he did deliver the whole, 'as the effect of it.'

Captain Bishop being further asked by the court, if he were present when the commissioners gave the oath, and took what Faulconer said in way of information, he answered, 'That he prepared it before the commissioners were sent for,' and then they had only the administering the oath; and said again, 'I prepared the Information which he made oath of;' hereupon Mr. Winslow desired leave to inform the court, that when he and the rest of the commissioners came to White-hall to administer this oath, being sent for to that end, the Information was ready prepared by captain Bishop, and having no register with them, they made use of captain Bishop, being well skilled in the use of his pen, to write over the Deposition, for though he had prepared the Deposition, the commissioners did see occasion to alter much of it, and it was writ over again, and then read to Faulconer, and attested by him, and subscribed unto by the hands of all the commissioners then present; and the oath which we gave him was this, 'Whether the Deposition thus drawn, and that which he was examined unto, was the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth;' Mr. Barners attested the like: then captain Bishop sat down.

After this lieut. col. Joyce was produced, who likewise spake of very great designs, and of matters of State, and what discoveries were made by Faulconer, which being not pertinent to the perjury, shall be here omitted; But as a witness he said, That Horsnel was formerly an agent for the prince. That Faulconer was a Hampshire-man, a gentleman well bred, that he was an enemy to himself in spending his estate, that he was always faithful to the parliament, that he believes Faulconer hath cuffed some of the witnesses produced against him for their malignancy, and that nothing could be expected to come from them to the credit of Faulconer: That Faulconer was sent over by him as a spy into Holland upon an account of faithfulness.

Lieut. col. Bardsey was produced in the next place on the behalf of Faulconer, who testified, that he put his hand to the Petition at Breda, that the lord Craven was desired to deliver it to the king of Scots, that the lord Craven said he was no courtier, but a servant to the states of Holland, that it was fitter for the princess royal to deliver it than himself, and so returned the Petition again: that the queen of Bohemia told the Petitioners the king would do for them what he was able; but about 4 o'clock in the morning he went away, and they had no other answer; that the contents of it was to put the king in mind of his promise, that some money might be delivered to the Petitioners for discharge of their quarters at Breda. Being asked by the court, if there were any expressions in it, as 'Barbarous and Inhuman Rebels,' he answered No: being asked, if to that Petition which Faulconer drew, he would have had 'Barbarous and Inhuman Rebels' added; he answered, Yes, Faulconer did move to have those words in, but was refused; that he the said Bardsey read over that Petition, and set his hand to it, and was at the penning of it, and Faulconer wrote it.

Captain Kitchingmen being produced, did testify, that a Petition was drawn at Breda, and signed by him, Faulconer, and others, to be presented to the king of Scots; that it was in pursuance of gaining moneys to discharge their quarters, and to enable them to serve the king, but knows not by whom it was delivered; that secretary Long was to issue out monies unto them, but they never had any; and in order to the gaining of that money, there was another Petition drawn, but by whom delivered, he knew not: only he saw a paper in the queen of Bohemia's hand, which was told him was the Petition, and after a quarter of an hour's discourse with the king, she delivered it to the king; but they never received any money upon that neither: That he did not read the last Petition at all, nor heard it read; that it was the first Petition which he signed.

Col. Dene was produced in court on the behalf of Faulconer, who said, he knew nothing of his birth, he only knew his father and mother, that they lived in good fashion and credit, but how this Faulconer hath been brought up, and where he hath inhabited for these 10 or 12 years, he knew not, and that this was as much as he could say.

Michel, an ale-house-keeper, was then produced, who said he knew nothing of Faulconer, but that he was a very honest man, Faulconer having lain in his house a year and three quarters; that he knows nothing to the contrary, but that he was a good scholar, an honest man, and brought up at the university.

Capt. Mowbray being produced as a witness, did testify, that anno 1649, in Amsterdam, he met accidentally with captain Brisco, who said to him and others, Gentlemen, I see you are in a sad condition, I will set you a way to get money; here are Dutchmen taking up men to go to plantations, and you shall have 12 stivers a piece a day, but I will warrant you, I will force them to leave you behind, and accordingly they received 12 stivers a day, and Brisco would have had them on ship-board, but one Church an Englishman bid them take heed what they did, for he served some Englishmen so before, clap them under decks, and received so many 6 dollars a piece for them, and so left them; That he hath known Faulconer 5 years, and he hath behaved himself civilly for ought he ever saw.

Mr. Corey did testify something to this purpose, in reference to Brisco's sending men to plantations; who said further, he had no more to say against Brisco, but that he was a man would drink, and sometimes swear as well as other men that are accustomed to it, that he knows nothing to the contrary, but that he came to Breda to wait for employment; in the mean time whilst he was there, he did as other men did, strive to seek for relief.

After the Court had with much patience heard captain Bishop and the rest of the witnesses on the behalf of Faulconer, the counsel for Faulconer summed up the Evidence, and left it to the Jury, with some further observations, viz.

That though the words "Barbarous and Inhuman Rebels" were not in the Petition, yet there were words of "tender of Service," as the king should command, and to prosecute his cause, which was the substance of the thing informed by Faulconer; that captain Bishop, and lieut. col. Joyce, who have testified of Faulconer's services, were witnesses to be preferred before any witnesses produced against Faulconer; that the endeavour is not only to convict this man, but by conviction and disabling of his credit, to undermine that which hath been acted by the parliament upon his testimony, and other concurrent testimonies, not only in passing votes, but in passing an act of parliament to sell an estate.

That there was nothing objected against the credit of this witness, so long as there was any other stone to turn, though there were other endeavours used in parliament to prevent the sale of the lord Craven's estate, so that when all other refuges failed, then they make use of this indictment of perjury, and so hope to undermine the act of parliament; though Faulconer might have some extravagance, yet you see what his part was to act, to dissemble that he was not what he was, and it may be when he was amongst the God-damnes, and such kind of men, it was his part to seem to be what most conduced to his end, [like themselves] for a man as he was employed must twine himself into all shapes, and though not drink a health, yet sometimes "hold a candle to the Devil;" that they acknowledge the charge in part, and would lay it in words, not in substance, and therefore not strictly in the letter true.

That it was proved that the first Petition was to serve the king, as they formerly had served his father, and they served his father against the parliament: so their offer must needs be, to be entertained to serve the king against the parliament.

That it is a sad case that this man for so many services performed by him for the Commonwealth, and settlements grounded upon his information, must be blasted here by an artificial Indictment a great while after.

And if he shall after all this be convicted of perjury, it will be a discouragement for all men to undertake the like employment for the future.

And lastly, The counsel for Faulconer did offer: that if there be a mistake in what he hath sworn, yet it appears not to be maliciously or corruptly done, and that therefore the Jury ought to find for Faulconer.

The REPLY by the Counsel on the behalf of the Commonwealth against Faulconer, was to this purpose following:

Gentlemen of the Jury, you have heard the Defence that Faulconer hath made; we have charged him, that he did take the oath that was set down in the indictment: they say, first, we have not proved it; secondly, that he did not take it, but did take it in effect; And thirdly, If he did, it was not maliciously, nor corruptly; but not one of them hath said it is not false, no not one of their own counsel; the evidence that hath been given for the most part, hath been to magnify the service of this man that is now in question before you: We shall admit his services to be true, but this we shall be bold to say, that a man that is employed beyond sea, and gives good return of his service in some kind, That that will not give him license to make a false accusation in another kind: and it is no argument to say, that because this man was a spy beyond the sea, and did good service as a spy, that therefore he did not give a false information; In this he must not take a liberty to ruin any man by a false oath: his service must not excuse him, if what he hath said be false.

And for what Mr. Bishop said concerning his oath; for Mr. Bishop tells you, it is his fault if the words "or to that effect" were not put down; if it were not, whose fault was it. It was mended by those whose judgments and consciences induced them to it: The information he took was done by the judgment of the committee, and not by the direction of him that was a minister, a scribe to write, and not a judge to dictate and correct: you have here two men of unquestionable truth and honesty every way (meaning Mr. Winslow, and Mr. Barners) that say positively he did swear it, and God forbid that we shall live to that day, that any man should be ruined upon a Deposition taken, by the judgment of a clerk, 'to such or such effect;' If we should come to such a piece of justice, that a Deposition 'to such and such effect,' and that taken by a clerk, should come to cast a man, it is beyond an oath of '&c.' For it is the judges that must say what is the effect of an oath, and not the clerk that writes it: If a clerk shall take an oath, and he shall come and say, 'it is to this effect,' never shall any man be free from him that by perjury will ruin another man: It is proved unto you, it was read over to Faulconer, expressly mended in his sight, and sworn by him, and let the 'effect' go with the '&c.' that went before it.

They objected to our witnesses, that Brisco had sold his companions for twelve stivers a day; that information had no other foundation than the saying of a Dutchman, that said so, or of an Englishman in a Dutch bottom; And what was testified, was what was said, and not what was known or sworn; they objected that Brisco would swear as well as another; that takes not off his testimony; but what do they say concerning their own witness Bardsey, whom they have produced. He hath sworn interminis, in effect with Drury, which you will not forget: He swore, that when the first petition was drawing, it was moved by Faulconer that the words 'Barbarous and Inhuman Rebels' should be put in, but this was rejected by them that were there, as a thing uncivil; so their own witness concurs with Drury.

As for the Deposition on record at Haberdashers Hall, which being filed there, it is proof of itself, which no man may aver against, when it is recorded; we have shewed it there, traced it here, brought a copy of it indorsed with the lord Bradshaw's hand; shall it be believed that a man shall be confiscated and lose his estate, and not so much as an oath taken against him. It is apparent there was an oath, and it is hoped you will believe that which the parliament hath recorded, and expressly proved by the gentlemen of Haberdashers Hall here present, which you will believe before any imaginations can be made on the other side.

They have endeavoured to say something touching the conversation of this man, to uphold his credit; but, Gentlemen of the Jury, you are to consider of the man, what damnable blasphemy hath come out of his mouth, you have heard it: If a man will go so high, as to kneel down to "drink a health to the Devil," I hope there is no excuse for that; his good services must not plead for him to comply with God-damnees, that will not justify him, he was not sent to do any such thing: but we have not rested there; have we not proved him a personator of other men, a decoy, and things that a man should be ashamed to name: the two and twenty shillings piece he took out, and what base and vile words he spake, not fit to be repeated. That will not be palliated by any service whatsoever. And for that which Mr. Bishop hath said, nothing shall be said against him, but what appears to you: that Mr. Bishop hath gone beyond a witness: for when he hath done his testimony, acteth and manageth the business, and in that is not equal to others that do not: For his expression, that Faulconer is one of them by which the Commonwealth of England sits safe at this hour: It is God we sit safe by, and not by him: I blame him not for his service, but when we are upon a question of truth, I say truth and righteousness is beyond all the service in the world.

They say my lord Craven furthered the Petition, and promised to second it. Gentlemen, you must distinguish that which my lord Craven knew, and that which he knew not: there is not one witness from beginning to ending that ever can speak one word that my lord Craven knew what the first Petition was. In that Petition was the expression of venturing their lives, which was three weeks before the latter, which was singly to desire they might have money for their quarters. The first Petition had some expressions relating to their former service, and some expressions of their readiness for the future, but that Petition my lord Craven never saw, but was delivered to one Long three weeks before, and Drury did put it down in his Deposition when he was examined by Mr. Bishop, which agrees with that which was read in court.

But the particular time when the latter Petition or Memorial was delivered, with which the lord Craven is charged, was the evening before the king went from Breda.

They say that here is no corruption proved, and a man cannot be guilty without corruption: but certainly he that swears a thing that is false, it must of necessity be corrupt.

Faulconer swears that 30 officers did subscribe the Petition: Doth he bring any one to confirm his testimony; or the least colour of evidence to what he hath sworn?

It was further pressed by the counsel for the Commonwealth, that the Jury would distinguish these two things, between the Petition framed and dictated by Drury, and writ by Faulconer; and that other Petition delivered the night before the king went from Breda; the first is produced, and proved to be Faulconer's own hand: that Petition was three weeks before, which begs for maintenance, and proffers service, the copy of which was brought forth before any evidence was given by them, for Drury upon his examination before the Council of State made the same known, and which agrees verbatim with that read in court; so the dictating of that Petition was by Drury, the writing by Faulconer, the delivery was to secretary Long, and that was the thing whereof they did expect an account; but that was not the Petition to which the testimony of Faulconer at all goes: that Petition of which this oath is spoken, and to which it is applied, is the Petition which was drawn the evening before the Scots king went from Breda, that is the Petition talked of in the Deposition, that is the Petition upon which we pitch, and therefore if in that Petition there be none of these words, that which he hath sworn unto is false: for in that Petition we say there was no such words, as 'Barbarous and Inhuman Rebels;' nor such words of proffer of service or malignity, but a mere desire of supply; and they have not offered the least proof to the contrary. And secondly, that it was not promoted by the lord Craven, for the Petition was delivered by them to the Scots king, before such time as the lord Craven came into the room, so that my lord Craven was no promoter of the Petition; and had he been a promoter of it, there was no such thing in it as might give offence; no not the least mention of the Parliament, or any thing that might offend; and whereas they object that this oath was not corrupt, the very words of his expression are very considerable, for he doth remarkably fix the words in his Deposition, 'To fight against the Commonwealth of England,' by the name of 'Barbarous and Inhuman Rebels:' why would he fix such an emphasis upon it as that was? it could not be a bare mistake; nor the words 'to this effect,' as Mr. Bishop would have had in, could never have served the turn, for to say that he would fight against 'the Barbarous and Inhuman Rebels,' or to that effect, there is no such effect in the one Petition nor in the other. Then a second thing is, that this Faulconer being, as he deposeth, the contriver of the Petition, it could not be a mere oversight and mistake in him; and then when he could not have his desire beyond seas, to get monies, he said, 'He would come here and do what mischief he could.'

The counsel urged further: Gentlemen of the Jury, what is become of the original Depositions it concerns not us to know, no more than the original of Depositions taken in the country; it lies upon them that are for the Oath to make it out. It cannot be presumed that the Parliament would confiscate a nobleman's estate, and order it to be sold: would they enter it into the Journal Book, and make it a record; should it come and be transmitted from Haberdashers-hall (the proper judicatory for that business) to the Council of State, and from the Council of State to the Parliament, and then not to be a true oath, or false copy? that is not to be borne, that a false copy should sell a gentleman's estate, and that a false copy should be recorded to stand to all eternity.

After the Reply was made, every Judge in Court spoke what they in their judgment thought fit, for the better direction of the Jury; whereupon the Jury withdrew, and the next day brought in their Verdict, that they found the said Faulconer Guilty of the Perjury mentioned in the Indictment. The Order following was thereupon made, viz.

By the Court.

"The Defendant was this day brought into court, under the custody of the marshal of this court, upon an Indictment for Perjury, whereunto he had formerly pleaded Not Guilty; and the Jury thereupon being impannelled, and sworn, found him Guilty of the Perjury in the Indictment mentioned. And thereupon the said Faulconer is committed to the custody of the said marshal; there to remain, until," &c.

192. The Case of Captain JOHN STREATER, on an Habeas Corpus,* at the Upper Bench in Westminster-hall, Mich. & Hil. Terms: 5 CHARLES II. A. D. 1653.

The Habeas Corpus was read :

"BY the Keepers of the Liberty of England by authority of parliament. To the Keeper of the Prison of the Gate-house in the Liberty of Westminster, in the county of Middlesex, or

* A passage in Ludlow's Memoirs (vol. 2, p. 114. Edinburgh edition, 1751), which, on other accounts, is curious and interesting, has transmitted to us the Narrative of a Conference between that sturdy republican and the master whom he had unwittingly made for himself, in which the practice of arbitrary imprisonment and the right to the Habeas Corpus were very boldly spoken of:

"The usurper having governed, as he thought, long enough by virtue of the Instrument of Government, which, though drawn up by himself and his creatures, was now thought to lay too great a restraint upon his ambitious spirit; and resolving to rest satisfied with nothing less than the succession of his family to the crown, he attempted to make himself king. To this end he thought it necessary to call a parliament; and that he might engage the army to assist him in all parts to procure such men to be chosen as would be fit for his purpose, he pretended that this assembly was called only in order to raise money for the payment of the army and fleet, to confirm the authority of the Major Generals, and that of the Instrument of Government. By this means he obtained his desires in a great measure; especially in Scotland and Ireland, where all kinds of artifice, and in many places the most irregular courses, were taken to get such men returned as were proposed by the court. But knowing the people of England not to be of so mercenary a spirit; and that as they were better instructed in the principles of civil liberty, so they were not wanting in courage to assert it, he used his utmost endeavours to disable and incapacitate such men from being chosen whom he thought most likely to obstruct his designs. In order to this, he summoned the Lord President Bradshaw, sir Henry Vane, col. Rich, and myself, to his deputy, these, greeting. We command you that the body of John Streater, in the prison under your custody detained, as it is said, together with the day and cause of his taking and detaining, by whatsoever name the said John is called therein, you have before us to appear before him in council; which we all did, except sir Henry Vane, who told the messenger he should be at his house at Charing-cross on a certain day. Cromwell, as soon as he saw the Lord President, required him to take out a new commission for his office of Chief Justice of Chester; which he refused, alledging that he held that place by a grant from the parliament of England to continue quamdiu se bene gesserit. And whether he had carried himself with that integrity which his commission exacted from him, he was ready to submit to a trial by twelve Englishmen, to be chosen even by Cromwell himself. Col. Rich being pressed to give security not to act against the government, and refusing so to do, was sent prisoner to Windsor castle. Then I drew near to the council table; where Cromwell charged me with dispersing treasonable books in Ireland, and with endeavouring to render the officers of the army disaffected, by discoursing to them concerning new models of government. I acknowledged, that I had caused some papers to be dispersed in Ireland; but denied that they justly could be called treasonable. And though I knew not that it was a crime to debate of the several forms of government, yet that I had not done any thing of that nature lately, to the best of my remembrance. He then said, That he was not ignorant of the many plots that were on foot to disturb the present power, and that he thought it his duty to secure such as he suspected. To this I replied, That there were two duties required by God of the magistrate, i. e. that he be a terror to those that do evil, and a praise to such as do well; and whether my actions were good or bad, I was ready to submit to a legal trial: that I was ignorant of any other way to secure the magistrate from being afraid of the people, or the in the Upper-Bench at Westminster, Wednesday next, after the morrow of St. Martin; to undergo and receive those things which our said Court of Upper Bench shall then and there order concerning him in this part. And this you must not omit at your peril. And have you then this writ. Witness Henry Rolle at Westminster, the 18th of Novemb. in the year of our Lord 1653.

people from the dread of the magistrate, unless both will do that which is just and good. 'You do well,' said he, 'to reflect on our fears; yet I would have you know, that what I do, proceeds not from any motive of fear, but from a timely prudence to foresee and prevent danger: that, had I done as I should, I ought to have secured you immediately upon your coming into England, or at least when you desired to be freed from the engagement you had given after your arrival: and therefore I now require you to give assurance not to act against the government.' I desired to be excused in that particular, reminding him of the reasons I had formerly given him for my refusal; adding, that I was in his power, and that he might use me as he thought fit. 'Pray then,' said he, 'what is it that you would have? May not every man be as good as he will? What can you desire more than you have?' 'It were easy,' said I, 'to tell what we would have.' 'What is that, I pray?' said he. 'That which we fought for,' said I, 'that the nation might be governed by its own consent.' 'I am,' said he, 'as much for a government by consent as any man: but where shall we find that consent? Amongst the Prelatical, Presbyterian, Independent, Anabaptist, or Levelling parties?' I answered, 'Amongst those of all sorts who had acted with fidelity and affection to the public.' Then he fell into the commendation of his own government, boasting of the protection and quiet which the people enjoyed under it, saying that he was resolved to keep the nation from being imbrued in blood. I said, that I was of opinion too much blood had been already shed, unless there were a better account of it. 'You do well,' said he, 'to charge us with the guilt of blood; but we think there is a good return for what hath been shed; and we understand what clandestine correspondences are carrying on at this time between the Spaniard and those of your party, who make use of your name, and affirm that you will own them and assist them.' 'I know not,' said I, 'what you mean by my party; and can truly say, that if any men have entered into an engagement with Spain, they have had no advice from me so to do; and that if they will use my name, I cannot help it.' Then, in a softer way, he told me, that he desired not to put any more hardships on me than on himself; that he had been always ready to do me all the good offices that lay in his power; and that he aimed at nothing by this proceeding, but the public quiet and security. 'Truly, Sir,' said I,

Capt. Streater. My lord, I desire that this Writ with the Return may be filed.

Judge. (Lord Chief Justice Bull.) What say you, Mr. Prideaux?

Prideaux (Attorney General). Nothing.

Judge. Let it be filed. Have you any counsel?

Streater. Yes, my lord.

Judge. What do you say to it?

Streater. I desire to have a copy of the Return, and that I may be bailed.

'I know not why you should be an enemy to me, who have been faithful to you in all your difficulties.' 'I understand not,' said he, 'what you mean by my difficulties. I am sure they were not so properly mine as those of the public; for, in respect to my outward condition, I have not much improved it; as these gentlemen,' pointing to his council, 'well know.' To which they seemed to assent, by rising from their chairs: and therefore I thought not fit to insist farther on that point; contenting myself to say, that it was from that duty which I owed to the public, whereof he expressed such a peculiar regard, that I durst not give the security he desired; because I conceived it to be against the liberty of the people, and contrary to the known law of England. For proof of this I produced an Act of Parliament for restraining the council-table from imprisoning any of the free-born people of England; and, in case they should do so, requiring the justices of the Upper Bench, upon the application of the aggrieved party, to grant him Habeas Corpus, and to give him considerable damages. To this act I supposed he gave his free vote; assuring him, that, for my own part, I durst not do any thing that should tend to the violation of it. 'But,' said he, 'did not the Army and Council of State commit persons to prison?' I answered, 'That the Council of State did so, but it was by virtue of an authority granted to them by the parliament; and if the army had sometimes acted in that manner, it had been in time of war, and then only in order to bring the persons secured to a legal trial; whereas it is now pretended that we live in a time of peace, and are to be governed by the known laws of the land.' 'A Justice of Peace,' said he, 'may commit, and shall not I?' 'He is,' said I, 'a legal officer, and authorized by the law to do so; which you could not be, though you were king; because, if you do wrong therein, no remedy can be had against you. Therefore, if I have offended against the law, I desire to be referred to a Justice of the Peace, that I may be proceeded with according to law; but if I have done nothing to deserve a restraint, that then I may have my liberty.' Whereupon being commanded to withdraw into a room next to the council chamber, I heard major general Lambert to advise, that I might be peremptorily required to give the security demanded. But Cromwell said, that the air of Ireland was good, that I had a house there; and therefore he thought it best to send me thither. Immediately after, Mr. Scobel, one of the clerks of the council, came to me, and acquainted me, that I might return to my lodging. Where I had not been a quarter of an hour, before Mr. Strickland, one of the council, came to me, and pressed me earnestly to comply. But I told him, that having contended for the liberty of others, I was not willing to give away my own, and to be made a precedent to the prejudice of my countrymen, because it was the pleasure of those that had the sword to have it so. 'Why,' said he, 'was it not the sword by which you kept Wardour-castle, and by which you acted during the whole course of the late war?' 'I had,' said I, 'the authority of the parliament to justify me in so doing.' He answered, 'But they governed by the sword.' To which I replied, 'That indeed they made use of the sword to remove the obstructions that were in the way of the civil government, and exercised that power to vindicate and establish the law of the land; and that I was heartily sorry to see one who had been so forward in the cause of the public, not to discern any difference between a sword in the hands of a parliament to restore the people to their ancient rights, and a sword in the hands of a tyrant to rob and despoil them thereof. Here our discourse was interrupted by a messenger, who came from the council with an order from them, to require me to give the security of 5,000*l.* within three days after the date of the order, not to do any thing prejudicial to the present government; and, in case of failure, to be taken into custody. Upon the receipt of it, I told the messenger, that having no power to resist, I must submit to their pleasure. A day or two after the expiration of the time limited by the order for giving the demanded security, which I had not done, Serjeant Dendy came to me, with an order from the council, signed by Henry Lawrence, President, requiring and authorising him to take me into custody. Having shewn me the order, he desired me to make choice of a chamber; but, after some discourse with my near relations, who were then present, he was contented to let me remain at my lodgings. So having promised to return in a day or two, and in the mean time to advise with lieutenant general Fleetwood, he went away. The next day Cromwell, diverting himself with hunting at Hampton-court, asked my brother Thomas Ludlow, who was in the company, if he were not angry with him for committing me? and my brother answering, That it was not fit for him to judge concerning his actions; he thereupon assured him, that he wished me as well as any of his own children; that his Streater. I desire, my lord, I may not be put to the trouble to sue for a new Habeas Corpus. [And then Mr. Streater not being permitted to speak any more, he was taken away by the marshal of the court of the Upper Bench, and carried to the Prison of the Upper Bench in Southwark.]

desiring me to give security for my own carriage to the government, was designed by him as well for my good as for his own security, and that he would have him to engage for me: to which he most readily consented. The morning following, my brother came to me; and having acquainted me with what had passed between Cromwell and himself, I gave him thanks for his kind offer; but withal told him, that I would by no means desire that of him which I was not willing to do myself. Besides, I told him, that should it be granted that the thing were fit for him to do, yet it might prove a snare to him, and lay an obligation upon him to gratify the usurper in another way. However, after this discourse of Cromwell to my brother, and the conference of my relations with Serjeant Dendy, I ventured to accompany my father and mother Oldsworth, with my wife, into Essex."

The following appears in the second volume of Thurloe's State Papers, p. 680.:

'Engagement of John Streater.

'I, John Streater, do promise, that I will make good my promise to general John Disbrowe, which was, that I will not act, or speak any thing to the disturbance of the Commonwealth, and the present government thereof; and that I will, upon notice given me, appear before the council, or any person the Lord Protector or his council shall appoint, there to answer any thing of misdemeanor that shall be charged against me. JOHN STREATER.

'October 18, 1651.'

'In witness whereof, we hereunto set our hands the day and year abovesaid.

'JOHN DISBROWE,

'CHARLES WORSLEY.'

Hume, speaking of the crisis which preceded Cromwell's violent ejection of the Parliament in April 1653, relates the following anecdote: "By mutual altercation and opposition the breach became still wider between the Army and the Commonwealth. Cromwell, finding matters ripe for his purpose, called a Council of Officers, in order to come to a determination with regard to the public settlement. As he had here many friends, so had he also some opponents. Harrison having assured the Council, that the general sought only to pave the way for the government of Jesus and his saints, major Streater briskly replied, That Jesus ought to come quickly; for if he delayed it till after Christmas, he would come too late; he would find his place occupied."

Colonel Barksted then appeared upon lieut. col. Lilburne's Habeas Corpus, and gave this following Reason for his not bringing the body of lieut. col. Lilburne.

"According to my orders, my lord, and the Return of the Habeas Corpus, I brought the body of lieut. col. John Lilburne on Monday to the court; at which time I was ordered to attend the court again with him here as this day. But this morning I received an order from the Council of State to the contrary: and here it is, my lord."

Clerk.

Wednesday Nov. 23.

"Whereas the body of Mr. John Lilburne, by an Order of Parliament, was committed to the Tower for the peace of the nation; and whereas there was an Order to the bringing of him forth thence to the Upper Bench this day: It is ordered by the Council of State, that they do not bring him, but that he there abide the pleasure of the house."

Lilburne's Couns. My lord, on Monday it was agreed that they should bring him again on Wednesday; and I have no instruction from my client, for I have no access to him, nor he to me.

Judge. Well, pray advise with your client.

Lilburne's Couns. My lord, I desire to have an Alias Habeas Corpus.

Barksted. I have only learned, my lord, to obey orders, and I shall obey them.

Judge. You do well. The Council of State have a reason for what they do in this business.

Lilburne's Couns. My lord, when must we attend at court?

Judge. On Saturday.

The Return of the Habeas Corpus for captain Streater being filed, the cause of Imprisonment shewn in the return was grounded upon two Warrants: first from the Council of State.

"These are to will and require you to take the body of Streater, and him you shall safely keep prisoner in your prison of the Gate-house; he being committed for publishing of seditious Pamphlets against the State: of which you are not to fail. And for so doing this shall be your sufficient warrant. Given at the Council of State sitting at White-hall, the 12th day of September, 1653.

S. MOYER.

To the Keeper of the Gate-House. R. TICHBURN, Presid.

R. LAWRENCE.

JOHN HEWSON.

The second Warrant was signed by the Speaker, by order of the parliament.

"By virtue of an Order of Parliament, bearing date this present 21st day of November, these are to will and require you to receive and take into your custody the body of John Streater, and him to keep and retain in safe custody, until he shall be delivered by order of Parliament. Whereof you are not to fail, as you will answer the contrary at your peril.

"Given under my hand this 21st of November, 1653. FRANCIS ROUS, Speaker."

To the Keeper of the Gatehouse, Westminster.

Upon the reading thereof in court, this Rule following was ordered to be entered.

"Wednesday next after eight days of St. Martin, 1653. The Gate-house, Westminster."

"The Defendant was this day brought into this Court, by virtue of a Writ of Habeas Corpus, to undergo, &c. under the custody of the keeper of the prison of the Gate-house. And it is ordered by the Court, that the Habeas Corpus and the Return thereof be filed, and that the said Streater have copies of the said Writ and Return, and that the said Streater be committed to the custody of the marshal of this Court, and that he have the body of the said Streater in Court upon Friday next, upon the motion of Mr. Freeman.—By the Court."

The second Appearance of captain Streater, on Friday the 23d of November 1653, by virtue of an Habeas Corpus, and the Rule aforesaid of the Court of Upper Bench of the 21st present.

Captain Streater being at the bar, the clerk read the Return, which was only the Keeper's Answer to the Habeas Corpus, which requireth him to shew cause why the prisoner is detained in prison. He in the Return citeth the Warrant, Order, or Mittimus for commitment, and certifieth that is the cause contained in them, and none other.

The Return being read, the judge asked captain Streater what he had to say to the Return, and who was his counsel.

Streater. Mr. Norbury, Mr. Freeman, and Mr. Twisden, are counsel with me.

Judge. What say you?

Twisden. I was a counsel for the first part, but not for the second, for publishing scandalous Pamphlets. If there be no more in it, he may be bailed.

Judge. No, there is no more in it. What say you, Mr. Freeman?

Freeman. My lord, as to the second part of the Return, it is in these words: "These are to will and require you to take into your custody the body of John Streater, and him safely keep, till he shall be delivered by order of Parliament." My lord, every Return ought to have these two things in it; the Cause and how long he shall be a prisoner: and so you have it in Magna Charta, p. 54. My lord, all acts of parliament against the laws of the land, are in themselves void. The law is above the parliament.

Judge. Good Sir, do not stand to repeat these things before us.

Freeman. My lord, I do know it; they may pass their acts according to law, but not against law. The lord Dyer hath it so in his Reports.

Judge. When we are in examination of a prisoner, will you come and overthrow the acts of parliament?

Freeman. My lord, I refer it to your lordship's judgment, whether this gentleman ought to be kept in prison without cause shewn.

Judge. What say you, Mr. Norbury?

Norbury. My lord, we must look to see if the Return be true: if it be not, we have an action of the case against them that made it false. And though we will not say that is false, yet here is no offence recited at all. And, my lord, all the acts are the acts of this present parliament; and we look on them to be, or ought to be, for the liberty of the people.

Judge. What have you to say to the second part of the Return?

As to the first part of the Return, Mr. Pri-deaux said he should say nothing unto it; therefore the Judges advise captain Streater to speak to the second part of the Return.

[Now for that the Argument that captain Streater had prepared to shew the insufficiency of the first part of the Return, may be of great use, and fit for public view, it is thought fit to be inserted here; and after it, his Argument upon the second part of the Return, the which he delivered with an audible voice at the bar, with the Attorney-General's Plea thereto, and the Judge's Judgment thereupon.]

Captain Streater's ARGUMENT to the first Part of the Return.

My lord, I being brought to this bar by virtue of a Habeas Corpus, which requireth (by virtue of the law, which is the supreme authority of England, and only authority of parliaments, and all courts of judicature) the cause ought to be shewn why I am detained a prisoner upon the Return. The first part mentioneth a cause, though not a lawful cause: the second part sheweth no cause.

My lord, the intent in law of an Habeas Corpus, is to relieve prisoners, notwithstanding special commands for imprisonment, as appeareth by the act of parliament the 17th of the late king, intituled, 'An Act for the abolishing the Star-Chamber, and regulating the Council Table:' which ordaineth, that notwithstanding special commands for imprisonment, the party so imprisoned shall by a Habeas Corpus be brought before the Judges of one Bench or other. And if the cause of his commitment be legal, he shall be remanded to the prison from whence he came; if no cause (that is to say, no lawful cause) appear, then the prisoner is to be set at liberty; if it be doubtful, then the prisoner is to be bailed.

My lord, with these agree the learned Arguments of sir Edward Coke, sir Edward Littleton, and Mr. Selden; together with the Resolves of the Commons in parliament (1628) thereupon. And the second part of Institutes, fol. 52. 'The warrant or mittimus ought to contain a lawful cause.' The writ of Habeas Corpus is the Water of Life, to revive from the death of imprisonment.

Sir Edward Coke in his third general reason why a Habeas Corpus is to remove the body, notwithstanding of special commands, saith, That 'Imprisonment is accounted in law a civil death, where a man is deprived of society, of wife, house, country, friends; and liveth with wicked and wretched men.' The writ of Habeas Corpus, and the benefit thereof by law (which is the undeniable right of every Englishman) is called 'The High Point, the only Point.' Nay the Commons of parliament of the 4th of the late king, in the Conference with the Lords, say that they had redeemed the body of liberty, by clearing this point: that is to say, That in case one be committed by virtue of special command, he shall have the benefit of the writ of Habeas Corpus to bring his body, with the cause, before the Judges of either Bench; where if it be found a lawful cause, he shall be remanded; if no cause, delivered; if it be doubtful, then to be bailed.

My lord, I shall make it evidently appear, when I come to make my Exceptions, that there is no lawful cause shewn in the Return to the Habeas Corpus why I should be a prisoner. With your lordship's favour, I shall speak one word or two of the law of England; I shall make use of it anon. It may not improperly be said, it is written by the Finger of God: it is not unlike (in that where indeed the perfection of it lieth) unto the laws of the Eternal Law-giver; which is, it is as well binding to the law-giver, as to those that are to give obedience unto it.

Anno 42 Edw. 3. chap. 3. 'No man shall be proceeded against, but according to the old law of the land: There shall be nothing done to the contrary, if it be, it shall be void.'

If this serve not my turn, I am sure there be enough that speak the language I would have them, that say, Be it so and so enacted, and not otherwise.

First, I observe here they command law.

Secondly, That they command, that none shall command otherwise but by law.

God himself bindeth himself by his laws: he is as well bound, as he bindeth those several beings he gives laws unto, let them be eternal, moral or natural. If he maketh a promise, he performeth it: he must not, he doth not but perform it. If he create a world, and willeth it to continue, he must support it in its beauty and strength, and by his providence support the several beings in it.

My lord, Law is supreme; none ought to command contrary to law. It is not, that he or they are superior that command, that therefore they should be obeyed; no, it ought to be diligently enquired by the inferiors, whether superiors command law, or not; if not, they are not to be obeyed. For that this is not a rule amongst men, is the reason so much of absoluteness and tyranny is so much on foot in the world.

Camerarius mentioned a story of Henry 2, of France, his committing to prison an Italian lackey, and shewing no cause of his commitment. The Judges visiting the prisoner, com-wanted that he should be delivered. The king again committed him, and commanded that he should be executed. The Judges notwithstanding the second time opened the prison-doors for him, for that the law warranted them for so doing.

Henry 3, of England, commanded Ralph Nevil (Lord Keeper or Lord Chancellor) to deliver the Great Seal. He refused it, because it was to be disposed of by the Common-Council, or parliament of the kingdom. This is attested by Matthew Paris, and Matthew of Westminster. Thomas late lord Stratford's plea, 'That what he did, was in obedience to his superior, the king his master,' could not protect him from condign punishment, for that he had transgressed the law. Plutarch saith, the Spartans were happy in their king Agesilaus, who had such a reverend esteem of law, that he gave obedience to a small scroll of parchment, which was the summons of his country for his appearance. That which will make us happy, must be our laws; not men, councils, or courts. Aristotle said, That it is better to govern by good laws than good men.

My lord, our laws are good; they are (as to the intent) the only preserving laws in the world: they are the strong-holds, the bulwarks to the weakest.

Edw. 6. fol. 36. The law is called, 'The inheritance of every subject.' It is the Inheritance of Inheritances; and without which inheritance, we have no inheritance: we should be but as tenants at will, to be turned out of life, liberty and estate, at pleasure.

My lord, withal, the law signifieth nothing at all, if there be not a way to obtain the benefit thereof; the which should be as certain and unalterable as the law itself. And therefore I think that the statute of 42 Edw. 3, chap. 3, is meant a proceeding by record, when it saith, 'That no man shall be proceeded against, taken or imprisoned, but according to the old law of the land.' The same opinion may pass of the 29th chapter of Magna Charta, which is but an exposition of the good old law of the land.

Mr. Selden, in his Argument at the Conference of the Lords and Commons, 1628, saith, 'The law is of no benefit, if that the way be not open to obtain the benefit of the law.'

In all which, Proceedings by Discretion are justly reprov'd; for they are of evil consequence, as witness Empson and Dudley† in Hen. 7's days, by whom 'the subjects were grieved,' my author saith.

My lord, just proceedings are as necessary as just judgments. It is justice that saveth and defendeth a nation, that maketh it happy, fruitful, and prosperous. The frontiers of a nation may be guarded with men at arms, but it will not be preserved thereby: it must be justice in the midst of it: 'If there be but a man that executeth justice and true judgment,' he shall save the city. There may be good reasons given for it. Injustice discontents a people; and usually the foundations of changes are laid upon the discontent of the people.

My lord, I speak not this as reflecting on this Court, or out of fear of injustice at this time or place; no, but only as laying a sure foundation for my Exceptions. If the law be supreme, and not to be varied from in the least tittle, then it is a sufficient sanctuary. Unless this be granted, all my Exceptions will profit me nothing.

I ought not to be remanded, because it cannot but appear I have been proceeded against not according to the law of the land, which is my right; and if my right, every man's right; and if not my right, it is no man's right.

42 Edw. 3, chap. 3, 'None shall be proceeded against, but by Presentment, or things of record, according to the old law of the land.'

It is not the law of our kings, but the consent of our forefathers: These are our privileges, and the present power hath declared they will be tender of them. The writ is by authority of parliament. This privilege of an Habeas Corpus putteth the difference between the villain and the freeman.

My lord, I shall now make my Exceptions to the Return.

First, the Return is too general, and sheweth not lawful cause why I should be imprisoned. I doubt not but to make it appear; and if so, I ought to be set at liberty without bail.

The act of the 17th of the late king provideth, 'That if no cause be shewn,' (that is to be understood, a lawful cause) 'then the Prisoner shall be discharged.' A Prisoner is not discharged, if he be bailed, for that he is a Prisoner to his bail; and if bailed, then it is to be supposed a cause, though such upon which he may be bailed.

The cause of imprisonment shewn in the first part of the Return, is for 'a Seditious Pamphlet against the State.' It doth not name wherein it is seditious; it doth not name what Books or Pamphlets.

2 Part Instit. fol. 591, on the statute of 1 Edw. 2. Sir Edward Coke saith, That the 'Mittimus or Warrant must contain the Cause, though not so certainly as the Indictment ought; yet with so much convenient certainty, as that it may appear judicially what the offence is;' as for stealing a horse, or the like. And this is according to Reason, which is the Mother of Law; which hath had good authority at this bar, and now hath, and I hope shall have.

As by variety of natures, and forms, and names, several beasts are distinguished; so variety of titles do distinguish books or pamphlets. And for that there is or hath been as many several sorts of books or pamphlets distinguishable by their title or name, and matter or subject, wherein they are seditious, as there are several sorts of beasts distinguishable either by their nature, name or form: therefore if it

* See 2 Cobb. Parl. Hist. 264,

† See No. 26, vol. 1, p. 283,

be needful, if a man steal a horse, that the Warrant or Mittimus shall say, the imprisonment is for stealing a horse, and not for stealing of a cow, the same will hold good for a cow, ox, or any other creature or thing.

If so, it had been as needful for the Return to express what Pamphlets or Books, either by title or name, matter or subject; for that there are, or have been as many several sorts of seditious pamphlets (so accounted) within these few years, of several titles, as there are several sorts of beasts in the world. And therefore seeing the Return doth not shew for which of them I am imprisoned, it must be presumed, there is not cause for my imprisonment. Generals are nothing in law:

Again, my lord: Sir Edward Coke, 4 part Instit. fol. 39, chap. 1, 'High Court of Parliament,' there in these words, saith, "That by order of law, a man cannot be attainted of high treason, unless the offence be in law high treason. He ought not to be attainted by general words of high treason by authority of parliament, (as sometime hath been) but the high treason ought to be specially expressed." This is so plain, it need not be pressed further.

Likewise the Resolution of the Commons in parliament, the 4th of the late king, resolveth, "That notwithstanding special commands for imprisonment, if there be not lawful cause of imprisonment shewed upon the Return of a Habeas Corpus, that then the Prisoner shall be acquitted."

I have plainly made it appear, that there is no lawful cause; yet notwithstanding I shall back it with Reasons that shall carry sufficient authority with them, to prove my assertion, That there is not lawful cause, and to prove that my imprisonment hath not been according to the law of the land, as is provided in the act of the 17th of the late king, 42 Edw. 3, c. 3, 25 Edw. 3, c. 4, and Magna Charta, c. 29. All which command but the law, or are rather but expositions of the law. And seeing the Parliament hath left this Court open for any to be relieved, I pray to be relieved.

My lord, I ought to be proceeded against by due course of law. The Act of the 20th of September, 1640, provideth, if it be for treasonable and seditious Pamphlets, the party shall suffer such penalties as are by the law of the land provided. By which it appeareth, that they intended no otherwise a man should be proceeded against in this case, but by due course of law; which is to be by presentment before justice, or thing of Record; as 42 Edw. 3, c. 3, at which time it is usual the accusers and the accused are face to face, and there they the accusers do aver, that that is the man that hath so and so offended; else how shall it be known that this or that is the man meant by the accusers.

Besides, my lord, anno 10 Eliz. c. 6, it is provided, That two Witnesses be as well at the Indictment as the Arraignment.

Indictment is an accusation against a man; and it is upon accusation the Mittimus is made for commitment. It is fit a man at his commitment do know his accusation and accuser; if he do not, he cannot make his Defence. It is not fit he should be deprived of any advantage of that kind. Festus (Acts 25, 27.) saith, 'It seemeth not reasonable that he should send Paul to Augustus Cæsar, without shewing cause of his imprisonment.' There was cause, but not a lawful cause; for he saith, 'He might have been acquitted, if he had not appealed to Cæsar.'

If it should be objected, That a Privy-Council may, for several secret reasons of state, if they please, commit men, and shew no cause, or at least not so particular as the law requireth; sir Edward Coke, 2 part Instit. fol. 199, sufficiently answereth that, and saith, That 'the law admitteth not of matters of pleasure.'

My lord, that good maxim, That 'the safety of the people is the supreme law,' hath been misinterpreted by some that would have it thus: That if any by their endeavours do threaten disturbance to a government, and that they conceive it safe to take away those disturbers lives, or their liberties, in order to prevent those mischiefs they apprehend they may be instrumental in: if they cannot do it by law, then they may repair to extraordinary courses.

Mr. Sadler, in his book, intituled "the Rights of the Kingdom, and Customs of our Ancestors," reporteth, That the old Saxons had a maxim, that 'high or extraordinary justice is injustice.' My lord, an Injustice doth a nation or state more mischief and hurt, than all its private and open enemies can do.

Now having proved that there is no lawful cause shewn in the Return why I am detained a prisoner, I shall present your lordship with my second Exception, which is, That there is not alledged the time nor place where the crime was committed, that is the pretended cause of my commitment. My lord, I shall not insist upon matter of fact to any other end, than to shew the insufficiency of the return. And that the law intendeth that cause, nay, lawful cause should be shewn of commitment, in the Warrant or Mittimus, upon the first committing, the cause of commitment, may the better prepare his defence; the which the law intendeth not to deprive a person of: the which he should be deprived of by such returns.

I shall shew your lordship wherein first it may be alledged that I did commit a crime at London such a time, when I was at York. Mirrour, chap. 3. sect. 23. "One that is appealed of Maim, may plead that he was sick at that time." My lord, many times such circumstances are the standards to measure the truth or falsehood of an accusation.

I shall first offer something to prove, that the place where the cause of commitment was committed, ought to have been shewn in the return.

Writ of Mainprise, it is in the beginning of the writ thus; 'The king to the sheriff, &c. of the part of A. taken and detained in our goal at G. for certain larcenary of a horse at S.' Now, my lord, here is the place alledged.

Sir Edward Coke, 2 part Instit. fol. 37. saith, That 'Appeals ought to contain, 1. the Fact: 2. the Year: 3. the Day: 4. the Hour of the day: 5. the Place where the fact was done.' Here are many certainties, but the certainty of time and place are not to be omitted; they are two essentials. So that if time and place be not shewn, when and where the crime was done, that is alledged to be the cause of the imprisonment, it may be concluded that there is no cause if it was done at no time, nor no place.

Another Reason why the time when the crime was committed, that is the cause of commitment, ought to be shewn in the Return, is this: If it were granted that it was so, that I did publish seditious pamphlets or books; it may be done seven years since, for ought that appeareth in the return.

That the Time when the fact was done, ought to be shewn, appeareth evidently by the provision that is made in the act of the 20th of September 1649, intituled, 'An Act for preventing of scandalous and seditious Books and Pamphlets.' 'Provided always, and be it enacted, That no person or persons shall be molested and impeached for any of the offences mentioned in this act, unless he or they be thereof accused within six months after his or their offence so committed or done.' Then 13 Eliz. c. 1. it is provided, 'That none shall be sued, troubled or molested for any of the offences contained in that act, unless they were accused thereof within six months, if the party or parties were not out of the realm.' Now, for ought there appeareth in the Return, the pretended cause of imprisonment was committed seven years since: and it may be as legally presumed to be six or seven years since, as four months since. And if so, then I am clear by virtue of those Acts I mentioned: they concern seditious and treasonable books or pamphlets. In a doubtful cause, it is better to acquit the guilty, than to condemn the innocent.

My third Exception is, That the conclusion of the Return ought to be according to law, and have these words; 'To be delivered by due course of law.' By which is to be understood 'speedily,' at the next gaol-delivery. It is not by the Return said by what I shall be delivered, nor when, whether ever or never delivered; it seemeth to intend a perpetual imprisonment, the which is utterly against the law of the land.

2 part Instit. fol. 315. c. 9. on the Stat. Gloucest. 'Expedition ought to be used, to prevent long imprisonment. Imprisonment should be but till the next coming of the justice. And' (saith he) 'it is the mercifullness of the law of England, that it willeth that none be ruined by long imprisonment.'

And therefore the afore-mentioned Writ of Mainprise (cited in Fitz-Herbert's Natura Brevium) seemeth to take up a complaint, That the people are not only grieved with wrong imprisonment, but more especially with long imprisonment, in these words: 'And him by such Mainprise from the gaol aforesaid hast delayed to deliver, to the no small loss and grievance of him the said R., and manifest peril of his life.'

Coke's 9 Report in Fowler's Case, and in the end of the Writ, hath these words; 'That the subject be not detained so long in prison, as till the justice shall come in Eyre.' By all which appeareth, that the law relieveth against long or perpetual imprisonment, as also against imprisonment without lawful cause, notwithstanding that it be by special command.

My lord, my life nor liberty cannot be taken away, but by law; nor given unto me but by law. It is a good Maxim, 'if we keep the law, the law will keep us.' It would be sad if a man should be necessitated to plead his cause by the making of friends, when the law shall not be sufficient to plead in his defence, and when life and liberty shall be disposed of at pleasure.

It is provided against in 2 Edw. 3. c. 2. of Charters of Pardon; where it is ordained and enacted, 'That such Charters shall not be granted, but only where the king may do it by his oath;' that is to say, where a man slayeth another in his own defence, or by misfortune: This the law warranteth to be done.

Now having proved, that there is no lawful cause shewn in the Return why I should be a prisoner, together with the insufficiency of the Return: if so, it is my privilege by law to be discharged and acquitted. And the present power declared to be tender of our rights and privileges: We have no rights, privileges or properties, but what we are instated in by the law: if so, then it is my right not to be deprived of what the law doth allow me. Your lordship is a judge of the law.

Captain John Streater's ARGUMENT to the second Part of the Return.

My Lord; As to the Second Part of the Return, that mentioneth an Order of Parliament, I make this Exception, 'That it doth not mention any cause at all of my imprisonment.' And seeing it doth not shew cause, it is of less strength than the former part of the Return, wherein is cause shewn, though not a lawful cause. And therefore there may be no more, but only the bare reading of it to shew the insufficiency of that part of the Return.

But here, if it should be objected, That it is grounded upon an Order of Parliament, and that the parliament are not bound to shew a cause; Truly, I am of opinion that the parliament would not own any one that should so argue, it being so perfectly repugnant to their honour, it being condemned in parliament within our memory, as unjust, illegal, unreasonable, and perfectly contrary to law; and law is the only sceptre of statutes, parliaments, councils, empires, kings, princes, governors and magistrates.

The late parliament in their Declaration upon declaring England a Free State, (March 17, 1649) say, 'That their only authority is by the law.' Again, they say that they are sensible of the 'excellency and the equality of the law of England.' Also, 'That they should uphold the true approved rules of the law of England; and that the good old laws and courts of justice, and the custom of England, are the badges of our freedom, rights and privileges.'

And this parliament hath declared, That they will be tender of our rights and privileges; the which we enjoy by our laws. 29. chap. Magna Charta; 'None shall be taken or imprisoned, but by a legal proceeding, according to the old law of the land.' The words, 'None shall be taken,' imply, that none shall take or imprison any contrary to law. And it cannot be denied, but the law intendeth the protection of innocent persons in freedom: And there being no cause shewn in the return, let the command come from whence it will, the law will warrant a discharge.

If it be by Order of Parliament, if the Order shew not cause of imprisonment, not a cause only, but a lawful cause.

Parliaments ever made laws, but the judges of the law judged by those laws. Who will question but that the warrant of a justice of Peace, shewing lawful cause of imprisonment, is of greater force in law, than an Order of Parliament shewing no cause of imprisonment?

But, my lord, the parliament is here; it is their authority that I apply unto; there is nothing can be done here but by their authority; that is to say, the law. And therefore the law, and several acts of parliament, as that of the 17th of the late king, and divers others say, That I shall be discharged. Shall an Order of Parliament over rule laws, statutes, customs, usages and reason? No, my lord, doubtless the parliament's intention in ordering that I should not be delivered but by Order of Parliament, is, That I should be delivered by Order of Law, as I here expect now, and do not question in the least. Order of Law may be reckoned as the comeliest of all the parliament's Orders. Surely none will alledge, that the parliament intendeth to stop the proceedings of law that may relieve me; or that this Order of Parliament is superior to authority of parliament that is judicially in this Court.

My lord, the inferior must give way to the superior. The same reason that the commons in parliament, of the 4th of the late king, judged of the invalidity of the record in James Damestris and Cæsar's Case; for that it was not argued or debated, it was not of weight to be a sufficient record: the same reason, I say, may be given for an Order of Parliament not to be in force against an Act of Parliament. An Order of Parliament hath but the same proportion with an Act of Parliament, that a verbal command hath with a command by record; for that there are not the debates, deliberations, and three times of reading of an Order of Parliament, as is at the establishing an Act of Parliament.

My lord, besides, any rational man will think that the wisdom and prudence of the parliament is such, that they will not lay up such a portion for their successors and children, as a record that shall be a law or precedent to after-ages, that shall be in effect, 'that J. S. was remanded to prison, by virtue of an Order of Parliament, when no cause is shewn in the one part of the return, nor lawful cause in the other.'

When the supreme authority of parliament, the law, and acts of parliament that contain law, say expressly, That 'if no cause, or lawful cause, be shewn in the return for imprisonment, that then the prisoner shall be set at liberty.' And anno 20 Edw. 3, cap. 1. 'That if commands come to the contrary, judges shall not cease to do even law and right.'

Besides sir Edw. Coke, in the 4th part of his Institutes, cap. 10, 'High Court of Parliament,' intimateth that an act of parliament is not pleadable in a court of record, but by record, or under the seal. And Mr. Sadler, in his Book, entitled, 'The Rights of the Kingdom, and Customs of our Ancestors,' saith as much. Then much less an Order of Parliament, that is not recorded upon the Parliament Rolls itself.

My lord, it is not to be imagined, neither do I think, that the parliament expected that their Order, the inferior part of their power, shall take place of the superior part of that power, the law and acts of parliament that command law, which is judicially here, as I said before. My lord, all acts of parliament that are unrepealed are their own: They are not theirs when they disown them by repealing. Until then they are with 'not otherwise' in force, and are law. My lord a parliament, as they command law, may be called the Wisdom and Reason of the nation.

Anno 4 Hen. 7, cap. 12, the law is called the 'Policy of the Nation.' Indeed it is so: Justice is the best policy, as I said before. None can demonstrate what Justice is, without the law be as the golden Mete-Wand, that sir Edward Coke cautions parliaments to leave all causes to be measured by, 4. part. Instit. fol. 41.

Upon the question of Hen. 8, to the Judges, Whether a man might be attainted of High Treason in parliament, and not to call him to his answer? The Judges' answer was, That an inferior Court could not in law or justice do so: And their Opinion was, That the higher the Court is, the more just they ought to be.

It is not to be supposed that a parliament will act contrary to their wisdom and policy, which is the law: Or that they would have their inferior power take place of their superior power. Neither will the parliament plead against me with their power, no surely, but by law, legally; else they would have nailed up my prison doors with armed men, and never have suffered me to come to this bar. And if that they had not intended that I should have been acquitted, they doubtless would have shewn cause. I know there can be no lawful cause of imprisonment shewn against me.

My lord, Job's friends, they tell Job, that because he was guilty, in their opinion, in the sight of God, of sin, Job xxii. 4. 'Will he' (meaning God) 'reprove thee for fear of thee?' 'Will he enter with thee into judgment?' As much as to say, that God would cut him off from amongst men, because he was sinful, and God powerful. But saith Job, (chap. xxiii. 3.) 'O that I knew where I might find him, that I might come to his seat! I would order my Cause before him, and fill my mouth with Arguments. I would know the words which he would answer me, and understand what he would say unto me. Will he plead against me with his great power? No; but he would put strength in me. There the righteous might dispute with him,' &c. And, chap. xxxviii. ver. 32. God saith, 'Gird up thy loins like a man, for I will demand of thee,' &c. And here God declareth his power and wisdom visibly in the creation of creatures great in magnitude, as the Leviathan; sweet in influence, as the Pleiades; swiftness and courage of the horse in the day of battle; and so of the whole creation. That this great and glorious Eternal God, that gave a being to all beings by one only conception of his mind; he willed them to be, and they were: this God, you shall find, pleaded with Job by and by, in chap. xlii. ver. 4. 'Hear, I beseech thee, and I will speak; I will demand of thee, and declare thou unto me.'

My lord, will the Parliament plead against me with their power, that is to say, what they may do? Surely they will not; but rather strengthen me, by affording me the benefit of the law at this time and place; which is the utmost of what I do expect, and the which they ought to do. By the which I shall arrive at my liberty, which is my right by law, in regard there appeareth no cause in the one part of the return, nor lawful cause in the other.

My lord, I have seen the copy of an Order of Parliament, bearing date the 21st of November present, that saith, 'That John Streater be and do stand committed to the prison of the Gate-house, Westminster, in order to a trial; and that Mr. Speaker do issue a warrant accordingly.' Without doubt this is the Trial intended by the Parliament, here at this place, to try whether there be cause of imprisonment, or not. The innocent need no other trial. The cause that is already shewn in the first part of the Return, is to be supposed true, and all the cause that was to be shewn, and none other; for that the second part mentioneth no cause at all. And if there had been lawful cause shewn, it is not to be denied but it had been of force. By all which it appeareth, that they intended me the benefit of the law; which speaketh this language, 'That the Innocent shall be acquitted.'

My lord, an Order of Parliament is but as the first thoughts of a man, by which he intendeth this or that. An Act of Parliament, and the law, is like the second, third, and fourth thoughts of a man, wherein he altereth his first Resolutions, formed by his first thoughts, unto more safe and better resolutions. And it is not contradictory to himself at all, nor never a whit below him.

My lord, here are the Parliament's second, third, and fourth thoughts judicially in this court: it is law digested by councils, debates, time and practice, into safety and conveniency. The which is for their honour to act by: the benefit thereof I pray.

My lord, the Return saith, 'I shall not be delivered but by Order of Parliament.' The Order of Parliament saith not such a word, but to be committed 'in order to a Trial;' at which I am.

My lord, the Return saith, 'I shall be committed prisoner to the Gate-house by order of parliament.' The authority of parliament, the law judicially in this court, hath committed me prisoner to the Marshal of this court; shall this be called a contradiction to the Order of Parliament? No, surely it will not stand so in the opinion of this court.

Neither can it be called a contradiction to the Order of Parliament, if I should be discharged of my imprisonment; because the authority of parliament, the law, saith, 'If there be no cause of imprisonment, I shall be discharged.'

The law intendeth but three things only to defend, in which all else is comprehended: they are Life, Liberty, and Estate. Liberty is the chief: not a liberty to do what one lists, either in obeying, or in commanding; but a just preserving liberty, that shall be for the good of society. It was this that our forefathers and we have contended for by arms: and being victorious, will the Parliament deprive us of the benefit of the law, which is the ornament of our triumph? No, my lord, they have declared to the contrary that they will not. Something of the like nature may be concluded from the Answer of the Council of State to my Keeper: the Keeper of the Gate-house, when he desired of them to know their pleasure, Whether he should allow the Writ of Habeas Corpus, or not, in regard I was a prisoner by their command; their answer was, They would leave it unto him. As much as to say, They intended not to deprive me of the benefit of the law.

My Lord Chief Justice Hyde is not now on this bench, who once was, and to his shame did deliver in effect this judgment, That for several reasons of state, the king may do or act contrary to law. My lord, I have power to kill this gentleman next me, but not by law.

It did better become Mr. Attorney-General

Heath, in his pleading for a corrupt interest (in the Cause of sir John Heningham,* and others) at this bar, to alledge, That the king may act above and contrary to the law; than Mr. Attorney-General Prideaux, that is to plead in behalf of a state, that some suppose are laying a foundation of the kingdom of Christ. If he should, it would be the grandest inconsistency that possibly could be, to what they have declared, namely, tenderness, of our just Rights and Privileges. The which declaration hath invited a national expectation thereof; the which should be a sufficient law to them to do nothing that might deprive any individual, though the most inferior and inconsiderable part or person of the whole; because they were comprehended in the whole, unto which the promises were made.

My lord, upon the agreement of sharing the Roman empire made between Octavius, Antonius and Pompeius Sextus, it fell out that they agreed to feast aboard of Pompeius's Admiral-Galley, lying at an anchor off the head of Mount Misena: and when they were all aboard and merry, Menas the pirate came and whispered Pompeius in the ear; 'Come,' saith he, 'shall I cut cable, weigh anchor, and set sail, and not only make thee Lord of Sicily and Sardinia, but of the whole empire also?' 'No,' saith noble Pompeius; 'I have not learned to break faith, although it were to the gaining of an empire.' When he had invited them to a banquet, they should not be deprived of what they expected by imprisonment, or loss of their shares of the empire: such advice and such practices do better become pirates and thieves, than persons of virtue and honour; the which was in his power to have done.

My lord, seeing, as I say, that the Parliament did at the first declare that they would be tender of our Rights and Privileges; and seeing it is our privilege to have the benefit of the law; and seeing the law saith, 'That if there be no cause, there shall be no imprisonment;' and in regard there is no cause shewn, why I should be a prisoner: I do aver that the parliament cannot have greater dishonour put upon them, than for any one to alledge that they intended imprisonment to me, if there should no cause in law appear.

My lord, if there be any thing else alledged to be against me than what appeareth upon the Return and the Record, the law requireth you not to take notice of it. And seeing there is no cause, there ought to be no imprisonment: if it should, it would be injustice. Justice is one of the attributes of God, that by his dispensations he would have administered to men. The administration of injustice is a perfect fighting against God. I believe the Parliament would not be found fighters against God.

My lord, the philosopher saith, 'Where just law ruleth, there God may be said to rule.' If you judge justly, you have no cause to fear. I expect it, as you will answer the contrary at the dreadful Day of Judgment.

Judge. What have you to say, Mr. Attorney-General?

Prideaux. That which I have to say is not to argue, but to acquaint the court he is committed by an Order of Parliament, which is not to give an account to the court. It is their pleasure to commit him till he be cleared by an order of the same power. And I hope, my lord, you will not dispute it: for I know it is fresh in your memory, where orders of the like nature have been made by the parliament. He is to remain prisoner by the authority that put him there.

Judge. Yea, as in the case of Lilburne, Chetwin, and others, which after made their Address to the parliament; which if this gentleman do, I make no question but they will do according to law and justice by him, and no otherwise, since he is committed by them; and they only know the cause of his commitment.

Sir Thomas Witherington, Serjeant at Law for the Commonwealth. There has been two counsels have spoke something in behalf of the gentleman at the bar: one of them pleaded this, that there was an Order of parliament, but not an Act of parliament. My lord, an Order hath force as well as an Act. As for Mr. Norbury, he said, Part of the Return was true, and part was not true. If it be not true, he has an action of the case against the Keeper. Again, whereas he says, That all acts of parliament were made for the liberty of the people: truly so they are, but not to give leave to licentiousness.

Judge. Mr. Streater, one must be above another, and the inferior must submit to the superior; and in all justice, an inferior court cannot controul what the Parliament does. If the parliament should do one thing, and we do the contrary here, things would run round. We must submit to the legislative power: for if we should free you, and they commit you again; why here would be no end: and there must be an end in all things.—Where you say we are not to imprison you without cause shewn: it is true, we are not: but if there be any that do disturb the peace of the nation, we are to settle things in peace and quietness; for the cause of the law is to quiet the nation.—The second thing that hath been objected against the Return, was by Mr. Freeman: He says, The parliament hath not power to alter the laws. Why, they have the legislative power, and may alter and order in such sort as they please; they may daily. If they find any thing that is fit to be reformed, they may alter and reform them, and make laws new. It is strange a counsellor should say this.—Another Objection was, That there was no cause expressed. It is true, here there is not. We are judges of the law, and we may call inferior courts to an account why they do imprison this or that man against the known laws of the land; and they must shew cause to any man. In this case, if the cause should come before us, we cannot examine it, whether it be true or unjust: they have the legislative power.—Now whereas you say, It is but an Order of Parliament, and has not been three times read in the house: how can you tell but that it has been three times read? Indeed they used to read it thrice when the king and house of lords and commons sat; and so it may be now, for aught we know. But if it were but once read, we cannot call it into question, but must conceive it was on just grounds: and it may be they thought it not fitting to express a case in matter of state; for if they should express the cause, and we not able to judge of it, there would be nothing done in it. Therefore, gentlemen, we can do no more in it, and yet I hope we shall do according to justice, that the people may not be oppressed. If it had been a cause we could have meddled in, something might have been done; but now we see no cause it should be repealed.

Justice Garmond. God made man, and gave him a law to live by; and the laws of England are grounded on the laws of God: and in the laws of England every man is concerned. And now the parliament of England is grounded on the whole body of the nation. Now, if one power were not above another, things would go in a circle to and fro, and have no end: now this will bring them to an end, since the whole law of the nation is grounded on the parliament laws.

Judge Nichols. I am of the same opinion, every thing must be done in order: and 'God is the God of Order;' and therefore every thing ought to be done in order, and not in confusion. Now what the parliament does, we cannot dispute or judge of: their laws are to bind all people; and we are to believe they had cause for what they did. And for that you say an Order should be read three times; when I was a Parliament-Man, divers acts passed with one time reading. In the next place, you did distinguish between an Order and an Act of Parliament. Why, their power is a law, and we cannot dispute any such thing. And whereas you affirm it was once pleaded here, 'That the king was above the law, and might do what he pleased against the law,' that it was so here, I do not remember: but the parliament does not so.

Prideaux. I humbly pray he may be remanded to the Gate-house again.

Judge Nichols. There is a primum mobile, or things would come into confusion. The parliament has the greatest power.

Capt. Streater. I desire I might be bailed; I shall be a prisoner nevertheless: The law accounteth one a prisoner though he be bailed; and if not bailed, I may be a prisoner a hundred years.

Prideaux. My lord, pray let him be sent to the Gate-house.

Streater. I desire then I may be a prisoner to this court. I am a wounded man, and, have done service for my country, and deserve not to be shut up in a close hole. Besides, I have been a prisoner three days, contrary to the Order of Parliament, by order of law, to the marshal of this court; when the Order of Parliament saith, 'I shall be a prisoner to the Gate-house;' and if the law can warrant the court for the doing of the one, doubtless it will for the doing of the other. I am sure it is my right by law.

Judge. No, no; no such matter.

Prideaux. My lord, I heard this man say he has been wounded, and that he was for the parliament; but I am informed he was cashiered. He cited the Order of Parliament, and that they did not publish the cause wherefore; but I will speak it publicly, it is in order to his trial.

Streater. My lord, he speaks falsely: I laid down my Commission myself.

Judge. We are to judge honourably of the Supreme Power.

Streater. You said but now, my lord, you could judge of nothing but what was before you upon record.

Judge. Let him be sent again to the Gate-house; he was committed there. And, gentleman, you should do well to apply yourself to the parliament in the mean time; for while we are possess otherwise, it must be our office that you must be sent back according to the Order of Parliament.

Streater. I never petitioned in my life; I shall not now begin.

Prideaux. When the cause is done, you may leave him as you found him.

Judge. You had your Habeas Corpus.

Streater. I could wish I had the benefit of it, as is my right by law. I desire that notice may be taken, that the same Judgment and the same Plea were adjudged illegal, arbitrary, and perfectly repugnant to law, the just rights and liberty of the people in parliament, the 4th of the late king, 1628, as in the case of sir John Heningham, sir Edmund Hampden*, and others, at this bar.

Judge. The king was plaintiff against them, and he was but a tenant in trust: The parliament is plaintiff against you, and they are a legislative power.

The Prisoner was carried back to the Gate-house.

The Proceedings upon the Habeas Corpus in Hilary Term.

In the vacation between Michaelmas and Hilary-term the parliament dissolving, Mr. Streater resolved to apply himself again to the law; he conceiving that the Order of Parliament was void, inasmuch as the parliament was dissolved. And accordingly, on Monday 23 January 1654, being the first sitting of the Judges in Hilary-term, he had Mr. Dormer of counsel, who moved the court for an Habeas Corpus. It was granted, and made returnable on Thursday the 26th next following. At which time, the Keeper sent the body of Mr. Streater, with a return of the Habeas Corpus not signed. Which being in court, was refused to be received.

Mr. Streater. My lord, I am here brought to this bar, by virtue of an Habeas Corpus: I desire that the Writ with the Return may be read.

Ld. Ch. Just. Let it be read.

Mr. Broughton. My lord, the Return is not signed.

Ld. Ch. Just. If the Return be not signed, we cannot take notice of it.

Streater. My lord, I desire that another day may be appointed by rule of the court.

Ld. Ch. Just. We cannot do so; we cannot take notice of you, whether you are the person or not, if the Return be not under your Keeper's hand.

Streater. My lord, I desire I may have an Alias Habeas Corpus.

Ld. Ch. Just. We cannot deny you that.

[The Alias Habeas Corpus was made returnable on Monday the 31st of Jan. 1654.]

Streater. My lord, I desire that I may by Rule of Court have assigned of counsel (with me) Mr. Twisden, Mr. Freeman, Mr. Wilde, Mr. Norbury, and Mr. Dormer.

Ld. Ch. Just. Let them be assigned.

Monday the 31st of January, 1654, Mr. Streater was again brought before the Court of Upper Bench, by virtue of his Habeas Corpus.

Mr. Streater. My lord, I am brought hither by virtue of an Alias Habeas Corpus. I desire that the Writ, with the Return, may be read.

The Clerk reads the RETURN.

“ ‘ Oliver Lord Protector of the Commonwealth of England, Scotland and Ireland, &c. To the keeper of the prison of the Gate-house, Westminster, in the county of Middlesex, or his deputies there, greeting. We command you, as formerly we have commanded you, that the body of John Streater, gent. in prison under your custody detained, together with the day and cause of his taking and detaining, by whatsoever name the said John is called therein, you have before us at the Upper Bench in Westminster, upon Monday next after the fifteen days of St. Hilary next to come; to undergo and receive those things which our court of Upper Bench aforesaid of him shall consider of in this behalf. And this you must not omit on any wise, and upon peril that will follow thereupon. Witness Henry Rolle, at Westminster, the 26th day of January 1654.’ ”

And the Return of this Writ appears in a certain schedule hereunto annexed, and the Answer of Aquila Wykes, Keeper of the Gate-House prison in Westminster;

“ ‘ To his Highness the Lord Protector of the Commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the dominions thereof, in the Upper Bench at Westminster, at the day and place in the writ to this schedule annexed named; do

‘ certify, That before the coming of the said writ to me directed, that is to say, the 12th day of September, 1653, John Streater in the writ named was committed to my custody, and there detained by virtue of a Warrant from the later Council of State, the tenour of which warrant followeth in these words:

“ ‘ These are to will and require you to receive into your custody the body of John Streater, and him you shall safely keep prisoner in the prison of the Gate-house, he being committed for publishing seditious pamphlets against the state. Of which you are not to fail: And for so doing, this shall be your sufficient warrant. Given at the Council of State at Whitehall, this 12th day of September, 1653.’ ”

ROB. TICHBURN, Presid.

H. LAWRENCE,

To the Keeper of the Gate-House.

SA. MOYER,

J. HEWSON,

CH. HOWARD.’ ”

“ And the said John Streater is also detained by virtue of a Warrant under the hand of the Speaker of the Parliament; the tenour of which Warrant follows in these words:

“ ‘ By virtue of an Order of parliament bearing date this present 21st day of November, these are to will and require you to receive and take into your custody the body of John Streater, and him to keep and retain in safe custody, until he shall be delivered by order of parliament. Whereof you are not to fail, as you will answer the contrary at your peril. Given under my hand the 21st day of November, 1653. FRANCIS ROUS, Speaker.’ ”

“ And the said John Streater is also detained by Rule of the Upper-Bench Court; the tenour of which Rule follows in these words:

“ ‘ The Keepers, &c. against John Streater. Friday in 15 days of St. Martin, 1654. The defendant was this day brought in court by virtue of a Rule of this court, under the custody of the marshal of this court; And it is ordered, That the said marshal do deliver the body of the said Streater to the keeper of the prison of the Gate-house in Westminster, to remain under his custody according to the Order of parliament, upon the motion of Mr. Attorney-General.—By the Court.’ ”

“ And these are the causes of the detaining the said John Streater, whose body before the Protector aforesaid I have ready accordingly, at the day and place in the said writ contained, as I am within commanded.

AQUILA WYKES, Keeper of the Gate-House.”

Ld. Ch. Just. Mr. Attorney, what say you to it? The Prisoner hath been here many times.

Att. Gen. My lord, I heard not of it.

Streater. My lord, I sent him notice the same day the writ was granted.

Att. Gen. My lord, he sent me a man that said he lived in Fleet-street, I do not know where.

Ld. Ch. Just. How cometh it that you did not send him other notice?

Streater. My lord, I beseech your lordship that I may not be intercepted by such pretences, and that I may not suffer any delay for want of such formalities. My lord, Mr. Attorney-General hath appeared often enough in this case: he cannot with credit pretend he is unprovided to speak to it.

Ld. Ch. Just. Let the Prisoner be here again on Friday.

[Mr. Streater was again sent back to the Gate-House, and was on Friday the 3d of February, 1654, brought by Rule upon the Alias Habeas Corpus.]

Mr. Twisden. My lord, I desire that the Prisoner may be bailed.

Mr. Wylde. I desire that the Writ and Return may be filed.

Ld. Ch. Just. Mr. Atkin, what have you to say why it may not be filed?

Mr. Atkin. Nothing, my lord.

Ld. Ch. Just. Let it be filed, and let the Prisoner be here on Thursday next.

Streater. My lord, I desire that I may have assigned of counsel with me, Mr. Latch and Mr. Windham.

Ld. Ch. Just. Let it be so.

[The Prisoner was carried by the Marshal of the Upper-Bench into the Upper-Bench Prison, Southwark; and on Tuesday the 7th of February, 1654, was again brought into Court, under the Custody of the Marshal of the Court.]

Mr. Twisden. I desire that the Prisoner may be bailed. He is committed by two Orders; the one from the Council of State, the other from the Speaker of Parliament, by virtue of an Order of Parliament. The Order of parliament is out of doors, the parliament being dissolved.

Mr. Attorney-General began thus: My lord, this gentleman the Prisoner stands committed by Order of Parliament: And whereas in his behalf the Counsel assigned for him have alledged, That the Order of Parliament is void, by reason, as they say, the Parliament is dissolved: My lord, Parliaments cannot be dissolved; the parliament are the same power that is in being now. And parliaments were to be once a year, as by the statute of the 4th of Edward 3, at which time he may be relieved. In the North parts, the Assizes can be held but once a year. But grant that the meaning of parliament was to deliver him themselves, and not that they meant the parliament to be on the 3d of September, 1654; yet for that they ordered that he should not be delivered but by Order of Parliament, I conceive he can be delivered no otherwise than by an Order of Parliament, nor by any other but a parliament. Possibly when that the parliament consisted of king, lords, and commons, or of one or two houses, without a three-sept, had not been binding: but now the power that was in the lords and king is joined in the commons, and therefore is of greater force. And it is not material whether they shew cause or not; there may be good cause; and it cannot be presumed that the Parliament would commit a man, and have no cause at all for so doing. But without question, a parliament may commit men, and shew no cause. But suppose his commitment be in order to a Trial in parliament, will this court take upon them to judge in the cause? Or can they by Habeas Corpus bring the body of the prisoner and the cause before them, out of parliament?

The lord of Strafford was tried in parliament: I believe this court would not in such a case remove the Trial before them, nor indeed can they. Upon the return it appeareth, he is committed by Order of parliament, and to be delivered by Order of parliament: If they had intended he should have been delivered otherwise, they would have either said nothing, or have ordered he should be delivered according to law. When kings die, it is true, that Commissions do cease; but when Parliaments do dissolve, their acts do not cease. Besides, a parliament is the Supreme Court, and they do constitute other courts; and therefore it is not for other courts to question the proceedings of a parliament. It will not be expected of me to shew that the parliament had sufficient matter or cause of imprisonment.

To this the Judges answered, No, No: If he had any thing more to speak to the Order of parliament, that was it that was to be spoken unto.

Mr. Attorney. My lord, this gentleman might make his application for his liberty to the present authority elsewhere; and I doubt not but it would be granted him: For now parliamentary authority is in one person. My lord, I doubt not but the court will be cautious in meddling in this case, but will rather remand him to prison: 1. For that it may be that the proceedings against him are not yet ripe; it may be yet under examination. 2. For that this is the first precedent of the like nature, and it being of so great and high concernment.

Mr. Twisden. My lord, a Parliament may determine, and parliaments do determine; and when they do, their Orders also determine with them. It is true, that Acts of parliament do continue; but this is but an Order of parliament, and not an Act of parliament. My lord, we must come hither to be relieved; this is the place, this is the court appointed for relief in this case: We expect it, and, my lord, desire that the prisoner may be bailed. Besides, my lord, this is not an Order of parliament upon return, but a Warrant of the Speaker.

Mr. Windham, of counsel with the prisoner.—My lord, it is true, we find Writs of Error returnable in parliament, as in Flowerdew's Case, and in Basset's Case of Error given in this court of King's-Bench against Basset, in a Judgment for the king: Rot. Parl. 25 R. 2, num. 24. This is after trial of law, and not before. As to the case of the lord Strafford, we know not but that by law he ought to have been impeached here. As to the Order, it is determined by law.

Mr. Wyde, of counsel with the prisoner.—My lord, the Order cannot be a bar but that the prisoner may be bailed. Besides, the Order is void, for that the parliament discontinueth; and it is ordained, 'That he or they that shall say the Parliament continueth, shall be guilty of an high offence.' An Act or Order of parliament is not a Judgment of parliament. We are here coram Protector.

Capt. Streater. My lord, I should not at all undertake at this time, having so many learned counsel assigned, who attend my cause, and who have sufficiently urged enough law to warrant the Court for my discharge, but that the Attorney-General hath both last term and this term endeavoured to asperse me, to discourage the court, so as to delay or deny me justice: As the last term, by suggesting to the court that I was a dangerous person, and stood accused in parliament for high misdemeanors; and said that they were such, and so dangerous, that they for many secret reasons of state thought it convenient not to discover them. And this term, by saying, the last day of hearing, that I was a stubborn refractory person, and would not make my application to the present authority, where he assured me that I might have my liberty for asking for it; and that my endeavours were to strike at the very power of parliament.—My lord, as to what great and high matters or things that were by him suggested to this court to be in parliament, certainly it would have appeared upon the return: They have not been intercepted, as to time, in the making of their return to the Habeas Corpus; they have also had time to make several returns; and lastly, to amend the returns by rule of court. Without question, my lord, if they had had other cause, they would have made it appear. However, your lordship can take no notice of any thing but what appeareth upon Record.—My lord, as to the other that Mr. Attorney urgeth, That I am a stubborn person, and refuse to make my application to the present authority; I deny it: my actions give another testimony of me, in this applying myself to the present authority in this manner, and at this place, by law; this is the proper and only superior court for relief, in case of false or long imprisonment: it ever was in this court settled by law, the supreme authority of this nation, and the only authority of those that will take upon them supreme power. The Lord Protector hath sworn to govern this nation according to its laws, statutes and customs: and here I make my application to the present authority judicially in this court. The Writ of Habeas Corpus is in the name of the Lord Protector: by which it appeareth, that those suggestions are false, and that I own the present authority in its proper channel, and own its true basis, by applying myself to the present authority here in this court.—My lord, I should have insisted upon the whole matter now before you; but I see that there hath been enough urged by my counsel, to shew the invalidity of the Order of parliament, the only business where all sticketh.—My lord, I shall not spend time to answer Mr. Attorney-General, for that the substance of his Argument is but of little weight, and not worthy of any answer.

[Here followeth the Argument that Mr. Streater had prepared to have insisted upon in this place: but for that he perceived the opinion of the court was, that the Order of parliament was not in force now, he omitted to urge it further. But for general satisfaction, it is here presented the reader word for word, according to his Copy.]

I am brought here by virtue of an Habeas Corpus, which doth require that cause be shewn why I am detained a prisoner; not who committed me to prison. Upon the Return, there is in the first part a cause, but not a lawful cause: in the second part of the Return, no cause at all.—My lord, the intent in law of an Habeas Corpus is to relieve prisoners, notwithstanding of special commands for imprisonment: as appeareth by an Act of Parliament in the 16th of the late king, intitled, 'An Act for abolishing of the Star Chamber, and for regulating the Council Table;' which ordaineth, 'That notwithstanding of special commands for imprisonment, the party so imprisoned shall by an Habeas Corpus be brought before the Judges of one Bench or other: and if the cause of his commitment be legal, he shall be remanded; if no cause, (that is to say, no lawful cause) he shall be set at liberty: and if it be doubtful, then the prisoner shall be bailed.' This Act recited several Acts, as that of 17 R. 2, c. 81, 42 Edw. 3, c. 3, 28 Ed. 3, c. 9, Magna Charta, c. 29, and the Petition of Right. These Acts declare, that this is the intent and meaning of the aforementioned.—My lord, with these agree the learned Arguments of sir Edward Coke, sir Edward Littleton, and Mr. Selden; together with the Resolution of the Commons in Parliament 1628 thereupon, in these words:

Die Jovis, 3 Aprilis, 4 Caroli Regis.

"Resolved upon the question, That no freeman ought to be detained or kept in prison, or otherwise restrained, by the command of the king, or the privy council, or any other, unless some cause of the commitment, detainer, or restraint, be expressed, for which by law he ought to be committed, detained, or restrained.—That the Writ of Habeas Corpus may not be denied, but ought to be granted to every man that is committed or detained in prison, or otherwise restrained, though it be by a command of the king, the privy council, or any other, he praying the same.—That if a freeman be committed or detained in prison, or otherwise restrained, by the command of the king, the privy council, or any other, no cause of such commitment, detainer, or restraint, being expressed, for which by law he ought to be committed, detained or restrained, and the same be returned upon an Habeas Corpus granted for the said party; then he ought to be delivered or bailed."

2 part Instit. fol. 52. 'The Warrant or Mitimus ought to contain lawful cause.' Sir Edward Coke, in his first general reason why a Habeas Corpus is to remove the body notwithstanding of special commands, saith, "That imprisonment in law is counted a civil death, when men are taken from their house, wife, children, country, friends, and familiar acquaintance, to live with wicked and wretched men."—Mirroure, chap. 2, sect. 9, saith of prisoners and prisons thus: "A gaol is nothing else but a common prison: and as a leper, or a man who hath a diseased body, is not to be suffered to dwell or remain amongst men who are sound, &c. therefore mortal offenders ought to be separated from the society of people, to the end the innocent be not infected with their offences."

Now, my lord, if it be so, it was of absolute necessity for the law to provide against long imprisonment as well as wrong imprisonment, notwithstanding any special commands. The writ of Habeas Corpus and the benefit by law, is the undeniable right of every Englishman; it is called 'the high point, the only point.' Nay, the Commons in Parliament, of the 4th of the late king, in their Conference with the Lords, say, 'That they had recovered the body of liberty,' by clearing of this point. In this is the only difference between slaves and freemen, villains and freemen.

My lord, the Law of England doth settle a freedom in the people of England, in their life, liberty, and estate: it doth relieve against any thing that shall by any be done to their detriment, either in one or other.

Mirroure, chap. 2, sect. 18, of Appeals of Imprisonment thus: "Darling here appealeth Weloc, for that whereas the said Darling, &c. the said Weloc came and arrested the said Darling, brought him to such a place on such a day, and put him into the stocks or in irons, or in other pain or inclosure: such a day, this felony he did feloniously."

My lord, here we see the law ever did allow of a remedy to be had against false Imprisonment. Here is no cause of imprisonment at all shewn, in either one part of the Return or other; therefore I ought to be set at liberty without bail, as is expressly provided in the Act of the 17th of the late king, in these words: 'If there appear no cause of imprisonment upon the return, then the prisoner shall be set at liberty, and not bailed.'—My lord, he that is bailed is still a prisoner; for he is a prisoner unto his bail. If bailed, it is to be presumed a cause, though such upon which he may be bailed. The following clauses of this Act explain the meaning to be so, in these words: 'If the cause be doubtful, then the prisoner shall be bailed.'

My lord, if it should be objected, That the greatest and only cause of my imprisonment is an Order of Parliament, or a warrant grounded upon an Order of Parliament, that saith I shall not be delivered but by Order of Parliament; I have seen a copy of the Order of Parliament, wherein there is not any such word mentioned; but it only saith this, 'That Mr. Speaker do issue forth a Warrant' (according to the Order) 'for my imprisonment,' &c.

But for that your lordship is not to take notice of any thing but what appeareth before you upon Record, I shall make no use of that; I shall not need. First, for that the Order itself is out of doors, the Parliament being dissolved. Sir Edward Coke, 4 part Instit. fol. 23, chap. 'High Court of Parliament,' saith, 'That an Ordinance of Parliament bindeth not in succession;' then much less an Order of Parliament. Besides, if Orders of Parliament were binding in succession, there would be no need of Acts of Parliament. And more especially such Orders are not binding, that there is no reason or law in them, but are opposite to reason and law.

Nay, but an Act of Parliament could not make such a Return to be good or allowable, as this, that shall mention no cause for which a prisoner is committed; it is against reason a man should be committed for nothing; and if there appear no cause upon the Return, this Court is to presume there is no cause, and therefore ought to deliver the prisoner, and cannot but look upon such Returns as unreasonable, and against law.

"The Doctor and Student," pag. 1. chap. 2, saith, 'That such Statutes, Ordinances and Prescriptions, as are not according to reason, or are against reason, they are not Statutes, Ordinances, or Prescriptions, but are things void in law.'

Again, my lord, a Parliament cannot overrule just proceedings in or by this Court, that are according to law and justice: but a Parliament may overrule proceedings in this Court that have error, or are not according to law and justice.

My lord, we understand Parliaments to be legislative powers, and therefore not to be the executive: it is not for law makers to be Justices of the Peace; a Sheriff cannot be a Justice where he is Sheriff. There is a maxim, 'That law-makers must suppose all men to be evil, and therefore they make laws against such offences in all persons: But Judges of the law must suppose all men good, until conviction.' If so, my lord, a Parliament are not competent Judges who and who not shall be prisoners. But here are the Judges, before whom I am; here is the place where I am, that a cause of that nature should be determined.

My lord, I dare confidently aver, That if ever it had entered into the consideration of our former preceding parliaments, that a succeeding parliament would ever do such a thing as commit a man for no cause at all, they would have provided against it by an act of parliament, in testimony of their abhorring of so great an absurdity as it is. Anno 11. 4, c. 14, it is provided, That 'Appeals are not 'in any wise to be pursued in Parliament.' No man can imagine it to be lawful in any inferior power to a parliament. If so, it cannot be lawful in a superior power.

Upon the question to the Judges by Hen. 8, "Whether a man that was forth-coming, might be attainted of High Treason by Parliament?" Their Answer was, "That an inferior Court could not do so;" they thought a parliament would not: Their Opinion was, "That the higher a Court is, the more just they ought to be, to give example to inferior Courts."

4 Part Inst. fol. 37, chap. "High Court of Parliament:" "If it be necessary for inferior 'powers to shew cause of commitment, it is as 'absolutely necessary that a superior court 'should.'

From whence it may be concluded, That were the parliament in being, yet I might by law be relieved by this Court.

1. For that the law doth warrant my discharge, in case no cause of imprisonment appear in the return; as by the 17th of the late king, who had then the executive power in his hands, as supreme magistrate: And the same reason why that it should be limited and bounded when it was distinct from the legislative and judicial; may be given, why it should be limited when they are all joined in one; which is, That it may not extend to grieve any contrary to reason and law.

2. That none ought to be taken or arrested, but by such against whom a remedy may be had in case of false imprisonment.

It was sir John Markham's opinion, That 'the king could not arrest, because a remedy 'could not be had against him in case of false 'imprisonment.' Much less a remedy be had against a parliament, that may possibly arrest or commit men upon false suggestions.

Again, my lord, if it had been an act of parliament that had provided I should be a prisoner in general words, and had provided I should not have had the benefit of an Habeas Corpus, I conceive I might have been relieved by an Habeas Corpus. This I suppose, if in case an act could be made against law and reason, as such an act as should deprive me of a common benefit that is due unto all, and to every individual, throughout the whole nation.

Parliaments ever made it their work, (as in duty they ought) to keep parallel to law and reason: they ever did make laws agreeable to both. But the judges of the law, in open courts of judicature, did judge by those laws: Nay, parliaments ever did advise with the judges of the law. The judges of the law were as the watchmen or centinels to the just liberty of the people; and our laws the bulwarks of defence.

Mr. Waller, in a Speech in Parliament at a Conference of both houses, the 6th of July, 1641, saith, "That out of parliaments all our courts of justice are governed and directed by the judges of the law; and in parliaments, the lords and commons were assisted by them:

otherwise," (saith he) "it might be stiled Parliamentum indoctorum." And further he saith, "That judges that delay justice, or give false judgment, or opinions that are contrary to law, that they are no other than conspirators against the Commonwealth."

My lord, Mr. Attorney-General hath not omitted to possess this Court with strange apprehensions of the dangerousness of me, both in what he urged in this court the last term, of dangerousness, and this term, of stubbornness: so that as much as in him lay, by his false suggestions, to prevent me of my right by law; as in the words of your lordship, desiring that I might be remanded till my stomach came down.

My lord, you sit here to raise the spirits, minds, and stomachs of men, by doing of them right by law, to encourage them to improvements and industry, by defending them in life, liberty and estate, as the law requireth and intendeth.

My lord, Articles were exhibited against sir Robert Berkley*, one of the Justices of the King's-Bench, and others. The substance of the first Article against sir Robert Berkley, was, "That he did traitorously and wickedly endeavour to subvert the fundamental laws and established government of England, by traitorous words, opinions and judgments." The 10th Article: "That the said sir Robert Berkley, being one of the Justices of the Court of King's-Bench, and duly sworn as aforesaid, in Trinity term 1637, deferred to discharge or bail Alexander Jennings, prisoner in the Fleet, brought by an Habeas Corpus to the bar of the said Court; the return of his commitment being, That he was committed by two several warrants of the lords of the council, dated the 5th of November, 1636, the first being only read in Court, expressing no cause; the other for not paying messenger's fees: he was remanded in Michaelmas term. After, the said Jennings being brought by another Habeas Corpus before him, and the same return, yet the said sir Robert Berkley refused to discharge him, &c."

My lord, I hope this Court, nay, I doubt not but that you will eye the future, and judge according to law and reason, and not by discretion.

My lord, such advice followed, as Mr. Attorney gave, is the ordinary cause of changes in states and commonwealths.

1. Injustice brings the judgments of God upon a nation.

2. Injustice discontents a people, and discontents are the ordinary foundations that changes are laid upon.

It was but the other day the Lord Protector took an Oath to govern according to the laws, statutes and customs of this nation: and now his Attorney-General would have matters ruled by discretion in this Court, contrary to law and reason, to pull men's stomachs down.

* See vol. 3, p. 1283.

My lord, I make my application to the present authority in its proper channel, where of right I ought to be relieved here in this case of mine by an Habeas Corpus. My lord, I do aver, that my life, liberty, or estate, cannot be taken away, or given unto me, but where the law doth it. My lord, God himself ruleth by law, eternal, moral and natural; and they have certainty in them: and he ruleth not otherwise, or contrary to them. And can it be imagined, that there is a mortal living, that will think it a diminution to his honour, if men choose the law for their sanctuary, rather than their changeable affections, and mutable will and pleasure?

There is a maxim, "That the law delighteth in certainty, and it doth abandon uncertainty, as the mother of all debate and confusion, than which there is nothing more odious in law."

My lord, another reason why I make my application to the present authority this way rather than any other, is, that the Record in this case will be of singular use and benefit, not only to the present, but to future ages; the which I do in duty, in regard a man ought to prefer the good of his country before a private good. The contrary will tend to the subverting of our English liberties. Our forefathers left us a law, by which we might demand justice, and not be necessitated to make use of friends to beg justice.

Mirror, chap. 3, sect. 6, "Of exceptions to the power of a judge," thus it is: "Sir, I demand the hearing and sight of your Commission, by which you claim Jurisdiction over me."

Anno 13 Edw. 1, c. 3, "When any is impleaded before any justices, and doth alledge an exception, praying that the justices will allow it; which if they will not allow, &c. he shall require the justices to put to their seal, &c."

My lord, this law of England is a law of freedom, and a law for freemen, and not for slaves: it is a law that settleth a right in its subjects.

Now, my lord, having presented your lordship with what the law accounteth of imprisonment, as in the Writ of Mainprise,

"Whereas thou A. hast delayed to deliver B. to the no small grievance of him the said B. and manifest peril of his life."

And, page 162, Fitz-Herbert's Natura Brevium; of the Writ de Homine Replegiando. The king, "Whereas A. hath complained to us, &c. We command you that he be replevied, &c. that we may hear no more a clamour for want of justice."

Seeing the law relieveth as well against long imprisonment as wrong imprisonment; and seeing that there is no lawful cause of imprisonment shewn in the first part of the Return, nor cause at all in the second: although it be grounded upon an Order of Parliament, it is void in a two-fold consideration. First, for that the parliament is dissolved. Secondly, for that it is against law and reason: And also considering that this Court is the highest Court of Judicature that can relieve in this case; and it being contrary to reason, that a legislative power should be an executive power, for they will be parties to judge by their own law, they will vindicate their own commands, and will take upon themselves to give their sense, possibly different from the letter of their own commands.

And therefore it is safer for the Judges of the law to judge by the letter of the law, and not otherwise.

Mr. Robert Brook, Serjeant at Law, in his reading upon the 16th chapter of Magna Charta, saith "If a man hath judgment to be hanged, and if the sheriff do behead him, it is murder." The letter of the law is duly to be observed, and not to be varied from upon any pretences of matters of state whatsoever. All which considered, I pray to be discharged, as the law hath provided: your lordship is judge of the law.

Mr. Attorney. My lord, for aught we know, this is a Judgment in parliament. If it be not, yet it hath the same stamp that an act hath; that is to say, parliamentary authority. If this Order be not good, the prisoner hath an action of false imprisonment against the jailor. If the Order die by the dissolution of the parliament, the jailor ought to have set the prison-doors open unto the prisoner at the time of the dissolution of the parliament.

Mr. Twiden. My lord, they have not returned an Order of Parliament, but a Warrant from the Speaker of Parliament.

Chief Justice Rolle. Mr. Attorney, what if the parliament by Order do appoint a committee, the parliament dissolved; doth the Committee continue by virtue of that order, or not?

Mr. Attorney. I think the persons are dissolved: but although it be said by Order of Parliament, I think that it is not much material whether the word Act, Order or Ordinance be used. My lord, it is by parliament.

L. C. J. Rolle. By your favour, Mr. Attorney, it is the word Order, Act or Ordinance, we must take notice of. How shall we know how to judge, but by the word or letter to direct us?

Judge Aske. Mr. Attorney, if an Order of parliament shall be in force after the dissolution of a parliament, and there be an Order made for the commitment of one or more, as in the case now under consideration; I pray which way shall the subjects be relieved, if not this way, in case we should live to see a parliament but once in one age, as in the latter end of the reign of king James, and as in the reign of the late king?

L. C. J. Rolle. This Court is the proper Court to relieve in this case; this Court is a standing Court, and the law doth adjourn it from time to time; but a parliament is a new Court, they appear, and are always summoned by new writs.

Mr. Attorney. The prisoner knoweth he might have his liberty for asking for.

L. C. J. Rolle. A man is not bound to do that. Well, let the prisoner be remanded until Saturday; and then we shall deliver our Opinions: it is a weighty business. And, gentleman, in the mean time you may make your application otherways for your liberty.

Mr. Streater. My lord, the law hath provided no other way, and I am bound to take notice of the way the law hath appointed. Our forefathers knew no other way. My lord, I desire that I may have the liberty to go to my counsel with my keeper: both the last term, and this, I have not at all advised with my counsel.

L. C. J. Rolle. That will not be denied you.

Mr. Wyld. My lord, it was moved this term, and it was denied, being opposed by the other side, but it was before the writ was filed. And I suppose that the Court may grant that liberty to the prisoner under the custody of their own marshal.

Saturday, February 11.

The Prisoner was brought again to the bar under the custody of the marshal of the court.

L. C. J. Rolle. Sir, have you your counsel here?

Mr. Streater. Yea, my lord.

L. C. J. Rolle. Where are they?

Mr. Windham. I am of Counsel for the prisoner.

Mr. Streater. My lord, here is also Mr. Wyld, Mr. Freeman, Mr. Norbury.

L. C. J. Rolle. Deputy-Marshall, go into the Chancery, and acquaint Mr. Attorney-General that we are going to deliver our Opinions in Streater's Case: and if he please to be present, he may; or if he hath any thing more to urge.

Mr. Pain, Deputy-Marshall. My lord, I have been with Mr. Attorney General; and he saith he will be here immediately.

[After a little space of time Mr. Attorney cometh into the Court.]

L. C. J. Rolle. Mr. Attorney, here is Mr. Streater again by rule of Court. He hath been a long time in prison; and I see here is nothing come against him that is material.

Mr. Serjeant Twisden, of Counsel for the Prisoner. My lord, we desire that he may be bailed.

L. C. J. Rolle. What, have you any thing more to say, Mr. Attorney?

Mr. Attorney. My lord, I thought I should have heard of him; but I did not. The court must do justice: he is committed by Order of parliament. My lord, if you will undo an Order of parliament, he is to be delivered: but I hope the court will not.

Mr. Windham. The Order of parliament is undone by the parliament's being dissolved.

Mr. Attorney. Commissions of Sewers are granted by parliament, and they do continue after the parliament is dissolved. Gaol-delivery is but once a year in the north-parts: And I suppose the next parliament will be sitting before he hath been a year in prison; at which time he may be tried, or delivered: and although this be called an Order of parliament, yet it was acted by parliament.

L. C. Just. Rolle. But all that the Parliament acteth are not Acts of Parliament. The first part of the Return is too general: It mentioneth not what Books, nor whose Books, or where they were, or when published. The second part of the Return is grounded upon an Order of Parliament: We are to take notice when a parliament sitteth, and also when it is dissolved: or when it endeth or determineth. Discontinuance is a determination. A writ of error many times is made returnable in the next parliament; but that lieth after trial at law. The word 'Order' is a proper phrase to that which is not an Act. An Order of Parliament is not binding in succession: How shall the next parliament take notice of a former parliament's Order? Committees that are appointed by Order of Parliament do cease upon the dissolving of the parliament. I have been of the parliament: I ever found parliaments of the same opinion. We must look to the first imprisonment and no farther; if you had returned other cause, we should have taken notice of it. We do not reverse the Order of Parliament; that is reversed by the parliament's being dissolved: And it being dissolved, there is no visible way how the Prisoner shall be relieved, though there may be a probable way.

Judge Ask. I am of the same opinion; and that it could not be, that the Order of Parliament, by saying he should not be delivered but by Order of Parliament, but that they meant by the same parliament, and not by a successive parliament. If it should be taken to be by Order of the next parliament, where shall be the Liberty of the Subjects? Or how shall they be relieved in long interval of parliament? As in the reign of king James, and the reign of king Charles, we had not parliaments in many years together; and although it be so, that the parliament, by the statute of the 4th Edw. 3, should be once a year, or oftener, if need be. Besides, here is no succession of parliament, but a dissolution. Another parliament must be another session; and therefore an Order cannot be in force until another session. If they had made an Act of parliament, or passed a Judgment of parliament, it had been another case.

Upon the consideration of the whole matter, the Judges' Opinion was, That the Prisoner ought to be discharged, and this Rule entered.

Saturday next, after eight days of the Purification, 1653.

The Lord Protector against John Streater, gent

'The Defendant was brought into Court by the Marshal, upon Habeas Corpus; and by the court discharged of his imprisonment, by the motion of Mr. Serjeant Twisden.

'By the Court.'

L. C. Just. Rolle. Sir, you will do well to carry yourself conformably to the present power, and walk inoffensively.

Mr. Streater. My lord, I ever have been, and I hope shall be, a subject to government, so as the law requireth me to be: It is not my duty to be otherwise subject.

P. S. If you observe the tenor of the Writ of Habeas Corpus, as it is observed by Mr. Streater in his last Argument, that the Writ doth only require that cause be shewn why the party is imprisoned, not who did commit the party to prison: If any cause lawful was returned, then the party is to continue still in prison; but without cause no commitment, from what power soever, can or ought, in law or reason, to be binding. That it is the cause only for which a prisoner is committed, that cutteth the prisoner off from the benefit of a Habeas Corpus, and not the will, pleasure, or power, of those in power. Here take sir Edward Coke's Nine General Reasons, why a Habeas Corpus is to relieve against illegal or long imprisonment*.

The First General Reason is drawn à re ipsa from imprisonment, ex visceribus cause, be it those or other imprisonments, which are divided into three parts. 1. No man can be imprisoned at the will and pleasure of any, but he that is bound, and a villain; for that imprisonment at will is Tales luy haut et base, are propria quarto modo to villains. 2. But if freemen of England might be imprisoned at the will and pleasure of the king, or any other's command, then were they in worse case than bondmen and villains: For the lord of a villain cannot command another to imprison his villain without cause, as of disobedience, or refusing to serve; as it is agreed in our books. 3. Imprisonment is accounted in law a civil death: Perdit domum, familiam, vicinos, patriam; his house, his family, his wife, his children, his neighbours, his country, and to live among wretched wicked men. If a man be threatened to be killed, he may avoid a feoffment of lands, gifts of goods, &c. So it is, if he be threatened to be imprisoned, he shall do the like, for that is a civil death.

The Second General Reason is, a minore ad majus: pana corporalis est majus qualibet pecuniaria: But the king himself cannot impose a Fine upon any man. But it must be done judicially by his Judges, per Justiciar' in cur', non per regem in Camera. And so it hath been resolved by all the Judges of England.

The Third General Reason is drawn from the number and diversity of remedies, which the law giveth against imprisonment, viz. Brevia de homine replegiando, de odio et atia, 'e Habeas Corpus, et brev' de manucapione. The former of these are antiquated; but the de odio et atia is revived, for that was in by the statute of Magna Charta, cap. 26.

See the Proceedings concerning the Liberty of the Subject, ante, vol. 3, p. 126.

And therefore though it were repealed by the statute of 28 Edw. 3, cap. 9, yet it is revived by the statute of 43 Edw. 3, cap. 1, by which it is provided, That all statutes made against Magna Charta are void. Now the law would never have given so many remedies, if the freemen of England might have been imprisoned at free-will and pleasure.

The Fourth General Reason is drawn from the extent and universality of the pretended power to imprison; for it should not extend only to the commons of the realm, and their posterity, but to the nobility, and the realm, and their successors: to all persons, of what condition, or sex, or age soever; to all judges, officers, &c. whose attendance are necessary, without exception of any person.

The Fifth General Reason is drawn from the indefiniteness of time: The pretended power being limited to no time, it may be perpetual during life.

The Sixth General Reason is drawn à dedecore, from the loss and dishonour of the English nation, in two respects: 1. For their valour and power, so famous through the whole world. 2. For their industry: For who will endeavour to employ himself in any profession, either of war, liberal science, or merchandize, if he be but tenant at will of his liberty? And no tenant at will, will support or improve any thing, because he hath no certain estate. And thus it should be both dedecus et damnum to the English nation: And it should be no honour to the king, to be a king of slaves.

The Seventh General Reason is drawn ab utili et inutili: For that appeareth by the statute of 36 Edw. 3, that the execution of the statute of Magna Charta, 5 Edw. 3, 25 Edw. 3, and 28 Edw. 3, are adjudged in parliament to be for the common profit of the king, and of his people; And therefore the pretended power being against the profit of the king, and of his people, can be no part of his prerogative.

The Eighth General Reason is drawn à tuto: For it is safe for the king to express the cause of the commitment, and dangerous for him to omit it. For if any be committed without expressing the cause, though he escape, albeit the truth be it were for treason or felony; but if the cause be expressed to be for suspicion of treason or felony, then if he escape, albeit the truth be it were treason or felony, yet the escape is neither felony nor treason; but if the cause be expressed to be for suspicion of treason or felony, then if he escape, albeit he be innocent, it is treason or felony.

The Last General Reason is drawn from authorities, 16 H. 6, Means de Fait; 182, by the whole court; The king in his presence cannot command one to be arrested, but an action of false imprisonment lies against him that arresteth. 22 H. 7, 4, Newton, 1 H. 7, 4. The opinion of Markham, Chief Justice to Edw. 4; and the reason, because the party hath no remedy.—Fortescue, cap. 8. Propria ore nullus regum usus est, &c. to commit any man.—4 El. Plo. Com. 236. The common law hath so admeasured the king's prerogative, as he cannot prejudice any man in his inheritance: And the greatest inheritance a man hath, is the liberty of his person; all other are accessory to it.

This Case is shortly reported in Styles as follows:

The PROTECTOR and Captain STREATER.

Hill, 1654. Ban. Sup.

Captain Streater was brought in Court by Habeas Corpus, and upon the return, read and filed, it appeared that he was committed by an Order of Parliament, for publishing scandalous and seditious Books. Twisden moved that the prisoner might be bailed, because that the Parliament is now dissolved, and by consequence the Order by which he was committed, is of no force. Mr. Attorney General, on the other side, urged, that the Parliament was not dissolved, but only the meeting of those persons in Parliament was dissolved, for the Parliament by the ancient law is to be every year, so that this is but in effect an adjournment, and not a dissolution; and besides, this matter for which the prisoner stands committed cannot be here inquired of, and so the cause of his commitment shall be intended to be good, and the Parliament may commit without shewing the cause of the commitment, and this commitment may be in order to his trial, and the prisoner is not without remedy, for he may apply himself to the supreme authority, to whom the Parliament have resigned their power. Twisden, for the prisoner, confessed, that this Court cannot be judge of the Parliament; but this Order by which he is committed differs from an Act of Parliament, for this is temporary, and determineth; and although the authority of Parliament ceaseth not, yet a particular Parliament may be dissolved, as this was.

Windham. When a Parliament is dissolved, the proceedings there are determined. Flourdeu's Case, 1 H. 7; the Latine Case, and the Parliament is now dissolved, and not adjourned, and a Parliament dissolved is not like the Courts of Justice here in the vacation time.

Wild. This case is not like to the case where this Court remanded a prisoner committed by the Parliament sitting the Parliament, for the prisoner here is coram Protectore, who may deliver him.

Capt. Streater. Mr. Attorney labours to asperse me, but shews no cause or crime for my commitment, and I am here before the Protector in his own Court.

Att. Gen. Only the persons and their convention is dissolved, but not the Court, no more than this Court is by the demise of the King, or in the vacation time, and I must refer it to the Court how far you will intermeddle in this case, and this Order by which he stands committed may be his judgment there, and and there he cannot be delivered; and I know no difference between an Order and an Ordinance of Parliament, and the stamp and authority of Parliament is upon this Order; and if the prisoner's counsel say true, then he may have an action of false imprisonment against his gaoler.

Twisden. Here is no Order of the Parliament returned, but it expresseth that he was committed by the Speaker by virtue of an Order of the Parliament.

Rolle (Chief Justice). We examine not the Orders of Parliament, but the question is, whether the Order doth now continue, and I conceive it is determined by the dissolution of the Parliament, and so would it have done by prorogation of the Parliament, because there is another session, and we can judge no otherwise of Orders of Parliament but by the words of them.

Ask, (Justice). If one that is committed by Order of Parliament cannot be delivered until another Parliament, the people's liberty will be lost, for there may not be a Parliament in many years.

Rolle, (Chief Justice). A new Parliament hath not reference to the old, but it is a new Court created upon new summons, and why may not the prisoner be bailed without these disputes? although he may apply himself elsewhere.

But the Court would advise, because they perceived the prisoner stubborn.

At another day, Mr. Attorney, upon the prisoner's appearance again upon his Habeas Corpus, said, that he had no more to say than what he had formerly offered, only he added that it was a tender and a leading case, and therefore to be well advised of.

Rolle, (Chief Justice). For the first part of the return, I conceive it too general, for it doth not appear in what the books are scandalous, for the publishing whereof he was committed. 2. I conceive that the Order of Parliament ceaseth with the Parliament which is dissolved; as an Order of one Session of Parliament ends with the Session, and is not like an Act, which continues after the Parliament, and all Committees made by Order of Parliament do cease by dissolving of the Parliament, but those which are made by Act of Parliament do continue afterwards; and this individual Parliament being dissolved, they can now make no further Order, and so the prisoner may be perpetually in prison, and he hath already laid long in prison, and therefore it is reason he should be bailed.

The Prisoner was admonished to be quiet, and not henceforth to disturb the State. The prisoner was ordered to bring sureties to be bound in 500*l.* for his appearance here the next Term, and sic de die in diem until Mr. Attorney will proceed against him, if he will proceed at all.

193. The Trial of Mr. JOHN LILBURNE, at the Sessions of the Peace held for the City of London, at Justice-Hall in the Old Bailey, for returning into England, being banished by Act of Parliament*: 6 CHARLES II. A. D. 1653. [Written (the chief part) by the said John Lilburne.]

I WAS Counsel or Proctor for my uncle, George Lilburne, esq. and one Mr. Josiah Primate, &c. about a Colliery taken from them in the county of Durham, by force and violence, by sir Arthur Haslerig†; which he by his certificate computes to be worth 5,000*l.* sterling per annum. About which Colliery the said Mr. Primate preferred a Petition to the Parliament, upon the 23d of December, 1651, in the delivery and management of which I appeared, as by the declared law of England I might justifiably do. Which Petition being by the Parliament referred to a committee to examine it, who spent twelve or thirteen large hearings thereupon; and upon the 15th of January, 1651, new stile, the Chairman thereof, Mr. Hall, made his report to the house: but what it was, we never were permitted to see nor to hear read. And as some members of Parliament have since told me, he made his report quite contrary to, or short of the evidence which was given in: whereupon the Parliament, the said 15th day of January, voted the aforesaid Mr. Primate's Petition to be false, malicious, and scandalous; and that sir Arthur Haslerig is not guilty either of Oppression or Tyranny, in the carriage and prosecution of this business; and that all the copies of the said Petition (which, relating only to Primate, is not here inserted) should be burnt by the hands of the common Hangman. And voted Mr. Primate to pay

* "In July this year, 1653, lieut. col. John Lilburne, who had been banished by the Rump Parliament, returned, and threw himself upon Cromwell, who left him to the law, upon which he was committed to Newgate and tried the next sessions at the Old Bailey, where he refused to plead unless he had a copy of his Indictment, which was at length granted, and then he put off his pleading by several evasions till the next session, when his Trial came on, and he was acquitted by the Jury, having rendered himself popular among the Malecontents of all the parties, by opposing all governments that were in being in his time. There is something remarkable in this man's story: Oliver seemed very much offended with him, and very desirous that he might be punished, yet privately paid him a pension equivalent with a Lieutenant-colonel's pay, and the malecontents of all parties opening themselves freely to Lilburne, who was looked upon as a confessor for their cause or causes, Cromwell found his account in keeping in with him, though to conceal the matter the better, Lilburne was content to lie some time in the Tower." 2 Oldmixon, 419. But he gives no authority, only putting in the margin, MS.

7,000*l.*, or to lie in prison till he pay it; which is all his punishment. And then the same day they passed certain Votes against me, which as they themselves, by special order of the 17th of January, have printed them, verbatim thus follow:

"Resolved, That the fine of 5,000*l.* be imposed upon lieutenant colonel John Lilburne, to be paid to the use of the Commonwealth. That he be fined 2,000*l.* more, to be paid to sir Arthur Haslerig, for his damages; and 2,000*l.* more, to be paid to James Russel, Edward Winslow, William Molius, and Arthur Squib, esqrs. four of the commissioners for compounding; that is to say, to each of them 500*l.* for their damages. That lieut. col. John Lilburne be banished out of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the islands and territories thereunto belonging; and not to return into any of them, upon pain of being proceeded against as a Felon, and in case of such return, shall suffer death according: That lieut. col. John Lilburne do depart out of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the islands and territories thereof, within 30 days now next coming; and in case the said John Lilburne shall, after the said 30 days, be found within England, Scotland, or Ireland, or the islands and territories thereunto belonging, or any of them, the said lieut. col. John Lilburne shall be proceeded against as a Felon, and shall suffer the pains of death accord-

In 1 Thurloe's State Papers, 366, is an intercepted Letter, dated London, July 21, 1653, addressed to Mr. Edwards, and signed 'Peter Richardson,' containing the following passage: "The last week, John Lilburne was five times at his Trial at the Sessions House, where he most courageously defended himself from Mr. Steele, the Recorder, his violent assaults, with his old buckler, Magna Charta; so that they have let him alone, although he be not yet acquitted. Cromwell thought this fellow so considerable, that during the time of his Trial he kept three regiments continually in arms, about St. James's. There were many tickets thrown about with these words:

'And what, shall then honest John Lilburne die!
'Threescore thousand will know the reason why.'

Lilburne encountered Prideaux with so many opprobrious terms, that he caused him absolutely to quit the field. Titus was one of Lilburne's accusers, and the duke of Buckingham's name is much used therein."

† Pamphlets of reciprocal accusation were published at the time on the part of Lilburne and Haslerig.

ingly: That the Serjeant at Arms attending the Parliament, do apprehend the said lieut. col. John-Lilburne, and bring him to the bar of this house, upon Tuesday morning next, to receive the judgment of Parliament aforesaid, and that Mr. Speaker do direct a warrant to the Serjeant at Arms accordingly."

But being myself at the Parliament-door when these Votes past, and understanding what they had done, although they sate (to my remembrance) a good while after candle-light, I staid; and when the Serjeant at Arms came forth with his mace, and the Speaker, I spoke to him in these words, or to this effect: Mr. Serjeant, I understand the house hath this day passed some Votes against me, in which regard I staid on purpose, to see if you have any thing to say to me. Unto which he replied, No, Sir, I have no warrant yet to meddle with you, and therefore you may go whither you please. Well, Sir, if you have none to-night, I will promise you, to wait upon you to-morrow morning, to see whether then you will have any or no. And being as good as my word, the next day being Friday, January 16th, he committed me to the custody of his Deputy, Mr. Parsons, where I remained till Tuesday morning next (as it was ordered in the last Vote) which was January 20th; and coming to the Parliament-door, I was ushered into the bar by the Serjeant at Arms, having his mace upon his shoulder; where Mr. Speaker, as the mouth of the house, expressed himself in these words, or to this effect:

"Lieut. Col. Lilburne, you are commanded by this house to kneel:" unto which I answered in these words, or to this effect; Sir, with all submission to this honourable house, I desire first a little liberty to speak. No, Sir, said he, you are not permitted to speak at all, but commanded to kneel. Well then, Sir, said I, with all submission, I stoop unto your sentence, that you have already past upon me, but I cannot kneel.

Lieut. Col. Lilburne, said he, the house commands you to kneel. Well then, Sir, said I, to be short with you, I neither can kneel, nor will I kneel. Withdraw then, said he; which I did accordingly, making them two or three congées at my going out, the which also I did as I came in. Whereupon, as I was informed, seeing that I would not kneel at their bar to receive my sentence, they voted to draw up an act of parliament to banish me; and passed another Vote by way of punishment, to take off 10 days of the time they had formerly given me to depart the land in. Although upon the Friday at night before, I with my keeper went to the Serjeant's house, and spoke to him to this purpose: Mr. Serjeant, I understand the parliament sits to-morrow, to chuse the commissioners for regulating the law, and I know it is their usual manner to command all men that come to their bar, that they look upon as delinquents or offenders, to receive their sentence at their bar kneeling. And truly, Sir, I have no desire at all to affront them, or to vex them more than they are, for I believe they are vexed enough already at me. And therefore I beseech you, oblige me so far unto you, as to tell the Speaker and some other members, whom you please, from me, That when upon Tuesday I shall come to their bar, to receive their sentence, I shall not kneel, although they should order you with your mace at their bar to knock my brains out: and, Sir, if you please to give me leave, I will render you my reason, and it is this: I know when any kneels at your bar to receive a sentence, the parliament looks upon that action or gesture of kneeling, as a demonstration of a man's own conviction in his own conscience that he is guilty, and thereby does deserve such a punishment as by that sentence is past upon him; the which if I should do, I were in my own understanding the veriest rogue in the world, because my conscience and soul tells me, that I have done no evil, nor broke none of the Parliament's laws, but followed, as by the laws of England I may justifiably do, an honest, just and righteous business, in a just and honest way, without using any base or wicked ungodly means to effect my design in it. And whatever Mr. Hill hath reported to the house, I am sure of it, we have fully proved every clause and circumstance contained in our Petition, save only that clause of sir Arthur Haslerig's private corresponding with some of the commissioners of Haberdashers-hall. But if we had not proved the Petition, there is no law extant in England to enable the parliament in the least to pass such a sentence upon me: and therefore for me in words, actions, or gesture, to do the least circumstance, to make the parliament believe that I in mine own conscience was convinced that they had passed a just sentence upon me: I had rather, Mr. Serjeant, be cut in ten thousand pieces, than be such a rogue and traitor to mine own liberties and the nation's; and therefore I beg of you beforehand to tell them as much from me, that so they may avoid, if they please, their forcing me on Tuesday next to affront them.—And he afterwards assured me, that the next day, being Saturday, he told 20 or 30 of the members of parliament of it; so that they put the affront upon themselves, and not I. But upon the said Tuesday, after that I was withdrawn out of the house, and set at liberty to be gone as soon as I pleased, there being great store of citizens, my very good friends, at the door, who were persons that had always faithfully adhered to the Parliament's cause, with a Petition for the revoking of my banishment; the Petition being called for in, was read and debated, but laid aside, without giving any answer to the Petitioners. The copy of which Petition, as since it is printed in England, thus followeth:

To the supreme Authority, the Parliament of the Commonwealth of England; The Humble PETITION of many well-affected People, inhabiting the City of London, Westminster, Southwark, and parts adjacent, in behalf of the just Liberties of the free People of England, highly concerned in the Sentence against Lieut.-Col. John Lilburne*.

“Humbly sheweth; That if the manifold services, and extreme sufferings of lieut.-col. John Lilburne, in opposition to tyranny and oppression, and how instrumental he hath been in the removal of divers sorts of oppressors, his wonderful deliverances, and clear acquitments by legal trials, from all former accusations, without the least stain to his reputation; if all these could be forgotten, and that he stood in our thoughts, but as the meanest of well-affected persons (and such at the least we must allow him, having in all times adhered to parliaments), yet in your late proceedings towards him, and heavy censure upon him, we apprehend our native rights so much concerned, that we never conceived a greater cause of speedy application to you for redress, than upon this sad occasion.

“For certainly it cannot be denied, but if he be really an offender, he is such by the breach of some law, made and published before the fact, and ought by due process of law, and verdict of 12 men, to be thereof convicted, and found guilty of such crime; unto which the law also hath prescribed such a punishment agreeable to that our fundamental liberty; which enjoineeth that no freeman of England should be adjudged of life, limb, liberty, or estate, but by Juries; a freedom which parliaments in all ages contended to preserve from violation; as the birthright and chief inheritance of the people, as may appear most remarkably in the Petition of Right, which you have stiled that most excellent law.

“And therefore we trust upon second thoughts, being the parliament of England, you will be so far from bereaving us, who have never forfeited our right, of this our native right, and way of Trials by Juries, (for what is done unto any one, may be done unto every one), that you will preserve them entire to us, and to posterity, from the encroachments of any that would innovate upon them. And if the original of the unhappy differences between sir Arthur Haslerig and Mr. Lilburne be duly weighed (being as we are informed), it will appear, that sir Arthur's stoppage of monies due to Mr. Lilburne, without legal process, was the first occasion thereof.

“And it is believed, that if Mr. Primate's cause (wherein sir Arthur and Mr. Lilburne have been engaged) had at any time either at first or last been admitted to a trial at law, and had passed any way by verdict of twelve sworn men: all the trouble and inconveniences arising thereupon had been prevented: the way of determination by major votes of committees, being neither so certain nor so satisfactory in any case as by way of Juries, the benefit of challenges and exceptions, and unanimous consent, being all essential privileges in the latter; whereas committees are tied to no such rules, but are at liberty to be present or absent at pleasure. Besides, Juries being birthright, and the other but new and temporary, men do not, nor, as we humbly conceive, ever will acquiesce in the one as in the other; from whence it is not altogether so much to be wondered at, if upon dissatisfactions, there have been such frequent printing of men's cases, and dealings of Committees, as there have been; and such harsh and inordinate heats and expressions between parties interested, such sudden and importunate appeals to your authority, being indeed all alike out of the true English road, and leading into nothing but trouble and perplexity, breeding hatred and enmities between worthy families, affronts and disgust between persons of the same public affection and interest, and to the rejoicing of none but public adversaries. All which, and many more inconveniences, can only be avoided, by referring all such cases to the usual Trials and final determinations of law.

“And whereas you have censured Mr. Lilburne 7,000*l.* fine, and to perpetual banishment, and to die as a felon if he return; we are exceedingly afflicted in our spirits thereby, not only because he hath not had the usual way of Trial by Jury, which yet weighs very much with us; nor for that we believe he hath followed Mr. Primate's cause, out of strong persuasion of the justness thereof (the cause in itself, as we have been informed, being very intricate and hard to be understood, and so did not wilfully or intentionally carry it out against his conscience, some of the Commissioners wishing to God it had therefore never came before them), nor for that we believe him innocent of any wilful breach of parliament privilege, in delivering printed Petitions, before the original was presented unto you [that being never before published, to be a breach], though all these add to our grief, yet the main of our affliction ariseth from the destructiveness of the sentence, as being therein contrary to that other our fundamental native right, which enjoins, That fines should have regard to the qualities of the persons; a plowman saving his wainage, and a merchant his merchandise. Whereas this, if relating to his estate, we believe, is so far from preserving him in his quality, as that it leaves himself, his wife, and his children, without sustenance; if in relation to his person, his affection to parliaments, and zeal to public freedom, renders all foreign nations so unsafe to him, as that in effect he is banished into a wilderness, and exposed naked to the fury of bears and lions.

“The premises duly weighed, and for that (as we are informed) the parties accused and censured have had no means to see what report hath been made by the honourable Committee, nor have had the liberty of exceptions

* This Petition shewing the esteem and veneration Lilburne was in among the people, and the sentiments those times had of this Case, and the value they set on Trials by Juries: as the birthright of Englishmen; is the reason it is here inserted.

thereunto, in like cases granted; and in that many well-affected people that heard the debates, and evidences on both sides, are unsatisfied, both in point of possession, and title to the colliery in question; that the honour of parliament may stand immaculate, our native, fundamental rights inviolable, and all those gentlemen concerned in this cause left without any the least grudging, or just complaints;

"We have deemed ourselves bound in conscience in most humble manner to intreat,
1. That you will be pleased to recal your forementioned grievous Sentence upon lieut.-col. John Lilburne, and the rest concerned therein.
2. To give free liberty to Mr. Pimate to prosecute his cause, both for title and possession at the common law; and therein to make use of what counsel he shall think fit.
3. That sir Arthur Haslerig be referred to take his course at law, for whatsoever injuries conceived to be done unto him by lieut.-col. John Lilburne, or any others, as was granted in Mr. Musgrave's case with the said sir Arthur; and that Mr. Lilburne, or any others, may have the same liberty against sir Arthur, if they conceive any cause."

After which, the said friends of mine drew up another, as they hoped, much more effectual than that foregoing. And upon the Tuesday after, being January the 27th, went up with it to the Parliament-house, but could not that day get it read. Upon which I that night supped with about 200 of them, at an house behind the Exchange in London; and the next morning went to the Speaker of the parliament, and told him, that on the morrow, being Thursday, I intended, by God's assistance, to take my journey for beyond sea, and therefore intreated him to give me his pass; but he told me he durst not for his hanging give me a pass. Unto which I replied; Sir, that is very strange, that your house will command me, upon pain of death, to leave England by such a day, [which I am willing to do] and yet you will not enable me by your pass to be gone. For want of which, it is very probable, when I come at the sea-side, your officers of the Custom-house will stop me: and yet, because I am not gone out of England before such a day, I must be hanged. What is this else, but to lay a snare for my life? For you command me upon pain of death to be gone, and yet you will not give me your pass to enable me to go, although it be almost impossible without it for me to get away. Well, said the Speaker, I dare not for my life give it you. So I was forced to depart without it. And the next morning, being Thursday, January 29th, I took horse at Finsbury-stables, by Moor-fields, and rid through London and Southwark, being accompanied with great store of my friends on horse-back, who brought me divers miles on my journey. And the next day I came to Dover.

And being forced at Dover to make use of the parliament's printed Votes about my Banishment, for my pass, I was by the officers let go, and in a few hours time I arrived safe at Ostend; and upon the 8th of February last arrived (by God's blessing) at Amsterdam, the place of my desired rest and abode, where, within a few days after, I found a printed Act of Parliament, which thus followeth:

An Act for the Execution of a Judgment given in Parliament against Lieut.-Col. John Lilburne.

"Whereas, upon the 15th day of January, in the year of our Lord 1651, a Judgment was given in parliament against the said lieut.-col. John Lilburne, for high crimes and misdemeanors by him committed, relating to a false, malicious, and scandalous Petition heretofore presented to the parliament, by one Josiah Pimate, of London, Leatherseller, as by the due proceedings had upon the said Petition, and the Judgment thereupon given at large appeareth: Be it therefore enacted by this present parliament, and by the authority of the same, That the fine of 3,000*l.* imposed upon the said John Lilburne, to the use of the Commonwealth, by the Judgment aforesaid, shall be forthwith levied by due process of law, to the use of the Commonwealth accordingly. And be it further enacted, That the sum of 2,000*l.* imposed by the said Judgment upon the said John Lilburne, to be paid to sir Arthur Haslerig for damages, and the sum of 2,000*l.* likewise imposed by the said Judgment upon the said John Lilburne, to be paid to James Russel, Edward Winslow, William Molins, and Arthur Squib, in the said Judgment named; that is to say, to each of them 500*l.* for their damages, shall be forthwith paid accordingly: And that the said sir Arthur Haslerig, James Russel, Edward Winslow, William Molins, and Arthur Squib, their executors and administrators, shall have the like remedy and proceedings at law respectively against the said John Lilburne, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, for the recovery of the respective sums so given to them by the said Judgment, as if the said respective sums had been due by several recognizances in the nature of a statute staple, acknowledged unto them severally by the said John Lilburne, upon the said 15th day of January, in the year of our Lord 1651. And be it likewise enacted by the authority aforesaid, That the said John Lilburne shall, within twenty days, to be accounted from the said 15th day of January, 1651, depart out of England, Scotland, Ireland, and the islands, territories, and dominions thereof: And in case the said John Lilburne, at any time after the expiration of the said twenty days, to be accounted as aforesaid, shall be found, or shall be remaining within England, Scotland, Ireland, or within any of the islands, territories, or dominions thereof; the said John Lilburne shall be, and is hereby adjudged a felon, and shall be executed as a felon, without benefit of clergy. And it is lastly enacted, by the authority aforesaid, That all, and every person and persons, who shall, after the expiration of the said twenty days, wittingly relieve, harbour, or conceal the said John Lilburne, he being in England, Scotland, or Ireland, or any the territories, islands, or dominions thereof, shall be hereby adjudged accessory of felony after the fact. And all judges, justices, mayors, bailiffs, sheriffs, and all other officers, as well military as civil, in their respective places, are hereby required to be aiding and assisting in apprehending the said John Lilburne, and in putting this act in due execution."

Friday, the 30th of January, 1651, Ordered by the parliament, "That this Act be forthwith printed and published.

HENRY SCOBELL, Cler. Parl."

But the said John Lilburne returning to his native country in June, 1653, was apprehended, and committed to Newgate, as appears by the following Mittimus:

The (illegal) Mittimus of the Lord Mayor.

"Whereas it was enacted by a late act of parliament, (entitled, 'An act for the execution of a Judgment given in Parliament against lieut. col. John Lilburne,') That the said John Lilburne should, within 20 days, to be accounted from the 15th day of January, 1651, depart out of England, Scotland, Ireland, and the islands, territories, and dominions thereof: And that in case the said John Lilburne, at any time after the expiration of the said 20 days, to be accounted as aforesaid, should be found, or should be remaining within England, Scotland, Ireland, or within any of the islands, territories, or dominions thereof; the said John Lilburne is hereby adjudged a felon, and to be executed as a felon, as in the said act was mentioned: And whereas the said John Lilburne hath been remaining, and found since the expiration of the said 20 days, within the liberties of the city of London, in the Commonwealth of England, contrary to the said act: These are therefore, in the name of the Keepers of the Liberties of England, by authority of Parliament, to will and require you forthwith, upon receipt hereof, to receive into your custody the body of the said John Lilburne, whom I send unto you herewith for the felony aforesaid, and him safely to keep, until he shall be delivered by due course of law; and this shall be your Warrant. Given under my hand and seal, dated this 16th day of June, in the year of our Lord, 1653. JOHN FOWK, Mayor."

To the Keepers of the Gaol of Newgate.

Before the sessions began, John Lilburne petitioned the Parliament, but they taking no notice of his Petition, he was brought to his Trial, July 13th, as follows:

The Keepers of the Liberties of England, by Authority of Parliament, against John Lilburne, now Prisoner at the bar.

Mr. Lilburne was brought to the bar upon Wednesday the 13th of July, where, after silence being made in the court, the clerk commanded him to hold up his hand at the bar: Mr. Lilburne applying his speech to the lord chief baron Wylde, desired his honour to explain what was meant by holding up the hand at the bar, that so by doing that act, ceremony, or form, he might not run himself into snares and dangers. And after a large dispute betwixt the court and him upon that point he saith, 'Then my lord, my name I must acknowledge to be John Lilburne, gent. son of Richard Lilburne of Thickle-Punchardon, in the county of Durham, esq. and I am here ready to answer any thing any man hath to lay to my charge.' And the Indictment being read, Mr. Lee, the clerk of the Court, demanded of him, whether he was Guilty, or Not Guilty? But Mr. Lilburne, the prisoner at the bar, applied himself to the Court, and said, 'My lord chief baron Wylde, I humbly desire as my right by law, to speak freely against the insufficiency and illegality of the Indictment, before I join issue to it.' Which being (with a little struggling) granted him, he said, 'Well then, my lord, now is the time, or never, for me to assign my errors against the Indictment, before I plead to it: For if once I should plead to it, it will then be too late to assign the errors; but if I do it before, then of right and justice you ought to grant me a copy of my Indictment, and assign me learned counsel in the law to consult with, and a convenient time to return in my Answer unto the said Indictment: All which,' (said the Prisoner) 'is fully declared for good law by the lord Coke, in his 3rd Institute, fol. 29, 34, 137, 250, which book was published by two special Orders of the House of Commons in their virginity and purity, in anno 1641, and 1642, for good law.' The pregnant and pertinent passages of which places were distinctly read by the prisoner at the bar, and pressed with all the earnestness and reason he possibly could to enjoy the benefit thereof. And to the apprehension of the prisoner, and multitudes of the by-standers, the Court expressly ordered, that he should have Counsel assigned, and the Copy of the Indictment; but withal, he was ordered under his hand to send in his Exceptions: Upon which the prisoner was carried into the garden, on the backside of the Court, to draw them up; where, having remained some space, during the dining of the Court, he writ a Letter, the copy of which thus followeth:

For the right hon. the Lord Chief Baron Wylde, and the rest of the Honourable Bench, these humbly present:

"My lord, and the honourable bench; Since I departed the Court, I have seriously considered, that I cannot legally make any Exceptions concerning the errors in the Indictment, without a true copy thereof, to compare with the Act against lieut. col. John Lilburne, and therefore I humbly pray, that you would be pleased so far to do me that right in point of life, that I may have a true Copy thereof, and I shall speedily present my Exceptions under my hand, and thankfully remain, your lordship's most humble servant, JOHN LILBURNE."

Which Letter being delivered by one of the officers, as the judge was at dinner; as soon as the Court sat again, the prisoner, contrary to his expectation, was called to the bar again, and Mr. Lee, the clerk of the Court, pressed very hard to him to plead to the Indictment, Guilty, or Not Guilty; but the prisoner at the bar applying himself to the lord chief baron Wylde, very much wondered why he should be called to the bar any more, before he had enjoyed the benefit of their own order, for a Copy of his Indictment, and the assignation of learned counsel in the law to consult with. Judge Warburton with some heat falls upon the prisoner, and undervalues the works of that learned man in the law of England, sir Edward Coke, and the parliament's Orders, that had caused his second, third, and fourth Part of his Institutes to be printed; and highly extols the absoluteness of parliaments. Upon which the prisoner at the bar replies with a great deal of zeal, earnestness, reason, understanding, and length of time. And after a long and tedious struggling, he could obtain no more that night, but a lame Order to have counsel assigned him only to one individual point. And taking out the Order by his friends the next morning, being Thursday, July 14, 1653, he sent a Letter to the Court, the true copy of which thus followeth:

For the right hon. the Lord Chief Baron Wylde, and the rest of the Honourable Bench, for the Goal Delivery of the Old Bailey.

"My Lord; Vouchsafe me liberty to acquaint you, that immediately upon my getting to my lodging in Newgate, I dispatched away this bearer, Mr. Overton, with another friend, to the Court for their Order, which was given unto them; and by it Mr. Serjeant Glynn, Mr. Serjeant Earl, Mr. Maynard, Mr. Hales, Mr. Twisden, Mr. Wylde, Mr. Chute, and Mr. Norbury, should be assigned of counsel with John Lilburne, gentleman, to advise with him, whether he shall insist upon his plea and law, or whether he be the same John Lilburne named in the Act, or not, before ten of the clock to-morrow in the forenoon. Sir, the parties who took the order, posted away to seek the counsel, and spent several hours, but could find none of them but Mr. Maynard, who was sick; and Mr. Chute, who was just a going out of town: And besides, my lord, give me leave to acquaint your honour, that in a private way, I have got the opinion of some well versed in the law, and really, my lord, when they read the Order of the Court, and are told, that I cannot get a copy of the Indictment, they stand amazed at it, and know not what to advise: Therefore seeing that really and in seriousness I have done the utmost to get the advice of Counsel according to the said Order, and cannot obtain it to any purpose; neither can those that are willing privately to help me, do me any good (as they say), for want of the copy of the Indictment, which they say in law and reason ought not to be denied to me; therefore I humbly continue my suit to your honour, and the honourable bench, that you would not require impossibilities from me, that am no lawyer, in an absolute unprecedented case, wherein I have no footsteps at all to tread in, or any other guide to walk by, but only the natural reason of an ignorant and illiterate man in the practice part of the law of England. And therefore do most humbly pray and beseech your honour, and the honourable bench, as you are Christians, and men of honour and conscience, to afford me a Copy of my Indictment, and time till the next Sessions, to consult with the counsel that you have assigned me: for which favour and justice, I shall be very much obliged to remain, Yours in sincerity and heartiness to serve you, JOHN LILBURNE."

VOL. V.

"Newgate, July 14, 1653."

But for all the aforesaid Letter, he was called to the bar upon Thursday in the forenoon, where he again struggled very earnestly for a Copy of his Indictment, as his right by law; and the Lord Chief-Baron Wylde sitting upon the bench, the Recorder and the Prisoner had a long and hot encounter each with other: and about 2 o'clock in the afternoon the Prisoner was dismissed, with a promise of the Copy of his Indictment, being thereupon ordered to bring in his exceptions by 2 o'clock the next day in the afternoon: but the Prisoner, several hours after his dismissal, apprehending himself wronged with those delays or denials (of right and justice), that were put upon him, writ a third Letter, the Copy of which thus followeth:

For the right hon. the Lord Chief Baron Wylde, and the honourable the Court of Gaol Delivery, sitting in the Old Bailey, these humbly with speed present.

My Lord; I stand amazed when I am denied a Copy of my Indictment, which I apprehended the Court granted me at the Bar as my right; I did therefore send my father and father-in-law, with my brother-in-law, and my cousin-german, humbly to desire it as my right, but they returned me your denial of it; in which regard, in all humility, though much of my time be expired, I have by these few lines once again sent my father and brother to wait upon you for a copy of it (to leave you without excuse), which is my absolute right by law; and do therefore humbly intreat you it may be sent to me presently, without which I am not bound in law to draw up a plea, nor cannot. But if I must be murdered and destroyed without law, my innocent blood be upon the heads of those that shall be guilty of it, by will to take it from me. So humbly craving your lordship's legal, speedy, and just answer, I rest Your Lordship's most humble Servant, so far as you are a maintainer of the people of England's fundamental Laws and Liberties, JOHN LILBURNE. Thursday, July 14, 1653. Past 5 o'clock at night."

2 E

But receiving no benefit by the said Letter, the next morning, being Friday, his father went to the lord chief-baron's chamber; but he being preparing to go out of town, he could not be permitted to speak with him. After which, the old gentleman came back to the Old Bailey, to complain of his son's hard usage; and from thence with a messenger went back again to the Lord Chief Baron's Chamber, and from thence to Attorney General Prideaux's Chamber, to get a Warrant from him to enjoy the Copy of the Indictment: and then coming to the Court again, about ten of the clock he received it from the hand of Mr. Lee; the Copy whereof thus followeth:

At the Sessions of Peace held for the City of London, at Justice Hall in the Old Bailey, now sitting, this present 16th day of July, 1653.

London, ss. The Jurors for the keepers of the Liberty of England, by authority of parliament, upon their Oaths do present, that in, and by a statute made in the parliament of this Commonwealth of England, holden at Westminster, in the county of Middlesex, the 30th of January, in the year of our Lord, 1651, intituled An Act for the execution of a judgment given in parliament against lieutenant-col. John Lilburne; it was enacted by the said parliament, and by the authority of the same, that the said John Lilburne should (within 20 days, to be accounted from the 15th day of January, 1651) depart out of England, Scotland, Ireland, and the islands, territories and dominions thereof. And in case the said John Lilburne, at any time after the expiration of the said 20 days, to be accounted as aforesaid, should be found, or should be remaining within England, Scotland, Ireland, or within any of the islands, territories or dominions thereof, the said John Lilburne should be, and was thereby adjudged a felon, and should be executed as a felon without benefit of clergy. And it was also enacted by the authority aforesaid, that all and every person and persons, who should, after the expiration of the said 20 days, wittingly relieve, harbour, or conceal the said John Lilburne, he being in England, Scotland, or Ireland, or any the territories, islands, or dominions thereof, should be thereby adjudged accessory of felony after the fact. And all judges, justices, mayors, bailiffs, sheriffs, and all other officers, as well military as civil, in their respective places, are thereby required to be aiding and assisting in apprehending the said John Lilburne, and in putting the said act in due execution, as in and by the said Act of Parliament appeareth. And that the said John Lilburne, late of London, gentleman, the statute aforesaid not weighing, nor the punishments therein contained any whit fearing, after the expiration of the said 20 days, to be accounted from the said 15th day of January, 1651, as aforesaid, to-wit, the 15th day of June, in the year of our Lord, 1653, was found, and was feloniously remaining within England aforesaid; that is to say, at London, to-wit, in the parish of Giles without Cripplegate, in the ward of Cripplegate, London aforesaid, against the form of the statute aforesaid, and against the public peace, &c. SADLER."

And bringing it to his son, who, with the best counsel that he had, reading it, his work was all of-new to begin again; so that he was forced first to post away his own father and others, to let the Court know, that although it was their order in Court, that he should have had the copy of his Indictment the day before, being Thursday, about two o'clock in the afternoon; yet it was ten o'clock upon Friday forenoon, before he could get it. And at two o'clock in the afternoon upon the said Friday, he was to appear at the bar; and all his work, upon the serious viewing the Indictment, was to begin anew, so that it was impossible that in three or four hours time he could be ready. And therefore his father and Mr. Overton pressed the court to give him time till the next morning, being Saturday the 16th of July, to make his Exceptions ready, and put them in; but it would no ways be granted, nor no longer time than two hours to be added to the former. At the understanding of which, he intreated his father-in-law, and Mr. Thomas Prince, to go down to the Court again, and tell them that it was altogether impossible that the prisoner could make his Exceptions ready by four o'clock in the afternoon of the said Friday, it being ten in the forenoon, before he could get the copy of the Indictment; although it was their order, that he should have had it by two o'clock in the afternoon the day before: and therefore they pressed hard at the bar to the Court, to have till the next morning, being Saturday, for the prisoner to bring in his Exceptions; but they also returned with a negative. The prisoner and such as he had at work, followed his papers as for their lives; and about six or seven at night, came the messengers from the court for Mr. Lilburne the prisoner, who being come to the bar, Mr. Lee, the clerk, pressed him again to plead Guilty or Not Guilty to the said indictment; but the prisoner little regarding him, addressed himself to the Lord-Mayor, as the then President of the Court, and gave him an exact narrative of what delays he had had about the getting of the copy of the Indictment; being delayed from two o'clock in the afternoon upon Thursday, till ten o'clock in the forenoon that present Friday: and that as soon as he had got it, he had taken all the pains, and used all the industry, that it was possible to be expected from an ignorant man in the formalities and niceties of the law of England. That he had sent several messengers truly to acquaint the Court, that he could not possibly get the said Exceptions deliberately perfected before the morrow morning, being Saturday. That they were weighty things, and the failing in one word, might cost him his life. That he was (when Mr. Brisco came for him) but newly begun to read, examine, and compare the ingrossed copy with the original, to see whether there was any fault in it or no; that he nothing nigh had read over one quarter of it, when he was called away to come to the Court. That he hoped they would not compel him to put in uncorrected Exceptions for his life, especially seeing the mistake of one word might destroy him, and especially seeing procrastination of time was no part of his fault, but the Court's only and solely, who had causelessly spent so much time, before they would give him that, the copy of his Indictment, which was in Law (he having already made his verbal Exceptions) so essentially and legally his right, and without which he neither was bound, nor could make legally and formerly in law his Exceptions against the Indictment read unto him in Court. And therefore humbly prayed, that he might enjoy the honourable Court's favour till to-morrow morning, to make them ready, and put them in: which being granted, he the prisoner departed to his lodging, and posted away to several of his counsel, some of which coming to him that night, he had a large discourse with them, and they read much of his papers, and very highly approved of his exceptions; but withal told him, he had fallen far short in demanding his right and due.

So upon Saturday, about eight o'clock in the forenoon, he was brought to the bar again, and he was pressed again by Mr. Lee, to plead, Guilty, or Not Guilty, to the Indictment.

But Mr. Lilburne, the prisoner at the bar, regarded not him, but addressed himself to the Lord-Mayor and the Court, acquainting them where they left off the last night; and that in obedience to their commands, he had brought in his Exceptions against the sufficiency of the Indictment read unto him in the Court, fairly ingrossed in parchment according to law, and humbly prayed that it might be accepted, recorded and read: so handing it into the Court, the Recorder, Mr. Steele, took it in his hand, looked upon it, and said, Mr. Lilburne, this is not under your counsel's hands.

Lilburne. No, Sir, it is not, I am sure some of them tell me it needs not; but it is under my own hand, and I must and will justify, and make good those Exceptions with my life.

Recorder. Wherefore did we assign counsel? One cause was, that they might sign your Exceptions.

Lilburne. My lord, with your favour thus; be pleased to take notice, that in your assigning me counsel, you have only done it to one individual point; which is not only a snare to me, but also to my counsel. First, To me, in cooping me up to one Plea for my life; whereas the insufficiency of the Indictment, and the illegal, contradictory things upon which it is grounded, and my right in law, leaves me sufficiently at elbow-room to have plurality of Pleas or Exceptions: and therefore in your assigning me counsel in one point only; if they should set their hands to any more but that one point alone, they tell me, they run themselves into snares and dangers. But, my lord, they likewise tell me, if you, and this honourable Court, please to assign them of my counsel at large, they will not only sign my Exceptions, but will venture their All at the bar of justice to maintain them to be good law. And not only so, but they tell me, and bid me tell the Court, if I pleased, that if they have any understanding in the law, and that their law-books speak truth, they are very confident that all the judges and lawyers in England, put together in one, shall never be able, while they breathe, to draw up a legal Indictment upon the act of banishment of the 30th of January, 1651, and the Votes or Judgment (as it is called) of the 15th of January, 1651, upon which it is grounded, if these printed copies of them be true copies; because, my lord, they say, a judgment, and the execution of a judgment, ought to be like a pair of indentures exactly even in all things, the one neither to be above nor below the other, but even with it in all circumstances; but in the pretended Judgment, and the Act for execution thereof, there are these three essential differences:

First, The Judgment (as it is called) saith, lieut. col. John Lilburne shall be banished and depart out of England, within 30 days next after the said 15th of January, 1651; but the act for executing the said Judgment, expressly saith, he shall not stay in England above 20 days next after the said 15th day of January, 1651: So that, my lord, here is ten days difference betwixt the Judgment itself, and the Act for the pretended execution thereof; which makes an essential nullity in it, and all proceedings that are founded upon it.

Secondly, The pretended Judgment banisheth one lieut.-col. John Lilburne out of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the islands and territories thereunto belonging, but banisheth him not in the least out of their dominions; so that Wales being styled, distinguished, and denominated in law to be a dominion, the said banished lieut.-col. John Lilburne, by any words contained in the said banishing Votes or Judgment, might legally and securely have lived in Wales all his days. But then comes the said Act of January 30th, 1651, which is called an Act for the execution of the said Judgment of the 15th of January, 1651, given in Parliament against lieut. col. John Lilburne, and it banisheth the said lieut.-col. out of England, Scotland, Ireland, and the islands, territories and dominions thereof: so that here is a main essential difference betwixt the pretended Judgment, and the Act for the execution thereof.

The third difference betwixt them is this; the pretended Judgment of the 15th January, 1651, saith, That if the said banished lieut.-col. John Lilburne shall return into England, &c. at any time after the expiration of the said 30 days, he shall be proceeded against as a felon, and shall suffer death accordingly. But the said pretended Act of the 30th January, 1651, made on pretence for the execution thereof, expressly saith, by way of addition, that if the said lieut.-col. John Lilburne shall return into England, &c. after his banishment, he shall be, and i hereby adjudged a felon, and shall be executed as a felon, without benefit of clergy; so that, my lord, they say it is impossible to draw up a legal Indictment upon the fore-mentioned contradicting Act, Votes, or pretended Judgment.

Recorder. Well then, Mr. Lilburne, seeing your counsel are so willing, as you say they are, to sign your Exceptions for good law, the Court will give you time till six of the clock at night, to get their hands to it, and will assign you counsel at large.

Lilburne. My lord, I am put upon a great streight. 1. In that the sessions are holden a week after they should usually have been held; by means of which length of time, most of the great and chiefest, able, and most learned counsel of England are gone out of town. 2. Your honour and the Court hath exhausted and spent from Wednesday morning till this hour, before you would fully grant me that which is my absolute right by law; by means of which delay of time, I am afraid, I have by this lost all my counsel, that you have assigned me, that I can fully rest upon, that were in town, when I named them for my counsel, and whom, if you pleased to have ordered it so, I could have often conferred with since, though now truly, I am afraid they are all gone out of town upon the Circuit; and if they be, is it possible that I should get their hands to my Exceptions by six o'clock? And therefore that we may delay no longer time in this Trial, I beseech you, without any more ado, accept of my own Exceptions under my own hand: I am sure I am the most concerned in them, and my life must pay for the faults in them, if there be any. And therefore I pray accept of them without any more ado, under my own hand alone: I am sure my counsel tell me, you ought in law to do it.

Recorder. Well, Mr. Lilburne, in short, the Court tells you they cannot in law, nor will not accept them, without your counsel sign them.

Lilburne. Really, Mr. Recorder, you drive me to very great streights, in delaying me so long my right by law, before you will fully grant it me; it is an apparent hazard, and a very great probability my counsel are already gone out of town: and then after you have so delayed me, to tie me up to an unnecessary and unrequired in law punctilio, for me to get my counsel's hands to my Exceptions in so short a time, when in probability it is impossible it shall or can be done.

Besides, my Lord Mayor, consider of the inconveniency that Mr. Recorder would tie me to, which is this; I stand here to plead for my life, and I am commanded to put in my Exceptions against the illegality of an Indictment read unto me, and it may be, it is evidently seen, known, or at least believed, that I have several of the now present greatest men in England for my grand and chiefest adversaries; and therefore to tie me up in my case at all, to bring in any thing under my counsel's hands, is a snare and danger to me: for we all know by experience, my lord, how easy it is for the great men in power, right or wrong, to crush and destroy any man that they in good earnest set themselves against; and it is apparent their indignation is heated seven-fold against me (but I must avow it, without any the least just ground or cause), and it cannot chuse but burn in a very great degree against my counsellors, that shall help me in law to preserve my life, against their enraged and big-swollen malice. And, my lord, I am sure, almost all those counsellors that you have assigned me, are not only men of great estates, but also men of great practice, which is their livelihood; and it is possible my condition, before my trial is done, will compel and necessitate me to speak that high, and yet legal language, that may ruin and destroy my counsel, either to plead it, or set their hands to it: and for me to expect or desire that from them, that shall apparently tend to the ruin and destruction of them and their families, when I am in such a mean, low, and poor condition, as that I am able in no measure in the least to make them any part of amends for that ruin or loss they shall or may sustain, by too deep engaging for my preservation, I were an irrational, unjust, beastly man to do it. My lord, it is my person at present now at the bar, that is in hazard and jeopardy, and none else. And, my lord, I am long since robbed of all my estate, by the tyrannical will and arbitrary pleasure of sir Arthur Haslerig; and have long since nothing left to buy me bread, but what I borrow. And, my lord, I have now nothing to lose but my wife and tender babes, and my skin; and to die to me is gain, so I be not jélu de se, a murderer of myself; and, therefore, I beseech you, my lord, let me put in my Exceptions under my own hand.

Recorder. Mr. Lilburne, if you be so earnest thus to do, wherefore do you so much press for counsel learned in the law to be assigned you?

Lilburne. I will tell you presently, my lord; in the Italian history of a nobleman of Italy, and otherwise, I have read and heard of Gustavus Adolphus, that valiant and wise late king of Sweden; that although he was a most expert soldier, yet in all difficulty and knotty enterprizes that he did endeavour to undertake, he would call all his able, discreet and understanding officers together. And because, as Solomon saith, two is better than one, and a three fold-cord is not easily broken; he would advise and consult with them all: But yet, being he was; and did apprehend himself most concerned, and had the far greatest stock to adventure in the affair he went about, he would not absolutely be tied up in every punctilio to their advice; but being a very wise, righteous, just, and withal valiant man, it is therefore said of him, when he had heard with mature deliberation all their advices, he would after that, with a serious consultation with his own reason and understanding, draw his own inferences and conclusions, and with mettle and gallantry put them only in execution. Even so, my lord, my life being at stake, although I have a little competency of understanding, and mettle enough to execute a thing; yet being I am ignorant of the punctilios, formalities or practice part of the law; and being that the Scripture saith, 'Woe to him that is alone, for two is better than one, and a three-fold cord is not easily broken;' on these considerations I am desirous to consult with learned counsel in the law, especially since it is my right by law so to do. But I do assure you, my lord, seeing God hath endowed me with a good proportion of judgment and understanding to discern of things, and seeing my adventure is abundantly the greatest, I will not absolutely be tied up to follow my counsel's advice in all things, neither will I do it, unless I like it very well; but in most knotty, difficult and high cases, that is not safe for them too deeply to engage in, for fear of their own ruin, and my absolute inability in any proportionable measure to requite them; I will therefore draw my inference and conclusions from their advice and counsel, and manage them myself in my own way, for the safety and preservation of my own life. And therefore, my lord, I pray you again to accept of my Exceptions under my own hand, without any more ado, that so we may speedily come to some issue of this tedious, jangling business.

Recorder. Mr. Lilburne, I tell you again, the Court will not, nor cannot receive your Exceptions without being signed by your counsel; and therefore to enable you to procure their hands, we will give you an order at large, that so you may be fully ready by six o'clock.

Lilburne. My lord, I pray deliver the order speedily to my father there in Court, lest it be never so little delayed, my counsel be all gone out of town.

Which being by the court assented unto, the copy of the Order thus followeth.

'London: At the gaol-delivery of Newgate, July 16, 1653. Mr. Serjeant Glyne, Mr. Serjeant Earle, Mr. Maynard, Mr. Hale, Mr. Twisden, Mr. Wilde, Mr. Chute, Mr. Norbury, and Mr. Webb, are by this Court assigned of counsel, with John Lilburne, gent. to perfect his plea in law, and deliver the same under the hands of them, or one of them, before six of the clock this day in the afternoon. SADLER.'

Whereupon the Prisoner withdrew to his lodging, and being brought to the bar about six o'clock at night, Mr. Lee, the clerk of the Court, pressed very hard to him, answer and plead to the Indictment, Guilty or Not Guilty; besides whom, stepped up another gentleman in the Court, and he in a mumbling manner prest something, as hard as his slender abilities would enable him. Whereupon Mr. Lilburne demanded to know of the Lord-Mayor, what that newly-come gentleman was, that was so far afraid to speak out his mind, that he could not understand what he said. Whereupon answer was returned, it was Mr. Hall, the attorney of the Dutchy, who was comethither to be a prosecutor for the State or Commonwealth.

But Mr. Lilburne's chiefest business being with the Court, he accordingly applied himself to the Lord Mayor.

My lord, I desire to give your honour a true and real account of all my transactions, since I was last before you, which is this; You may remember at my being last at the bar, I told you, I did verily believe my counsel were all upon the point of going out of town; in which regard I earnestly intreated you without more delay to deliver your order to my father, that so he might not fall short of getting to my counsel before they were gone; but, my lord, at my departure from the bar, as soon as I came to my lodging, I all on post-haste dispatched my cousin-germans, George and William Lilburne, to Mr. Norbury, who they found just ready to mount on horseback, to be gone out of town, and acquaint him by word of mouth, with the order the Court had made, to assign him my counsel at large: and he was pleased, without any delay, in his riding habit, to hasten to me, and seriously read over my Exceptions, and sign them, and so bid me farewell, and is gone out of town. But, my lord, that which I desire your honour to take notice of, is, That if I had staid till my father came forth of the Court with your Order, I had totally lost Mr. Norbury, and he had absolutely been gone out of town a good while before he could have got to him.

In the second place, having sent my said kinsmen post-haste before to my counsel, as soon as my father came with your Order, I posted him and my brother-in-law away to Mr. Maynard; with whom speaking at his own chamber, they found him sickly and ill, and altogether unfit and unable to come to me, by reason of that little time he had to stay in town, those several things he had to do at his chamber during his staying, and the weakness of his body, and the absolute necessity of his being at a place by a fixed hour, or to run the hazard of losing 600*l.* upon his own score: and if you doubt any thing of this relation, they are here in court to declare the truth of it upon their oaths themselves. But, my lord, though Mr. Maynard could not well come to me, yet he was pleased to stay at his chamber, till my father fetched my papers and Exceptions from me; which, with seriousness reading, he hath also signed them, which I have now in my hand. But, my lords, from both my counsellors, especially Mr. Maynard, I perceive I am very much blamed for my ignorance and folly, in not, when I demanded the Copy of my Indictment, as my right by law, demanding Oyer, or hearing in open court, of the act of parliament, the judgment upon which it is grounded, and the crimes upon which the judgment is grounded; which, I understand from them, should be exemplified under the Great Seal of England, and ought so to be here remaining in Court.

Recorder replied, Mr. Lilburne, we know of no such thing, the records of the acts of parliament are at Westminster, in the clerk of the parliament's hands, and there you may have them.

Lilburne. Good Mr. Recorder, interrupt me not, but let me go on; I say, my counsel tells me, I ought, as my right by law, to have demanded 'Oyer of the said act, judgment and crimes,' and after I had seen them under the broad seal of England, and heard them read in open court, I ought, as my right by law, to have demanded copies of them all three, and they ought not to have been denied me; that so I might have been fully enabled all at once to have returned exceptions at large to the Indictment, the act upon which it is grounded, the judgment upon which the act is grounded, and the crimes, which is the original of all. And if no legal act can be produced, they tell me the Indictment, and all proceedings upon it, are void and null. And they also say, if no legal judgment can be produced, they tell me the act for the execution of it is null, and falls to the ground. And they also say, if no crimes in law can be produced upon which the judgment is legally founded, all is at an end, because what is not good nor sound in its original in law, can never be made so by tract of time; and what is not sound and substantial in its foundation, can never be made so in its fabric or building. But yet, my lord, they say it is not too late for me yet to insist upon the Oyer as my right by law: I confess, my lord, their time would not permit either of them to stay in the town, to draw me up the formal draught of such a claim, much less would it permit them to stay in town till it was engrossed in parchment, that so they might set their hands unto it. But, my lord, according to those legal instructions that I have largely received from my counsel, I have got such a paper formally in law drawn up, and it is here engrossed in parchment, and signed with my own hand. And, my lord, I here tender it unto the court, with two shillings as the clerk's fee, to enter it upon record at his peril. The copy of which Parchment thus followeth:

"At the Sessions of Peace held for the City of London, at Justice-Hall in the Old-Bailly, now sitting this present 16th day of July, 1653.

"The Keepers of the Liberties of England, by Authority of Parliament, against John Lilburne, now Prisoner at the Bar.

"The said John Lilburne, gent. the now prisoner at the bar, supposed to be indicted by that name, brought to the bar, and now appearing in person, having heard the said Indictment read in these words, to wit:

"London ss. The jurors for the Keepers of the Liberties of England, by authority of Parliament upon their oaths do present, that in and by a statute made in the parliament of this commonwealth of England, holden at Westminster in the county of Middlesex, the 30th day of January, in the year of our Lord 1651, intitled,

'An Act for the execution of a judgment given in Parliament against lieut. col. John Lilburne;' and it was enacted by the said parliament, and by the authority of the same, that the said John Lilburne should (within 20 days, to be accounted from the 15th day of January, 1651), depart out of England, Scotland, Ireland, and the islands, territories, and dominions thereof. And in case the said John Lilburne, at any time after the expiration of the said 20 days, to be accounted as aforesaid, should be found, or should be remaining within England, Scotland, Ireland, or within any of the islands, territories, or dominions thereof; the said John Lilburne should be, and was thereby adjudged a felon, and should be executed as a felon, without benefit of clergy.

"And it was also enacted by the authority aforesaid, that all and every person and persons, who should, after the expiration of the said 20 days, wittingly relieve, harbour, or conceal the said John Lilburne, he being in England, Scotland, Ireland, or any the territories, islands, or dominions thereof, should be thereby adjudged accessory of felony after the fact. And all judges, justices, mayors, bailiffs, sheriffs, and all other officers, as well military as civil, in their respective places, are thereby required to be aiding and assisting in apprehending the said John Lilburne, and in putting the said act in due execution, as in and by the said act of parliament appeareth. And that the said John Lilburne, late of London, gentleman, the statute aforesaid not weighing, nor the punishments therein contained any whit fearing, after the expiration of the said 20 days, to be accounted from the said 15th day of January, 1651, as aforesaid; to wit, the 15th day of June, in the year of our Lord 1653, was found, and was feloniously remaining within England aforesaid; that is to say, at London, to wit, in the parish of Giles without Cripplegate, in the ward of Cripplegate, London aforesaid, against the form of the statute aforesaid, and against the public peace, &c.

SALLER."

Which being heard and read, he saith, that it appears by the said Indictment, that he stands indicted by the name of John Lilburne of London, gentleman, by virtue of an Act of parliament made the 30th day of January, 1651, grounded upon a supposed judgment given in parliament against him the said John, or lieutenant-colonel John Lilburne, for several crimes and misdemeanors therein contained. And therefore he the now prisoner at the bar, doth humbly pray Oyer, or hearing of the said act, judgment, and supposed crimes mentioned in the said act, according to law, and under the Great Seal of England, to enable him to plead therunto. And he will ever pray for your honours and bench.

JOHN LILBURNE.

Which being handed into the Court, Mr. Recorder looked upon it, and said, Mr. Lilburne, this is not signed under your counsel's hand; the thing that we expect is, your Exceptions signed by your counsel: what call you this parchment?

Lilburne. I know not, Sir, what more properly to call it, than my legal demand of Oyer, or hearing in open court the Act of parliament upon which the indictment is grounded, and the judgment upon which the act is grounded, and the crimes which is the foundation of all. And, Sir, let me tell you, my counsel commands me to insist, and dwell upon the demand of Oyer as my right, and as the chiefest shield and buckler I have to defend my life: for they say, if no legal crimes can be produced upon which the judgment was grounded, all is at an end, and there can be no more proceedings against me. And I am sure, there can be no felonious crimes in law produced against me, for I never committed any in all my days, never was any legally so much as pretended to be laid unto my charge: therefore, my lord, as my birthright, and inheritance, I demand the benefit of the law, which is Oyer, or hearing of the Act, judgment, and crimes. But the Recorder, the Lord Mayor, and several others endeavoured to interrupt him.

Whereupon he cried out again and again, My lord, rob me not of my birthright, the benefit of the law, but let me have Oyer; which again and again I demand as my right, and inheritance. [But four or five in the court again interrupting him, viz. the Lord-Mayor, Mr. Recorder, Mr. Attorney-General Prideaux, and mumbling Mr. Hall;] my lord, rob me not of my birthright, the benefit of the law, nor interrupt me not, but give me free liberty to speak for my life. And, my lord, if you will be so audacious and unjust in the face of this great auditory of people, to deny me, and rob me of all the rules of justice and right, and will forcibly stop my mouth, and not suffer me freely to speak for my life according to law, I will cry out and appeal to the people, and do cry out, and appeal to all the people that hear me this day, how that my lord-mayor, and this court, by violence rob me of my birthright by law, and will not suffer me to speak for my life. [At which the court being in a great heat and rage, Mr. Recorder sent the prisoner his parchment, and money out of the court again; but he would have none of it, but commanded the clerk again to receive it, and enter it upon record at his peril.]

Mr. Attorney-General Prideaux being very busy to hold the prisoner to questions to insnare himself, as whether he was that John Lilburne meant, and intended in the Indictment and Act, or no, and to stave him off from pursuing his just demand of Oyer; which the Prisoner perceiving, falls upon the said Mr. Prideaux to this effect:

My lord; I had thought the other day I had said enough to have silenced that gentleman at this place; but, my lord, seeing he will needs be doing, and speaking, I beseech you, my lord, let me desire to be satisfied, and to know in what capacity that gentleman is here at this place; for I am sure, my lord, he is no judge of the law, nor no citizen, and therefore cannot, as a justice of peace, sit upon the bench as one of my judges. And, my lord, if he be my prosecutor, as he is Attorney-General, he can be no more; and if so, my lord, it is an amazement to me, that your lordship and the court will so dishonour yourselves, as to suffer a bare prosecutor to sit amongst you upon the bench, as one of the chiefest of you, with his hat on his head. My lord, do that which becomes you, and thrust him down to the bar, and there let him (as I do) stand with his hat in his hand, and know his office and duty, and prate there. But, my lord, whether he sits as my judge, or my prosecutor, he is no competent man to be in either place; because, my lord, he is legally an impeached traitor, by one esq. Elliot, now prisoner in Newgate; who, my lord, avows to me, that he hath long since, before the Lord Chief-Justice Rolls, and the rest of the judges of the Upper-Bench, legally and formally in law exhibited a charge of high-treason against him; which he avows the court hath accepted of, and recorded as formal in law, and required of him to enter into great bonds to prosecute it, and make it good: and, my lord, here is a duplicate of the said charge of high-treason, which the esquire's own hand gave unto me as a true copy. And besides, my lord, he further vows to me, that the Attorney-General, by reason of his late power and greatness in parliament, the said Attorney-General stands out in contempt, and scorn of the law, and neither will, nor dare answer his said charge of high-treason; in which regard of his contempt of the law of England, through his own acknowledged guilt thereby, he hath almost brought him at law to be outlawed as a traitor: which he avows, as soon as it is perfected, whenever he can meet the said Attorney-General, and apprehend him, he will without any more ado execute him as a traitor.

In all which regards, my lord, I do avow Mr. Attorney-General, in law, to be altogether uncompetent, either for my judge, or prosecutor, or any man's else whatsoever; or so much as to be at liberty, to converse with the honest and untainted people of England till he hath yielded conformity to the law, and answered to his said charge of high-treason. [Unto which Mr. Recorder seemed to make some answer in the Attorney-General's behalf, which the penman hereof not well hearing, cannot set down.]

But Mr. Recorder fell upon the prisoner, and told him how he had trifled away the time of that court, and had had more favour than any prisoner ever had.

Mr. Lilburne endeavouring to reply, the Court over and over again and again interrupted him; but he would go on, and crying out, said to this effect: Mr. Recorder, I wonder you are not ashamed to tax me with trifling away time; when it is only yourself and the Court that are truly guilty of it, in making me spend my lungs and my spirits for two or three days together, to plead and contest with you, before you would grant me that which is so absolutely my right by law, as a copy of my Indictment is: so that, sir, with your favour, it is you that trifle away time, and not I. And whereas you say, I have had more favour then ever prisoner had; I wonder, Mr. Recorder, you are not ashamed so to say; for what favour at all have I had, when I have not yet enjoyed so much as the law allows me? Sir, let me tell you, the learned men of the law, the Lord Chief Justice Rolles, and the judges of the King's or Upper Bench, allowed the lord Macguire, that arch bloody Irish Rebel and Traitor who was indicted before them for his life, a thousand times more favour than you do me: for although his crimes were notoriously wicked, even in the eye of the common or known law of England, and obvious and perspicuous almost to the sight of every eye, yet when he made, as my information hath often told me, but one single exception in a punctilio, or formality about his peerage, against his Indictment, the judges assigned him learned Counsel in the Law, to plead it, and time enough for him and them to study and frame their arguments in law upon it.

Mr. Recorder. Mr. Lilburne, you tell us much of the advice your counsel has given you about the Oyer, can you shew us their advice under their hands?

Lilburne. Yes, sir, that I can.

Recorder. Well, produce it.

Lilburne. Sir, do ye mean to the point of the Oyer?—Recorder. Yes.

Lilburne. Well then, sir, it may be as to the punctilio of a word I have mistaken you; but I am sure I have it under one of their hands, and two witnesses at the bar to depose it upon oath, that the other expressly advised it, as the main essential thing to my life and well-being.

Recorder. Mr. Lilburne, for all your pretence of integrity, the auditors may take notice, that you aver a falsehood in the open Court that you are not able to make good.

Lilburne. In the midst of those many and eager interruptions that I meet with from three or four of you at a time, it is easy for a stronger memory than mine, to let a slip fall in the punctilio of a word; but, sir, to the utmost of my disparagement, and disadvantage, make the worst of it you can; and see what it can amount unto. For in the first place, I do avow with my life, that I saw Mr. Norbury, with his own hand, write these very words upon the back of the Copy of the Indictment, which is here in my hands, and are as followeth:

'Mr. Lilburne ought to see the Certiorari, and the return of the Certiorari; and if the Act be certified without the judgment, which is recited therein, all is invalid for the Commonwealth.'

Mr. Steele was pleased to spend some time upon cavilling at Mr. Lilburne's mispronouncing the word Certiorari; although he had formerly told the Recorder, he neither understood Latin, nor French, nor could well read either of them. And then he told them, that most lawyers hands were very ill to read by persons that were not well acquainted with them; but, Sir, saith he, here is Mr. Norbury's own hand, and I do avow it upon my life for a truth that my eyes saw his own hand and pen write it.

Secondly, If my memory mistake not, I have Mr. Maynard's hand to the same thing also: in those instructions that Mr. Maynard under his hand sent me, by my father and brother this day, both of whom are here present in Court, upon their oaths to justify, that if it be not plainly expressed under his hand, that by word of mouth, it was the principal instruction he gave unto them, to give unto me to insist upon, as my right, to demand the Oyer, &c. But, Sir, as for the Paper itself, there it is, read it: which paper followeth in these words:

'It said, that 'John Lilburne the 15th of 'June, 1653, was found, and was feloniously 'remaining in England.' This is insufficient, 'for it is not said that he was feloniously found; 'so that the being found in England is not laid 'within the Indictment. Secondly, 'And was 'feloniously remaining;' it should be said, was 'then and there feloniously remaining. So 'there is no Felony charged in his being found. 'There is no time charged of that which is laid 'as a Felony. John Maynard, the 16th of 'July, 1653.'

And by way of postscript in the same hand, there are these words, 'That the Prisoner at 'the Bar is to desire, that he may have counsel 'to plead his Exceptions.' And in the same paper, in somewhat a different hand, there are these very words, 'I pray the Oyer of the Act 'of Parliament the Indictment is grounded 'upon; pray enter it upon record, accept of no 'copy but the sight of the record under the 'Broad Seal.' Which paper the Recorder reading, and seriously viewing, said, Mr. Lilburne, this paper will not reach your purpose; for those lines that seem to be Mr. Maynard's, are not home to the thing in hand, and those lines that are for your purpose are in a quite different hand.

Lilburne. Well, Mr. Recorder, it matters not much, for I am sure the paper is not in the least of my writing; for I had it as it is from my brother, that I sent to Mr. Maynard with my father about my business, and I am sure it either all is Mr. Maynard's hand, or my brother's; who writ down from the words of Mr. Maynard's own mouth, those instructions that he gave unto him and my father for me to dwell and insist upon, and to venture and cast my life upon. There they both are, I pray administer unto them both their oaths, that they may freely speak before the Court, what Mr. Maynard said unto them in this particular point about the Oyer, &c.

Whereupon old Mr. Richard Lilburne, the prisoner's father, with his son-in-law Mr. Thomas Gore, began to speak, and to justify what the Prisoner had alledged; but the court interrupted them, and commanded them to be silent, and would not let them go on. But Mr. Re-condemner, taking liberty to speak as long and as often as he pleased, took the liberty several times to calumniate, and render odious the Prisoner at the Bar, for averring a falsehood in the open Court: and so sometimes did the Lord Mayor also, although his honour was pleased to shew Mr. Lilburne a printed Petition a day or two before, and did solemnly in the face of all the Court aver, that the woman, pointing to Mrs. Dormer, then a Prisoner at the Bar, had avowed that she had the said printed Petition, and others of the same kind, from Mr. Lilburne. Upon which the said Mrs. Dormer openly cried out, That's false, my lord, I never said any such thing in my life.

Upon these furious hurley-burleys, that happened betwixt the Lord Mayor, Mr. Recorder, the Attorney General, and mumbling Mr. Hall the Attorney of the Dutchy, and Mr. Lilburne Prisoner at the bar; Mr. Lilburne's father and his brother-in-law Mr. Gore, and one Mr. Thomas Haws, but especially Mr. Thomas Prince, pressed to speak; but could not be permitted, but were again and again interrupted and silenced.

But Mr. Prince pressed hard on, and told the Lord Mayor to this purpose; That it was the known law of England, that any by-stander whatsoever might speak for the prisoner's benefit at the bar, especially when they apprehended the prisoner was like to be wronged, and denied his birthright, the benefit of the law; and this privilege, my lord, by order of the Court, you have granted me, and other of Mr. Lilburne's friends as our right by law, to speak in his behalf, when we see things urged against him against reason and right; and therefore, my lord, the thing that Mr. Lilburne demands about his Oyer, or hearing read the act of parliament, upon which the Indictment is grounded, and the judgment upon which the act is grounded, and the crimes that ought to be the original of all, is so essentially his right, that it is an amazement to me to see it disputed: and also it is a wonder to me, that any man that pretends so much as to know the very first rudiments, or the very first footsteps of the law, as Mr. Recorder doth, should endeavour to deny such a thing so commonly practised in every ordinary court of justice, in the case of every ordinary bond and bill that a suit is commenced upon.

The Court with violence and fury interrupting him, and silencing him; and Mr. Recorder commanding the prisoner at the bar at his peril to deliver in his Exceptions before it was too late to receive them, and Mr. Hall mumblingly pressing again and again to pass sentence of condemnation upon him; and the Attorney General upon the bench closely pressing to hold him to the point, and not let the prisoner have any elbow-room to go from it; and Mr. Lee, the Clerk of the Court, (like a most detestable tyrant) pressing to gag the prisoner at the bar, that so he should speak no more, and immediately pass sentence of condemnation upon him, and take him away: the Prisoner clearly perceiving the violence and fury of the Court, with an extreme, earnest, ardent and fierce, and shrill loud voice, cried out;

'My lord, will you murder me without right of law, by robbing me of my birthright, and denying me of Oyer, which is as much my right by law, as the blood that runs in my veins? My lord, are you afraid, and ashamed to produce that Act of Parliament upon which you pretend to ground your Indictment, upon which you would take away my life? My lord, if you thus proceed, you will give me and the people cause to believe, that there never was such an Act of Parliament as you pretend, nor such a Judgment as it pretends to be the executor of; nor no such crime ever committed or acted, as any judgment of felony can be imagined to be grounded upon; but that rather all your proceedings against me, from first to last, is a malicious packed conspiracy against me to murder me, and without ground or cause to take away my life. For whose life have I feloniously taken away, or endangered? And if none of all these things in the least can be laid unto my charge, or never were, where is the act of felony that I have committed, upon which I am endeavoured to be hanged?'

But the officers crying out, 'Hear the Court;' and the said mumbling Mr. Hall still singing his pitiful ill-tuned song of pressing for Judgment against the prisoner; and so many of the Court fell upon him at once, to deliver in his Exceptions before it was too late, as made the proceedings of the Court full of confusion.

Mr. Lilburne. My lord, I may not part with my Exceptions till my demand of Oyer be read. My lord, my able and honest counsel, both of them, in both of whom I have found a great deal of faithfulness and truth to me, have commanded me to dwell upon my demand of Oyer, as upon my life, and as upon a thing that is my undoubted right by law, that cannot, nor ought not to be denied me. My lord, the security of my life lies in it; and if it be granted me, I am for ever out of all danger of gunshot, because it is possible you cannot produce one line of a legal Act of Parliament, nor one syllable of a legal Judgment, nor, I am sure of it, so much as any shadow of pretence of a legal crime of felony to be the foundation of all: and if so, they tell me absolutely all your proceedings against me are at an end, and I am safe and secure. Therefore, my lord, I again and again press, to leave the Court without excuse, and do demand before all these people Oyer, or hearing of the Act, Judgment and Crimes upon which your Indictment is grounded, as a thing that is as much my right by law, as the blood that runs in my veins: therefore, my lord, deny it me not.

'Mr. Lilburne,' saith the Recorder, 'it is late, and we cannot spend much more time about your business; and the Court hath already told you, they neither will nor can receive in your parchment for Oyer, without your Counsel sign it.'

Mr. Lilburne. Alas, Sir, I have dealt fairly fully and truly with you, and told you, that it is drawn up by their instructions: but really and truly they were both gone out of London, before pen could be put to paper to draw the rough draught of it; and therefore it was impossible to get their hands to the ingrossed copy. Wherefore I beseech the Court to give me time but till Monday morning, and I will send after them for their hands; and engage not only to get their hands to the parchment, but to bring one or both of them to this bar, to justify their instructions to me, and that their instructions are law. Therefore, my lord, be pleased to grant me but till Monday morning, and I will have them here, although I borrow money to send two coaches with six horses a-piece to fetch them back.

Lord Mayor. No, the Court breaks up to-night, and therefore we cannot give you till Monday.

Recorder. Mr. Lilburne, seeing you insist so stiffly upon it for your Oyer, I will tell you what we will do with you: put in your Exceptions to-night, which you have under your counsel's hands, and the Court will assure you that in case your counsel at our next meeting about your business, will avow that your parchment for the demand of Oyer is law, we will grant it you; and your putting in your Exceptions now, shall be no prejudice to you in any kind.

Mr. Lilburne endeavouring to speak, to close with him, several of his honest and true friends that stood by him, cried out, 'There was a snare laid for him, and bid him rather die than go an inch from his counsel's honest, just, and safe instructions. At which the Court grew very angry, and judgment again began to be pressed against the prisoner at the bar: and the Court required the Exceptions, without any more ado, to be delivered in.

Lilburne. Well then, my lord, seeing I have done my utmost to obtain my right by law, which is to have the Oyer of the act, judgment, and crimes, upon which the Indictment is grounded, and it will not be granted me, but the Court hath over-ruled me; therefore, my lord, to let all the world know that I am no bawler, nor procrastinator of time, nor have any thing of guilt, fear or dread within me, although it be never so much to my wrong, and tend never so much to my apparent disadvantage or my ruin, I will close with Mr. Recorder, and immediately deliver in the Exceptions that I have in my hand already, signed by my counsel as a part of my Exceptions; provided he will distinctly repeat over the promise of the Court, and enter it upon record in the Court's books, and order the clerk immediately to draw up an order upon it, as large as it is in itself, and give it me legally signed before I stir from the bar.

'No,' saith Mr. Recorder Steele, 'Mr. Lilburne, the doing of that that you require, would take up too much time, and therefore the Court cannot do it: but they will make good what I have said unto you.'

Whereupon, Mr. Lilburne repeated what Mr.

Recorder (in the name of the Court) had promised, and said, Sir, is not this that the Court will stand to? Yes, saith the Recorder. Then, Sir, I beseech you, in the audience of all these people, (that they may hear witness) repeat it over again yourself. Which he did: and Mr. Lilburne closed with him, and accordingly delivered in his Exceptions. And at his coming to his lodging, some of his friends drew up the promise of the Court in writing, and set their hands to it; which thus followeth:

"That if Mr. Lilburne would deliver in the copy of his Exceptions, the not granting at this time his Oyer should be no prejudice to him. And further, That the Court was to consider of a time to have the Exceptions debated by counsel: and if the counsel of John Lilburne, gent. when they came to plead to the Exceptions, conceived it necessary and right to have the Oyer, that then it should be granted him, before any proceeding upon the Exceptions should be, as if the Exceptions were not delivered into the Court. Witness, Richard Lilburne, George Wade, Thomas Webbe, George Lilburne, jun. William Lilburne."

Lilburne. My lord, I here deliver your lordship and this honourable Court, part of my Exceptions under my own and my counsellor's hands: but my lord, I have many more to make, when I shall hear the Oyer, and have copies of the act, judgment, and crimes, according to my right, that your Indictment is grounded upon. And then spoke as follows:

My lord; I have given into the Court my demand for Oyer, fairly ingrossed in parchment under my hand, and part of my Exceptions against the Indictment, which are very difficult points in law, and beyond my reading and skill fully to argue, and therefore I must depend upon my learned counsel for that.

It was never denied the worst of Traitors to have copies of their Indictments, and counsel to argue the points of law for them. The lord Macguire, the great bloody rebel of Ireland, indicted for Treason lately at the Upper Bench, had his counsel to argue before the learned judges thereof, when he was indicted for High Treason, and spent much time only about his title of baron. Duke Hamilton, lord Capel of late, and the lord Castlehaven formerly, were never denied it, nor the earl of Strafford: yet all these persons were tried for facts that were crimes in the common law, for treachery, and bloodshed, and foul offences, such as the law of nature forbids and abhors (and had laws made before their facts to be their guide.) But my only crimes are, that my name is John Lilburne, and that I am in England, my native country: and the matter of law that rose in their cases was only upon the formality of the Indictment of charges against them, and consequently less need of serious arguments in law; yet the law is so tender of blood and life, that it takes away advantage from any man whose life is in question or danger.

But, my lord, I beseech you consider the difficulty of my case; the very crimes whereof I am accused, have no foundation in the common law, I am only accused for being in my native country; and the pretended law against me lays no crime to my charge: I have wronged no man in his property; I have designed no evil against my country; I have hurt no man in his liberty, nor life, nor member.

The very crime laid to my charge, may be called a point of law: it is supposed to arise upon the breach of a pretended act of parliament, so that it is not in matter of form, or in the formality, or nicety of proceedings against me, that the point in law arises in my case; it is about the nature of the crime itself whereof I am accused, and therefore counsel learned in the law is more necessary in my case, deliberately and maturely to argue it before all the learned judges of the law in England, than in any case that hath been tried in England this 500 years; here is no light to lead my judges in their judgment, but the very light of the law itself, being a strange kind of single act made in a strange kind, or unknown and unheard-of manner. Here is no precedent, no example to help them; the like cause, I dare avow it, was never tried in England before, and all England, and their posterities, yea the babes in their mothers wombs, are concerned in the event of my trial. Whatsoever is the issue of my trial, will hereafter be drawn into a precedent, either for the good or evil of all the people of England. Besides, the shedding of my blood without cause or reason, must needs bring guilt, punishment, and misery upon the causers and permitters thereof. Remember righteous Abel's case, Naboth and Uriah; therefore I hope much caution will be used in determining the difficult points of law in my case. My lord, not for my own sake, for the sparing of my blood, though I am bound to preserve it, if I can, by the great law of nature; yet, my lord, if my life were only at the stake, I could counten it, if I saw my contempt of it might serve my country, and restore it to its liberty and freedom. But when the liberties of millions of persons already in being, and yet unborn, which consist and subsist in being ruled by written laws and rules: when these are at the stake, I hope the difficulties of the law in this case, shall be seriously weighed, and solemnly debated by the most experienced men in the law in the whole nation.

The copy of the fore-recited Exceptions thus followeth:

THE EXCEPTIONS of John Lilburne, Gent. Prisoner at the Bar, to a Bill of Indictment preferred against him, grounded upon a pretended Act, intituled, 'An Act for the Execution of a Judgment given in Parliament against Lieut.-Col. John Lilburne;' which Judgment is by the said Act supposed to be given the 15th day of January, 1651.

The said John Lilburne, prisoner at the bar, saith, That the said Indictment is insufficient, in the law, in matter, substance and form. And he humbly offereth these Exceptions following against the same.

Exception 1. For that the said Indictment is grounded only upon an act intituled, 'An Act for the Execution of a Judgment given in Parliament against lieut. col. John Lilburne.' And it doth not appear, either by the title of the said act recited in the Indictment, or by any thing contained in the said act, that either the said act itself is an act of parliament of the Commonwealth of England, or of the parliament sitting at Westminster; or that the said supposed judgment, for the execution whereof the said act is supposed to provide, was given in the parliament for the Commonwealth of England, or in the parliament sitting at Westminster? nor yet when the said parliament did commence or end, or whether the same was held by prorogation or otherwise. And it is evident in law, that no law could at that time be made, but by the parliament of the Commonwealth of England; for by the law then in being, the power of making laws was only in those persons which were known and distinguished by that title of the Parliament of the Commonwealth of England; and in that name only addresses were made to them, both by the people of England, and by all foreign states and princes, and all addresses refused that wanted that title. Now for ought that appears in the said act, whereupon the said Indictment is grounded, it may be as well an act of parliament in France, or Scotland, or Naples, as an act of the parliament of the Commonwealth of England; so that it doth not appear, that the said Indictment is grounded upon any law of England; or that John Lilburne, prisoner at the bar, is indicted for any fact that is a crime by any law of England, and then the same is void in law.

Exception 2. The said Indictment is grounded upon the fore-recited act, intituled, 'An Act for the Execution of a Judgment given in Parliament against lieut.-col. John Lilburne;' and so relates only to some judgment supposed to be given in parliament against the said lt. col. John Lilburne; and if no such judgment were given, the act were void, and the judgment also. Now it doth not appear that any judgment, for any crime whatsoever, was given in parliament against the said lieut.-col. John Lilburne.

1. Before any judgment can be given in law against any Englishman, for any crime, there must be either an Indictment, presentment, or some information or accusation against him, to that court that judgeth him, for some crime supposed to be committed by him.
2. The party accused must either appear before that court, or be out-lawed for not appearing.
3. If the party appears, he must either confess the crimes or misdemeanors whereof he is accused, or else plead to the indictment, presentment, or information, or accusation against him, and come to trial thereupon. And as some of these ought in law to precede a judgment against any Englishman, so also some of these afore-mentioned proceedings, in order to a lawful judgment, ought to be entered upon such record, wherein any such judgment is entered; and unless it doth appear upon the record, wherein any judgment is entered against any Englishman for any crime, that some such proceeding as abovesaid, hath been made before the judgment passed against him, the judgment is to be holden for erroneous and void, and ought so to be reputed. Now it doth not appear either by the said pretended act, as it is recited in the indictment, nor by any record of the supposed judgment produced, nor any otherwise, that there was any indictment, presentment, or information to the parliament of the Commonwealth of England against the said lieutenant-col. John Lilburne; or if there were, it doth not appear, that he ever appeared to the same, nor that he was ever outlawed for not appearing; neither doth any pleading by the said lieutenant-col. John Lilburne to any such indictment or information appear, nor any trial of him for the same. And therefore if any such pretended judgment be entered, as the said supposed act, and the Indictment of John Lilburne, prisoner at the bar, thereupon, doth relate unto, the same is erroneous and void in law; and by consequence the said indictment is void.

Exception 3. The said Indictment is erroneous and insufficient in law, for that it is only grounded upon, and recites an act, which act is declared to be made for the execution of a judgment passed in parliament against lieutenant-col. John Lilburne, the 15th day of January, 1651; when in truth there was no such judgment, either in matter or form, passed in parliament on the said 15th day of January, 1651, as is enacted by the said supposed act, to be executed against the said lieutenant-col. John Lilburne; and as is also recited in the said indictment, to be enacted by the said act, to be put in execution against him. First, There was no judgment passed in parliament upon the said 15th of January, 1651, that the said lieutenant-col. John Lilburne should depart out of England within twenty days, after the said 15th day of January, 1651, as is mentioned in the said indictment. Secondly, There was no Judgment passed in parliament, upon the said 15th day of January, 1651, that the said lieutenant-col. John Lilburne should depart out of England, Scotland and Ireland, or the islands, territories, or dominions thereof, within any limited time whatsoever, or under any penalty whatsoever, as is mentioned in the said Indictment. Thirdly, There never was any Judgment passed in parliament, the said 15th day of January, 1651, that the said lieutenant-col. John Lilburne should be executed as a felon, without benefit of clergy, in case the said lieutenant-col. John Lilburne should be found, or be remaining in England, Scotland, or Ireland, after the expiration of twenty days, or any other time whatsoever, to be accounted from the said 15th day of January, 1651. And if no such Judgment doth appear to have been passed against the said lieutenant-col. John Lilburne, as is aforesaid, and as is recited by the said Indictment, to be enacted to be put in execution against him; then the original ground of the said Indictment is null and void: Which is a Judgment supposed to be passed in parliament against the said lieutenant-col. John Lilburne, in matter, substance, and form, as aforesaid, upon the 15th day of January, 1651, which is enacted by the said act recited in the said Indictment to be put in execution: whereas no such Judgment ever passed; and therefore cannot be supposed or admitted by the law to be enacted to be put in execution: And upon these reasons and causes the prisoner at the bar conceives the said indictment to be insufficient in the law.

Exception 4. The said John Lilburne further excepts against the said Indictment, as insufficient in the law, in regard of the uncertainty of the same; the law requiring all allegations against any man to be certain; for that the said Indictment doth recite and ground itself upon an act, made for the execution of a Judgment passed in parliament against lieutenant-col. John Lilburne; and then chargeth John Lilburne, late of London, Gentleman, to have been found in England; that is to say, in London, contrary to the said act: but averreth not that the said John Lilburne, now prisoner at the bar, indicted by the name of John Lilburne, late of London, Gentleman, is one and the self-same person, with the said lieutenant-col. John Lilburne, meant and intended by the said act; and not other or divers: by reason whereof, and for that there are several persons known and distinguished by the name of John Lilburne, of London, Gentleman. And for that the said John Lilburne, prisoner at the bar, doth not acknowledge that he now is, or at the making of the said act, or passing the said supposed judgment, was a lieutenant-colonel, or that he could be notified and distinguished by that title; he, the said John Lilburne, prisoner at the bar, cannot join any certain issue with the Keepers of the Liberties of England upon the said Indictment. For the said Indictment not averring the said John Lilburne, now prisoner at the bar, to be the same person, and not other, or diverse from that John Lilburne, intended and meant in the said act, and distinguished from all others of the same name, by the title of a lieutenant-colonel; if the prisoner at the bar should plead the general issue of Not Guilty, he should confess himself to be the same John Lilburne, intended by the said act; else he is not concerned to plead to the said Indictment. And by consequence, if the prisoner at the bar should plead Not Guilty to the said Indictment; the only issue to be tried in point of fact between the Keepers of the Liberties of England and the prisoner would be, whether John Lilburne, prisoner at the bar, was found in England, upon the 15th day of June, 1653? and by consequence, the prisoner at the bar, though he be not the person intended by the said act, might be ensnared and condemned as a felon, only because his name is John Lilburne; and if any other John Lilburne should in like manner plead to the said Indictment, he should suffer, because he is called John Lilburne.

For all which errors and insufficiencies in the law, in the said Indictment, Act, and supposed Judgment, appearing, the said John Lilburne, prisoner at the bar, humbly prayeth, that the said Indictment may be quashed; and in case the honourable Court be not fully satisfied in the said errors and insufficiencies of the said Indictment, he prayeth that counsel learned in the law may be assigned him, and a competent time given for him to advise with them, and for them to prepare their arguments upon all the said matters of law. And that the case being of very great difficulty, and much concernment to the liberty of all the people of England; and being a case without any precedent; and the shedding or sparing of innocent blood, depending upon a resolution thereof: he humbly prayeth, that the said difficult points of law, arising upon the case, may be argued before the reverend judges of the law, as hath been accustomed in such cases, that their opinions may be had thereupon.

Signed John Norbury, John Maynard; and presented to, and accepted by the Lord-Mayor, and the honourable Bench, July 16, 1653. JOHN LILBURNE.

But the Court being eager to see the Exceptions, the cryer commanded silence, and to hear the Court, who had commanded their clerk with a low voice to read them the title of the Exceptions amongst themselves. Whereupon, as soon as the prisoner at the bar perceived the Court had heard the title, he desired them to read them all over with an audible voice. But withal, my lord, said he, I beseech you and the Court to take notice, that they are but part of my Exceptions, which the Court hath forced and compelled me to deliver in.

At which the Lord-Mayor was very angry, and said, Mr. Lilburne, you are very much to blame, thus to abuse and scandalize the Court, in saying we have compelled you; you may take your Exceptions again, if you are not free to deliver them in. Give him them again.

Lilburne. No, my lord, I will have none of them: for seeing they are in, they are in; and I will stand to them, and maintain them with my life; and I hope, and doubt not but my honest and learned counsel will back them with strong and irresistible arguments of law. But, my lord, hereafter I shall endeavour to keep the Court close to their promise, made unto me by their mouth, Mr. Recorder about the Oyer: for, my lord, here are witnesses enough of it. But, my lord, whereas you say I have abused the Court, in declaring that they forced and compelled me to deliver in my Exception; my lord, I absolutely deny it, that that averment is any abuse at all to the Court. You know, my lord, you have over-ruled me in point of reading my parchment about the Oyer, and you have ordered me to deliver in my Exceptions to the Indictment, which you know I have averred by law, I ought not to be compelled to, till I have legally the Oyer: so that, my lord, I must yet aver that in the eye of the law you have committed a force and compulsion upon me. But, my lord, I have done with it.

They spent some time in reading the beginning of the Exceptions; which (an observant man might easily see) did very much trouble both the Lord-Mayor and the Recorder. But the Prisoner withdrew; and by several of those that sat nigher the Lord Mayor and Recorder than he stood, he was certainly informed that the Attorney-General (Prideaux), who sat upon the bench, although he would not speak much openly and publicly, yet he constantly, in a whispering or clandestine way, pressed the Court to keep the Prisoner close to the question; 'Whether he was the John Lilburne meant in the Act or no?' and to give him no elbow-room to let him get off it: And that Mr. alderman Atkins was in a pitiful frightened condition, when the Prisoner appealed to the people against their injustice. And that the pitiful alderman most lamentably cried out to colonel Okey, presently to send for some troops of horse, to secure his worshipful person. And that Mr. Lee, the clerk, was extreme earnest to have the Prisoner gagged at the bar, that he should speak no more; and privately pressed very hard, immediately to have him condemned and taken away. And that the Lord-Mayor, at the reading of the title, in which the act is called, 'A pretended Act of Parliament,' said unto the Recorder, We are undone, if we receive in this; for we shall be adjudged betrayers of our trust. And at their reading the first Exception, the Recorder was amazed, and said, he wondered how Mr. Lilburne could get learned men in the law to sign such Exceptions. And the Lord-Mayor asking him, what that Mr. Norbury was whose hand was first to the Exceptions; the Recorder told him, he had lately been a Judge in Wales. My lord, I do not so much wonder at his setting his hand to the Exceptions (for I have known him for many years to be a man of principles something in affinity to Mr. Lilburne); but for Mr. John Maynard, one of the greatest lawyers of England, one of the greatest practitioners of the nation, for him to set his hand to such Exceptions, is that (my lord) amazeth me. For if this very first Exception of Mr. Lilburne's be good in law, then all the late acts of parliament are totally invalidated, as well as that which he speaks against.

Then the Court broke up.

Notwithstanding the strictest enquiry, we cannot find that Lilburne, or his friends, or any one else, ever published the remainder of his Trial. Mr. Whitelock, in his Memorials p. 560, says no more than this. "July 13, 1653, Lieut. Col. Lilburne was arraigned at the sessions in the Old-Bailey, upon the late act for his banishment. July 14. Lieut. Col. Lilburne was brought again to his Trial, but he urged for further time in regard the counsel assigned him refused to appear for him: only serjeant Maynard, who was sick; and he had an order for a copy of his Indictment. July 17, Lilburne was brought to his Trial, but nothing done in his business," and page 563, says, "Aug. 11. Lilburne's Trial proceeded at the Sessions-house. 16th. Mr. Lilburne's Trial at the Sessions-house proceeded. 20th. The Jury found Lilburne Not Guilty; he pleaded long for himself."

Nothing of these three last days Proceedings are printed.

In a Book entitled "Lieut. Col. John Lilburne Tried and Cast, or his Case and Craft discovered," 4to, 1653, is recited some of his speeches at his Trial, and animadversions on them; which shews that the Colonel made a notable Defence. His speeches, as mentioned in that book, page 125, &c. are as follow:

Concerning the act whereupon he was indicted, this he said; It was a lye and a falsehood: an act that hath no reason in it, no law for it; it was done as Pharoah did; Resolved upon the question, that all the male children should be murdered. That if he died upon this Act, he died upon the same score that Abel did, being murdered by Cain. That the act was a void act, a printed thing, there being no one punctilio or clause in it, grounded on the law of England, and that it was an unjust, unrighteous, and treacherous act, and that he doubted not to shatter that act in pieces. That they could not make an act of parliament, since the king's head was cut off. By the same law they voted him to death, they might vote his honest twelve Jurymen.

He said, The parliament, before the king's head was cut off, and the members taken out, were in their purity a gallant parliament, who were tender of the liberties and welfare of the nation, and walked in the steps of their ancestors and fore-fathers; then were the days of their virginity, they made good and righteous laws, and then they had no force upon them. But since 1640, and 1641, there have been no good laws made.

He affirms, that it was no lawful parliament that made that act. Again, the parliament that made this act of banishment was no parliament. I will prove it: And the parliament was rather transgressors than I. Again, admit the parliament legal, they had no power to send for me. If there were any judicatory in parliament, it was the Lords-house, not the Commons.

As for all parliaments in general, he said parliaments were a delegated power, and ought to give a reason of all they do; and that it was not in their power (as he had proved in his plea at large, before the Lord Chief Justice Rolls and Mr. Justice Bacon, May 18, 1647;) nor had they the least jurisdiction, to sentence him, or any of the least free-born Englishman; unless it be their own members. That all crimes whatever were to be heard, determined, and judged at the Common-law, and no where else. Acts of Attainder were not lawful.

Speaking to the Lord Mayor; This is the strangest thing (saith he) that ever I saw, that a man must be cheated of his life. Good my Lord Mayor, you have made yourself a party in my case, and taken a wrong John Lilburne; and if you do not make me hang, you are afraid of yourself. You make the land groan under your burthens and oppressions; I desire you will not deny me my right, that I may not lose my life in the resolve of a question; That John Lilburne shall be hanged; which in time may come to murder your posterity, and the posterity of those that hear me this day.

He told the lord Keble, that he had nothing to do to judge him, being a party, and had a salary of 1,000*l.* per annum from the State.

To Mr. Prideaux, Attorney General, he said, You are a blood-thirsty man, and you come here to justify your unrighteous act; and I hope the Jury will take notice of all your violence. It is the admiration of my soul, that he should be a judge in his own case; to have a man sit as my judge that thirstest after my blood.

He said, that the army (many of them) have been very good instruments for the good of the nation, to deliver us from tyranny: I wish there is not a greater than they delivered us from.

For the Jury, he called them his honourable Jury, and said they were the Keepers of the Liberties of England; and will make it appear that the Jury are the Judges of the Law, as well as of the Fact.

Moreover he charged them to consider, Whether if I die on the Monday, the parliament on Tuesday may not pass such a sentence against every one of you twelve; and upon your wives and children, and all your relations; and then upon the rest of this city, and then upon the whole county of Middlesex, and then upon Hertfordshire, and so by degrees there be no people to inhabit England, but themselves? I call Jehovah to witness (saith he), and do here protest before God, Angels and Men, I am not the person intended to be banished by that Act; speaking of the Act whereupon he was indicted.

The Jury having acquitted him were summoned before the Council of State, on the 23d of August, 1653; in pursuance of an Order of parliament, of the 21st, to answer for their conduct. The Examination of which Jury here follows,

The Examination of the JURY* who tried and acquitted Lieutenant Colonel JOHN LILBURNE, at the Sessions-House in the Old-Bailey, upon Saturday the 20th of August, 1653. Taken before the Council of State the 23d of the same Month, in pursuance of an Order of Parliament of the 21st.

Thomas Greene, of Snow-hill, tallow-chandler, Foreman of the Jury, being asked what the grounds and reasons were that moved him to find the said lieut.-col. John Lilburne Not Guilty upon the Indictment preferred against him at the Sessions-house in the Old Bailey, saith, 'That he did discharge his conscience in what he then did, and that he will give no other answer to any questions which shall be asked him upon that matter.'—And being in particular demanded of him, whether he conceived it not sufficiently proved, that the Act whereupon he was indicted was an Act of parliament; whether he was not satisfied that the copy of the Act produced was a true copy of the Act itself, or that the John Lilburne at the bar was the John Lilburne mentioned in the Act; and what other thing it was which moved the Jury to find as aforesaid: the Examinant answered, 'that he will give no other answer, than as abovesaid, and desired that he might be no further pressed therein.'—And being further asked, why he would not give an account of the grounds and reasons of their verdict, he said, 'He would not do it, for reasons best known to himself.'

Michael Rayner, of Friday-street, leather-seller: he saith, That he was one of the Jury that tried lieut.-col. John Lilburne, upon Saturday the 20th instant; and that he was summoned to serve the Jury on Wednesday was sevensnight, and did constantly attend in court, and upon the service, until the Trial was over: and that he was not soli-

Whitelocke Memor. (Feb. 1655-6) 620. "The practice heretofore in use of fining, imprisoning, or otherwise punishing Jurors, merely at the discretion of the court, for finding their verdict contrary to the direction of the judge, was arbitrary, unconstitutional, and illegal; and is treated as such by sir Thomas Smith, two hundred years ago; who accounted 'such doings' to be very violent, tyrannical, and contrary to the liberty and custom of the realm of England." 4 Black. Comm. 361.

"The business of Lilburne is judged and conceived here to be a business of very great consequence; for on the one side Cromwell being so highly set and incensed against him, and on the other side people murmuring so much against such illegal and violent proceedings against the ordinary course and practice, that when one after absolution and sentence given shall be afterwards brought and tried at a higher court of justice, and that the judges shall be summoned to answer and give reasons of their sentence; they say here, that it was one of the heaviest points wherewith my lord Strafford was accused, whereby he came to suffer. There were on Saturday last at his Trial 6,000 men at least, who it is thought, would never have suffered his condemnation to have passed without the loss of some of their lives. To prevent this they had placed two companies of foot soldiers near the place of his Trial, and several companies up and down the streets to the number of three regiments of foot and one of horse; and the country here round about is full of soldiers. The three gentlemen put into the Tower are thought to have kept correspondence with 24, 15, 35. (Lilburne) and that they had some great design in hand, having a great party to back them in favour of the king." 1 Thurloe's State Papers 441. 1 Thurloe, p. 442, Vande Perre to Bruyne, Pensionary of Zealand, dated Westminster. Aug. 26, Sep. 5, 1653. "Lient.-Col. John Lilburne is cleared by a Jury. There were six or seven hundred men at his Trial with swords, pistols, bills, daggers, and other instruments, that in case they had not cleared him, they would have employed in his defence. The joy and acclamation was so great after he was cleared, that the shout was heard an English mile, as is said; but he is not yet released out of prison, and it is thought they will try him at a High Court of Justice."

Same page, Beverning to Ingestall.—"The proceedings against Lilburne, Saturday last, after a pleading of sixteen hours, were determined, and he declared Not Guilty of any crime worthy of death. Since, the twelve jurymen have been called to account before the Council to give an account of their verdict, and in the mean time he remaineth a prisoner. It seems they will charge him with farther crimes of treason, and will judge him by a High Court of Justice. There are two or three others of quality put into the Tower about some plot for the service of the king, and that they should have held correspondence with the said Lilburne."

cited by John Lilburne, nor any other on his behalf. And the questions mentioned in the foregoing Examination being asked him, he answered, 'that he was satisfied in the verdict he gave in that case; and that he should give no other answer thereto.'—And being further pressed therein, he desired that a day's time might be given unto him to consider of it, and he should give satisfaction to the aforesaid questions. He was further asked, who advised him to make this answer to the Council: whereunto he answered, 'That the Jury were all of that mind; and that they agreed to give this answer at a meeting they had all together at the Windmill-tavern in Coleman-street this morning; which meeting they had upon occasion of the Order of Parliament for examining this business: and that he had notice to come to this meeting by one or two of his partners, whose names (he saith) he doth not well know.—And being further demanded of him, Whether Mr. Scobell, clerk of the Parliament, did not give evidence that lieut. col. John Lilburne at the bar was the very Lilburne against whom the act was made? He said he did give that evidence; and that he did believe he said true; and that the copy of the Act of Parliament produced was a true copy: but saith, 'that he and the rest of the Jury took themselves to be Judges of matter of law, as well as matter of fact; although he confessed that the bench did say that they were only judges of the fact.'—He further said, He was very unwilling to be of the Jury.

Thomas Tunman, of Cow Lane, salter, another of lieut.-col. John Lilburne's Jury, who saith that the verdict was Not Guilty. And being asked the questions in the first Examination, he saith, 'That he was sworn to find according to the issue and evidence, and that he did find according to his conscience; and positively refused to give any other answer: and did deny that the Jury, aforesaid, had agreed together to give one and the same answer to the Council, or that they had met together this morning, or at any other time since Saturday-night last, until they came to the Council.' And being asked in particular whether the said Jury did not meet together this morning at the Windmill Tavern in Coleman-street, he positively answered, they did not.

Emanuel Hunt, of St. Sepulchre's; who saith, He was one of John Lilburne's Jury, upon his Trial on Saturday last; and that the Jury found him Not Guilty: but his memory being short, doth not well remember the issue.—He being asked, whether it was not proved that the prisoner was the John Lilburne mentioned in the Act, saith, 'He was not satisfied that it was so proved; and that there are many John Lilburnes; and that John Lilburne was indicted of felony, which he did believe he was not guilty of: and that what was found was done by the consent of all, and did satisfy their consciences therein; and refused to give any other answer than as aforesaid.'—And it being demanded of him, whether the Jury had not met together, to agree of the answer they were to give to the Council, he answered, 'They met together the night of the Trial to drink a pint of wine; and that they met not since until this day.' And being asked what time of the day, he answered, 'Five of them met here.' But being asked particularly, whether they met not at the Windmill Tavern in Coleman-street this morning, he did acknowledge they did, and that Mr. Tunman in particular was there: but refused to declare who gave him notice of this meeting.

James Stephens, of the Old Bailey, haberdasher, who saith, That he was one of lieut.-col. John Lilburne's Jury; and that having considered of the matter whereof he was indicted, they found him Not Guilty. And being asked the questions in the first Examination, he acknowledged, 'That he was satisfied that the prisoner was the John Lilburne mentioned in the act; nor did he yet question the validity of the act: but the Jury having weighed all which was said, and conceiving themselves (notwithstanding what was said by the council and bench to the contrary) to be Judges of law as well as of fact, they found him Not Guilty.'—He acknowledged that all the Jury met this morning at the Windmill Tavern in Coleman-street, to consider what answer to give to the Council, and that the Foreman of the Jury spoke to him to be there, telling him he had heard there was an Order of Parliament for summoning them before the Council: and further saith, That Tunman was at that meeting.

Richard Tomlins, of St. Sepulchre's, bookbinder, who saith he was one of lieut.-col. John Lilburne's Jury; and that the Jury found him Not Guilty. And being asked what was the point in issue, he desired to be excused in that, saying, 'What he can tell, is one thing; but to accuse himself is another thing.' It being further demanded of him, whether he was satisfied that the prisoner was the John Lilburne mentioned in the act, he said he was not. And being asked what made him think so, he answered, 'He was not bound to give any account of what he did in that business, but to God himself.'

William Hitchcock, of Watling-street, woollen-draper; who saith he was of lieut.-col. John Lilburne's Jury, and that the Jury found him Not Guilty. He being asked the questions expressed in the Foreman's Examination, he answered, 'He had discharged his conscience in what he had done; and desireth the council not to ask him any questions, for he can give no other answer, and is resolved to give no other answer.'—And being asked concerning the meeting of the Jury, to agree of an answer to be given to the Council, he first denied that they had any other meeting than what they had the same night his Trial was. But being asked particularly if they met not at the Windmill Tavern in Coleman-street this morning, he as-knowledge they did; 'But denied he heard of any Order of Parliament for sending for the Jury; nor did they meet upon the business of John Lilburne, or that they did at the meeting speak of it: but only met to drink a pint of wine, as they had agreed to do the same night they gave up their verdict.'

Thomas Evershot, of Watling-street, woollen-draper; who saith he was one of John Lilburne's Jury, and that they found him not guilty: But denied to give any answer to any further questions, saying, 'He was satisfied in his own conscience in what he did.' And being asked whether the Jury did not meet this morning, to agree of an answer to be given to the council, denied that they did, or that they met at all since the night of the trial, until they met at the council.

The Persons following were examined the 29th of August, 1653, in the morning.

Thomas Smith, of Cornhill, haberdasher of small wares: he saith he was of John Lilburne's Jury, and found him not guilty. But refused to answer to any other questions; saying, 'He was called to serve his country in this particular; and that he had done it according to the best of his understanding: acknowledged the meeting of the Jury at the Windmill Tavern yesterday morning.'

Gilbert Gayne, of Dunstan's in the West, grocer: He saith he was one of John Lilburne's Jury, and found him not guilty. And he being asked what the issue was, he acknowledged that he was indicted for felony, for coming into England. But saith, 'That the Jury did find as they did, because they took themselves to be Judges of the law, as well as of the fact: and that although the Court did declare they were Judges of the fact only, yet the Jury were otherwise persuaded from what they heard out of the law books.' He confesseth he himself did at first differ from the Jury, but was convinced by their reasons. He confessed the meeting of the Jury.

Griffith Owen, of Bishopsgate Ward, brewer: He acknowledgeth he was of lieut.-col. John Lilburne's Jury, and that they found him not guilty, 'Because he was not satisfied that the prisoner was the John Lilburne mentioned in the act; and that he had never seen John Lilburne before that day, nor was he solicited in his behalf by any person.' He acknowledgeth the Jury met yesterday morning at the Windmill Tavern; but made no agreement what answer to make the council,

The following Examinations were published in the Year 1653, not improbably before this Trial took place, with the design of facilitating the Conviction of Lilburne:

Several INFORMATIONS and EXAMINATIONS taken concerning Lieutenant-Colonel JOHN LILBURNE, shewing his Apostacy to the Party of Charles Stuart: And what his Intentions are in coming over into England out of Flanders.

A Perfect NARRATIVE of what passages I observed from lieut. col. John Lilburne, and others, touching him in Flanders.

About the beginning of July, 1652, I was employed on the behalf of this Commonwealth into Holland, and Flanders, and landing at Ostend, I found a number of very desperate enemies of all sorts to this Commonwealth, with whom I observed lieut. col. Lilburne much to associate; and having observed before his restlessness of spirit, and that his late actions had rendered him so obnoxious to this Commonwealth, that incurred an Act of Banishment upon himself; I therefore applied myself to find out what his endeavours at present drove at: And to this purpose it was not long before I found that lieut. col. Lilburne had been very conversant with capt. John Bartlet, and to whom he had imparted several secrets, as he himself called them, the said capt. John Bartlet who told me, that there were many delinquents and Cavaliers of dangerous consequence that escaped out of England to that town of Ostend, whom lieut. col. Lilburne no sooner heard of, but came to them, and in as gross a manner as he could, did endeavour to lessen the justice, honour, and power of this Commonwealth, and this in so vile and scurrilous language, as produced rather a wonder than an affection in its chiefest adversaries, as was several times confessed to me by several of them with whom he conversed. Capt. Bartlet, as well as several others further told me that lieut. col. John Lilburne kept great correspondencies with several people in England, and that one Sanctly, Mr. Prinn's man, he conceived did send away his letters, for which purpose the lieut. colonel every Saturday came from Bruges to Ostend, and having wrote them, on the Monday following he returned, as I myself often observed him to do. Not long after I heard col. Charles Llyod, sometimes called sir Charles Llyod, engineer-general, and quartermaster-general to the late king, capt. Luke Whittington, agent to Charles Stuart, capt. John Titus, capt. John Bartlet, say that lieut. col. John Lilburne had proposed several times, sometimes to the duke of Buckingham, sometimes to sir Ralph Hopton, sometimes called the lord Hopton, and sometimes to col. Charles Llyod aforesaid, and several others, That if any of the forenamed persons would procure him 10,000*l.* he would destroy the lord general Cromwell, the parliament, and the Council of State that now sitteth at Westminster, and settle Charles Stuart (king of England as he called him), in his throne in England; or he would have a piece of him nailed upon every post in Bruges. In answer to which, sir Charles Llyod as aforesaid told me, that if he thought the lieut. col. could perform what he proposed to them, it would be hard but they would procure so much money upon so good a score. I observed further from lieut. col. John Lilburne, and others who told me of his actions, that the lieut. col. did not only move with much violence and earnestness, shewing which way he would bring this his proposed design about, but went from person to person whose reputation he thought could procure so much as he proposed for (for the advancement of this his declared design), and whose affections and opinions were most suitable to further him in such employments.

Not long after this lieut. col. Lilburne took up a presumption that I was employed by the Commonwealth of England, which he averred he was certified of by several of his friends (and named one col. Layton as one of his friends, who now stands exiled from this Commonwealth, and was secretary to the Council of War to Charles Stuart in Scotland.) The lieut. colonel hereupon went to the duke of Buckingham, sir Ralph Hopton as aforesaid, col. Charles Llyod as aforesaid, major general Diol, a Scotchman that came and invaded England with Charles Stuart, and had lately broke out of the Tower, Dr. Nicholas, Judge of the Admiralty Court in Dunkirk for Charles Stuart, capt. Luke Whittington, agent for Charles Stuart, capt. John Titus, brother to capt. Titus the professed enemy of this Commonwealth, capt. John Bartlet, and what other Cavalier, he could meet with, and told them that I was a spy for the Parliament of England, and warned them to beware of me. For he had already spoiled two of the parliament spies, and would in a short time ruin me also. And to this purpose (as capt. Titus and several others afterwards told me), the lieut. col. went to Placingdol, and the said col. Layton, where they way-laid me an hour and a half to have ruined me, as lieut. col. Lilburne often said he would, though it pleased God in his mercy not to let me come that day from Ostend, when I knew nothing of the design against me. Not long after this I conversed with some of the lieut. colonel's associates, and told them I wondered much why lieut. col. Lilburne should offer thus to abuse his own countryman in another nation, in so high a nature as he had done me, since I never did him hurt, and repeating what I had heard from others, that lieut. col. Lilburne should say of me; It was soon told the lieut. col. again, who presently presumed that it was captain Bartlet that had told me, and from that time forward he sought with more violence than before to have me murdered, as too plainly appeared by his after-actions, and by two witnesses that I examined by order, who gave it under their hands, and offered to depose it, That one of the lieut. colonel's conspirators against me, often told them, that the lieut. colonel and this other conspirator had hired a man to have stabbed me, because I was employed an intelligencer for the Parliament of England; and had not I escaped speedily away, their business had been effected upon me. But I understanding the lieut. colonel's practices against me, resolved on my voyage for England; which being understood by the lieut. col. some more men besides himself with weapons way-laid me and capt. Bartlet (as we were to take boat for Ostend), that so he might have executed what he had formerly spoke against me, which was for this purpose (as some afterwards confessed to me, who had it from his own mouth), that his carriages in Flanders should not be declared to the Parliament of England, for said he, as they have banished my person, so they will sequester my estate. But it pleased Almighty God this second time by his providence to protect me, in giving a resolution not to go till the morrow, which the lieut. col. perceiving, supposed himself to be discovered, and returned into the town, and suddenly thereupon came on capt. Bret, an Irish Rebel, to inquire for capt. Bartlet, with the said capt. Whittington, who were both privy to the design, and discovered it, after God in his mercy had prevented them. By this time it was noised up and down the city, insomuch that some of the citizens offered me their assistance, which some of them afterwards gave me, and brought me to the boat the next day; at which time the lieut. col. with some more of his conspirators lay behind a hedge, near the way that I was to pass, and thus blessed be God I escaped his hands.

A little before the lieut. colonel had discovered that capt. Bartlet informed me of whatsoever the lieut. colonel told him, capt. Bartlet said that he had told him that he, the lieut. colonel, had much intercourse and correspondence with Holland, by which means, he would ruin me, in causing me to be apprehended, because (as he said) I was a spy for the Commonwealth of England, which capt. Bartlet giving me timely notice of, hindered my journey, and so a third time I escaped his malice, which was not against me any further, than as he said I was a spy for the commonwealth of England.

ISAAC BERKENHEAD.

The Examination of Capt. John Titus, concerning Lieut. Col. John Lilburne, Sept. 22, 1652.

The Examinant saith, that the said lieut. col. John Lilburne proposed to the lord Hopton, that if he would procure him 10,000*l.* he would destroy the Commonwealth of England in six months, or he would have a piece of him nailed upon every post in Bruges. The lord Hopton told the said Lilburne, that it could not be so facile a thing, though he believed it would be done, but not in so short time : to which the said Lilburne replied, my lord, I will shew you how it shall be done ; give me but the monies that I propose for, and I will have my agents (for I have enough of them) that shall give me a continual account of all the Commonwealth of England's proceedings : and by those agents I will spread my papers abroad, that shall instigate the people against the parliament, and so by that power I have already, and that power that my agents shall make by working upon the people, I will destroy this Parliament, the Council of State, and the lord general Cromwell, in half an hour.

This Examinant further saith, that George Villers, duke of Buckingham, sent for the said Lilburne to enquire which way he might make his addresses to the parliament for his peace, but the said Lilburne advised the duke from it, for that the lord general Cromwell and the parliament were so false a company of rogues, that it was not safe for the said duke to put his life into their hands : and further said, that if the king (to wit Charles Stuart) would but observe what he the said Lilburne had set down in some papers, which shew the reason why the said Lilburne would not be a cavalier, and reform but them, he might easily do his business and sit in his chair. But the said duke spurred him the said Lilburne on to his first request of advising him which way he might make his peace with the parliament. But the said Lilburne would not hear of that, but advised the said duke to the contrary, and further telling him the said duke, that they had hitherto (naming his excellency the lord general Cromwell and the parliament,) broken all their engagements, and particularly the lord general, to me, who promised with all the protestations in the world, and by whatever else was sacred, that so soon as the general had done his business in Scotland, he would then answer all their expectations and desires (meaning the desires of that party which are called Levellers) and further promised that Magna Charta should be set on foot, and all the privileges of the people fully answered, according as they the said Levellers had in several papers of theirs proposed.

But the said duke still drove the said Lilburne off, desiring him the said Lilburne, that if he had any interest or party in England (as he the said Lilburne boasted much of) that he would use it on the duke's behalf ; for, said the said duke, could I procure a pass to day to come into my native country, I would fling myself into the lord general and parliament's hands to-morrow ; For, said he the said duke, so far as I have assisted the king hitherto, hath been but to quit myself of ingratitude, since my family hath been raised by the king and his ancestors. To which the said Lilburne replied, My lord, since you are so resolved, I would advise you not to stir in such things as yet, for that there is expected a new representative, at which time he the said Lilburne doubted not but he should be able to do him the said duke service, for he the said Lilburne should then be as powerful as any in the representative. But the said duke desired that if he the said Lilburne had any interest that he would use it forthwith, for that he had a desire to be reconciled to his country. To which the said Lilburne replied, My lord, the General and the parliament are so false a company of rogues, that it cannot be safe for you to put yourself in their hands.

This Examinant further saith, that at this same time the said Lilburne proposed to the said duke, that if he the said duke could but procure him 10,000*l.* he the said Lilburne would have a piece of him nailed upon every post in Bruges, if he the said Lilburne did not overthrow and destroy those damnable villains in England, I mean, said he the said Lilburne, the lord general Cromwell, the Parliament, and that monstrous Council of State. To which the said duke replied, I pray you, Sir, let me hear which way you will do this. The said Lilburne replied, My lord, I will tell you how, first, I will set my press on work (for which purpose I have bought one with a letter at Amsterdam, which cost me 30*l.*) and then I will send my papers over into England, which by my agents shall be spread all over the nation, and by my agents (for I have enough) my papers shall be brought into the army there, where I have double interest, and now every trooper begins to understand his own privilege, and so soon as these papers are spread, they will fly in the faces of their officers, so that with the help of my particular interest, the soldiery shall do all themselves, and I will do nothing but sit in my chair, and use my pen. To which the duke replied, Sir, you may observe that in all your attempts the General outwitted you, and broke your business in the bud ; besides, you may see that on all occasions the soldiery hath been obedient unto his officer, so discreetly hath the general ordered his army. Why then, saith the said Lilburne, I perceive you take the general for a wise man. Yes, said the duke, let the world read his stories and they will find him so. No, said the said Lilburne, I know him to be otherwise, for heretofore all his business was managed by Ireton, and is since by others : And for the General himself, he is as false a perfidious false-hearted rogue as ever lived in the world. And I know no reason why I should not vie with Cromwell, since I had once as great a power as he had, and greater too, and am as good a gentleman, and of as good a family. To this the said duke replied, Sir, if you have any interest in England, as you say you have, I pray you to use it for me, for I have a great desire to be reconciled to my native country. Then the said Lilburne perceiving he could not move the said duke to any thing in relation to his the said Lilburne's proposals and persuasions, he the said Lilburne promised to use his interest in England on the said duke's behalf, to which purpose the said Lilburne wrote to some in England, but to whom this Examinant knoweth not. But withal the said Lilburne advised the said duke not to stir in it yet.

This Examinant further saith, that the said Lilburne said that there was one Rogers that was a rogue, for that he was a spy for the Commonwealth of England, and therefore he the said Lilburne would ruin and destroy him: And that he the said Lilburne had discovered several that were employed in that way before. And after this apprehending the said Rogers was to come towards Bruges, the said Lilburne lay an hour and a half waiting for the said Rogers's coming, at Placingdoll, three English miles from Ostend, which was his way to Bruges.

The Examinant further saith, that there was one Mr. Lambert, (a man that keeps much company with the said Lilburne, who took the said Lilburne's house for him in Bruges,) that said that lieut. col. Lilburne told him the said Lambert, that he the said Lilburne had found a rogue out, one Rogers, that was a spy for the Commonwealth of England. The said Lambert further said, with another Papist, commonly called by the name of Paracelsus, as he the said Lambert was, that if the said Rogers had staid two days longer in the town, he the said Rogers should never have gone thence alive, for that they would have him the said Rogers knocked on the head.

This Examinant further saith, that the said Lilburne said, that the lord general had abused major general Lambert, who, when time served, would be revenged on the General.

JOHN TITUS.

The Examination of Capt. John Bartlet, concerning Lieut. Col. John Lilburne.

About the 20th of July, 1652, in an arbour in Placingdoll, three miles from Ostend in Flanders, lieut. col. John Lilburne did propose to col. Charles Lloyd, sometimes called sir Charles Lloyd, quarter-master general, and engineer general to the late king in the late wars in England, and to capt. John Bartlet, this Examinant, and capt. Luke Whittington, agent for the king of Scots, that if he the said Charles Lloyd, or any of the aforesaid persons, would procure him 10,000*l.* he the said Lilburne would settle the king in his throne (to wit Charles Stuart) in England. And this Examinant further saith, that at the same time the said Lilburne said, that the king (to wit Charles Stuart) should never come into his throne, but by his the said Lilburne's means, and that he further said, the said Lilburne did oppose the late king's death more than any man in England besides then durst do. And this Examinant further saith, that the said Lilburne did then boast much of the largeness of his own party, as he the said Lilburne called them, which he had in England.

This Examinant further saith, that there was a rumour in Flanders, that his excellency the lord general Cromwell was made lord admiral of the seas, and that he was to go to sea in the ship called the Sovereign, the which when lieut. col. Lilburne heard, he was very angry, saying, That the General had more commands than ever Julius Cæsar had, but if it is no matter, said he, let him go to sea when he will, I will warrant him he shall never return; or words to this effect.

This Examinant further saith, that lieut. col. John Lilburne said, that Mr. Rogers was a spy for the Commonwealth of England, as he was told by lieut. col. Layton. And further said, that if he the said Lilburne knew it certainly, he would destroy the said Rogers; And further said, that he had warned the duke of Buckingham, the lord Hopton, doctor Nicholas, Judge of the Admiralty Court, for the Scotch king in Dunkirk and several other cavaliers, that they should not trust him, and the said Lilburne further said, that he had spoiled two of the parliament's spies already, and would do the like to this; And further said, that he the said Lilburne, and the said col. Layton (supposing which way the said Rogers would come) lay an hour and a half waiting for him, but though he missed him then, he would ruin him afterwards; and at this time the said Lilburne commanded this Examinant to keep it secretly, and to beware of him the said Rogers. After this it appeared that the said Lilburne had intelligence that this Examinant had discovered to the said Rogers what had formerly past betwixt the said Lilburne and this Examinant as secrets, and what is related in this paper; and understanding the said Rogers and this Examinant were to go from Bruges to Ostend, and so for England, that none of the said Lilburne's actions might be declared there in England to the parliament, which the said Lilburne feared, he the said Lilburne with certain others that he had procured with their weapons, as pistols and swords, way-laid the said Rogers and this Examinant, but by Providence the said Rogers resolved not to go that day, and prevailed with this Examinant to stay till the next, which this Examinant did, though they never heard any thing of the conspiracy against them. But their stay being understood by the said Lilburne and the rest of his conspirators, one that was privy to the conspiracy, capt. Ignatius Brett an Irish rebel, with capt. Luke Whittington, came to the house where this Examinant and the said Rogers were, and this said Brett sent for this Examinant, and asked this Examinant what was the reason why this Examinant continued not his resolution for his journey. This Examinant answered that by a friend's advice he staid till to-morrow. The said Brett replied, you may thank God you went not down to the boat, for had you gone, ye had been harder put to it in fighting than ever you were in your days; whereupon this Examinant asked the said Brett, by whom? the said Brett answered you shall excuse me, I will never be a Traitor to them so long as I live, but you know them all as well as I. Then the said Whittington being in company said, I am glad with all my heart you went not down, for the persons were Lilburne, &c. who were all well furnished for this purpose. With that the said Brett said, gentlemen, you are my witnesses that I discovered them not. And this being noised abroad in the town, a merchant of the town offered the said Rogers if he pleased he would cause them all to be clapped up, which the said Rogers refused, providing themselves against them.

This Examinant further saith, that before this, the said Lilburne told him that he the said Lilburne had good intercourse with Holland, and would cause the said Rogers to be surprised there, for that he was a spy for the Commonwealth of England.

This Examinant further saith, that the said Lilburne was reading a Declaration of the Parliament of England touching the war with the Hollanders, the said Lilburne professed, that were the parliament half so honest as they were wise they were the bravest people in the world. But the Dutch were fools; for had he their cause in handling, he would choak the parliament in two words; which should be in telling them of their promises made to the late king, in preserving his person, honour, crown and dignity, and how falsely they have broken them all.

JOHN BARTLET.

For my dear and loving wife Mrs. Elizabeth Lilburne, these with haste, haste, post haste deliver in London.

My Dear Love; I have been, and yet am in a longing condition to hear from thee, but I confess by this post I have nothing to expect from thee, more than to hear that thou art safely got amongst our friends at London, where I hope your joint activity will be such (according to my full instructions to you and my true friend that went with you) as that you will procure my expected pass so speedily as to send it me, or a copy of it, with my friends, encouragement, to Dunkirk, the next post, where by God's assistance I will be on Sunday next at night; and if it come, it is more than probable I may come to Dover that packet (or certainly send you word when by God's gracious permission I shall) for I long to see London, and if I come so suddenly, I shall leave all my things behind me in the care and possession of Mr. Lambert, for which I can either come over myself again, or send for them. One reason that moves me to make the more haste, is because if I come over, and find things in a handsome way to my liking. I have something of very great consequence to say speedily to such a great faithful man as I shall trust, and if I come, I shall stay at Dover a day, two or three, and by the post let you know I am there, and expect you to send me a horse to Canterbury, where at the post-house I intend to lie the first night, and shall not stir from thence till I receive a horse from you.

But if our new Council of State, or governors, will not cast a favourable eye upon you, but either deny or delay you a pass, so that the next Post I hear not of it. I shall then take it for granted that major general Harrison, being, as I hear, one of your new Council of State, is my principallest, and grandest adversary, and accordingly I shall only take arise from what I was informed he said in the house at my banishment, and what he said publicly at Alhallows (when from Dover I sent my letter to the people that meet there) to write him such a letter (which already in my brain I have contrived) as will no way please him, let the issue be what it will. I have writ again to major general Lambert (who I hear is president of your new council) and enclosed him one of my printed Epistles, in Dutch and English, I have also writ to col. Bennet, which you may read the copy of on the other side.

So with my hearty and true love and affection presented to thee and all my friends in the bulk, longing above measure to hear from thee, I commit thee and my poor babes, as my own soul, to the protection of the Most High, and rest thy faithful and loving husband. I. L.

I have herewith enclosed one of my printed Letters, which I hope are before now printed at London; I have already sent two copies of this two several ways for fear of miscarriage. I am in haste, and cannot read this over, the post is going, therefore mend the faults if there be any.

The Information of Rich. Foot, concerning Lieut. Col. John Lilburne.

Being in Flanders about three months since, I came acquainted with lieut. col. John Lilburne, where among other discourse I asked him why he did not apply himself to learn some language, he being then unable to speak to any of the country without an interpreter; he answered me, that he thought himself too old to learn languages, and said he had work enough to set his adversaries by the ears. Few days after I came into England, and about seven weeks or two months since returning there again he told me that his wife had been there, and that he had sent her into England with a letter to Cromwell, a copy of which he gave me in print, and that he expected a pass to go into England, he would not stay a day after it came, though he hired a boat of purpose; then one Parker a cavalier taking his leave of him, asked if he might not write to him, he answered, no, I will receive no letters from Mr. Parker; then he asked if not by another name, to that he assented. So Lilburne went to Dunkirk with great confidence that he should receive his pass there; and few days after one Jamot, which had been a lieut. col. for the late king, came post from Paris, staying but one night at Antwerp with his wife, and came to Bridges, and not finding Lilburne there, came to my lodging early in the morning, and asked me if I thought he was gone for England, then presently went away to the boat, to which I hasted, and went with him to Dunkirk, and often by the way he asked me if I thought Lilburne was gone, speaking as if he extremely feared it; as soon as he had taken up his lodging in Dunkirk he went to seek Lilburne, and finding him in the street delivered him a letter, and had some private discourse with him; a while after coming to them at a tavern, Lilburne desired me to go to Bridges for a letter directed to him from sir Henry Denix, wherein he said was a pass for the duke of Buckingham to come into Flanders, and to that purpose he gave me a letter unsealed, directed to Mr. Tho. Lambert, at Bridges, desiring him to enquire for the said letter, and deliver it to me, which was accordingly done, at my being at Bridges the aforesaid Mr. Parker's wife delivered me a letter directed to or some such like name, desiring me to deliver it to Lilburne, saying it was for him, I asked why it was so directed, she said he well knew the meaning of it; at my return to Dunkirk I received a letter from Jamot, wherein he wrote they were gone to Calais to meet the duke of Buckingham, and desired me to send the aforesaid letter with the pass in it to Graveling, and within two or three days after returned to Dunkirk, being Sunday the 29th of May, and Lilburne and Jamot being at a tavern called the Conserge with one capt Whittington and col. Layton, both of the king's party here in England, and two merchants, desired me to send one for his letters to the Post house, upon which one of the company asked him what he would say if this pass came not, he said that if my pass come not, and that I find that it is Cromwell that hinders it, as it must be, for it lies in his power, I will either kill him myself, or send one to do it; then one of the merchants asked him how he could do such a thing with conscience, he answered tell not me of conscience in this case, for if that I am banished without law, conscience or equity, and deprived of my natural air to breath in, which is every man's birth-right, (with such like expressions) I may justly right myself if I can; if I would take a hare or a deer, I ought to give him fair play, because they are beast of game; but if a fox or wolf, I may use what device I can to kill him; so if Cromwell keep himself above the law, that I cannot have my right by the law, I may kill him how I can. Then presently his letters came, and after he had read them, and saw his pass was not come, he said, I am resolved to have one fling more at Cromwell. Further he said, that Cromwell hath been an atheist this seven years, and that his design is and hath been to make himself king; so having been there together three or four hours, expressing great confidence in one another, I and this informant left them. The next day Lilburne and Layton went again for Calais to the duke of Buckingham, and were not returned when I came for England, which was eight days after.

RICHARD FOOT.

The Information of John Staplehill, of Dartmouth, taken June 20, 1653.

This Informant saith, that coming through France in his way to England from Spain, he lodged at Calais, upon Friday was sevennight at the Silver Lion, where was the duke of Buckingham, and likewise some colonels of the late king's army, and with them was lieut. col. John Lilburne and his wife, that the Informant being in the next chamber, he heard them discourse of the lord general Cromwell, but could not understand distinctly the particulars of their discourse, but did apprehend he spake very slightly of the General, hearing him say these words, Cromwell, what can Cromwell do? And this informant did observe, that the said duke, cavaliers and Lilburne were very familiar together, and Lilburne and his wife dined and supped constantly with them; that the Informant being bound for England, hired a boat upon Sunday for his passage, and being upon the key, a boat man came to him, and told him that he need not hire a boat, but might go over with three gentlemen that were going over, meaning lieut. col. Lilburne and two cavaliers in his company, and the boatman went to them to ask them, whether this Informant might not go with them, but the said Lilburne refused to admit it, and said he should not go with them. And he afterwards hearing that the Informant had hired a boat himself procured the duke to go to the governor of Calais to stop the Informant's going over at that time, and the Informant being sent for by the governor to that purpose, the Informant met the said duke there, and was then prohibited by the governor, not to depart till he had leave, so the said Lilburne went away that night about midnight, with his wife, and two cavaliers, whereof one was a colonel, and embarked all in one boat, the duke accompanying them to the water side.

That the next day about two o'clock, the governor gave liberty to the Informant to come away, who arrived at Dover at seven o'clock the same night, where he heard Lilburne arrived in the morning before, and this Informant coming through Canterbury in his way to London, staid at the Three Kings, the post-house, to dine, and there asked whether lieut. col. Lilburne past that way, and one of the drawers told him he did, and the Informant thereupon saying, he was a great enemy to the General, the drawer answered, that he did express as much here, saying, he came into England without any pass, and that he did not fear what Cromwell could do to him, being as good a man as he; and this was upon Tuesday last. He likewise boasted, that he had caused three gentlemen to be stopt at Calais, which was the Informant, a Spaniard, and an Englishman, who came all in company together.

194. Case of the PRIVILEGES of EMBASSADORS, being the Proceedings against Don PANTALEON SA, Brother of the Ambassador from the King of Portugal * to England, for Murder in a Riot in the New Exchange : 6 CHARLES II. A. D. 1654. [Sommers' Tracts, 3 Coll: vol. 2. p. 65. Whitelocke's Memorials. Zouch's Solutio Questionis de Legati Delinquentis Competente Judicio. Oldmixon. Guthrie. Carte. Burnet. Thurloe's State Papers. Cotton's Posthuma.]

NO circumstantial account of the Trial in this Case has been obtained, and the accounts which are extant of the Case itself do not agree with each other so exactly as was to be wished. Nevertheless, as the transaction has been discussed by writers both on the Law of England and on the Law of Nations, and as our history and our law-books furnish but very few incidents and very little learning relative to this head of Public Jurisprudence, it has been thought right to present the best representations of the Case which have been found, together with some other documents, which contribute to throw light on the matter. The statement which is adopted by Mr. Ward in his Inquiry into the Foundation and History of the Law of Nations in Europe, and in speaking of which he says, "one of more authority can hardly be met with," is given in the Third Collection of the Sommers Tracts, vol. 3, p. 65, as follows :

A RELATION OF THE MUTINY ON TUESDAY THE 22d OF NOVEMBER, 1653, IN THE NEW-EXCHANGE, OF THE PORTUGAL AMBASSADOR'S FOLLOWERS, &c.

"This night was a great Mutiny at the New Exchange in the Strand, such as had scarce ever been the like. The business, upon the best information that I can have from those who were present in part of the business, and have conferred with others upon the whole, is this:

"On Monday night, which was the night before, three of the Portugal Ambassador's family, whereof his brother was one, being at the New Exchange, they talking in French, spake of such discourse of transactions of some English affairs, which col. Gerhard, sir Gilbert Gerhard's brother, understanding the French tongue, hearing, told them very civilly, that they did not represent the stories they spake of right; whereupon one of the Portugals gave him the lie: Upon that they began to jostle, and all three fell upon col. Gerhard, and threw him down, and got upon him; but though he be but a little man, yet he threw him off that was upon him, and so was bustling with him a good while: There were some gentlemen there, but knew not who it was they so assaulted, and so never meddled with them; and yet one of the Portugals with his dagger stabbed col. Gerhard in the shoulder, and hurt him sore: But afterwards Mr. An-frazer spake to the Portugals, that it was not civil nor handsome for so many to fall upon one, three to one being very unequal, and endeavoured to pull one of them off, and so to persuade them to cease, and thereby he came to see who it was they had assaulted; who finding it to be col. Gerhard, which he knew well, and seeing them still pursue their rage upon him, he drew to relieve him; and after some bustle the Portugals went away, one of them having a cut upon his cheek: And that night afterwards near twenty of their attendants came to the Exchange, and would have quarrelled with any body; and some cuffing there was by some, but not much more that night, for it was late, and they returned home.

"On Tuesday night, came about fifty of the Portugals again to the New-Exchange, of which number were the Ambassador's brother, and two knights of Malta, and they were led on by a Portugal in buff, whom they call Captain, one well known to some in the Exchange, and they had generally double arms, all or most part of them swords and pistols, and coats of mail or armour, some one thing, some another, to preserve their bodies from swords entering upon them.

"They had also two or three coaches that brought ammunition, in which were hand-granadoes, and bottles, and some little barrels of powder and bullets, and other necessaries, if occasion was. They had also some boats ready to attend them at the water-side, if occasion was for them also.

"Thus they came with a resolution to fall upon every English gentleman they should find in or about the Exchange; and entering in with this equipage, the people were exceedingly frightened. For first came in the Captain in the buff, who led them, and after him the Portugal Ambassador's brother, and the knights of Malta, and so the rest, all with drawn swords, and in so furious a posture, as if they intended to kill every body they met with that stood before them.

"Hereupon the people fled into the shops in the Exchange to shelter themselves, and all that did not so they fell upon, though no man gave them the least affront, yet they pistolled and cut, and wounded many.

"Mr. Greneway, a gentleman of Grey's-Inn, son to the lady Greneway, was there with his sister, and a gentlewoman whom he was to have married, who desired them two to stand up in a shop, where he saw them safe, and they would have had him to have staid with them, but he said he would only go see what was the matter; but he was no sooner parted from them, but immediately the word being given by the Portugal Captain in buff, which was Safa, which was the word when they were to fall on. Without any affront offered towards them, one of them pistoled him, and shot him in the head, and he is dead of his wounds; and many others they have dangerously wounded. Cpl. Mayo had twelve upon him at once, yet drew his sword, and fought with them as long as he was able to hold his sword in his hand, which being cut, he was forced to let his sword fall, and then they cut and wounded him in many places. Mr. Thomas Howard, Mr. Carter, and divers others, were wounded passing by.

* Whitelocke in his Memorials for September 1652 notices the unusual state with which the Ambassador from Portugal came to present his Credentials to the Parliament.

"The Horse at the Meuse had taken alarm before they returned, and returning home, passing by the Meuse, some of the horse moving towards them, some of them discharged pistols towards the horse, and the rest run home to the Ambassador's house; but the horse-guards took some of them, and carried them into the Meuse, and sent word thereof to the Lord-General; and a party of Horse pursued them and beset the Ambassador's house.

"And commissary general Whalley sent in to the Ambassador, acquainted him with this horrible attempt and bloody murder of his followers, and shewed him his men they had taken prisoners, and required the chief of the rest of them to be delivered into the hands of justice, which the Ambassador was loth to do. But seeing he could not baffle them, to stop the course of justice in so horrible a bloody business as that had been, he delivered up his brother and one of the knights of Malta, and some others such as they had then information was chief, and promised to secure the rest to be forthcoming any of them when they should be demanded. After which the Ambassador made his address to the Lord General, and chiefly for his brother; but his Excellency told him that it did concern the public, and therefore his addresses must be to the Parliament and Council of State. It is such a horrible business that his Excellency would not meddle with him in it. The Portugals that are in custody are prisoners at James's, and the business is under examination before the Council of State."

In the same volume is also printed the Order of the Council of State as follows:

"By the Council of State; The Council of State taking notice of the tumultuous and barbarous actings at the New Exchange in the Strand, in the county of Middlesex, upon the 21st and 22d of November last past, the same being accompanied with the drawing of swords, discharging of pistols, and such other high misdemeanors as are scarce to be paralleled by the actings of any persons living under the protection of a civil government, and which, in the effects thereof, produced not only a very great and notorious violation of the public peace, but also the murdering of one, and the assaulting, wounding and affrighting of many other of the people of this nation, pursuing their ordinary callings and occasions. And for as much as the said Exchange is a place of public resort and trade; the Council have therefore thought it necessary hereby to declare their resentment of those proceedings, and their just displeasure against the same. And as they intend vigorously to prosecute the offenders, so, to the intent the like evils may be better prevented in time to come, they do hereby strictly require and charge, That no person or persons, of what quality soever, do presume at the said Exchange, or any other like public place, to occasion, encourage or abet, any tumultuous meetings, or hazard a breach of the civil peace, or drawing there, or in any other such place, any sword or other weapon, discharging, presenting, or bearing any gun or pistol, or firing of powder in granadoes, or in any otherwise whatsoever. Of which command, it will be expected that all persons whatsoever take notice, and demean themselves accordingly, upon peril of being reputed, and dealt withal, as disturbers of the public peace, whereof a very strict account shall be taken: And all justices of the peace, and other public ministers, are required carefully to perform their duties in this behalf; as also, to use their utmost endeavours to prevent and restrain all immodest and unhandsome demeanors of such as shall resort to the said Exchange, that so no just cause of offence may be given to sober minds, nor any thing there acted dishonourable to religion or the nation."

The following detached Narrative, extracted from the candid and careful Whitelocke, is somewhat more circumstantial.

Nov. 21st, 1653. A great insurrection and tumult was at the New Exchange, between the Portugal Ambassador's brother and some of his company, and col. Gerrard* an English gentleman, who hearing the Portugueses discoursing in French of the affairs of England, told them in French, That they did not represent those passages aright. Whereupon one of the Portugueses gave him the lye, and they all three fell upon col. Gerrard, stabbing him in the shoulder with a dagger, but being rescued out of their hands by one Mr. Anthuser they retired home, and within one hour returned with 20 more, armed with breast-plates and head-pieces, but after two or three turns not finding Mr. Anthuser, they returned home that night.

Nov. 22nd. The Portugal Ambassador's brother returned again to the New Exchange with his company, and walking there they met with col. Mayo, whom they supposed to have been Mr. Anthuser, and shooting off a pistol as a warning, 50 Portugueses came in with drawn swords, and leaving some to keep the stairs, the rest went up with the Ambassador's brother and fell upon col. Mayo, who gallantly defending himself, received seven dangerous wounds, and lies in a dangerous condition, and then they fell upon Mr. Greenway of Lincoln's Inn, who was walking with his sister in one hand and his mistress in the other, and pistolled him in the head, whereof he died immediately. They brought with them several jars filled with gun-powder in their coaches, stopped with wax and filled with matches, intending, as it seemed, to have done some mischief to the Exchange had they not been prevented. The Parliament Horse at the Mews taking the alarm apprehended some of the Portugueses, and the rest of them ran to the Ambassador's house, whither col. Whaley pursued them and beset the Ambassador's house with his horse, acquainted him with the murder and insolency committed by his followers, shewed him some of them whom he had taken prisoners, and required the chief of the rest to be delivered up to justice. The Ambassador insisted upon his Privilege as Ambassador, but seeing nothing else would satisfy, he at length delivered up his brother and one of the knights of Malta and some others, and promised to secure the rest to be forthcoming; after which the Ambassador made his address to the Lord General*, and chiefly for his brother, but the General told him the business did not concern the public, and therefore his excellency's address must be to the Parliament and to the Council of State.

Nov. 23. The brother of the Portugal Ambassador and his company who committed the murder at the Exchange, were examined by the Lord Chief Justice Rolles; and the Ambassador's brother, and four others, were committed to Newgate in order to take their trial.

Dec. 13. The Portugal Ambassador's brother made an escape out of Newgate, but was retaken. The Council of State published a Declaration against the late Tumult at the New Exchange, and forbid all persons of what quality soever to do or abet the like in any public place of trade or resort, upon pain to be dealt with as disturbers of the public peace, whereof a strict account shall be taken; and all officers to perform their duty for apprehending such offenders, and to prevent the like tumultuous actions.

Jan. 8, 1654. The Trial of the Portugal Ambassador's brother put off till the next sessions upon the petition of the Portugal merchants.

April 3d. The Portugal Ambassador had audience of the Lord Protector.

* Cromwell, who did not assume the office of Protector, till after the abdication, in the following month, of the parliament which he had himself constituted in June preceding.

May 12th. The treaty with Portugal is not yet come to any agreement. The business of his brother yet sticks. His highness hath now ordered his Trial by a special commission of Oyer and Terminer. The Commissioners are, my lord Rolles*, justice Atkins, serjeant Steel, Dr. Zouch, Dr. Clerk, Dr. Turner, Dr. Blunt, Mr. Lucy, and Alderman Tichburn.

July 5th. The Portugal Ambassador's brother and two other Portugueses were tried before commissioners of Oyer and Terminer in the King's Bench. He pleaded that he was not only the Ambassador's brother, but had a commission to himself, to be Ambassador when his brother should be absent, and that by the Law of Nations he was privileged from his Trial, and he demanded counsel. The point of Privilege of Ambassadors by the Common Law, and by the Civil Law, and by the Law of Nations, was long debated by the Court, and the Lord Protector's Council; and the result of the court was, That by all those laws the proceedings in this case were justified. And that no counsel could be allowed to the Ambassador's brother in Matters of Fact, but if in the proceedings of his Trial he should desire counsel as to Matter in Law, it should be allowed him. After much persuasion he and the rest pleaded Not Guilty, and to be tried by God and the country, and a Jury was called of half English and half foreigners. Adjourned till the next day for their Trial.

July 6th. The Portugal Ambassador's brother was again brought before the Commissioners of Oyer and Terminer in the Upper Bench, and tried by a Jury of six denizens, and six aliens. He pleaded his ignorance in the laws of England, and desired to have counsel assigned him, but the Court told him that they were of counsel equal to him as to the Commonwealth†, and upon hearing of the Wit-

* Whitelocke (Mem. 363), styles Rolles "a wise and learned man."

† This is a more correct expression of the maxim that "the judge shall be counsel for the prisoner" that is, according to Blackstone (who calls it, "when rightly understood, a noble declaration of the law") "the judge shall see that the proceedings against the prisoner are legal and strictly regular," or as Mr. Christian expresses it, "the judge shall take care that the prisoner does not suffer from the want of counsel." The phrase that "the judge is counsel for the prisoner" is very apt to mislead, and we shall not therefore be surprised at the exclamation of a culprit who, when he heard his judge, presently after saying, that he was counsel for the prisoner, put to a witness a question directly tending to elicit proof of the prisoner's guilt, cried out, "Alas, my lord, if you were my counsel, you would not ask that question!" The following anecdote reported by Mr. Christian [note (8) to 4 Blackst. Comm. 5th ed. 355] shews that the common phrase has, once at least, misled even a judge. "Upon a trial for the murder of a male child, the coun-nesses, the jury found the Ambassador's brother and four more Guilty of Murder and Felony. The Lord Chief Justice Rolles gave Sentence against them to be hanged, and a day sel for the prosecution concluded his case without asking the sex of the child, and the judge would not permit him afterwards to call a witness to prove it; but, in consequence of the omission, he directed the jury to acquit the prisoner. But, to the honour of that judge it ought to be stated, that, he declared afterwards in private his regret for his conduct." Mr. Christian rightly states, that "the judge is counsel only for public justice; and to promote that object alone all his enquiries and attention ought to be directed."

It is a settled rule at common law, that no counsel shall be allowed a prisoner upon his trial, upon the general issue in any capital crime, unless some point of law shall arise proper to be debated, 2 Hawkins Pl. Cr. 400. Blackst. Com. b. 4. c. 27. s. 5. The qualification expressed in the words "proper to be debated" is not so definite as it seems desirable that it should be.

Upon the trial of issues which (do not in Mr. Justice Foster's not very exact phrase) turn upon the question of Guilty or Not Guilty, but upon collateral facts; prisoners under a capital charge, whether for treason or felony, always were intitled to the full assistance of counsel. Foster 232. See Ratcliff's Case, A. D. 1746, infra, and Roger Johnson's Case there cited. And by St. 7 W. 3, c. 3, (of which see the history and some important debates which took place upon it in 5 Cobb. Parl. Hist. 658, 675, 684, 691, 712, 737, 965. See also 4 Hats. Prec. 40, 333. 2 Burnet's Own Times, 141, 161, 163. Foster, 221, 3 Kennett's Hist. 633, 704. 1st ed.) it is enacted, that all and every person and persons indicted for High Treason, except (what Foster calls the lower class) treasons concerning the seals and the coin, whereby any corruption of blood may be made to such offenders or their heirs, or for misprisions of such treasons, shall be admitted to make their full defence by counsel, and the Court before whom such person or persons shall be tried, or some judge thereof, is required immediately upon his or their request to assign to such person or persons such and so many counsel (not exceeding two) as he or they shall desire; to whom such counsel shall have free access at all seasonable hours." No specific punishment is enacted against the refusal to assign counsel and to afford them at seasonable hours free access to a prisoner. The provision concerning the counsel's access to the prisoner might have been more definitely expressed. It appears by a note to page 267 of the fourth Volume of Mr. Hatsell's Precedents, that on May 2, 1716, the Lords passed a "Bill, for allowing of Counsel to all persons who shall be proceeded against in Parliament for any crimes of Treason or Misprision of Treason." The Commons rejected this bill (which is preserved in the Office belonging to that house) on the question for the second reading. But by Stat. 20 G. 2, c. 30, the above-recited enactment of st. 7

W. 3, c. 3, is extended to cases of parliamentary Impeachments for the same kinds of treasons and misprisions, which cases were excepted, in that statute of king William. In prosecutions for Misdemeanours, defendants are allowed counsel as in civil actions. Mr. Hatsell (Precedents, vol. 4. p. 290) in a note, takes notice that this Statute was introduced into the House of Commons soon after the Trial of lord Lovat was finished. It may be added, that the bill was moved for by sir William Yonge, who had been the leading manager of the Impeachment against lord Lovat.

In no trials for felony, whether the offence be capital, or clergyable, or petty larceny (except as to issues arising out of collateral facts, see Foster as cited above) is a prisoner allowed counsel to plead his cause before the jury. "I am far" says Foster, "from disputing the propriety of this rule while it is confined to Felony, and the lower class of Treasons concerning the Coin and the Seals. I know many things have been thrown out upon this subject, and inconveniencies, some real, some imaginary, have been suggested by popular writers, who seem to have attended singly to those on one side of the question: but it is impossible in a state of imperfection to keep clear of all inconveniencies, though wisdom will always direct us to the course which is subject to the fewest and the least; and this is the utmost that human wisdom can do." Foster appears to have been a most laborious and sincere enquirer after truth, and a most diligent, upright, and unimpeachable magistrate. Even Churchill, perhaps the most powerful and most unsparing satirist of his time, has borne testimony to his worth. By the members of his own profession his character and his labours are highly esteemed, and have been highly commended. See in this Collection Wilkes's Case, A. D. 1764—1770. Crosby's Case, A. D. 1771, in which last case he is styled by De Grey, Ch. Just. C. B. 'the Magna Charta of liberty of persons as well as fortunes.' See also 4 Blackst. Comm. ch. 1, in which he is mentioned as 'a very great master of the crown-law.' It is therefore to be regretted that he evaded to enter into the merits of the point under consideration, and that respecting it, he has left nothing better or more distinct than the superficial, trite, and insignificant common places cited above.

Of the many things which, in Foster's phrase, 'have been thrown out on this subject,' the following will probably be thought worth attention. It appears that in November, 1649 (see Whitelocke's Memorials under that date, and 3 Cobb. Parl. Hist. 1339) there were in the parliament "many debates about reformation of things, according to the late petitions, and amongst the rest of particulars, there was a great pique against the lawyers. Inasmuch as it was again said, as it had been formerly, That it was not fit for lawyers who were members of parliament, (if any lawyers ought to be of the parliament) to plead, or practice as lawyers, during the time that they sate as members of the parliament."

lony. The Lord Chief Justice Rolles gave Sentence against them to be hanged, and a day was appointed for execution, but by the desire of the prisoners it was respited two days.

W. 3, c. 3, is extended to cases of parliamentary Impeachments for the same kinds of treasons and misprisions, which cases were excepted, in that statute of king William. In prosecutions for Misdemeanours, defendants are allowed counsel as in civil actions. Mr. Hatsell (Precedents, vol. 4. p. 290) in a note, takes notice that this Statute was introduced into the House of Commons soon after the Trial of lord Lovat was finished. It may be added, that the bill was moved for by sir William Yonge, who had been the leading manager of the Impeachment against lord Lovat.

Whitlocke, then one of the Keepers of the Great Seal, made upon this occasion an elaborate and learned Speech, in which is the following passage:

"Sir, the worthy gentleman was pleased to mention one thing with some weight, that lawyers were permitted to counsel, and to plead for men, in matters touching their estates, and liberties, but in the greatest matters of all others, concerning a man's life and posterity, lawyers were not permitted to plead for their Clients. I confess, I cannot answer this objection, that for a trespass of 6d. value, a man may have a Counsellor at Law to plead for him, but where his life and posterity are concerned, he is not admitted this privilege, and help of lawyers. A law to reform this, I think would be just, and give right to people. What is said in defence, or excuse of this custom is, 'That the Judges are of Counsel for the Prisoners, and are to see that they shall have no wrong.' And are they not to take the same care of all causes that shall be tried before them?"

See, too, what Jeffereys says in Rosewell's Case cited below.

"The rule," says Blackstone, "that no Counsel shall be allowed (to) a prisoner upon his trial, upon the general issue in any capital Crime, unless some point of Law shall arise proper to be debated, seems to be not all of a piece with the rest of the humane treatment of prisoners by the English Law. For upon what force of reason can that assistance be denied to save the life of a man, which yet is allowed him in persecutions for every petty trespass? Nor, indeed, is it, truly speaking, a part of our antient Law: for the Mirror, having observed the necessity of counsel in civil suits, 'who know how to forward and defend the cause, by the rules of law and customs of the realm:' immediately afterwards subjoins, 'and more necessary are they for defence upon indictments and appeals of felony, than upon other venial causes.' And the judges themselves are so sensible of this defect, that they never scruple to allow a prisoner Counsel to instruct him what questions to ask, or even to ask questions for him, with respect to matters of fact: for as to matters of law, arising on the trial, they are entitled to the assistance of Counsel."

And Mr. Christian on this matter observes that "it is very extraordinary that the law of England should have denied the assistance of counsel, when it is wanted most, viz. to defend the life, the honour, and all the property of an individual. It is the extension of that maxim of natural equity, that every one shall be heard in his own cause, that warrants the admission of hired advocates in courts of justice; for there is much greater inequality in the powers of explanation and persuasion in the natural state of the human mind, than when it is improved by education and experience." The remainder of Mr. Christian's note contains a very sufficient proof of the necessity of professional advocates to the administration of substantial justice, and some observations on the duties of such professional advocates, and on the course to be pursued by them. He refers to the authority of Cicero and Panætius on these subjects. A not unamusing dialogue upon the same topics, between the indecisive scrupulosity of Boswell, and the playful shrewdness of Johnson, is related in Boswell's Life of Johnson, v. 1, p. 298. 1st ed. 4to.

In the Case of lord Cornwallis, A. D. 1678, infra, the Lord High Steward (Heneage lord Finch, afterwards earl of Nottingham) says, that "There is no other good reason can be given why the law refuseth to allow the prisoner at the bar counsel in matter of fact, when his life is concerned, but only this, because the evidence by which he is condemned, ought to be so very evident and so plain, that all the counsel in the world should not be able to answer upon it." The like reason is given by lord Coke, 3 Inst. 137, and is cited by John Cook the Regicide (see his Case A. D. 1660, infra). Sir John Hawles, in his remarks on Colledge's Case (A. D. 1681, infra), enquires into some of the reasons alledged for this privation, but does not notice that on which lord Finch relies; nor does Emlyn in his learned Preface to his edition of the State Trials, republished in the first volume of this Collection, include the privation itself, in his enumeration of the hardships of the law: But sir Robert Atkyns, in his "Defence of the late lord Russell's Innocency," subjoined in this Collection, to the Account of lord Russell's Trial, A. D. 1683, powerfully illustrates the severity of the want of counsel. As to the saying that "The court is of counsel for the prisoner," he observes, "For my part I should never desire to depend upon that only, I know what this is by experience." See, too, sir John Hawles's Observations on the Proceedings towards the close of Charles the Second's reign, against several persons charged with High Treason.

For the valuable statute 7 W. 3, c. 3, we are indebted to the Jacobites, by whom it was first proposed, most resolutely and pertinaciously persisted in, and ultimately effected, in spite of very vehement and obstinate opposition, and after repeated failures. Its origin probably was owing chiefly to mere party spirit; in which same spirit it was accordingly resisted by the Whigs, and vilified by Burnet, who, as Foster has shewn, did not understand the act, and contradicts himself in what he says of it. It must be admitted, however, that during the period in which occurred the proceedings upon the Bill for Regulating of Trials in Cases of Treason, and Misprision of Treason, (see 5 Cobb. Parl. Hist. 965.) the friends of the Revolution might have better motives than mere party spirit, for opposing any proposition to facilitate the indemnity of persons, to whom treasonable conduct was imputed.

Sir William Parkyns was tried for High Treason (the Assassination Plot) on March 24th, 1695-6, (see his Case post.) after the stat. 7 W. 3, c. 3, had been enacted, but yet one day before the provisions of it were to be carried into effect. He strenuously urged an application for counsel, alledging that the statute was, as to the allowance of counsel, declarative of the Common Law, because it says, that "it was always just and reasonable." But the Chief Justice (Holt) replied, "We are to proceed according to what the law is, and not what it will be." Sir Michael Foster, in his relation, a little over-states the expression of Holt, who was wont himself to use expressions of sufficient clearness and strength. Foster omits to notice, that Parkyns particularly intreated for a delay of his Trial, which delay, though for only one day, would have given him a legal right to that aid, in the conduct of his defence, which the legislature had most solemnly declared was always just and reasonable. But the indulgence for which he prayed, was not granted to him. He was, however, allowed a solicitor, and had been apprised that he might have counsel to advise with before his trial.

It seems probable that the first case in which counsel was had under 7 W. 3, c. 3, was that of Rookwood, for the Assassination Plot, (see this Case A. D. 1696, post.) upon which occasion sir Bartholomew Shower, of counsel for the prisoner, thought fit to make a deprecatory speech to the Court, in answer to which, Chief Justice Holt told him it was expected he should do his best for those he was assigned for.

With respect to the allowance or refusal of Counsel or other assistance, the following account of what was done in some other Cases of Treason and other Felonies, both before and after the stat. 7 W. 3, c. 3, may not be unacceptable.

In the duke of Norfolk's Case, A. D. 1571. (see vol. 1, p. 966,) he applied to have counsel allowed him, for the answering of the Indictment, and he cited the case of Humphrey Stafford, who was indicted for High Treason, in the first year of H. 7, and had counsel allowed him. But it was answered by Chief Justice Dier, that Stafford had counsel only for an incidental point of law, concerning Sanctuary, and not upon the point or fact of High Treason. So the Duke was not allowed counsel.

In the Case of general Harrison, A. D. 1660, the prisoner desired, lest he should over-run his challenges, that the officer might acquaint him with the number, and the Court said, You shall know it: God forbid the contrary.

The English boy, who was concerned in the murder, was hanged at Tyburn.

In sir Henry Vane's Case for High Treason, A. D. 1662 infra, the prisoner repeatedly applied for counsel, but his applications were rejected. The points upon which he wished counsel for him to be heard were: 1. Whether the collective body of the parliament can be impeached of High Treason? 2. Whether any person acting by authority of parliament; can (so long as he acteth by that authority) commit treason? 3. Whether matters acted by that authority, can be called in question by an inferior Court? 4. Whether a king de jure, and out of possession, can have treason committed against him, he not being king de facto, and in actual possession? 5. Whether matters done in Southwark, in another county, may be given in evidence to a Middlesex Jury. In the earlier Trials of the Regicides, application had been made for counsel to be heard upon some of these points, and also upon the obligation of the Declaration of king Charles 2, but the applications were rejected.

In lord Stafford's Case, A. D. 1680, post. Counsel were assigned him for matters of law if such should arise, and they were allowed to stand by and hear the evidence, but it was obstinately insisted on the part of the crown, that they should not stand near enough to the prisoner to be able to prompt him, and it seems to have been agreed that they ought not to prompt him.

On Fitzharris's Arraignment for treason, A. D. 1681, post, the prisoner put in a plea setting forth, that he had been previously impeached in parliament for the same offence. Upon reading this plea, the Chief-Justice (Pemberton) said to him: "We use not to receive such pleadings as this without a counsel's hand to it." Thereupon, Fitzharris prayed counsel might be assigned to him; and being asked whom he would have, he named sir William Jones and six others. Ld. Ch. Just. "Here are a great many you name! We will not enjoin any counsel to serve you farther than they are willing themselves. As for sir William Jones, one of them you desire, he does not practise now in Westminster-hall, and therefore we cannot assign you him unless he please." The prisoner then omitting Jones, named four; who were assigned to him. Some altercation between the bench and the bar afterwards took place, concerning the rule allowing the counsel's attendance upon the prisoner, and it was agreed that they were to have liberty to speak with him alone. Upon his Trial, Fitzharris was refused permission that his solicitor might be by him; and the counsel for the crown endeavoured to prevent his wife's giving him assistance; but, the Chief Justice said, "sure it is no such huge matter to let a man's wife stand by him, if she will demean herself handsomely and fairly;" and he said it was always done that a person should assist the prisoner to take notes for him to help his memory.

In the Case of Busby, post, tried at the summer assizes 1681 at Derby, for treason, the prisoner begging he might be allowed counsel, was told by the Judge (baron Street) that if any point in law arose he should be allowed counsel; presently afterwards the same Judge told him to have a care at his peril to challenge peremptorily above the number of thirty five.

Colledge (see his Case A. D. 1681) previously to his Trial, petitioned the king for the use of pen, ink, and paper, and that his children and Mr. Aaron Smith an attorney, and Mr. Robert West a barrister (see Hawles's Remarks) might have leave to come to him. The king ordered that he should have the use of pen, ink and paper, and that he might converse with his children, and Smith, and West, as often as he should desire, in presence and hearing of the warder; He afterwards petitioned that counsel and a solicitor might be assigned to him, that they might have free access to, and private conferences with him, and that he might have a copy of the Jurors to be returned upon his Trial some days before the Trial. In answer to which it was ordered by his majesty in Council, "That the friends and relations of Stephen Colledge, a prisoner in the Tower, shall have liberty of visiting and freely conversing with him; and the Lieutenant of the Tower having first caused their names to be taken in writing, is to suffer such friends and relations to have access to the said Stephen Colledge, without any interruption accordingly." Upon his Trial he asked for a list of the Jury, a copy of the Indictment, and counsel to advise him in matter of law. Neither was granted, and Lord Chief Justice North said, "You cannot have counsel unless matter of law arise, and that must be propounded by you, and then if it be a matter debatable the court will assign you counsel, but it must be upon a matter fit to be argued; for I must tell you a defence in case of High-Treason ought not to be made by artificial cavils, but by plain fact." A long altercation ensued.

When Boroski, upon his trial at the Old-Bailey A. D. 1682, (see the Case, infra), for the murder of Mr. Thynne, applied for the assistance of counsel, Chief Justice Pemberton said he was charged with matter of fact: counsel could do him no good in such a case.

In Algernon Sidney's Case for Treason, A. D. 1683, infra, Jeffries, the Chief Justice, told him, "Because no prisoner under your circumstances is to have counsel, but in special cases to be assigned in matters of law, the Court is bound by their oaths and duty of their places, that they shall not see any wrong done to you." Before pleading, he asked for counsel, in order, as it seems, to be advised with as to the sufficiency of the Indictment; but his request was refused, the Chief Justice saying, "If you assign us any particular point of law, if the Court think it such a point as may be worth the debating, you shall have counsel." After some farther altercation, he pleaded Not Guilty. On his Trial, a fortnight afterwards, it appeared that after his pleading, counsel had moved on his behalf for a copy of the Indictment, which the Court had refused. On his Trial two persons whom he desired were allowed to write for him. In the course of his Trial he desired counsel as to the point of there being but one witness, but was told, that was a point of fact. Then he desired counsel to the point that conspiring to levy war is not Treason; upon which also he cited Throgmorton's Case: but the Chief Justice said, "You had as good ask me, whether the first chapter in Littleton be law." Counsel was also refused to him to argue his objection to his jury for want of freeholds.

See, too, in Sidney's Case, the Note referring to Rosewell's Case.

In Lord Russell's Trial, A. D. 1683, infra, he asked if he might have somebody to write to help his memory. The Attorney General (Sir Robert Sawyer) answered, "Yes, a servant," to prevent, observes Dalrymple, the aid of counsel. He afterwards asked counsel (it appeared that counsel to advise with had been previously assigned him elsewhere) to challenge in London for want of freehold; and three whom he desired were assigned. He afterwards desired to have his counsel heard as to whether two witnesses should not prove the same overt act; and whether conspiring to levy war was treason; but Chief Justice Pemberton would not permit it.

In Rosewell's Case, for Treason, A. D. 1684, infra, he asked for counsel at the time of his arraignment and before he pleaded; but Holloway, Justice, told him, "We cannot assign you counsel at present, for we hear nothing to assign it upon. If there do any question of law arise in your Case, then the Court will (as they are bound to do) take care of you that you suffer no prejudice for want of the assistance of counsel, and in matters of fact upon your Trial, the Court are of counsel for you:" nor would they permit counsel to come to him in the interval between his arraignment and trial; but by the consent of the Attorney General he was allowed, in the presence of the keeper, to see his wife and children. On his Trial he asked for and was allowed the use of pen, ink and paper, before the Jury was sworn, and Jeffries, Chief Justice, told him there should be sure to be notice taken that he might not be surprized as to the number of his peremptory challenges. Afterwards the prisoner being brought up for judgment objected, in arrest of judgment, that the words imputed to him were not, as laid in the Indictment, treasonable, and the Court thinking apparently that there was great weight in what he had objected; assigned him three counsel, whom he named, to argue upon the insufficiency of the indictment, which they were not permitted to see. Jefferies in refusing them a copy of the Indictment seems to admit that this denial was a hardship on the prisoner, and proceeds, "I think it is a hard case that a man should have counsel to defend himself for a twopenny trespass, and his witnesses examined upon oath, but if he steal, commit murder or felony, nay, high treason, where life, estate, honour, and all are concerned, he shall neither have counsel nor his witnesses examined upon oath."

In the Case of Joseph Hayes for Treason, A. D. 1684, infra, when the prisoner asked that counsel might be heard against the admissibility of comparison of hands as evidence, adding he had been informed it had been denied to be evidence (he quoted Lady Carr's Case), it was refused; Jefferies saying, "Somebody has put it into your head, and puffed you up with a vain story: there is no such thing; it is a fiction, a mere whim only said by Mr. Sidney, and no ground in the world for it." And when the prisoner afterwards objected that his Trial was not, as it ought to have been, under the Stat. 35 H. 8, c. 2, and desired counsel to argue that point, Jefferies refused it: "We are of another opinion. If any whimsical notions are put into you by some enthusiastic counsel, the Court is not to take notice of their crotchets."

Sir Thomas Armstrong, (see his Case A. D. 1684, infra), being arraigned upon an outlawry for treason, and alledging that he was beyond sea at the time of the outlawry, that the year was not yet expired, and that he then was ready to render himself and did render himself, and claiming the benefit of sect. 8 of the stat. 5 and 6 E. 6, c. 11. (to which it has been since repeatedly decided that he was entitled) prayed for counsel to plead for him in that case. Ch. Just. Jefferies, "For what reason? We are of opinion it is not a matter of any doubt. For you must not go under the apprehension that we deny you any thing that is right. There is no doubt nor difficulty in the thing."

In lord Delamere's Case, A. D. 1686, post, the Lord High Steward (Jefferies) tells the prisoner, "You cannot by the course of law have counsel allowed you in the case of a capital crime, till such time as the Court where you are called to answer is apprised that there is some matter of law in your Case that may need counsel to be heard to inform their judgment, and which they may think convenient to hear counsel to: For if in case any prisoner at the bar shall beforehand be allowed to have counsel to start frivolous objections such as this, and we all know that there are some who laying the blame of the quarrel and murder upon the English in that business, will be easily prevailed with to endeavour to pick holes where there are none, and to offer matters foreign from the things whereof the party stands accused, and upon the prisoner's bare request counsel must be heard to every trivial point, the Courts of Law would never be at an end in any trial, but some dilatory matter or other would be found to retard the proceedings: But it does not consist with the grandeur of the Court nor your lordship's interest to let such a frivolous plea interrupt your lordship's trial. However, if your lordship has counsel ready I will not refuse to hear them." Lord Delamere in vain urged that he could not have counsel there ready, because none were assigned to him. Jefferies told him, He could not tell how to help that.

When lord Preston (see his Case, A. D. 1690, infra) desired that he might be heard by counsel on a point of law, it was ruled that the Court were not to assign counsel but upon matter which they apprehended required debate. And when lord Preston urged that there was a doubt in the Case, it was replied by Atkins, Chief Baron, That it was not the doubt of the prisoner, but the doubt of the Court that will occasion the assigning of counsel.

In Ashton's Case for Treason, A. D. 1690, post, the prisoner, after obtaining from the Court the use of pen, ink, and paper, desired likewise that they would give his solicitor leave to be as near him as possible, only to refresh his memory if he should forget any thing. Ld. Ch. Just. Holt: "That is a thing you cannot of right demand, the other of pen, ink, and paper, you may." Prisoner: "My lord, I shall acknowledge it as a very great favour." Ld. Ch. Just. Holt: "That is an innovation that ought not to be, the Court cannot allow it."

In Anderton's Case, A. D. 1693, infra, it is stated, that the prisoner alledged that the matter given in evidence against him was not sufficient to make an overt-act, and prayed that he might have counsel allowed him to plead, it being a matter of law, to which the Court replied, that there was no room for any counsel to be assigned him, for there was no matter of law for them to plead to, and therefore desired him not to give the Court any unnecessary trouble. In the account of Anderton's Trial, published by Grascomb, a non-juror, and inserted in this Collection, it is stated, that "the prisoner desired he might have the benefit of counsel upon the question, Whether printing were treason? But the Court peremptorily denied to him, what was (as the learned in the law tell me) never denied to any man before, counsel as to matter of law."

Charneck, who, together with two others, was tried for High Treason on March 11th

After a few private words and passages of 1696, fourteen days before the operation of the stat. 7 W. 3, c. 7, struggled hard for counsel to assist him in his Trial, and to direct him how to manage himself, as well as for a copy of his Indictment; alledging the ground of the act, and the reasonableness and equity that all prisoners should be made capable of fairly defending themselves. Both his requests were refused. See the Case, infra, where it appears, an Order had been given that counsel should be permitted to come to the prisoners, and be with them in private previously to the Trial. See too what passed on Charnock's saying, He had been informed that Ch. Just. Treby had in a conference between the two houses declared his opinion, that by the common law a person arraigned for high treason should have a copy of the Indictment and counsel to assist him in his defence. Charnock desired that the Indictment might be read to him, which in Latin was read over to him twice, and it seems that he was previously allowed pen, ink, and paper. He afterwards hoped the Court would give him leave to have his solicitor or a friend by him during his Trial, that he might be instructed in some measure how to manage himself, and when it would be proper for him to speak, and what: but Holt, Ch. Just. said, "No, we can order no such thing. You must speak for yourself." It appeared that an order had been given, for a copy of the pannel to be delivered, which the Chief Justice noticed was not of right, but of favour."

When Sir John Friend, (see his Case, A. D. 1695, post, requested), that if any matter of law should arise upon his trial he might be heard by his counsel, Holt, Ch. Just., answered, "If any matter of law do arise at your Trial, and you will tell us what that matter of law is, and the court see that it is a matter of doubt, we can, and ought, and no question shall assign you counsel." But upon the prisoner's further application, the Ch. Just. added, "We are bound to tell you when any thing of that nature appears before us."

In Cranburne's Case (A. D. 1696, infra) when sir B. Shower, counsel for the prisoner, expressed his hope that the officer of the court took an account of the challenges, Holt, Ch. Just. said, "Nay, you should take care of the challenges, who are his counsel. If he had no counsel, we would take care of him."

In lord Warwick's Case, for murder, A. D. 1699, post, counsel were assigned him in case any matters of law should arise.

In the Case of Kidd, for murder and piracy, A. D. 1701, post, counsel were assigned him and were heard in support of an application to put off the Trial.

It appears by Mr. Hatsell's Precedents, vol. 4, p. 266, that Sacheverell, (see his Case, infra, A. D. 1709-10) on February 13th, petitioned the Lords to acquaint them, that some of the counsel allowed to assist him, had returned their fees, and refused to assist him, and therefore praying that the Lords would assign other counsel, and also a solicitor, to which the Lords agreed.

In the Case of the Earl of Wintoun, impeached of Treason, A. D. 1716, post, it appears that sir Thomas Powis and Mr. Mead, to whom he had caused application to be made to appear for him, excused themselves, whereupon he presented a Petition for time to nominate other counsel, which was granted, and sir Constantine Phipps, and Mr. Peer Williams were afterwards assigned to him. Upon a subsequent day (March 14th) it appears, that "Upon reading the Petition of George Earl of Wintoun, praying that this house [of lords] will be pleased to assign and add Mr. Kettelby, and Dr. Strahan to his counsel, formerly named, and that they may have access to him during his confinement. It is Ordered, That the counsel above-mentioned be assigned the petitioner to be heard to matters of law, but not to matters of fact, so as not to put off the petitioner's Trial; and that they or either of them, have access to the petitioner from time to time at all seasonable times." In the same Case, the Lord High Steward (lord Cowper) told the prisoner, "The counsel assigned you are not to cross-examine any witnesses, nor to give you any assistance, public or private, while matter of fact only is in question; but if any matter of law arise during the course of your Trial, they may speak to it in your lordship's behalf, and to that end are permitted to be within hearing, that they may be the more ready to serve your lordship on such occasion."

In the Case of lord Oxford, A. D. 1717, post, who was charged, in one Impeachment, with High Treason and also High Crimes and Misdemeanors, the Lord High Steward (lord Cowper) acquainted the prisoner and others whom it might concern, with such Orders as the Lords had made, one of which was, "That counsel for the Lord (the prisoner at the bar) may be present at the bar in order to be heard to any matter or point of law (if any such shall arise) relating to the High Treason, and also to make that Lord's full Defence on the Articles of Impeachment of High Crimes and Misdemeanors, as well in matters of fact as matters of law."

In the Case of Lord Balmerino, infra, A. D. 1746, upon an indictment for treason, the prisoner, nearly three weeks before the day appointed for his Trial, petitioned that an attorney whom he named should be assigned solicitor for him, which was accordingly ordered on the same day, and also that he might have access to him at all seasonable times; but counsel was not desired or ordered. Very early in the Trial, before any witness had been called, he made an interlocutory objection, and thereupon the Lord High Steward, lord Hardwicke, asked him, If he would have counsel assigned him?

him his beads and crucifix, laid his head on the block, and it was chopt off at two blows. The and he answered, No. He afterwards, in the course of the Trial, took a frivolous objection, which after some argument on the part of the Crown he abandoned. However the Lords thought fit to ask the opinions of the judges, which were given unanimously against the objection. And the prisoner then admitted that he had previously had the advice of counsel to the same effect. After conviction, he started another objection in arrest of judgment. The Lord High Steward seems to have thought that in that late stage of the business, considering that the prisoner had declined to have counsel to make his full defence, and that it appeared he had had the advice of counsel upon his case, the Lords should, before appointing counsel to argue a particular point, have that point so far opened as to see whether there was any colour in it or not. However upon adjourning to the Chamber of Parliament, the Lords unanimously resolved, That in case the prisoner desired it, they would assign him such counsel as he should propose. Two were accordingly assigned; but, when they attended on a subsequent day as had been appointed, the prisoner abandoned his objection, and would not give the Lords the trouble of hearing them.

So in the Case of lord Lovat, A. D. 1747, post, who was tried upon an Impeachment for High Treason, it was ordered, That the counsel assigned the prisoner might be present when he was at the bar, in order to be heard touching any point or matter of law, if any such should arise during the Trial. When the Managers for the House of Commons were proceeding to examine witnesses, lord Lovat begged that his counsel or solicitors might be allowed to examine his witnesses, and to cross-examine those produced on behalf of the Crown, and to take Notes. Lord Hardwicke, Lord High Steward, stated, that the known and clear law in these cases was, that his counsel and solicitors had liberty to assist him in all matters of law that might arise in the course of his Trial, but not to assist him in matters of fact or in the examination of witnesses. As to taking Notes, the Lord High Steward said, he had observed, that while the Managers were speaking, one of the prisoner's solicitors took Notes, which had been allowed. Upon this lord Lovat said, that by reason of his infirmities (he was eighty years of age) it would be impossible for him to make any defence at all, if his counsel or solicitors were not allowed to examine the witnesses. The Lord High Steward then asked the Managers, whether they had any thing to offer on that head; and it was answered on their part, that whatever inclination they might have to indulge the noble lord at the bar, it was not in their power to depart from the law of the land. The prisoner's counsel and solicitors were not allowed to assist him in the examination or cross-examination of witnesses.

rest condemned for the murder were all reprieved*.

The Articles of Peace were signed by the Portugal ambassador, who thereupon went out of town†.

It may not be impertinent to add what appears in Whitelocke, under date August 5th,

In the Case of earl Ferrers, for Murder, A. D. 1760, post, it appears by the speech of the Lord High Steward (Henley) that the prisoner had "pursuant to the course of that Judicature had his own counsel assigned" to him, so that "he was enabled to make such defence as was most for his benefit and advantage." But though his counsel might advise him what defence to make, he was compelled himself to make it; neither did his counsel examine his witnesses nor cross-examine those for the prosecution. The defence adopted was that of insanity. There is some appearance of absurdity in requiring a prisoner himself to conduct this defence. Mr. Yorke, the Solicitor General, in his Reply on the part of the Crown, argued against the validity of the defence, from, among other matters, the ability with which it was conducted.

In the Trial for Bigamy, a clergyable felony, of the duchess of Kingston (as she called herself) before the House of Lords, A. D. 1776, post, all the examination and cross-examination, on the part of the prisoner, of witnesses, was conducted by her counsel.

* Whitelocke does not mention by what authority they were reprieved. Mrs. Macaulay says of this reprieve, "This exertion of power in Cromwell was contrary to an Article in the Instrument of Government, which denied the supreme governor the liberty of granting pardon for murder." The third Article of the Instrument of Government, was, "That all writs, processes, commissions, patents, grants, and other things which now run in the name and stile of 'The Keepers of the Liberty of England, by authority of Parliament,' shall run in the name and style of the Lord Protector, from whom, for the future, shall be derived all magistracy and honours in these three nations, and shall have the power of pardons, (except in cases of murder and treason,) and benefit of all forfeitures for the public use. And shall govern the said countries and dominions, in all things, by the advice of the council, and according to these presents and the laws." The Instrument of Government is inserted at large in the Memorials of Whitelocke, by whom, principally, it is supposed to have been contrived. It will also be found in 3 Cobb. Parl. Hist. p. 1417.

† In a letter from La Bastide de la Croix to De Baas, dated London, [10 July, 1654,] it is said, "This morning, at eight of the clock, the Portugal ambassador signed his Treaty, and departed from" [qu. for] "Gravesend at ten. His brother was beheaded this afternoon, and his man hanged at Tyburn." 2 Thurl. 439.

in this same year 1654, that the Portugal ambassador at Gravesend, in his voyage homewards, was arrested by some merchants of London, to whom he owed great sums of money which they had lent him here, and they stopped his journey*.

From a passage in May, introduced in a note to lord Macguire's Case, in vol. 3, p. 654 of this Collection, it appears, that when Mrs. Leviston's room was searched in 1644, upon the occasion of the escape of lord Macguire and Mac Mahone, "because the French minister had lodgings in her house, to prevent any occasion of offence, a declaration was drawn up to give his most Christian majesty satisfaction touching that affair."

The following article is extracted from Thurloe's State Papers, vol. 2, p. 267.

"To the right honourable Council sitting at Whitehall. The Commissioners for managing estates under sequestration, sitting at Haberdashers' Hall, do humbly represent, that the Commissioners for London have certified them of an arrear of 3,000*l.* or thereabouts, due for the rent of a house belonging to the marquis of Winchester, from the Spanish ambassador, which hath been formerly demanded of him; but the said ambassador refused to hear of the same from any committee, or to give his answer thereupon to any other than to the Parliament or Council of State. This hath been made known to the then Council of State, during the sitting of the late Parliament, about two years since; and they were pleased to take some time to consider the same, but never ordered any thing therein, as we have heard. We therefore thought it our duty to present the same to your honours, humbly submitting it to consideration, by whom, and in what manner, a further demand thereof shall be made; and whether your honours shall think fit to give any order herein unto us. * In another place, Whitelocke briefly notices a matter involving the Privileges of Embassadors and their attendants: "Feb. 28, 1655-6. Some of the Swedish ambassador's gentlemen had a little quarrel with two fiddlers in a tavern, and beat them, for calling the gentlemen Swedish dogs, and other foul language and ill carriage of the fiddlers, who were drunk, yet alderman Tichburn bound over the gentlemen to the sessions, being apprehended by a constable: and the fiddlers, in actions of battery against one of the gentlemen, had a verdict for forty pounds damages. The ambassador was highly exasperated at this affront, and, as he called it, "breach of the privilege of an ambassador," and complained of it; upon which his servants had no farther trouble, which gave full contentment to the ambassador."

VOL. V.

Dr. Zouch, who was one of the delegates appointed by Cromwell to investigate this business, published, in 1657, a Latin Tract upon the Inviolability of Ambassadors, under the title of "Solutio questionis de Legati delinquentis competente Judicio," in the preface to which he gave a short account of the transaction. This work, including Zouch's Preface, was republished, with an English translation on the alternate pages, in the year 1717, when the proceedings against Count Gyllenberg, the Ambassador from Sweden to Great Britain, had called the public attention to the Rights and Liabilities of Ambassadors.—From a copy of this work in the Bodleian Library, has been taken the following translation of Zouch's Preface:

"On the 22nd of November, 1653, there happened an unlucky accident in a mad, but premeditated riot, which was raised by the retinue of the Portuguese ambassador, chiefly upon the account of his brother. For an English gentleman walking in the New-Exchange at London, and thinking no harm, was basely killed by a pistol-shot. The most eminent the Lord Protector, shewing a just concern both for the blood of an English subject, and the pretended privilege of an ambassador, consulted the most eminent professors both of the common and civil law, how such a barbarous murder might be punished: But these disagreeing among themselves, his highness thought fit to leave the decision of this affair to a Court of Delegates, consisting of the Chief Justice and two other judges, the same number of gentlemen, and three doctors of the civil law. When the ambassador's brother and the other offenders were brought before this Court, he who was supposed by some to be a colleague in the embassy, vaunted there he was his king's ambassador, and subject to the jurisdiction of no one else: but producing the king of Portugal's letters, all that appeared from them, was, that the king intended in a little time to recall his brother, and to give him commission to manage his affairs in England. But this being judged insufficient to prove him an ambassador, he was, without any further regard to the privileges of that character, ordered, himself as well as the rest, to plead to the Indictment: And accordingly pleaded Not Guilty. But witnesses appearing, and relating the whole matter of fact upon oath, they were all convicted and condemned to die. The ambassador's brother having been discovered in an attempt to make his escape, was afterwards executed, together with an English servant of his. The author of a book, entitled "De jure et judicio inter gentes," being of the civilians present at his trial; and who, in the case of punishing a criminal ambassador, seems to agree with Hugo Grotius, as he does in many other cases, has thought it worth his while in an affair of such importance, to examine further what is more agreeable to the law of nations. To this purpose, he carefully read over all the authors he could meet with on this subject, diligently observing what they had borrowed from others; and having faithfully collected, digested, and considered the arguments for and against the immunity of an ambassador, observing that those against the opinion of Grotius were weaker than those which were for it; he made no scruple of submitting his own thoughts and observations to the examination of the public; being fully satisfied that the immunity of an ambassador, as determined by Grotius, has the greatest tendency to preserve peace and commerce between princes and states; and that if it be received under those limitations which he has settled, it can never deceive or injure the safety and government of the prince."

In the same year (1717) David Jones's translation of Zouch's work was published, without the original, in London. This publication was dedicated to General Stanhope, who was at that time First Lord of the Treasury and Chancellor of the Exchequer. In the translator's preface the following Narrative* of this business was inserted. It contains, with some trifling variations, the account given in 3 Clarendon's Hist. of the Rebellion, 492. It should, however, be noticed that Lord Clarendon calls the punishment of Don Pantaleon de Sa, "a very exemplary piece of justice."

"Oliver Cromwell, in the year 1653, having assumed the supreme power into his own hands, by the title of Lord Protector; among other potentates who courted his friendship, the king of Portugal sent an ambassador to beg a peace, and to purchase it by the payment of a great sum of money.† The ambassador had a very splendid equipage, and in his retinue his brother Don Pantaleon de Sa, a knight of Malta, and a man eminent for many great actions; who out of curiosity accompanied his brother in this embassy, that he might see England. He was a gentleman of a haughty and imperious nature, and one day being in the New Exchange in the Strand, upon a sudden accident and mistake had a quarrel with one Mr. Gerard, a relation of the lord Gerard, afterwards earl of Macclesfield, who had then returned some negligence and contempt to the rhodomontades of the Portuguese, and had left him sensible of receiving some affront: whereupon Don Pantaleon repaired thither again the next day, with several servants, better armed and provided for an encounter, imagining he should there find his former adversary, who expected no such visit. But the Portuguese not distinguishing persons, and finding many gentlemen walking there, and amongst the rest one Mr. Greenaway, a gentleman of Lincolns-Inn, whom he fancied like the other, he thought he was not to lose the opportunity, but entered into a new quarrel; in which Mr. Greenaway, utterly unacquainted with what had formerly passed, and walking there accidentally, was killed with a pistol-shot, and others wounded.

"This unhappy accident came to pass on the 22nd of November: upon which the people rising from all the neighbouring parts, Don Pantaleon thought fit to make his retreat to his brother's house, caused the gates to be shut up, and put all the servants in arms to defend it against the people, who had pursued him, and now flocked thither from all quarters to apprehend those who had caused the riot, and slain the gentleman.

"The ambassador knew nothing of the affair; and looking upon himself as affronted and assaulted by a rude multitude, took care to defend his house till the government should allay the tumult. Cromwell, who was soon informed of the insolence, sent an officer with some soldiers to demand and seize upon all those who had been engaged in the action, and the ambassador came to be informed of the truth of the story, with which he was exceedingly afflicted and astonished: The officer demanded the person of his brother, who was well known, and the rest of those who were present, to be delivered up to him, without which he would break open the house, and find them wherever they were concealed.

"The ambassador insisted upon the privilege that was due to his house by the law of nations, and which he would defend against any violence with his own life, and the lives of all his family; but finding the officer resolute, and that he was not strong enough for the encounter, he desired he might have so much time allowed him, as to send to the Protector; which being granted, he complained of the injury which was done him, and desired an audience. Cromwell sent him word that a gentleman had been murdered, and several other persons wounded, and that justice must be satisfied; and therefore required that all the persons concerned might be delivered into his officer's hands, without which, if he should order the soldiers to withdraw and demit the demand, the people would pull down the house, and execute justice themselves; the event of which he would not answer for: when that was done, he should have audience, and all the satisfaction that was in his power to give him.

"The ambassador desired that his brother and the rest might continue in his house, and he would be responsible and bring them forth to justice, at a time which should be appointed for them: but nothing of this kind would serve, the delivery of the persons was positively insisted upon, and the people increased their cry, that they would pull down the house. Whereupon the ambassador was obliged to deliver up his brother, and the other offenders, who were all sent prisoners to Newgate.

"Being thus got into fast hold, and the Protector desirous that an inquisition should be made for the blood of a subject, and at the same time solicitous for the privilege of an ambassador, as Don Pantaleon the prisoner was affirmed to be; by the advice of his council had recourse to the opinions of the most eminent lawyers, both common and civil, how such a notorious murder might be punished: but they not agreeing among themselves, he appointed the Chief Justice, and two more, as many noblemen, and three doctors of the civil law, viz. our author Dr. Zouch, who was sent for from Oxford on purpose, Dr. William Clerk, and Dr. William Turner, to take cognizance of, and examine into this knotty affair.

* It is printed from a copy obligingly imparted by the present Earl Stanhope. (A. D. 1809.) His lordship's grandfather, General Stanhope, (the first Earl) was Secretary of State when Gyllenberg was seized.

† This is not quite correct. Cromwell was not Lord Protector, but only Lord General, when Mr. Greenway or Greenaway was killed. See the note to p. 465.

"Don Pantaleon, the ambassador's brother, and the other offenders of the family, making their appearance before them, Don Pantaleon, whom some took to be a colleague in the embassy, vaunted that he was the king his master's ambassador, and was not subject to any other jurisdiction whatsoever. And then producing the king of Portugal's letters, all that appeared by them was, that the king intended in a short time to recal his brother, and to give him a commission to negotiate his affairs in England, which being not at all sufficient to entitle him to the privilege of an ambassador, all thoughts that there was any regard to be had to him on that account were laid aside; and a resolution taken to have him, with the rest of them, tried for the crimes laid to their charge.

"The ambassador used all imaginable instances in behalf of his brother, when at the same time he expressed his willingness to leave the rest to the mercy of the law; but he could receive no other answer but that justice must be done, and justice was done, to the full. I know that there was a report, which subsists to this day, that the then government should acquaint the king of Portugal with the misadventure; and that he should send answer, He left the criminals entirely to be punished by our law, and in our country. But since our histories are wholly silent in this respect, I dare aver nothing concerning it; and perhaps the temper and haughtiness of Cromwell would not let him come into such a condescension, in respect to a crown that was then buying a peace of him at a full price, and upon the humblest submission.

"On the 5th of July, 1654, the persons commissioned to try the offenders were sir Henry Blount, famous for his wit, and a gentleman that lived almost to our times, our author Dr. Richard Zouch, Dr. William Clerk, Dr. William Turner, civilians, Mr. Lacy, &c. They sat in the Upper Bench, as they then called it, in Westminster-hall; where the prisoners were arraigned, and pleaded Not Guilty.* I should have been glad to have been able to give the substance of the trials; but having never met with any footsteps of it in all my inquiries, it remains for me to observe, that Don Pantaleon and an English boy, who was his servant, were convicted of murder and a riot, and received sentence of death accordingly. There were three more, all Portuguese, tried at the same time, and all of them likewise convicted, condemned, and executed, according to the Lord Clarendon's Account, at Tyburn: but Zouch mentions no other to have suffered than the English boy and Don Pantaleon; who after he had endeavoured in vain to make his escape, was, on the 10th of July, beheaded on a scaffold upon Tower-hill. It is remarkable, that that unfortunate gentleman Mr. Gerard above-mentioned, was a few hours before, in the same place, beheaded for a pretended conspiracy against Cromwell, a design to seize the Tower, and to proclaim the king; and that Don Pantaleon's brother, the ambassador, even on the very same day, was terrified into a ready signing of the peace between the king his master, the Protector, and the Commonwealth of England."

Oldmixon, who takes his account from Whitelocke, observes, "The Lord Clarendon, quite contrary to Whitelocke and the fact, says the rest were hanged at Tyburn; to make Cromwell as bloody minded as he could:" and he proceeds, "It is said, the Spanish Ambassador forwarded this execution as much as lay in his power, saying 'Don John of Portugal is an Usurper and no lawful King, and Don Pantaleon may be executed without violating the Rights and Privileges of Ambassadors.'" He farther says, "The Emperor of Germany brought this prosecution as a precedent, to justify his carrying off the Prince of Furstemberg, Plenipotentiary at the Treaty of Cologne twenty years after, and in the Manifesto his Imperial Majesty published, this piece of Cromwell's Justice in executing the Portuguese gentleman is cited at large; though the whole herd of writers against him talk of it as a breach of the Law of Nations."

Guthrie, without referring to any authority, says, that "when Colonel Whaley invested the Ambassador's House with a party of horse, the Ambassador ordered his domestics to stand to their arms, and sent to complain to Cromwell of a breach of the Law of Nations. Cromwell with great magnanimity answered, that Justice must be done, and that blood must be satisfied with blood. All the other foreign Ambassadors in and about London took a very warm concern in the matter, not being able to conceive that a Man of Quality, an Ambassador's brother, and Knight of Malta, as Don Pantaleon was, ought to be questioned for the murder of a mechanic; for so they judged an English gentleman to be. But all remonstrances to Cromwell were ineffectual, and the Ambassador's brother, at once to the amazement and admiration of the world, was tried, condemned, and publicly executed for the murder."

* Lord Clarendon says they were all brought to their trial at the sessions at Newgate.

Carte grossly misrepresents this transaction as follows:

"The king of Portugal had been, by the terror of the English fleet, and the losses he and his subjects had suffered by the intercepting of their ships from Brasil, and the general interruption of their commerce, obliged to send over an ambassador to treat for a peace with England. The rump had insisted on such hard conditions in the preliminaries, to which an assent was demanded in six days, before they would enter on a treaty, that Don Juan de Guimaraes, who was first employed on that subject, returned home without any success. In expectation of a gentler treatment from Cromwell, whose circumstances rendered a war very inconvenient to him, the Conde de Cantenairo was sent to London, with the character of ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary; to renew the old alliance between the two kingdoms; which was clogged with new demands. These were, the release of English merchants and their goods, arrested at Lisbon, which was not so much as disputed; and the sum of 180,000*l.* as well for damages done to the English by P. Rupert's squadron, which had been received into that port, and there protected, as for the charges of reducing the revolted ships to obedience, which was submitted to, upon an abatement of the sum demanded. The article for the English merchants at Lisbon to meet for the free exercise of their religion, seems to have been qualified, by allowing them the use of the English service in their private houses, and on board their shipping. An obligation on the Portuguese, not to raise their duties on merchandize, to hire no ships but English for their navigation, to grant these last a monopoly or pre-emption in the trade for salt, and to allow them a free liberty of commerce in all their ports of Brasil and the East-Indies, were demands very disagreeable to the Portuguese, but all complied with, except the last, from which Cromwell thought fit to recede, as too unreasonable and contrary to the practice of all nations, which had colonies in the Indies. During this treaty, Don Pantaleon Sa, a young gentleman, brother to the ambassador, being at the New Exchange, on Monday, Nov. 21, 1653, there happened some rodomohtado discourses, in which he conceived himself affronted, as several English likewise did, one whereof, Mr. Thomas Howard, when they met at the same place the next evening, demanded satisfaction of him, and some drew their swords; which was likewise done by the ambassador's servants, no otherwise armed, and one Greenway, an Englishman, was killed. The fray appears to have been accidental: but all the English being in a fury at the death of their countryman, the mob threatened to pull down the ambassador's house; and Cromwell sending a troop of guards to demand the parties concerned, they were delivered and committed to Newgate. Don Pantaleon's escape, and lying for some time concealed, or a dispute about the privileges of an ambassador in such a case, caused the Trial to be put off till July 5, when being indicted before Rolles, chief justice of the Upper Bench, assisted by half a dozen common lawyers, and as many civilians, he was found guilty by a jury, half English and half foreigners, as were likewise four of his servants. The plea which he had made of Privilege was not so much as suffered to be argued, and he was threatened to be pressed to death immediately, if he did not plead directly to the indictment. The quarrel being sudden, and the death of Greenway unpremeditated, the crime seemed to be manslaughter, rather than murder: but Cromwell made of it a political affair; making the ambassador a thousand professions of kindness, and promising soon to restore him his brother. It was likewise given him to understand, that the prosecution had been carried on purely to get him to sign a rigorous article, that obstructed the conclusion of the treaty; which the ambassador, deluded by these promises and suggestions, presently signed. Cromwell, having thus treacherously gained his point, gave up Don Pantaleon to the rage of the populace: this young nobleman was, on July 10, beheaded upon Tower-hill; one of his servants was hanged at Tyburn; and the ambassador departed the same afternoon for Lisbon."

Hume treats this business with great carelessness, and what little he says of it is incongruous in itself, as well as inconsistent with the facts of the case. He first calls it, "an act of justice, which gave satisfaction, though the regularity of it may perhaps appear somewhat doubtful," and in the same page says, "that the laws of nations were plainly violated in it." He also, trusting to the allegation of Don Pantaleon in his Petition to Cromwell, (2 Thurloe 429) says, that he was joined with his brother the ambassador in the same commission, which allegation appears from Zouch's and Whitelocke's accounts to be untrue. Mr. Christian [Blackst Comm. B. 1 c. 7, note 4] seems to have been misled by Hume and thus his observations and authorities concerning the inviolability of an ambassador are not exactly in point. Upon the whole, as Mr. Ward has observed, the Case of Don Pantaleon Sa, however it may militate against the exemption from trial of an ambassador's attendants, yet proves nothing either one way or the other with respect to the ambassador himself.

Bishop Burnet had a just view of the facts of this Case. In his "Summary of Affairs before the Restoration," in the first vol. of the History of his own Time, he says, "The putting the brother of the king of Portugal's ambassador to death, for murder, was the carrying justice very far, since though in the strictness of the Law of Nations it is only the ambassador's own person, that is exempted from any authority but his master's that sends him; yet the practice had gone in favour of all that the ambassador owned to belong to him."

The following documents, printed in Thurloe's State Papers, concern this matter.

An intercepted Letter of Sir W. Vane to Sir John Sayers, Major to the Lord of Oxford's regiment at the Hague.

Dear Jack ;

Here is a foolish Portugal Ambassador, whose brother pretending to have received some affronts in the New Exchange, came the other night 50, or 60 of them, armed, swords, pistols, coats of mail, and coaches full of gun-powder, to have blowed up the New Exchange, if they could not have gotten in ; they found almost nobody there, only 4 or 5 gentlemen, of whom they killed two. The General at 12 o'clock sent to take the brother, and 7 or 8 more, out of his house, which the Ambassador was forced to yield to. [1 Thurloe's State Papers, 610.]

Extract of a Letter from Mons. de Bordeaux, the French Resident in England, to Mons. Brienne the Secretary of State in France, 6 December 1653. (N. S.)

J'ajouterai une petite rencontre arrivée depuis deux jours à l'ambassadeur de Portugal. Son frere et toute sa famille pretendans avoir été maltraités par quelques gentilhommes Anglois dans la Bourse, se résolurent Mardi d'en avoir raison, et se rendirent au même lieu sur le soir armés, de cottes de maille, brassarts, rondaches, pistolets, grenades, et petards ; se saisirent des portes et montèrent en haut où quelques Anglois s'étant trouvés il y eut combat dans lequel le colonel Irlandois fut tué et un autre gentilhomme spectateur.—Je n'ai pas manqué de rendre tous les offices d'auni au dit Sieur Ambassadeur, même de lui donner avis sur le point que ses gens sens se preparoient pour cette entreprise de les retenir ; mais il croyoit que l'honneur des Portugais étoit trop engagé pour se contenter d'un coup de poignard, que ses gens avoient donné la veille. London to wit.

The Examination of William Metham, of Metham in the county of York, gentlemen, taken the 8th day of April 1654, before us Thomas Foot and Robert Tichbourne, aldermen and justices of peace for the said city, by virtue of an Order of his highness the Lord Protector and the Council at Whitehall, hearing date the 7th of April instant.

The Examinee being examined, and asked, whether he was at the New Exchange on Monday the 21st of November last, he answereth, that he was not there in the Monday aforesaid ; but confesseth, that on Tuesday the 22nd of November last, he was at the New Exchange aforesaid ; for, being on the way towards St. James's, he this examinant, did meet the Portugal Ambassador's own coach coming towards the Exchange, about the Pall-Mall ; and Don Pantaleon being in the same coach, did call this examinant into the said coach, wherein were (he this examinant believes) a knight of Malta, and the lord of Boyne, and some others, whose names he knows not, being Portuguese ; with whom this examinee went along to the said New Exchange ; and that this examinee, and the said Don Pantaleon, and other Portuguese aforesaid, coming into the said Exchange, one Mr. Philips Howard came to this examinee, and desired him to persuade the said Portuguese to go off the Exchange ; for that there were some above that did stay for them. And this examinee speaking to the said Don Pantaleon to the same effect, he the said Pantaleon answered, that he had no arms, and would offend none ; but he did believe none would offend him, there being but four Portuguese there together at the same time with this examinee, none of them having then any arms ; And this examinee sayeth, that after the said Portuguese had staid there in the Lower-Exchange for some little time, they went up into the upper part of the said Exchange ; and being there, one Mr. Thomas Howard came to the said Don Pantaleon, and demanded satisfaction for an affront offered the night before : and the examinee persuading the said Mr. Howard to be satisfied, the said Mr. Thomas Howard did cease to speak or act any thing else as this examinee did see ; but immediately upon this, the shop-keepers in the said Exchange began to make a noise with shutting up their shops ; and that during the time of discourse between the said Don Pantaleon, Mr. Howard, and this examinee, there was a pistol shot off about the West end of the said Exchange ; and thereupon this examinee did depart from the said Exchange, and did not see any Portuguese, save only the Portuguese aforesaid, before the said pistol was fired off as aforesaid ; but after the said pistol was fired, he did see divers Englishmen upon the said Exchange with their swords drawn ; and that he did also see divers black men there also with their swords drawn ; whom he conceives may be Portuguese ; but what were the particular passages there after that time, this examinee says he knows not, neither did he know or hear of any design or appointment by the said Portuguese, to be or met at the said Exchange that night, to injure or affront any persons whatsoever. Extract of an intercepted Letter to Sir Gervase Clifton.

Tomorrow morning the Portugal Ambassador's brother is to receive his Trial at the Upper-Bench bar in Westminster hall ; these being appointed his judges, viz. the Lord Chief Justice Rolle, (who presides) together with half a dozen counsellors at the law, and as many advocates or doctors of the civil law, all whom take in, so to be their assistant, and a judge with them too, sir Henry Blunt, the great traveller. It is already generally believed that he shall escape.—(Unsubscribed.) July 4, 1654.

The superscription.

To the much honoured Sir Gervase Clifton, knight and baronet, present the-e most humbly at Clifton in Nottinghamshire.

[Vol. 2. p. 427.]

A Justification of the Proceedings against the Portuguese for the Murder of Mr. Greenway, notwithstanding their relation to their Embassador.

That the matter of fact may be truly stated, whereby the insolency and malice of the parties may appear; and to justify our proceedings against them, though relating to the embassador, to set forth—That the fact is murder, and so a sin against the law of God and man, such as by the Levitical law admitted neither pardon nor sanctuary.—Joab was taken from the horns of the altar. No cities of refuge allowed a murderer by the law of Moses, nor privilege of sanctuary by our law.

That the privilege of an embassador cannot exempt him from his trial by the law of this nation. It is a maxim in our law, that no foreign law, either civil or national, can take place in this nation, unless it be part of our law by act of parliament or by a continued practice of the people time out of mind if admitted here, and that supposeth an universal assent of the people, and then it goes for the law of the land. And therefore whatever the civil law is, or Jus Gentium practised by other nations is not applicable to England. Neither will it be any argument to exempt this Portuguese from his Trial for Murder, though some examples be produced (even in this nation) of embassadors dispensed with from the trial of our laws by some of our princes, for practice of treason against the state, which might be upon particular reason of state. And I hold treason which may be contracted by endeavours only, more pardonable than murder, and I do not know any precedent of dispensation with the trial of an embassador for murder or manslaughter, &c.

That upon solemn debate it hath been resolved, by the opinion of learned counsellors and common lawyers, embassadors themselves are to be tried by the laws of this nation, and not to have their privilege.

The Queen of Scots was tried and executed for treason by commission of oyer and terminer.

The Bishop of Ross embassador from the crown of Scotland, was committed for treason, and resolved by the opinion of five learned civilians, that he could not have privilege to exempt him from his Trial. [Camb. Eliz. f. 276, Co. 4 Inst. 152, 153.] So the resolution of Sam. Pelache's case, the embassador of the king of Morocco, wherein the lord Coke cites the opinion of judges of the common law and civilians.

Vivian, the Pope's legate, here was restrained by Hen. 2 for disquieting this state, and forced to swear not to act any thing in 'prejudicium regis et regni' [Benedict in Vita Hen. 2.]

Hen. 3 did the like to the Pope's embassador, who was fain to fly 'timens pelli suæ' (as the record saith). [Record in Scaccario West. claus. l. 1. sir Tho. Cotton.] Ed. 1 restrained the Pope's embassador, until he received satisfaction for the wrong done.

In the year 1523 Lewis de Prat, embassador from Charles 5, was commanded to his house, for accusing falsely cardinal Wolsey to have practised a breach between Hen. 8. and the Emperor to make amity with the French king.

In 1568 Don Gusman Despes was confined to his house in London, for sending scandalous letters to the duke of Alva. [Sir T. Cotton.]

The like was done to Dr. Alpen and Malviset, the French embassadors. Bernardino de Mendoza, for falsely traducing the ministers of State, was restrained, &c. [Sir T. Cotton.] These records and precedents should be perused in the originals that you may be sure to proceed upon safe grounds in citing of them, and I only mention them to show the practice of the law of England, &c.

It is reasonable the law should be so: 1st. for Embassadors and their families have the protection of the law, and if any of them be injured the party that committed the offence must incur the punishment of the laws: [11 Ed. 3. Fitz. Brev. 478.] For if an Englishman rob or kill an Embassador or his servant, he must suffer death, and therefore reason that they who have protection of the law, should submit to the law. [Co. 7 15, in Calvin.]

2nd. It would be destructive to Embassadors if it was otherwise; for if they were not subjected to this law, that the people of this nation may have remedy against them in case of injury, nobody would have commerce with them; so that they might be starved for want of victuals or other commodities, and men would not converse with, if they might do violence to their persons and estates, and must not be punished by this law without appeal to the foreign prince from whence they come. [Nob. Rep. 78. 113. Embassador of Spain's Case.]

3rd. If it were so, then is the English nation, in relation to any injury done them by Embassadors, under the protection (upon the matter) of a foreign prince; for they must appeal to him for justice, and not to their own prince.

4th. Admit the foreign prince would do justice, the same cannot be done without examination of witnesses; and what a length of time and trouble and expence that would take may be easily guessed; it would wear out the prosecutor, and probably spend so much time that witnesses and parties innocent would die in the interim.

5th. If Embassadors had such privilege here, then our Ambassadors must have the like elsewhere: and if an Englishman should kill a Portuguese he must be sent to England to be tried, in which case he must go unpunished, for he cannot be tried, and then Quere, whether it be not so in other countries? It is good to keep to the case in question in case of murder, and not to launch to privileges in general.

Since I writ the letter, I perused the stat. of 27 Eliz. and commission whereby the queen of Scots was tried; and doubt much whether it be to advantage to mention it, because her trial was by special commission framed by Act of Parliament in the nature of an high court of justice. Quere.—[Vol. 2. p. 428.]

To his highness the Lord Protector of the Commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland.—The humble Petition of Don Pantaleo de Sa é Meneses, prisoner in Newgate.

Shewing that on the 5th of this inst. July, the petitioner being brought before certain judges at Westminster to answer concerning a crime of Murder objected against him, the petitioner then alledged his agency and employment here, being made a public minister with his brother the Lord Ambassador from the king of Portugal his master, and that he was taken out of the house of residence of himself and his said brother Ambassador, to answer touching the premises, which were supposed to be done during the time of his residence here, for the causes aforesaid. The petitioner prayed allowance of his privilege, and to be tried according to the use and justice of all nations in such cases, and prayed counsel to be allowed him to alledge his privilege, but was denied in his requests; and for fear of certain torments of death, unless he pleaded not to the indictment, which he apprehended would be instantly executed; he pleaded thereto, and hath since received judgment of death; which of how great consequence it is, being as he conceiveth, violation of the rights of Embassadors in his person, and otherwise, your highness's wisdom may judge.—He prayeth respite of execution by your favour, and that due consideration may be had of him and premises, and execution on the said judgment may not be done, and that he may be remitted to his king.

‘DON PANTALEO DE SA E MENESES.’

To his highness the Lord Protector of the Commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland.—The humble Petition of Alvaro Gonsalves Pereira, master of the horse to the Lord Ambassador, Sheweth,

That he is innocent of the crime that he is accused of; besides that he was condemned, the judges thinking he had submitted to the laws of England, which is a great mistake, for he, not being acquainted with the language, ever said the same that his master's brother said, not understanding any thing that was past, neither having any body to counsel him herein. Therefore he humbly beseeches your highness to consider of it, and other reasons, that do excuse him; and to grant him time, wherein your highness may be better informed herein, and he enjoying the privileges of the Ambassador's family, your highness may take such resolution as you shall think most just and fit. [Vol. 1. p. 616]

Bordenux, the French Ambassador in England, to the count de Brienne.

My lord; You will have without doubt received the articles, which the Lord Protector did send to me; likewise you will have taken notice of the demands of this state, which did oblige me at my audience, which I had on Sunday last, after I had interceded for the brother of the Ambassador of Portugal, to declare unto him in general, &c.

An Extract of a Letter of Intelligence from Paris.

Sir; Yours by this post came to me safe, wherein I see how the Portuguese Ambassador's brother suffered, which is very much considered and looked upon here. Some say, it is gallantly done; others, that it is dangerous for the Protector to use an Ambassador's brother so; others do much admire it, that the Protector had the courage to do the like. However it is conceived some mischief will follow, where the Protector shall get the worst; but God is over all.

Paris 25-15 July, 1554.

Extract of a Letter of Intelligence from Paris, July 29, 1654. [N. S.] (Not signed.)

It is believed your government cannot hold long in that fashion; yet the beheading of the Portugal Ambassador's brother is not displeasing or wonderful to honest men; but the action he committed is worse esteemed, and only taken for madness and temerity, not for any gallantry or courage; so they say, justice should be considered over all things; yet concerning such a person, that grace should take place; which is all here said of that matter.

Letter from Mr. Edward Pashlowe to the Protector's Council. Dated Gravesend Aug. 3, 1654.

Right honorable; I make bold to inform your honours, that this day an attachment was granted out against the Portugal Ambassador's goods, at the suit of William Garfeild, who pretends, that the said Ambassador owes him 52*l.* and more. And I being desirous not to suffer the attachment to be perfectly executed without some directions from your honours, I have caused my servants to forbear, until I can be informed from your honours, whether I shall give permission, that the same shall be executed, or no. Therefore I most humbly pray your honours to send me such order therein, as may tend to my security, and according to your honour's good pleasure. [Vol. 2. p. 517.]

Some few decisions relative to the Privileges of Embassadors and of persons attached to legations, which have been made in our courts of law, are collected in Comyns's Digest, title Ambassador B. (they relate chiefly to the question what servants of an Ambassador are protected against process in civil suits by stat. 7 Anne c. 12, which protection was at one time much abused.) Mr. Ward, in his “Enquiry into the Foundation and History of the Law of Nations in Europe," chap. xvii. has collected and examined several precedents (among others this of Sa, and those of the Russian Ambassador in 1708 and of Count Gyllenberg in 1717) and several opinions of jurists respecting the inviolability of Ambassadors.

Towards the end of the reign of James the first, the Spanish Ambassador Inoisa secretly laid before the king a Memorial containing some very grievous and alarming charges against the duke of Buckingham. (See Hacket's Life of archbishop Williams). Upon discovering the fact, the duke, who was very desirous that the Ambassador should be punished, applied for advice to sir Robert Cotton, and obtained from him the following answer, which is printed in the Posthuma of the author and is also among Tanner's MSS. in the Bodleian Library at Oxford.

A RELATION OF PROCEEDINGS AGAINST AMBASSADORS WHO HAVE MIS-CARRIED THEMSELVES, &c.

To the high and mighty prince George duke of Buckingham. May it please your Grace; "In humble obedience to your Grace's command, I am emboldened to present my poor advice to this the greatest, and most important cause that ever happened in this state; the quiet of the kingdom, the honour of the prince, the safety of the Spanish ambassador's person exposed hereby to the fury of the people, all herein involved; A consideration not the least for the reputation of the state, and government, though he little deserved it.

"The information made to his sacred majesty by him, That your Grace should have plotted this parliament; wherein if his majesty did not accord to your designs, then by the authority of this parliament to confine his sacred person to some place of pleasure, and transfer the regal power upon the prince: This information if it were made by a subject, by the laws of the realm were high treason, to breed a rupture between the sovereignty and the nobility, either by reports or writings, and by the common law is adjudged no less: The author yet knowing that by the representing the person of a sovereign prince he is by the law of nations exempt from regal trial, all actions of one so qualified being made the act of his master, until he disavow: And injuries of one absolute prince to another, is factum hostilitatis, and not treason. The immunity of whom civilians collect as they do the rest of their grounds, from the practice of the Roman state, deducing their arguments from these examples. The Fabii ambassadors from Rome were turned safe from the Chades with demand of justice against them only, although they had been taken bearing arms with the Ethrurian their enemies: [Titus Livius 2 dec.] The ambassadors of the Tarquines, 'Morte affligendos' 'Romani non judicârunt, et quanquam visi' 'sunt ut hostium loco essent, jus tamen gentium voluit.' And where those of Syphax had plotted the murder of Masinissa, 'Non

'aliud mihi factum quàm quod sceleris sui reprehensi essent,' saith Appian; The ambassadors of the protestants at the council of Trent, though divulging there the doctrine of the churches, contrary to a decree there enacted, a crime equivalent to Treason, yet stood they protected from any punishment: So much doth public conveniency prevail against a particular mischief; that the state of Rome, though in case of the most capital crime, exempted the tribunes of the people from question, during the year of office: [August. de Legibus Antiq. Roman.] And the civilians all consent, that 'legis de jure gentium indictum est, et eorum corpora salva sint, propter necessitatem legationis, ac ne confundant jura commercii inter principes,' the redress of such injuries, by such persons, the example of modern and best times will lead us to. Vivian the Pope's legate was restrained by Henry 2, [Benedict. in Vita Hen. 2.] for exercising a power in his realm, not admitted by the king, in disquiet of the state, and forced to swear not to act any thing in 'prejudicium regis vel regni.' [Record. in Scaccar. West Claus. Edw. 1.] Hen. 3. did the like to one of the Pope's ambassadors, another flying the realm secretly, fearing, timeas pelli sui, as the record saith. Edward 1, so restraining another until he had, as his progenitors had, informed the Pope of the fault of his minister, and received satisfaction of the wrongs. In the year 1523, Lewis de Pratt, Ambassador for Charles 5, was commanded to his house, for accusing falsely cardinal Wolsey to have practised a breach between Hen. 8. and his master, to make up the amity with the French king; sir Michael Throgmorton, by Charles 9, of France, was so served, for being too busy with the prince of Condy in his faction. Doctor Man. in the year 1567, was taken from his own house in Madrid, and put under a guard to a straiter lodging, for breeding a scandal (as the Conde Teri said) in using by warrant of his place, the religion of his country, although he alledged the like permitted to Ghusman de Silva their ambassador, and to the Turk no less than in Spain. In the year 1568 Don Ghuernon d' Espes was ordered to keep his house in London for sending scandalous letters to the duke d' Alva unsealed. The bishop of Rosse in the year 1571 was first confined to his house, after to the Tower, then committed for a good space to the bishop of Ely his care, for meddling with more business than belonged to the place of his employment: The like was done to Dr. Alpin and Marvisett, the French ambassadors successively, for being busy in more than their master's affairs. In the time of Philip the 2d, of Spain, the Venetian ambassador in Madrid, protecting an offender that fled into his house, and denying the heads or justices to enter his house, where the ambassador stood armed to withstand them, and one Bodevario a Venetian, whom they committed to prison, for his unruly carriage, and they removed the ambassador unto another house, until they had searched and found the offender: Then conducting back the ambassador, set a guard upon his house, to stay the fury of the people enraged. The ambassador complaining to the king, he remitted it to the Supreme Council; they justified the proceeding, condemning Bodavario to lose his head, and other the ambassadors servants to the galleys, all which the king turned to banishment, sending the whole process to Inego de Mendoza his ambassador at Venice, and declaring by a public ordinance unto that state, and all other princes, that in case his ambassadors should commit any offence, unworthily, and disagreeing to their professions, they should not then enjoy the privilege of those officers, referring them to be judged by them where they then resided. Bernardino de Mendoza, for traducing falsely the ministers of the state to further his seditious plots, was restrained first, and after commanded away in the year 1586. The last of Spanish instruments that disquieted this state, a benefit we found many years after by their absence, and feel the want of it now by their reduction.

Having thus shortly touched upon such precedent examples, as have fallen in the way, in my poor observation, I humbly crave pardon to offer up my simple opinion what course may best be had of prosecution of this urgent cause. I conceive it not unfit, that with the best of speed, some of the chief secretaries were sent to the ambassador by way of advice, that they understanding a notice of this information amongst the common people, that they cannot but conceive a just fear of uncivil carriage towards his lordship or his followers, if any the least incitement should arise; and therefore for quiet of the state, and security of his person, they were bound in love to his lordship to restrain as well himself as followers until a further course be taken by legal examination where this aspersion begun, the way they only conceived secure to prevent the danger; this fear in likelihood will be the best motive to induce the ambassador to make discovery of his intelligence, when it shall be required: I conceive it then most fit, that the prince and your Grace to morrow should complain of this in parliament, and leaving it so to their advice and justice, to depart the house, the lords at the instant to crave a conference of some small number of the commons, and so conclude of a message to be sent to the ambassador to require from him the charge and proofs; the persons to be sent, the two Speakers of the two houses, with some convenient company of either, to have their maces and ensigns of office borne before them to the ambassador's gate, and then forborne, to shew fair respect to the ambassadors, then to tell them that a relation being made that day in open parliament of the former information to the king by his lordship, they were deputed from both houses, the great council of the kingdom, to the which, by the fundamental law of the state, the chief care of the king's safety and public quiet is committed, they were no less the high court of Justice, or supersedeas to all others, for the examining and correcting all attempts of so high a nature as this, if it carry truth; that they regarded the honour of the state, for the Catholic's immoderate using of late the lenity of sovereign grace to the scandal and offence of too many, and this aspersion now newly reflecting upon the prince and others, meeting with the former distaste (which all in public conceive to make a plot to breed a rupture between the king and state, by that party maliciously laid) hath so inflamed and sharpened the minds of most, that by the access of people to term and parliament, the city more filled than usual, and the time itself near May-day (a time by custom apted more to licentious liberty than any other) cannot but breed a just jealousy and fear of some disorder likely to ensue of this information, if it be not aforehand taken up by a fair legal trial in that high court: Neither want there fearful examples in this kind in the ambassadors of Genoa upon a far less ground in the time of parliament, and his house demolished by such a seditious tumult: The parliament therefore, as well to secure his lordship's person, followers and friends, from such outrages, to preserve the honour of the state, which needs must suffer blemish in such misfortunes, they were sent thither to require a fair discovery of the ground that led his lordship so to inform the king, that they might so thereupon provide in justice and honour, and that the reverence they bear unto the dignity of his master, may appear the more by the mannerly carriage of his message. The two that are never employed but to the king alone, were at this time sent, and that if by negligence of this fair acceptance, there should happen out any such disaster and danger, the world and they must justly judge as his own fault: If upon the delivery of this message the ambassador shall tell his charge, and discover his intelligence, then there will be a plain ground for the parliament to proceed in examination and judgment; But if (as I believe) he will refuse it, then is he author scandali both by the common and civil laws of this reahn, and the parliament may adjudge it false and untrue, and declare by a public act, the Prince and your Grace innocent, as was that of the duke of Gloucester, 2 Rich. 2, and of York in Henry 6th his time, then may the parliament jointly become petitioners to his majesty, first to confine his ambassador to his house, restraining his departure, until his majesty be acquainted with his offence, and as well for security as for further practice to put a guard upon the place, and to make a proclamation that none of the king's subjects shall repair to his house without express leave: And to send withal a letter, with all speed, of complaint against him to the king of Spain, together with a declaration under the seals of all the nobility and Speaker of the commons, in their names, as was 44 Hen. 3, to the Pope against his legate, and 28 Edw. 1. Requiring such justice to be done in this case, as by the leagues of amity, and law of nations is usual, which if the king of Spain refuse, or delay, then it is transactio criminis upon himself, and an absolution of all unity and friendly intelligence, and amounts to no less than a war denounced. Thus have I by your leave, and command, delivered my poor opinion, and ever will be ready to do your Grace the best service, when you please to command it.

Many particulars concerning Leslie the bishop of Rosse, whose Case sir Robert Cotton quotes, may be found in the Trial of the duke of Norfolk, ante, vol. 1, p. 957. The Case is also noticed in that of the duke of Hamilton, ante, vol. 4, p. 1155. The following are extracted from Camden:

"Since by the confession of all, even of the duke himself, the bishop of Ross was charged as principal contriver of the business, they entered into a serious consultation what should be done with him, being an ambassador. For whilst he (after the manner of other ambassadors) thought he might lawfully promote the interest of his prince by any methods, and that by the sacred and inviolable privilege of ambassadors, he was not to be accountable to another's jurisdiction: he had already committed many irregularities, by raising rebellion, and holding nocturnal cabals with the earl of Southampton and others; and now lately with the English fugitives in the Netherlands, the duke d'Alva, the Spaniard, and the Pope, for invading of England. It was therefore proposed to Daniel Lewis, Valentine Dale, William Drury, Wm. Aubrey, and Henry Jones, learned civilians,

1. "Whether an Ambassador procuring an insurrection or rebellion in the Prince's country, toward whom he is Ambassador, is to enjoy the privilege of an Ambassador?"

2. "Whether he may not, Jure Gentium et Civili Romanorum, be punished as an enemy, traitor, or conspirator, against that Prince, notwithstanding he be an Ambassador?"

To these two questions they answered: "Touching these two questions, we are of opinion, that an Ambassador procuring an insurrection, or rebellion, in the Prince's country towards whom he is Ambassador, ought not, Jure Gentium, et Civili Romanorum, to enjoy the privileges, otherwise due to an Ambassador; but that he may, notwithstanding, be punished for the same."

4. "Whether, if the Prince be deposed by the common authority of the realm, and another elected and invested of that crown; the solicitor, or doer of his causes, and for his aid, (although the other Prince do suffer such one to be in his realm) is to be accounted an Ambassador, or to enjoy the privilege of an Ambassador?"

To this they answered, "We do think, that the solicitor of a Prince lawfully deposed, and another being invested in his place, cannot have the privilege of an Ambassador, for that none but Princes, and such other as have sovereignty, may have Ambassadors."

4. "Whether a Prince coming into another realm, and remaining there under custody and guard, ought, or may have there his solicitor of his causes, and if he have, whether he is to be counted an Ambassador?"

To this they answered, "We do think that a Prince coming into another Prince's realm, and being there under guard, and custody, and remaining still a Prince, may have a solicitor there; but whether he be to be accounted an Ambassador, that dependeth on the nature of his commission."

5. "Whether if such a solicitor be so appointed by a Prince so flying, or coming into another Prince's realm; if the Prince in whose realm, the Prince so in guard, and his solicitor is, shall denounce, or cause to be denounced, to such a solicitor, or to such a Prince under custody, that his said solicitor shall hereafter be taken for no Ambassador; whether then such solicitor or agent can justly claim the privilege of Ambassador?"

To this they answered, "We doe think that the Prince to whom any person is sent in message of Ambassador, may for causes forbid him to enter into his lands, or, when he hath received him, command him to depart; yet so long as he doth remain in the realm, and not exceed the bounds of an Ambassador, he may claim his privilege as Ambassador, or solicitor, according to the quality of his commission."

6. "Whether, if an Ambassador be confederacy, or be aider, or comforter of any traitor, knowing his treason toward that Prince, toward whom, and in whose realm he pretendeth to be Ambassador; is not punishable by the Prince in whose realm and against whom such treason is committed, or confederacy for treason conspired?"

And to this they answered, "We do think that an Ambassador aiding and comforting any traitor in his treason toward the Prince with whom he pretendeth to be Ambassador in his realm, knowing the same treason, is punishable by the same Prince against whom such treason is committed."

* According to these answers of the civilians, Ross being called up from the isle of Ely, and receiving a sharp reprimand, it was declared by the council, that he should be no longer reputed an Ambassador, but be severely punished according to his demerits. He answered, 'That he was the Ambassador of an absolute queen that was unjustly deposed, and had, according to his duty, carefully endeavoured the delivery of his princess, and the safety of both kingdoms: that he came into England with the full authority of an Ambassador under public warrantise, which he had produced; and that the sacred privileges of Ambassadors are by no means to be infringed.' Burghley most gravely informed him, 'That neither the privileges of an Embassy, nor letters of public warrantise,

* These queries and answers are thus given in Murdin's State Papers. Camden abridges them.

‘ could protect Embassadors that offend against the public majesty of a prince, but that they are liable to be punished for the same, else wicked Embassadors might plot against the life of princes without any punishment.’ On the other hand, he stiffly maintained, ‘ That the privileges of Embassadors had never been violated’ (to use his own words) ‘ vis Juris (but via facti :’ And he pleasantly wished them not to shew him fouler play than the English Embassadors, Throckmorton in France, and Randolph and Tamworth in Scotland, had found; who had raised rebellions, and openly fomented them; and yet suffered no greater punishment, than the being commanded to depart within such a time.’ When they began to urge him with testimonies of Englishmen, he gently desired them not to do it, since by a common received custom, which, as he said, was grown into a law, ‘ The testimony of an Englishman against a Scotchman, or of a Scotchman against an Englishman, was not to be allowed of.’ After some debates whether this would hold good, unless betwixt the borderers of both kingdoms, and that in cases relating to the frontiers; and whether the English Embassadors had raised rebellions; Ross was committed to the Tower of London; where being kept close prisoner, within a while he answered to all questions, with this proviso, That his answers should not be prejudicial to any. ‘ He excused the queen of Scots, for that she being a prisoner in the flower of her age, could not but use her utmost endeavours to regain her freedom, since queen Elizabeth denied her access to her presence, debarred her from all hope of her liberty, and openly relieved her enemies. The duke he excused, in that he had done nothing as to the marriage with the queen of Scots, but with the consent of many of the queen’s council; nor could he forsake her, though he had promised to do so under his hand and seal, since there was before a mutual engagement of marriage betwixt them.’ Lastly, he excused himself, ‘ For that since he was an Embassador and a servant, he could not without a sin depart from his duty, and abandon his princess in her distress.’ But that ‘ he proposed the design of seizing on the queen, with no other intent, than to try whether the duke had courage to undertake such an attempt.’ The crimes of the other conspirators he cunningly extenuated, but could by no means be brought to tell the names of the gentlemen who had devoted their service to the duke in seizing the queen. But he confessed, that, by the queen of Scots orders, he had, by servants employed betwixt them, treated with the duke, Arundel, Lumley and Throckmorton, and with the lord viscount Montacute by Lumley, about putting the castles in Scotland, the hostages, and the king of Scots, into Englishmen’s hands, about renouncing the title, and giving up the English rebels.”

Afterwards, under the year 1573, he says, “ That England might be the better secured from all domestic attempts upon the queen of Scots account, John Lesley bishop of Ross (who had served his queen with an approved loyalty, though to the ruin of some, and the danger of more) was dismissed from the Tower, and commanded to depart England. He accordingly withdrew into France, being deadly afraid of the earl of Southampton, (whose life he brought into danger by the discovery he made) and of Henry Howard the duke of Norfolk’s brother, for the appeasing of whose displeasure, he wrote an apology for himself. He was scarce gone, but H. Cokin, his private letter-carrier, was apprehended, and by his confession Morgan discovered; who, being a forward man to promote any secret designs for the queen of Scots interest, and very eager to put them in execution, presently fled. Atslo, the principal physician among the Papists; and Good, both of them doctors of physic; and Francis Berty, were kept in prison for some months, for holding a private correspondence with her by letters; and upon the same account were Henry Goodyer and Richard Lowder had in suspicion.

“ In the mean time the bishop of Ross was not wanting in the duty of a most faithful subject to the queen of Scots, but solicited the emperor, the Pope, the French king, and the catholic princes of Germany, who held him in hopes, but performed just nothing.”

Mr. Ward cites the following Case from Finet :

“ In the year 1627, one Philip Weiseman, a German, who was a kind of purveyor to foreigners in England, having bargained to defray the Embassador of Denmark’s expences at a certain rate from Paris to London, made some unreasonable demand upon him on his arrival at the latter place, and that, says Finet, “ with much touch to his honour.” The Embassador complained to the Lord Chamberlain, who acquainted the King, order was made for the Lord President of the Council, the Lord Chamberlain, and the Vice Chamberlain, to “ hear and determine” the business. The cause was examined, and the following Record and Sentence was the consequence :

“ Henry, Earl of Manchester, President of the Privy Council of his Majesty of Great Britain; Philip, Earl of Montgomery, Great Chamberlain, and of the Council of State to his said Majesty, being Commissioners and Deputies for his said Majesty to hear the protestation which the Lord Rosenbrank, Embassador Extraordinary to his Majesty of Denmark, shall make against Philip Weiseman, for certain injuries and calumnies which he should speak and write against his person, in prejudice of the honour of the King his master, and of his own particular reputation; having by express commandment from his Majesty adjourned, and examined the foresaid Philip Weiseman, and having understood at the same time, by confrontation, some of the domestics of the said Lord Embassador, and others; as also examined his letter to the said Lord Ambassador: we find that the said Philip, without any reason or cause, having received more monies than were agreed upon, according to his own confession, hath maliciously and impudently blazed abroad, such words and writings, without having regard to the honour of the person whom he presents, or to his own particular quality: Therefore we have inordered that he be put in safe custody, until he give satisfaction to the foresaid Ambassador, if he thinks it not fit to bring him before the King his master, to be punished according to his demerit. In faith whereof we sign this present instrument this 14th of April 1627. Manchester—Montgomery—Carleton."

"The fellow, persisting stubborn and most averse from submission, was after four or five days restraint in the house of a messenger, delivered by a warrant from the Lord President, and the Lord Chamberlain, from the Messenger's hands to the Ambassador's; who, causing him to be imprisoned in the Counter, by virtue of the said warrant, which gave him power to dispose of him, he was upon the point of being sent to Hamburgh; but his stomach lessening, and his submission made with acknowledgment of his guilt, both by word, and writing, he was at last set at liberty."

In the Case of Owen or Collins, ante, vol. 2, p. 881, sir Francis Bacon, Attorney General, laid it down, that "by the Law of Nations if an Ambassador compass and intend death to the person of the king in whose land he is, he may be condemned and executed for treason; but if he commit any other treason than this, it is otherwise: then, he should be sent to his own country." See also vol. 1, p. 1046, and Dr. Story's Case (p. 1087 of the same volume, reported also by Dyer) cited chap. 2, sections 3, and 9 of the Treatise on the Pleas of the Crown by Mr. East, who after speaking of the local allegiance due from foreigners in this country, and of the grounds of such allegiance, says, "The case of an Ambassador is not meant to be included in the foregoing observations. The exception, if any, is grounded on principles of policy and not of justice." And he refers to a chapter (to be published hereafter, as it seems) "Of persons capable of committing crimes."

Coke, 4th Inst. 153, says, "If a foreign Ambassador, being prorex, commiteth here, any crime, which is contra jus gentium, as treason, felony, adultery, or any other crime, which is against the Law of Nations, he loseth the privilege and dignity of an Ambassador, as unworthy of so high a place; and may be punished here, as any other private alien, and not to be remanded to his Sovereign but of courtesy. And so of contracts, that be good jure gentium; he must answer here. But if any thing be malum prohibitum, by an act of Parliament, private law, or custom of this realm, which is not malum in se, jure gentium, nor contra jus gentium; an Ambassador residing here shall not be bound by any of them."

Hale writes thus: "Here somewhat may be of use to be said touching treasons by ambassadors of foreign princes, wherein although sometimes reason of state and the common interest of princes do de facto govern in these cases, yet it will not be amiss to consider the opinions and practices of former times in relation to this matter.

"First, If an Englishman born, though he never took the oath of allegiance, becomes a sworn subject to a foreign prince, and is employed by him into England as his minister, agent, or ambassador, and here conspires against the king's life, he shall be indicted and tried for treason, as another subject should be; and the reason is, because no man can shake off his country wherein he was born, nor abjure his native soil or prince at his pleasure. This was the case of Dr. Story, who had sworn allegiance to the crown of Spain, and was here condemned and executed for treason*. Vide Camden's Eliz. 14 Eliz. p. 168.

"Secondly, but if a foreigner being the agent, minister, or ambassador of a foreign prince either in amity or enmity with the king of England, come over with or without the king's safe-conduct, and here conspire against the life of the king, or to raise rebellion or war against

* It seems highly absurd, that a person owing allegiance to any sovereign power, should by that power be recognised under a character so apt as that of ambassador from a foreign state, to require from him services, and to impose on him duties inconsistent with such allegiance. Some years ago it was reported currently, and, as I have reason to believe, truly, that the elector [now king] of Bavaria was disposed to appoint as his minister to our court, sir Benjamin Thompson (the count of Rumford,) who was born a subject of Great Britain, and that the British government (most properly as I conceive, notwithstanding Wicquefort's doctrine,) signified, that he could not be received in that station. The maxim 'Nemo potest exuere patriam nec ligeantiae debitum ejurare,' is rigidly maintained in our books; and, by divers statutes, acts by English-born subjects, in contravention of that maxim, are severely punished: See Bracton, lib. 3, c. 9. Fleta, c. 2. Stamford, 67. Lord Coke's Commentary upon Littleton, sect. 198. 1 Hale's Pleas of the Crown, 68. East's Pleas of the Crown, c. 2, sections 3, 23, 33. 1 Blackst. Comm. c. 10. 4 Blackst. Comm. c. 6, (pp. 74, 87), c. 12, s. 11. Some foreign Jurists, however, maintain a different doctrine. See Vattel, book 1, c. 19, s. 218, 220, 225. Wicquefort's L'Ambassadeur, &c. liv. 1, 111, and also his Memoires pour les Ambassadeurs. Wicquefort, however, in his section entitled, "Le Prince peut employer des Estrangers en ses Ambassades mesmes dans leur Patrie," observes, that, "En Angleterre les sujets ont une obligation plus forte et plus particuliere qu'ailleurs en vertu du Droit que l'on y appelle Allegeance." See, too, Pccquet's Espirit des Maximes Politiques, c. 21.

him, some have been of opinion, that he may be indicted of treason; but by the civilians he cannot, because he came in as a foreign ambassador representing the person of his prince, and therefore is not to be so dealt with in such case, but by the law of nations may be dealt with as an enemy, not as a traitor; and though he have the protection and safe-conduct of the king of England, yet it is under a special capacity, and for a special end, namely, as a foreign agent; but if he be criminally proceeded against, it must be as an enemy by the law of war or nations, and not as a traitor; but how far and in what cases he may be dealt with as an enemy, remains to be farther considered. Camden's Eliz. sub anno 1571, p. 164.

"Thirdly, therefore those, that are most strict after the rights and privileges of ambassadors, yet seem to agree, that if he do not only conspire the death of the king or the raising a rebellion against him, but actually attempt such an act, as actually or interpretatively is a consummation thereof, though possibly the full effect thereof do not ensue, yet he may be dealt withal as an enemy, and by the law of nations he may be put to death, as if he should stab or poison the prince, and yet doth not kill him, or raise an actual rebellious army, or should levy an actual war against the prince to whom he was sent, and in that prince's country, as Fabius the Roman ambassador to the Gauls, by challenging and fighting with the champion of the Gauls; Plutarch in vita Numa, the prince, to whom he is sent, may, without consulting the prince that sends him, inflict death upon such an ambassador by the law of nations, as an enemy: 'Consummata autem sunt, que eoque producta sunt, quo produci ab hominibus solent, et quæ delinquendi finem statuere solemus.' Vide Albericus Gentili, lib. 2, cap. 2, de legationibus.

"Fourthly, But in case of a bare conspiracy against the life of the king, or a conspiracy of a rebellion or change of government. novarum rerum molimina, there is great diversity of opinions among learned men, how far the privilege of an ambassador exempts him from venal prosecution as an enemy for such conspiracies or inconsummate attempts, that do not proceed farther than the machination, solicitation, or conspiracy.

"Upon an attempt of this nature by the bishop of Rosse, agent and ambassador of the queen of Scots, 14 Eliz. the question was propounded to Lewes, Dale, Drury, Aubry, and Jones, doctors of law, viz.

"Whether an ambassador, who stirreth up rebellion against the prince to whom he is sent, should enjoy the privileges of an ambassador, and not be liable to the punishments of an enemy?"

"They answered, That such an ambassador hath by the law of nations, and by the civil law of the Romans, forfeited all the privileges of an ambassador, and is liable to punishment. See the rest of the resolutions touching this matter, Camden's Eliz. sub anno 1571, p. 164, 165, 370.

"Herenpon he was committed to the Tower, but yet no criminal process against him as an enemy.

"And Mendoza the Spanish ambassador, who here in England fostered and encouraged treason, was not dealt with according to the utmost severity, that possibly in such cases might be used, but was only sent away, sub anno 27 Eliz. Camden's Eliz. p. 296. The lord L'Aubespine also, the French ambassador, that conspired the queen's death, was not proceeded against criminally, but only reprov'd by Burghley, and advised to be more careful for the future. Camden's Eliz. sub anno 1587, p. 378, 379.

"And upon these and some antient instances among the Romans and Carthaginians, learned men have been of opinion, that an ambassador is not to be punished as an enemy for traitorous conspiracy against the prince to whom he is sent, but is only to be remitted to the prince that sent him. Albericus Gentili de Legationibus, lib. 2, cap. 18. Grotius de Jure Belli, lib. 2, cap. 18, who gives these two instances in confirmation thereof.

"The truth is, the business of ambassadors is rather managed according to rules of prudence, and mutual concerns and temperaments among princes, where possibly a severe construction of an ambassador's actions, and prosecutions of them by one prince, may at another time return to the like disadvantage of his own agents and ambassadors; and therefore they are rather temperaments measured by politic prudence and indulgence, than according to the strict rules of reason and justice; for slyly conspiracies of this kind by ambassadors, are contrary to the trust of their employments, and may be destructive to the state whereunto they are sent, and according to true measures of justice deserve to be punished, as acts of enmity, hostility and treachery, by private persons.

"And although of all hands it is admitted, that the prince, to whom the ambassador is sent, is the judge of the miscarriage of such foreign ambassador, without any application to the master from whom he is sent, and without any actual dedition or giving him up to the judgment of the law; yet they assign this reason of the difference between a bare conspiracy or machination against the prince, and an actual attempt of treason, whether against his person or government, which hath attained as great a consummation as such ambassador is able to effect, as procuring the wounding of the prince, or an actual attempt to poison him, though death ensue not, or an actual raising of a rebellious army against him; because in these latter the mischief is consummate, as far as the ambassador could effect it, and so prohibited not only by the civil and municipal laws, but by the laws of nations; but inconsummate machinations, according to their opinions, are raised to the crimen læsæ majestatis, by civil or municipal laws or constitutions; and they think it too hard, that an ambassador or foreign agent, who doth sustinere personam principis, should be obnoxious to a capital punishment for bare machination or conspiracy, which is a secret thing and of great latitude; but this, as I have said, is rather a prudential and politic consideration, and not according to the strict measure of justice.

"But now, although it should be admitted that a foreign ambassador committing a consummate treason is not to be proceeded against as a traitor, but as an enemy; yet if he or his associates commit any other capital offence, as rape, murder, theft, they may be indicted and proceeded against by indictment in an ordinary course of justice, as other aliens committing like offences; for though those indictments run contra pacem regis, yet they run not contra ligeantiam suam debitum; and therefore, when in the late troubles, the brother and servants of the Portugal ambassador committed a murder in the Exchange, they were tried and convicted by a special commission of Oyer and Terminer, directed to two judges of the common law, some civilians, and some gentlemen, to proceed according to the ordinary course, 'secundum legem et consuetudinem regni Angliæ,' whereupon some of them were convicted by jury, and had judgment; and, as I remember, some of them were executed. And yet many civilians will allow the same privilege to the comites legati, as to the ambassador himself.

"And the difference between proceeding against an alien (whether ambassador or other) in cases of felony and treason, is well illustrated by the book of 40 Ass. 25, where a Norman captain of a ship, with the help of English mariners, committed robbery and piracy upon the narrow seas; the English pirates were convicted and attaint of treason, but the Norman captain was attaint of felony, but not of treason, because it could not be said contra ligeantiam suam debitum."

Mr. Justice Foster, in the introduction to his Discourse on High Treason, calls the law respecting this matter "extremely right and expedient considered as a general rule," yet he seems to have felt that even the principles of natural equity, as well as prudential considerations grounded on reasons of state, should occasionally induce the crown to dispense with the execution of it. Mr. Macdonald, whose case he reports, was, he says, "pardoned upon very equitable and easy terms." Mr. Christian takes occasion to remark, that Macdonald's "is certainly an extreme case, and we should have reason to think our law deficient in justice and humanity, if we could discover any intermediate general limit to which the law could be relaxed consistently with sound policy or the public safety." Upon the whole, however, it must be confessed, that though the law strictly asserts and severely enforces the incapacity of English born subjects to free themselves from the obligations of their allegiance, and punishes acts committed in derogation thereof, (See in addition to East and Blackstone ubi sup. the statutes abstracted in Mr. Christian's Note at the end of Blackst. Comm.

book 4. chap. 13), it affords ample facilities, and holds out inducements to the subjects of other states to infringe the duties of the allegiance which they owe to such states. See Bl. Comm. b. 1, ch. 10, and the Statutes enumerated towards the end of that chapter.

Foster as to this matter says,

"The case of an Ambassador, or his attendants, not being subjects of Great Britain, mentioned by lord Hale, doing acts which in a subject would amount to high treason, will, as his lordship observeth, be always governed" [one might have expected Foster to cite with more scrupulous fidelity] "rather by prudential considerations, or what are generally called reasons of state, than by any fixed rules of law: and as ambassadors generally act under direction and by orders from their sovereigns, they have seldom been proceeded against farther than by imprisonment, seizing their papers and sending them home in custody. Which was done in the case of count Gyllenborg the Swedish minister in the late king's time.

"But whatever proceedings be against them for state-crimes, they are to be considered at the worst but as enemies subject to the law of nations; never as traitors subject to the municipal laws, and owing allegiance to the crown of Great Britain; unless perhaps in case of attempts directly and immediately against the life of the king; in which case no orders from their sovereigns can be presumed, or, if in fact produced, would justify or excuse: and therefore I shall not take their case into consideration in this place. And for the same reason I say nothing of the case of spies taken here in time of war, actual hostilities being on foot in the kingdom at that time, nor of prisoners of war.

"But for murder and other offences of great enormity, which are against the light of nature and the fundamental laws of all society, the persons mentioned in this section are certainly liable to answer in the ordinary course of justice, as other persons offending in the like manner are: for though they may be thought not to owe allegiance to the sovereign, and so to be incapable of committing high treason, yet they are to be considered as members of society; and consequently bound by that eternal universal law by which all civil societies are united and kept together."

The following is Blackstone's summary on the subject:

"The rights, the powers, the duties, and the privileges of ambassadors are determined by the law of nature and nations, and not by any municipal constitutions. For, as they represent the persons of their respective masters, who owe no subjection to any laws but those of their own country, their actions are not subject to the control of the private law of that state wherein they are appointed to reside. He that is subject to the coercion of laws is necessarily dependent on that power by whom those laws were made: but an ambassador ought to be independent of every power, except that by which he is sent; and of consequence ought not to be subject to the mere municipal laws of that nation wherein he is to exercise his functions. If he grossly offends, or makes an ill use of his character, he may be sent home and accused before his master, who is bound either to do justice upon him, or avow himself the accomplice of his crimes. But there is great dispute among the writers on the laws of nations, whether this exemption of ambassadors extends to all crimes: as well natural as positive; or whether it only extends to such as are mala prohibita, as coining, and not to those that are mala in se, as murder. Our law seems to have formerly taken in the restriction, as well as the general exemption. For it has been held, both by our common lawyers and civilians *, that an ambassador is privileged by the law of nature and nations; and yet, if he commits any offence against the law of reason and nature, he shall lose his privilege: and that therefore, if an ambassador conspires the death of the king in whose land he is, he may be condemned and executed for treason; but if he commits any other species of treason, it is otherwise, and he must be sent to his own kingdom. And these positions seem to be built upon good appearance of reason. For since, as we have formerly shewn, all municipal laws act in subordination to the primary law of nature, and where they annex a punishment to natural crimes, are only declaratory of and auxiliary to that law; therefore to this natural universal rule of justice ambassadors, as well as other men, are subject in all countries; and of consequence it is reasonable that, wherever they transgress it, there they shall be liable to make atonement. But, however these principles might formerly obtain, the general practice of this country, as well as of the rest of Europe, seems now to pursue the sentiments of the learned Grotius, that the security of ambassadors is of more importance than the punishment of a particular crime. And therefore few, if any, examples have happened within a century past, where an ambassador has been punished for any offence, however atrocious in it's nature †.

* Mr. Ward takes notice that Blackstone quotes only common Lawyers, and conjectures that the only civilians whom he had in his thoughts were the five mentioned above, in the Case of the Bishop of Rosse.

† "Upon this passage the learned editor of the late editions of the Commentaries (after an erroneous notice of this Case of Don Pantaleon Sa, into which as I have already mentioned he appears to have been misled by Hume), says, "Vattel with irresistible ability contends, that the universal inviolability of an ambassador is an object of much greater importance to the world than their punishment for crimes however contrary to natural justice. 'A minister,' says that profound writer, 'is often charged with a commission disagreeable to the prince to whom he is sent. If this prince has any power

"In respect to civil suits," proceeds Blackstone, "all the foreign jurists agree, that neither an ambassador, or any of his train or comites, can be prosecuted for any debt or contract in the courts of that kingdom wherein he is sent to reside. Yet sir Edward Coke maintains, that, if an ambassador make a contract which is good jure gentium, he shall answer for it here. But the truth is, so few cases (if any) had arisen, wherein the privilege was either claimed or disputed, even with regard to civil suits, that our law-books are (in general) quite silent upon it previous to the reign of queen Anne; when an ambassador from Peter the Great, czar of Muscovy, was actually arrested and taken out of his coach in London, for a debt of fifty pounds which he had there contracted. Instead of applying to be discharged upon his privilege, he gave bail to the action, and the next day complained to the queen. The persons who were concerned in the arrest were examined before the privy council, (of which the lord chief justice Holt was at the same time sworn a member), and seventeen were committed to prison: most of whom were prosecuted by information in the court of Queen's Bench, at the suit of the attorney general, and at their trial before the lord chief justice were convicted of the facts by the jury, reserving the question of law, how far those facts were criminal, to be afterwards argued before the judges; which question was never determined*. In the mean time the

'over him, and especially if his authority be sovereign, how is it to be expected that the minister can execute his master's orders with a proper freedom of mind, fidelity, and firmness? It is necessary he should have no snares to fear, that he cannot be diverted from his functions by any chicanery. He must have nothing to hope, and nothing to fear, from the sovereign to whom he is sent. Therefore, in order to the success of his ministry, he must be independent of the sovereign's authority, and of the jurisdiction of the country, both civil and criminal.' B. 4. c. 7. s. 92, where this subject is discussed in a most luminous manner. The Romans, in the infancy of their state, acknowledged the expediency of the independence of ambassadors; for when they had received ambassadors from the Tarquin princes, whom they had dethroned, and had afterwards detected those ambassadors in secretly committing acts which might have been considered as treason against the state, they sent them back unpunished; upon which Livy observes, 'et quanquam visi sunt commisisse, ut hostium loco essent, jus tamen gentium valuit. Lib. 2. c. 4. When Bomilcar, 'qui Romam fide publica venerat,' was prosecuted as an accomplice in the assassination of Mas-sura, Sallust declares, 'fit reus magis ex æquo bonoque ex jure gentium.' Bell. Jug. c. 35.

* In 3 Burr. 1480. lord Mansfield declares, that 'the statute of queen Anne was not occasioned by any doubt, whether the law of nations, particularly the part relative to public czar resented this affront very highly, and demanded that the sheriff of Middlesex, and all others concerned in the arrest; should be punished with instant death. But the queen (to the amazement of that despotic court) directed her secretary to inform him, 'that she could inflict no punishment upon any, the meanest, of her subjects, unless warranted by the law of the land: and therefore was persuaded that he would not insist upon impossibilities.' To satisfy however the clamours of the foreign ministers (who made it a common cause) as well as to appease the wrath of Peter, a bill was brought into parliament, and afterwards passed into a law, to prevent and punish such outrageous insolence for the future. And with a copy of this act, elegantly engrossed and illuminated, accompanied by a letter from the queen, an ambassador extraordinary was commissioned to appear at Moscow, who declared 'that though her majesty could not inflict such a punishment as was required, because of the defect in that particular of the former established constitutions of her kingdom, yet, with the unanimous consent of the parliament, she had caused a new act to be passed, to serve as a law for the future.' This humiliating step was accepted as a full satisfaction by the czar; and the offenders, at his request, were discharged from all farther prosecution.

"This statute recites the arrest which had been made, 'in contempt of the protection granted by her majesty, contrary to the law of nations, and in prejudice of the rights and privileges, which ambassadors and other public ministers have at all times been thereby possessed of, and ought to be kept sacred and inviolable: wherefore it enacts that for the future all process whereby the person of any ambassador, or of his domestic or domestic servant may be arrested, or his goods distrained or seized, shall be utterly null and void; and the persons prosecuting, soliciting, or executing such process shall be deemed violaters of the law of nations, and disturbers of the public repose: and shall suffer such penalties and corporal punishment as the lord chancellor and the two chief justices, or any two of them, shall think fit.* But it is expressly provided, that 'ministers, was not part of the law of England, and the infraction criminal, nor intended to vary an iota of it.' And he proceeds to say that lord Talbot, lord Hardwicke, and lord Holt, were clearly of the same opinion. But the infraction of the law of nations can only be a misdemeanor punishable at the discretion of the court, by fine, imprisonment, and pillory; and therefore, lord Mansfield says, the persons convicted were never brought up to receive judgment; for 'no punishment would have been thought by the czar an adequate reparation. Such a sentence as the court would have given, he would have thought a fresh insult.'—Christian.

"* Perhaps it was intended as a compliment to the czar, that the offender is deprived of the no trader, within the description of the bankrupt laws, who shall be in the service of any ambassador, shall be privileged or protected by this act; nor shall any one be punished for arresting an ambassador's servant, unless his name be registered with the secretary of state, and by him transmitted to the sheriffs of London and Middlesex. Exceptions that are strictly conformable to the rights of ambassadors, as observed in the most civilized countries. And, in consequence of this statute, thus declaring and enforcing the law of nations, these privileges are now held to be part of the law of the land, and are constantly allowed in the courts of common law."

Mr. Ward mentions the Case of another Ambassador which happened about this time.

"In 1654, M. de Bas (Wicquefort calls him de Bas. In Thurloe the spelling is Bass,) Minister from France to Cromwell, was accused of a conspiracy against his life. The Council endeavoured to make him undergo examination, but he refused, saying, That although he would communicate with Cromwell personally, and prove to him that he was not privy to the design; yet he would not submit to interrogatories before a Judge; for being a public Minister, he would, by so doing offend against the dignity of his Master, to whom alone he was accountable for his actions. The Council retired to consult what was to be done with him, and he persisting in his refusal to answer, they contented themselves with ordering him to depart the country in four and twenty hours." (Wicquefort, it will appear, says forty-eight hours.) Mr. Ward professes to take his account from Wicquefort, and 2 Thurloe's State Papers.

The following is Wicquefort's story: "En l'an 1654, M. de Bas, envoyé de France en Angleterre, fut accusé d'avoir eu part à une conspiration qui s'estoit faite contre la personne de Cromuel. Un nommé Naudin medecin Parisien l'avoit mis au nombre des complices et il y avoit d'ailleurs des preuves si fortes contre de Bas que le conseil l'ayant fait venir pour l'oïr on luy leut les depositions des témoins. Mais lorsque les conseillers le voulurent interroger et sçavoir la verité de sa bouche celui cy dit qu'il pourroit bien répondre et déclarer qu'il n'avoit point de connoissance de l'affaire dont il ne s'estoit point mêlé. Qu'il ne feroit point de difficulté non plus d'informer Cromuel en particulier par maniere d'éclaircissement de ce qu'il en sçavoit mais qu'il n'estoit pas obligé de subir interrogatoire devant le juge ny de répondre en justice parce qu'estant Ministre public il péchoit contre la dignité du Roy son maistre à qui seul il estoit obligé de rendre Trial by Jury; and as he is to suffer any corporal punishment that two of these three judges may think fit to inflict, the czar would be induced to believe, that any future requisition of instant death could be complied with; but as the statute has not made the offence felony, of course this punishment cannot extend to the privation of life."—Christian.

‘compte de ses actions.’ Surquoy Cromüel et cinq des sept conseillers qui faisoient tout le Conseil s’estant retirés dans une autre chambre et rentrés quelque temps après ils demanderent à de Baas s’il persistoit à ne point vouloir répondre et parce qu’il dit ‘qu’il ne répondroit point’ on luy ordonne de sortir du Roiaume dans deux fois vingt quatre heures. Il estoit suffisamment convaincu d’avoir conspiré contre Cromüel et neantmoins cet usurpateur qui avoit bien fait voir en d’autres occasions qu’il ne consideroit pas fort les Ambassadeurs et qui en ce temps là n’avoit pas plus besoin de la France que la France avoit besoin de luy jugea que tout ce qu’on pouvoit faire à de Baas sans violer le Droit des Gens c’estoit de le faire sortir de l’isle.”

Of the two passages in Thurloe’s State Papers, cited by Mr. Ward, as the other authority for his narrative, the first contains merely the informations given by certain witnesses against le Baas, and the second, so far as it goes, may be thought to impugn the representations of Wicquefort and Mr. Ward. No great civility is displayed by ordering a gentleman who is in London to quit England within the space of twenty-four or forty-eight hours. It appears, moreover, that the Ambassador was civilly sent away, ‘for his master’s sake.’ There is room for a suspicion that Mr. Ward had not consulted all the books to which he refers. In page 449, of his second volume, he makes a slight mistake in the title of Wicquefort’s work.

The passages in Thurloe are these :

An Information concerning Monsieur de Baas.

“I being in discourse with Mons. de Baas the day he went from London, he told me that he was occasioned to go away by a deposition of Naudin to the Lord Protector, by whom he was sent for some days ago, with an intention to examine him before many of his council, not considering he was a royal commissioner, whereof he was very sensible, saying, that if the Protector had spoken to him in private, he would have given him satisfaction of the things, of which he was accused by the said Naudin, whom he called an indiscreet man, his own meaning having not been to attempt any thing against the Protector, but only to know what could be attempted. And after some discourse betwixt Mons. de Baas did confess, that he ever since some weeks had enquired from D. Naudin, whether he knew not among his own acquaintance a good valiant and understanding gentleman, in whom the soldiers should have confidence, and who also should have interest amongst the gentry, both for to divide the army, and for to raise secretly money and troops against the power newly settled in England. To this answered Naudin, that he knew such a gentleman, and he believed many able ones should be ready to follow on him in the same design, if there was any hope of relief and help from another place. Mons. de Baas said to this, that he being a public minister, he would assure him, that the crown of France should doubtless deliver money enough by his own hands for the payment of such an enterprize ; and that would appoint a good recompence in France or other parts to the beginners of the said design, if so was, that they would not come to the end of it : besides, that it was a glorious way, by which the king of Scots (whose intention surely was free in matter of religion) should be restored, and called again, both by many provinces of England, and several officers and soldiers of the Protector’s army.

“D. Naudin answered to this, that he durst not, nor had the power of attempting such things himself ; but that he would acquaint some with the said matter and offers.

“Mons. de Baas said this before he went away, that notwithstanding all these discourse, his intention was not to go further with Naudin ; but he knew another way of hurting England, which he had not communicated yet.”

The Examination of Theodore Naudin, taken the fifth day of June, 1654.

“Who saith ; That about April last Mons. Baas, agent of the king of France, residing here, sent unto this examinant, by one Mons. Sbarriere, and desired to speak with him ; and accordingly, the examinant went to the said Mons. Baas to his house in Covent-garden in the morning, where he found him in bed ; and then nobody being in the room, the said Mons. Baas, after mutual salutations, did ask the examinant of several particular things relating to this commonwealth, as what forces there were in England, and whether the examinant knew major general Harrison, and some other things, which he doth not now remember ; but did observe, that the said Mons. Baas was very inquisitive, which made the examinant suspect he had some design against this state ; but at that conference he acquainted the examinant with nothing in particular. He farther saith, that a little while after he went again to the said Mons. Baas ; and that then he told this examinant, that he did fear that the Protector had no mind to make peace with France ; and that therefore he had a design to trouble the affairs of England, and to make divisions in the army ; and other words to that effect ; and asked this examinant, whether he knew not some able valiant persons, who had interest in the army, to undertake this design ; whereto this examinant answered, he would endeavour to find out such persons, and that he hoped to do it. And this examinant did presently after acquaint colonel Buller with this discourse, and what design the said Mons. de Baas had. And the said Buller wished the examinant to proceed on with Baas ; and thereupon this examinant did repair to the said Mons. de Baas, and acquainted him, that there was a person of honour, a friend of his, that would undertake this business ; but that this could not be carried on without money, and the orders and countenance of the cardinal ; and that if that were had, other persons would join too. That the said Mons. de Baas did embrace this with much gladness; and said, that he, being a public minister, would assure him, that the cardinal would be glad of the news; and that France would contribute money, and such other things as were necessary for the carrying on this design; and other words to the same purpose. And said, that he would write to the cardinal about it; and did not question but to have a sudden answer. And this examinant further saith, that he, at the desire of the said Baas, went unto him, and had conference with him about the same business, and was usually with him every post-night; but saith, he never saw any answer the cardinal did write, nor knows whether he did write at all. This examinant saith, that in all this discourse he intended nothing of hurt against the government; but was desirous to find out the design of the said Mons. Baas, perceiving by his inquisitiveness, he had somewhat of design; and did accordingly, about eight days before his imprisonment, acquaint the said colonel Buller, that he would acquaint the Protector with it, the business being then quite put off; and further saith not.

THEO. NAUDIN."

The Information and Examination of colonel Buller, taken the day of

"That upon Tuesday morning the 18th of April 1654, Dr. Naudin came early to my lodging, where he desired me to walk alone with him in James's Park; where as soon as we were come, he began to praise and extol me with great admiration, admiring that a person of my quality and experience, with my travels and languages, and so great a soldier, and a person of so much courage and resolution, would suffer myself and services to be so slighted and abused, and myself and country to be enslaved; and that I would not think of a way to make me great, which was in my power to do; and how fit a person I was for it; expressing how much it was for God's glory, and freeing my country from this slavery they were now under, saying, Portugal, Naples, and divers others had thrown off their tyrants, and had and did keep their country ever since to themselves; and that it was in my power, not only to make myself great now, but to posterity for ever; and that I was not less in the world than any other, and had as much right for to govern as any man; and that giving liberty of conscience, I might be sure of all the Anabaptists, Levellers, and Independents would be for me, and stand to me, besides all discontented persons, and many presbyterians and cavaliers; and desired me to be secret, which he wished me for God's sake to do; for otherwise he must perish, if he were known; he proffering me, if I would join with him to cut off the Protector, he would procure me money enough from the king of France's ambassador; and that if I would join with him to cut off the Protector, I should leave it to him to continue and manage the business, which he said was feasible, and nothing to do;

adding farther, that after the Protector was cut off, all that were in command, from the general to the least officer, should be in command but eight days, and every one take their turns; and this would make all the common soldiers to join with me, and all other discontented persons; and that for me to do this action, it was nothing at all, if I would undertake it; saying, that if I would not, although he had never been a soldier, yet he had as much courage to do this action as any man whatsoever; and therefore he pressed me to give my consent, and then he would go to the French ambassador about it. I thought it fit to put him off four days, at the end of which I condescended he should go; and accordingly the 22nd of April he went to Mons. le Baas in the morning, and was near two hours alone with him, before he was out of his bed, he commanding all his servants to go out of the chamber. So when they were all alone, the doctor began thus to say: Sir, I am one, that is a lover of his country, and ready to do it service; for you see this tyrant and devil the Protector, who holds now his sword to your throats in France, either to have his own terms by a treaty, (which he is now beginning with you) or to cut your throats. Mons. le Baas desired to know, how he could help him, or serve his country. To which the doctor replied, that if Mons. le Baas would help him with money, there were persons of courage and quality, that would undertake a design with him, to cut off the Protector, and make a division here in England; which motion Mons. le Baas did like very well, and did give him many thanks, and embraced it cordially. And accordingly he sent letters away to the cardinal by the next post for his order, which packet Mons. le Baas sent over with a merchant's son to Calais, on purpose, whom the doctor named, saying, he knew him; but I have forgotten his name; but the governor of Calais sent the letters away; for Mons. le Baas told him he was confident the cardinal would be glad of the news, and embrace it; but he, of himself, could not undertake to act, till he had the cardinal's order. To which the doctor replied, he knew that very well; for although 30 or 40,000*l.* would be able to begin the business, yet it would cost many millions to carry it on; and that after the cardinal had approved of the design, he would go over on purpose to the cardinal about the business, which Mons. Baas liked very well, and told him, that the king and cardinal knew, that the Protector had sent divers scouts, which lie in France as his creatures to carry on his designs; and that they knew them all, and all that they had spoken to any of quality, that could help them, and what answer they had given them again; and that they had a vigilant eye on them. And then Mons. Baas desired the doctor to dine with him, and to come often to him; but he told him, he came not to him for his meat, but for the business, which was treated of; and that in case he should dine with him, or come too often to him, he might be taken notice of; which Mr. Baas did commend him for it. So the doctor went once or twice a week to correspond with him, and for to have the cardinal's answer; which Mr. Baas did faithfully promise him, and desired the doctor to get him certain and private news, how affairs went in Scotland, and to procure him a true list of the strength of the army in England and Wales, and how and where they were quartered, and the number in each garrison, and also of the strength of the army and garrisons in Ireland; which the doctor did very much trouble me, both for a list and private news; and to try to get some in command for to join in the design, being importuned by Mr. Baas, who had promised not to let any man here know any thing; but afterwards did confess to the doctor, that he had told Mr. Bourdeaux, the ambassador, and his own brother; and that Mr. Bourdeaux was inquisitive to know, who it was that had treated with him; but Mr. Baas would not tell him. So Mr. Bourdeaux asked him, Whether it was not the big man, the colonel with the great mouth, who had been so often with him, and proffered to undertake to do very great matters against the Lord Protector here? To which Mr. Baas replied, It was another, and not he; but the doctor was with Mr. Baas once or twice a week, for five or six weeks together, treating about the design."

A Letter of Intelligence.

Sir, Paris, July 18, 1654. [N. S.]

"Since my former I have only to add, besides what you now have in my letter of occurrents, that from court, of Mons. de Baas nothing is renewed; but the king and cardinal, having the Protector's letter, consult what is to be done. A complimentary answer may be sent; and if the Protector moves not in it; Mazarin will easily let the matter pass. The cardinal and council are so busy, that Arras may be relieved, Stenay taken, and their army increase and maintained, that they think less of their business with England; and Mazarin says, that he will do well enough with England yet, and that Mons. Bordenaux will do all. And indeed Mons. Bordenaux gives now more hopes of success to his negotiation, than when de Baas was there. This de Baas being sent away so civilly by the Protector, is a great honour to his highness here; for few would do him in such cases that honour for any master's sake.

"All or most here are yet of opinion, the Protector is subject to many dangers yet; wherefore he is to have a care, for so much smoke cannot be without a fire. For R. C. is gone to Germany, as you had before; he received the sums of money from this court; and I can assure you, Mazarin sent within these four weeks supplies of monies from Holland to Middleton. R. C. will raise some men in Germany, and go with them into Scotland, if his majesty shall be there visible. Wherefore, if you design to be free, put an end with all speed (if possible) to the war in Scotland. R. C. is to receive considerable succours in Germany; and I have it from such a hand you would give credit to, that he received from England, before he left Paris, 100,000 crowns, to relieve Scotland, with assurance, that if general Monck was defeated, and the royalists march towards England, they should not want assistance in England.

"A second consideration of trouble to your Protector is, the ensuing parliament; but I presume he is wise enough to prevent that with ease, having so done greater matters."

195. The Trial of JOHN GERHARD, PETER VOWELL, and SOMERSET FOX, before the High Court of Justice, for High Treason, in conspiring to Murder the Lord Protector: 6 CHARLES II. A. D. 1654.

Friday, June 30, 1654.

THE High Court of Justice met this day in the Painted-Chamber. Mr. Bond prayed with them about half an hour. The court then sat,

* "Discontents" says Clarendon, "were general over the kingdom, and among all sorts of people, of what party soever. The Presbyterians preached boldly against the liberty of conscience, and monstrous licence that sprung from thence: and they who enjoyed that licence were as unsatisfied with the Government as any of the rest, talked more loudly, and threatened the person of Cromwell more than any. But into these distempers Cromwell was not inquisitive; nor would give those men an opportunity to talk, by calling them in question, who, he knew, would say more than he was willing any body should hear; but intended to mortify those untuly spirits at the charge of the king's party, and with the spectacle of their suffering upon any the most trivial occasion. And if, in this general licence of discourse, any man who was suspected to wish well to the king, let fall any light word against the Government, he was sure to be cast in prison, and to be pursued with all possible severity and cruelty; and he could not want frequent opportunities of revenge this way. It was the greatest consolation to miserable men, who had, in themselves or their friends, been undone by their loyalty, to meet together, and lament their conditions: and this brought on invectives against the person of Cromwell; Wine and good fellowship, and the continuance of the discourse, disposing them to take notice of the universal hatred that the whole nation had of him, and to fancy how easy it would be to destroy him. And commonly there was, in all those meetings, some corrupted person of the party, who fomented most the discourse, and, for a vile recompence, betrayed his companions, and informed of all, and more than had been said. Whereupon a new plot was discovered against the Commonwealth and the person of the Protector, and a High Court of Justice was presently erected to try the criminals; which rarely absolved any man who was brought before them. But to this kind of trial they never exposed any man but those of the king's party; the other, of whom they were more afraid, had too many friends to suffer them to be brought before such a tribunal; which had been first erected to murder the king himself, and continued to root out all who adhered to him. No man, who had ever been against the king (except he became afterwards for him) was ever brought before that extravagant power; but such were remitted to the trial of the law by juries, which seldom condemned any.

The court was called (each member by name), and the ordinance empowering them read. The prisoners to be tried were, Mr. John Gerard, gentleman; Mr. Peter Vowel, schoolmaster of Islington; and Somerset Fox.

"The very next month after the peace was made, for the better establishment of Cromwell's empire, a High Court of Justice was erected for the trial of persons accused of 'holding correspondence with Charles Stuart' (which was the style they allowed the king) 'and for having a design against the life of the Protector, to seize upon the Tower, and proclaim the king.' The chief persons they accused of this were, Mr. Gerard, a young gentleman of a good family, who had been an ensign in the king's army, but was not at present above twenty two years of age; the other, one Mr. Vowel; who kept a school, and taught many boys about Islington. Mr. Gerard was charged with 'having been at Paris, and 'having there spoken with the king;' which he confessed; and declared 'that he went to Paris 'upon a business that concerned himself' (which he named) 'and when he had dispatched it, and was to return for England, he desired the lord Gerard, his kinsman, to present him to the king, that he might kiss his hand; which he did in a large room, where were many present; and that, when he asked 'his majesty, whether he would command him 'any service into England? his majesty bid 'him to commend him to his friends there,

Somerset Fox was first called to the bar, and an Indictment of High-Treason read against him, for joining in a traitorous design to have murdered his highness the Lord Protector, and divers of his council, proclaimed 'and to charge them that they should be quiet, 'and not engage themselves in any plots; which 'must prove ruinous to them, and could do the 'king no good:' which was very true: for his majesty had observed so much of the temper of the people at his being at Worcester, and his concealment after, the fear they were under, and how fruitless any insurrection must be, that he endeavoured nothing more than to divert, and suppress all inclinations that way. However, this High Court of Justice received proof, that Mr. Gerard and Mr. Vowel had been present with some other gentlemen in a tavern, where discourse had been held, 'how easy a 'thing it was to kill the Protector, and at the 'same time to seize upon the Tower of London, and that, if at the same time the king 'were proclaimed, the city of London would 'presently declare for his majesty, and no body 'would oppose him.'

"Upon this Evidence, these two gentlemen were condemned to be hanged; and upon the 10th of July, about two months after they had been in prison, a gallows was erected at Charing-Cross; whither Mr. Vowel was brought; who was a person utterly unknown to the king and to any person entrusted by him, but very worthy to have his name, and memory, preserved in the list of those who shewed most magnanimity and courage in sacrificing their lives for the crown. He expressed a marvellous contempt of death; 'which,' he said, 'he suffered without having 'committed any fault.' He professed his duty to the king, and his reverence for the Church; and earnestly and pathetically advised the people to return to their fidelity to both; 'which,' he told them 'they would at last be compelled 'to do after all their sufferings.' He addressed himself most to the soldiers; told them 'how 'unworthily they prostituted themselves to 'serve the ambition of an unworthy tyrant,' and conjured them 'to forsake him, and to serve 'the king; which, he was sure, they would at 'last do.' And so having devoutly recommended the king, and the kingdom, and himself, to God in very pious prayers, he ended his life with as much Christian resolution, as can be expected from the most composed conscience.

"The Protector was prevailed with to shew more respect to Mr. Gerard in causing him to be beheaded, who was brought the afternoon of the same day to a scaffold upon the Tower-Hill. But they were so ill pleased with the behaviour of him who suffered in the morning, that they would not permit the other to speak to the people, but pressed him to discover all the secrets of the plot and conspiracy. He told them, 'that if he had a hundred lives, 'he would lose them all to do the king any Charles Stuart king, seized on the present guards and forces, involved the nation in a bloody war, &c.

Somerset Fox did ingenuously confess the charge against him upon the main to be true, and that he is Guilty.

Then Mr. John Gerhard and Mr. Peter Vowell were brought to the bar, and an indictment to the same purpose as that against Somerset Fox, read against them. They pleaded Not Guilty, and denied every thing.

Vowell said, that he required a jury of twelve of his equals, it being a law confirmed by Magna Charta; and according to the sixth Article of the Government by the Lord Protector also, that law being not repealed, and therefore that he might be tried by his peers.

The Lord President told him, That the members of the court were his peers, not his superiors but his equals, and that they were present near twice twelve, as he saw: and that they are to proceed by the power of an Ordinance before them.

It was also told him by serjeant Glyn, that he had owned the jurisdiction of the court in pleading Not Guilty.

Vowell said he was a man ignorant in the law, and desired advantage might not be taken of his weakness.

The Attorney-General (Prideaux) said, none desired to take any advantage of any thing, he wished they had not brought themselves into these troubles; that they were there in the name of the Lord Protector of the Commonwealth of England to accuse the prisoners at the bar, and to bring in their Proof, and the ‘service, and was now willing to die upon that suspicion; but that he was very innocent of what was charged against him; that he had not entered into, or consented to any plot or conspiracy, nor given any countenance to any discourse to that purpose;’ and offered again to speak to the people, and to magnify the king: upon which they would not suffer him to proceed; and thereupon, with great and undaunted courage, he laid down his head upon the block.”

Hume thus expresses himself concerning this transaction:

“Another act of severity, but necessary in his situation, was, at the very same time, exercised by the Protector, in the capital punishment of Gerard and Vowel, two royalists, who were accused of Conspiracy against his life. He had erected a High Court of Justice for their trial; an infringement of the ancient laws, which at this time was become familiar, but one to which no custom or precedent could reconcile the nation: Juries were found altogether unmanageable. The restless Lilburne, for new offences, had been brought to a new trial, and had been acquitted with new triumph and exultation. If no other method of conviction had been devised during this illegal and unpopular government, all its enemies were assured of entire impunity.”

prisoners were to defend themselves as well as they could; and when both sides were heard, it was to be left to the Court to determine, and to judge between them.

And it was declared that the Plot was to this effect: That the plot was to seize on the Lord Protector and murder him, and some of the council and others, and proclaim and bring in Charles Stuart, son of the late king, to be king, which bloody design was to be effected thus: That the first hatching of the plot was in England by Mr. Hinshaw, who was one of the chief plotters, and others; Mr. Hinshaw went over from England to France to acquaint Charles Stuart (whom they called their king) with the design, and Mr. John Gerhard about that time went over to France also, who had told Mr. Hinshaw that he would do nothing in it until he had first had approbation from Charles Stuart. Mr. Wiseman was also then in France with them.

Address was made to Prince Rupert, and the design made known to him, desiring him to communicate it to (him they called) the king, who accordingly did, and brought Mr. Hinshaw to him; but Charles Stuart at the first delivered his judgment in the thing, that he was at present unsatisfied at that time to go on in that design for three reasons. 1. Because it would be dishonourable to him in the esteem of other princes, in case such a thing should be known, and should not be effected, to come in in such a way. 2. Because it did not seem to him to be feasible, but unlikely to be effected. 3. Because it was not at that time seasonable. But prince Rupert afterwards did much encourage and persuade, That the design might be carried on, and promised all assistance.

Mr. Hinshaw and Mr. Wiseman returned into England, Mr. Gerhard stayed there a while longer, but some weeks after came back also; Mr. Hinshaw declared to his confederates here in England what overtures had been with Charles Stuart, and that prince Rupert had engaged to send ten thousand Scots, English and French, and the duke of York to come with them to land in Sussex, and other places, and that there would be forces enough ready to assist and join with them.

Mr. Hudson the minister was thought on, to have letters of credence from Charles Stuart, who sent a letter to him; and that which he desired in case the plot had taken, was to be made the Master of Sutton's Hospital, which Mr. Hinshaw promised him.

One Master Philips, also, and others, were treated with about it, and master Gerhard returning from France, the Plot was resolved to be carried on, which was to be effected thus: 1. They were to seize on the Lord Protector, and murder him; and to do this work, they should take the opportunity of his going to Hampton-Court, which he used to do every Saturday with a small number slenderly armed; and those that were to do this were master Hinshaw and Mr. John Gerhard, with 30 horse. Mr. John Gerhard to bring 25 horse, and Mr.

Hinshaw five, which each of them was to engage. Mr. Gerhard was something cautious not to discover who they were he engaged, before an oath of secrecy was given, but 25 he had undertaken for. Mr. Hinshaw's five were himself, Mr. Tuedore the apothecary, Mr. Wiseman, col. Aldridge, and another, and then to seize on the Tower of London, and to go on with their work.

2. If that failed, to seize on all the guards about Westminster, which they thought 2500 sufficient to do, and carry on their work here about London; and for that purpose Mr. Hinshaw, Mr. Gerhard and others viewed the Meuse, and the rest, and was heard to say, what a pity it was that so slender guards should not be seized on! And that when the soldiers were at nine-pins in the Meuse, it was but shooting off a pistol, and presently to fall on.

3. The last way to have it effected to be thus: That when the foot regiments that are for the guards about London were mustering in Tothil-fields, as they used several times to do, to come into Tothil-fields and meet them there as of their own party, and when they have laid down their arms to seize upon them, and have others to be ready at the same time every where to perfect the work. And for this purpose, if they acted this way, Col. Finch with a party of 200 was to fall into London, and do the work in the City. Major John Gerhard to fall on Whitehall. Col. Hinshaw to fall on the Meuse. Col. Daniel with 200 to fall on St. James's. Another to fall into Southwark. And one Billingsly, a butcher at Smithfield Bars, with a party to fall upon Islington; and it was pressed that the opportunity might not be neglected.

And that the work might be the more feasible, they considered how as many of the soldiery as might be, might be engaged in the business. And the Papists (who had a great hand in the design) gave information of two soldiers of the army, that used sometimes to come and hear mass; and these two they sent a papist woman to, who engaged them, and their direction was, to give intelligence at Mr. Hudson's house, where Mr. Hinshaw and others of them frequented.

Master Vowell was cautious, being a solid man, for his work was not to bear arms, but as a privy-counsellor to them, and he was to engage Mr. Billingsly the butcher with a party to seize the Lord Protector's house at Islington, and him Mr. Vowell recommended to be a very fit man for that work. And they had this art, to endeavour to make the Lord Protector odious to the people, in turning the design upon him by a Libel, which was scattered up and down London, that his highness and the army had a design to massacre all but their friends in all parts of England; and this libel was written by Mr. Fenshaw, which was got printed by one in Newgate-market, and Mr. Vowell had one of them.

When the design was discovered, and Mr. Gerhard and some others apprehended, Mr.

Vowell being at Mr. Hudson's house, it was said by him, That the design might still go on, though some were discovered; Mr. Hinshaw and Mr. Wiseman came to him to Islington to his house, from whence they went to drink their morning's draught. Mr. Vowell said, there were enough to do the work still; Mr. Wiseman said, There were many horse to fall on; Mr. Vowell said, It might be easily done.

One Wharton in Black-friars was to proclaim Charles Stuart king, and col. Finch was to seize on the Lord Mayor, and make him to proclaim him; Somerset Fox and others were to raise Apprentices to join in the design; but the Lord Protector going by water disappointed them.

Vowell then said to the Court, That they were not his peers because they were his judges, and therefore desired a jury of twelve of his equals.

Prideaux answered, that so a jury are the judges, though they be the Prisoners peers.

The Witnesses against the Prisoners at the Bar were called for.

John Wiseman was sworn, and being required to give evidence what he had to say touching the prisoners at the bar, avouched the charge against them, and said, That he was with Mr. Hinshaw in France, who did communicate by prince Rupert to Charles Stuart the design, as is before expressed. That he saw Mr. John Gerhard oftentimes with Mr. Hinshaw while he was in France, and that he told him in England, That there was a Plot to fall on the Lord Protector, and to bring in Charles Stuart to be king, and to the rest of that design as is before expressed. And about three weeks after he met Mr. Hinshaw and Mr. John Gerhard, and they went to James's, and the Meuse, Whitehall, and other places. That Mr. John Gerhard told one Mr. Minors of the business, and how they were to fall on my Lord Protector, and so as before expressed.

Then Mr. Gerhard interrupted him, saying, 'How should this be done with a company of geese?'

To whom Mr. Prideaux answered, 'That he knew best how it should be done, and wished he had never known it, nor gone about it.'

Wiseman went on in his evidence, and said, That Mr. John Gerhard being at Mr. Hudson's house, did there speak about the plot to fall on the Lord Protector, &c. That he had a dispute with Mr. Hinshaw (whom the said Wiseman calleth brother by some relation), That such a time, and so and so, would be seasonable (mentioning some particulars): That another day he heard Mr. John Gerhard say, That he was to command the party, and had a pistol that would discharge three several times, Mr. Hinshaw and several other persons being then by; and that he doubted not but it would be seasonable. That there were to be about thirty persons to fall on the Lord Protector; that his brother Hinshaw said he was to bring five, and Mr. Gerhard 25 to do the work, and named the five aforesaid that his brother Hinshaw was to bring; and that his brother Hinshaw told him that Mr. John Gerhard was to surprize the Lord Protector's person.—And when the Plot was discovered, he heard his brother Hinshaw say, That they that were taken were all of Gerhard's party, and none of his, and that there was a Libel printed to turn the Plot on the Lord Protector, as is before expressed; and that his brother Hinshaw and Mr. Vowell had some of the Papers: That on Wednesday after it was discovered he was at Mr. Vowell's house at Islington, and his brother Hinshaw was there, and they went to the King's-Head to drink; and there his brother Hinshaw said, that the business might go on for all it was discovered, many regiments in several parts being ready to rise, enough to carry on the work.

Mr. John Gerhard and Mr. Peter Vowell, the prisoners at the bar, still denied all, and said it was not true what he said.

Mr. Edward Hudson, a Minister that was blind, was sworn, who said that Mr. Hinshaw desired him to write two or three words to the Scotch king, and that Mr. Hinshaw related all the business to him of the design, and the three objections by Charles Stuart, and prince Rupert's Answer afterwards, and the three ways to effect it; very much agreeing with the particulars aforementioned.—When he came to particulars touching the prisoners at the bar, he said that Mr. Vowell was his intimate friend, one that he had been much beholden to, and might have perished had not he relieved him. That Mr. Hinshaw sought to engage Mr. Vowell, but he answered that 'he thought himself to be unfit;' That he said 'he did not relish it;' What Mr. Hinshaw and he did agree, he knows not. What he heard was from Mr. Hinshaw, That he did meet accidentally, that he did suspect Mr. Vowell to act, but was not sure of it; that he did suppose they had concluded, but was not sure of any thing; that Mr. Vowell said he was himself unfit to engage, but he would engage a friend if he could; that Mr. Vowell said there was a great many horses at Islington, which might be surprized, that he would try what he could do; but whether he did any thing or not, he knows not.

Mr. Hudson denied some things he confessed upon oath before col. Goff, Justice of the Peace.

Col. Goff was sworn. He testified that the Examination (which was produced in the Court) was all written from Mr. Hudson's own mouth, and after it was written, it was read to him, to the end that if there had been any mistake it might be altered, and was all by him owned upon his oath, that it was freely testified, and nothing in it extorted from him.

Mr. Hudson said that he was pressed, and that he then said these words: 'Do not thus afflict an old distressed man, that hath nothing but afflictions upon him.'

To which col. Goff answered, That at first Mr. Hudson denied all, and would confess nothing until he heard the whole business confessed by another, and that all that was pressed to him was to discharge his conscience in speaking the truth; and that when he heard another to confess the Plot so fully, he desired to be heard again, and then did freely confess, according to the Examination.

In the said Examination Mr. Hudson declared the whole Plot, and the proceedings in France, Charles Stuart's objections, prince Rupert's encouragement, the three ways to effect it, and all the particulars of the design as aforesaid, &c. And how Mr. Vowell spake with Mr. Hinshaw, Mr. Wiseman, and the two soldiers; that Mr. Hinshaw said there were many cavaliers in town in the Plot, but would never speak to two together; that some relished it well, others doubted. And some agreed to seize on the Lord Protector and the guards, go with drums and colours to Whitehall, and the rest of the particulars, for bringing in Charles Stuart, &c.—In the said Examination he also said, that Mr. Hinshaw said that they would set up major-general Brown to be at the head of them, by a letter which they hoped to get from Charles Stuart, and believed that he would accept of it, he being a friend to the king, as they called him. That it was propounded to Mr. Vowell, who did consent to do something in it, and did afterwards meet some six times at Mr. Hudson's house. That Mr. Vowell engaged Billingsly the butcher aforesaid to be a considerable man, discoursed with him of the number of horse, and Billingsly said to him that the horses at grass might be easily seized. That Hinshaw told him and Vowell, after Gerhard was taken, that none of his party was taken, and that the Plot might go on, that the French, English, and Irish from prince Rupert were to land at Rye, and other places in Sussex.

The Lord President asked Mr. Hudson whether he did own it; to whom he answered, That they were together, and such and such things were spoken; but how far Mr. Vowell consented, he knows not.

Then Mr. Robert Dale was sworn, who declared against Mr. Vowell the prisoner at the bar, That Mr. Vowell came to his house, and asked him what arms he had; he told him two pistols; he said he would buy them of him; he asked for what use; he said that he would tell him hereafter. That he came with Mr. Hinshaw and Mr. Wiseman several times to his house, who did declare that they had a design to fall on the Lord Protector (and so in all particulars agreeing with the rest touching the whole business of the design how it should have been done, as hath been before exprest.) And that sir Gilbert Pickering, Mr. Strickland, and two or three more of the Council were named that should be cut off.—That they invited him to assist them, and would have engaged him to fall on in the seizing of them at Islington, and they said there was one to head them, which they should know afterwards, and he said that Mr. Vowell heard these things. And that at another time Mr. Hinshaw, Mr. Wiseman, and Mr. Plunket met with Mr. Vowell.

And his Examination was read: That Mr. Vowell asked him whether he had any arms to accommodate friends, he said two pistols (and the rest of the discourse as now he had spoken before the Court); only the Examination mentioned a third person of the council, viz. major general Lambert also to be cut off. That they were provided of an head, and bid him therefore be sure to rise when he had notice. Then Mr. Hinshaw seeing two men passing along by where he was, supposing them to be soldiers, said they should be killed, and he said that Plunket would give notice when they should be ready upon the design to fall on; and that he was engaged to get as many as he could to assist in the work: That Vowell brought Hinshaw to his house.

John Hipwell, one of the two soldiers in the Plot, being sworn, said, That a Papist woman brought him to Mr. Hudson's house where he met with them, and one told him, That he had something to discover to him, if he could join in it. That he was examined how strong the guards were, and that regiment of which he was, and said the regiment were 1200: He was asked what ammunition, and other such-like questions, to all which he gave answer. After some discourse he told him, That it was to fall on the Lord Protector, and on the guards, &c. and so told him the whole design (which he related to the same purpose as those before). That he was bid to enquire what cavaliers were in the regiment, and among the soldiery, and drink with them, and do what he could to divide the soldiery, and to make what party he could for this work, and that when the time should be for action, the word should be 'Fall on.' The next morning hearing some were taken prisoners, there was much sorrow.

Then col. Aldridge was sworn; who said, That Mr. Hinshaw revealed there was a design to have fallen on the Lord Protector, and brought in Charles Stuart to be king, and related the particulars much to the purpose as is before expressed, and that Hinshaw asked him, if he would be one; that he made some queries about it; but Mr. Hinshaw told him, They had great hopes of accomplishing it, and that there was an officer of their own in the Tower that should free the prisoners, and put swords in their hands, and that all should be done upon an instant, and that then they should have money enough.

Then Mr. John Gerhard was caused to withdraw awhile.

Mr. Charles Gerhard was next called for, to see what he could say touching the plot, who declared, That Mr. Hinshaw had been in France with Charles Stuart, and his brother John also, and Mr. Wiseman had been there; and made a narrative of all the proceedings there, agreeing with the rest before; and spake also of several meetings at Ludgate-hill and Covent-garden; how he met col. Finch at the piazza, who told him of the design to kill the Lord Protector, to seize on the guards, the Lord Mayor, &c. proclaim Charles Stuart king; and the rest of that story of their design, in which he agreed with the former. And that he declared to him, That they were listing apace, and they had many joined hereabouts: that col. Deane had listed all that day: that he himself had listed some: that col. Finch had a party to join with him in the city. That another time he had further discourse again with him about it; that they were to meet the next day, and then it was also said, That Finch was to command a party, and that his brother John Gerhard also was to command a party, and that his brother John was then by, and heard this discourse; and that it was said there was ready about London to seize on several parts, in all, about 2 or 3,000: that col. Finch was to seize on the Lord Mayor, col. Dean on James's, col. Haines on col. Ingolsbie in Southwark (and so named other particulars like what is mentioned before): told him also the management of the design in France (agreeing with what is mentioned before), and said, he had a commission from the king (as he called him). And he spake also of their meeting at the Bell Savage at Ludgate-hill, where mention was made of his brother John Gerhard; and that Somerset Fox was there, and engaged in the design, and his was to get in all the Apprentices he could to join in it. That at another time Hinshaw said, They had listed two or three thousand.

Then Mr. John Gerhard was called to the bar again, where he appeared with the other two.

Mr. Charles Gerhard was then sworn, and upon his oath gave in evidence, after his brother was brought to the bar, That the design was to fall on the Lord Protector, &c. (he gave a short narrative as before) and further said, that his brother John Gerhard had been in France.

John Gerhard prisoner at the bar said, He confessed it, that he was in France when they were there, and was sometimes in their company, but denied that he knew any thing of any plot.

Mr. Charles Gerhard being desired to go on further, said, That Mr. Hinshaw was several times at his lodgings, near Essex house, and his brother with him, and talked with him of the design, which his brother scrupled; but he told him, that if it could be accomplished, the king (as he called him) would like well of it. That his brother met Mr. Hinshaw at Covent-garden, at Mr. Jones's house in Rose-street, who had pen and ink before him, and talked of the numbers and other particulars, his brother John then in the room (and he named the particulars as before). But his brother did not relish it, and was pressed by them, nor did he know that he consented to act.

Mr. Prideaux told Mr. Charles Gerhard, That he did well to be as sparing as he could against a brother, only be careful to speak the truth, though with the fairest interpretation, because conscience is nearer than a brother.

The Lord President also said, That he was not to look upon either the greatness of men, or the relation of a brother in this thing, but to look upon his conscience, and to look up to his God.

John Mun was sworn, who declared the design in general, (as the rest all agreeing) and that Mr. John Gerhard and others had consulted about it.

That being asked if he would engage in it, he answered, Yes: that afterwards he went to the Bell Savage; but when he came there, there were Somerset Fox and others, and they said he could not have admission, for several were apprehended about it, and they knew not what to do.

William Dod was sworn, who gave in evidence, That on Thursday morning in Whitsun-week, Somerset Fox told him, that there was a design (as aforesaid, giving him an account of the whole), but he told him that it was to be kept secret. And that they were to meet about 2 o'clock in the morning about it. That at the Bell Savage he met with Somerset Fox, and his cousin Fox the next day again, and had the like discourse.

Francis Fox being sworn, gave in the like evidence against his cousin Somerset Fox, and that he was invited to join with them, but could not tell what to do.

John Wharton was sworn, who said, he keeps a victualling-house in Black-friars, and that a gentleman, a stranger, came to him, and asked him, If he would serve the king, and fell in discourse about his calling; that he told him he had married a poor widow: and that the gentleman told him, that if the design went on, he might have money enough, and said that he would find him better employment. The gentleman's name, he said, was Hinshaw, as he heard afterward. And that he told him, He would not be long before he came again. He said that he did believe that they had designed to seize on the Lord Protector, and all the Horse Guards. But for his part, he was, when they should give him notice of it, only to proclaim the king; that was all that he was to do.

Mr. Barnes was sworn, who spake of the Design in general, much after the same manner as those before.

Mr. Minors was the last witness sworn, who gave evidence, that major Hinshaw told him of the design near Covent-garden, and one Mr. Harrison, Tuedor, and others, were mentioned. That he asked him if he would join in it. That afterward he met with Hinshaw in the Palace-yard at Westminster, who told him of the design as before. And that major John Gerhard would command a party, and that the business was then in good forwardness, but major John Gerhard thought it could not yet be accomplished. And that when Mr. Hinshaw heard Mr. John Gerhard was taken, he said that he might thank himself; for had not he delayed it, the business might have been done two days before.

The Prisoners at the bar were then asked what they had to say for themselves.

Mr. John Gerhard said he was falsely accused, and that the Witnesses did not speak the truth, and denied that he had any thing to do in the plot, or knew of it.

Mr. Vowell did require of the Court to be allowed pen, ink and paper, the copy of his Charge, and counsel to advise him what defence to make for himself. And he pleaded Magna Charta again, as before, and the sixth Article of the Government of the Lord Protector.

Serjeant Glyn declared, that an ordinance being declared law until the parliament shall repeal it, is to give the same authority to it, which is to an Act of Parliament, every Act being a law no longer. That the laws of old of Treason against the king are of force (were this new Ordinance not in being): For it means the Supreme Governor*; though it names only a King, it hath been made use of for Treason against a Queen, and so is to be touching a Lord Protector, or any other Supreme Governor.

Mr. Ellis, Counsel of the Commonwealth, produced in Court the Government of the Lord Protector, in which that very Article, in the conclusion of it, hath a Proviso to the 30th Article.

The Attorney General (Prideaux) declared, that the Charge having been so fully proved against them, yet they could not but take notice of the ingenuous confession of Somerset Fox; but were sorry to see such obstinacy in the other two, after such a barbarous and bloody design; that they should shew no signs of repentance: And therefore in behalf of the Commonwealth prayed for Justice from the Court against them.

The Court adjourned into the Painted Chamber, and ordered that they should have pen, ink and paper, and any friend to come to them that they should desire in the presence of the lieutenant of the Tower.

The Court adjourned until Thursday next in the afternoon: When Mr. Gerhard, Vowell, and Fox were again brought before the Court, and were demanded what they had more to say for themselves, Gerhard and Vowell denied the fact, notwithstanding what had been proved against them; after which the Lord President Lisle made a short speech to convince them of the desperate wickedness of their design, and how fully the Charge had been proved, and what punishments the law hath provided in such cases; after which the Sentence of the Court was read severally to all three to this effect: That upon mature consideration of the Treasons and Murders plotted and contrived by them against his highness the Lord Protector, and the Commonwealth, and raising a bloody war in the same, the Court did adjudge them to be hanged by the neck, until they be dead.

Mr. Gerhard desired the execution might be altered, and that he might be beheaded, or shot to death; and presented a Petition to the Lord Protector for that purpose.

The Protector was pleased to reprieve Somerset Fox, because of his ingenuous Confession, but the other two were executed the Monday following, July 10. Vowell was executed in the morning upon a gallows erected at Charing Cross; he spake little of the crime for which he suffered; but his main discourse was to proclaim his zeal for the Old Way of Religion, and to the cause of the late king and his family; after half an hour's hanging he was cut down, and conveyed away in a coach.

About four in the afternoon of the same day, Mr. John Gerhard was brought to the scaffold on Tower Hill; his behaviour was sprightly, the substance of his Discourse Cavalier-like, boasting himself of the profession of religion which was established by queen Elizabeth, king James, and king Charles, to which family he declared his affection. He acknowledged himself guilty of former sins, for which he had deserved death heretofore; but as touching the crime for which he was to die, he spent not many words, only he confessed, that he knew of the Plot. At length he submitted his neck to the executioner, who at one blow severed his head from his body.

A true and impartial RELATION of the DEATH (and dying Speech) of Mr. John Gerhard, who was beheaded on Tower-hill, July 10, 1654. [Published by his friends *.]

It was thought needless by the friends of Mr. Gerhard, to declare any thing concerning his Sufferings to the world more than in their sighs, had not the sacrilegious malice of the last weekly pamphlet thrown some stains upon his name, and so incensed them to a vindication as pious as his death was. It is most certain, that there can no blots stick upon true honour, which such weak felons endeavour against it: These are cursed beasts, but their horns are short: sepulchral dogs, that scrape up graves, and violate the dead, and are fierce and ravenous; but yet dogs still. And all worthy people will call their railing, praise, and what they intend a barking infamy, the greatest merit. Yet because every understanding is not of the same brightness, and those putrid libels may, by ill chance, fall into some innocent hand hereafter (and yet sure such vermin should not be endured long), therefore let wise and good men pardon him that hath undertaken this justice for that gentleman, and be pleased to read this sad Story, not for their satisfaction sake, but their sorrows: It may dry up a friendly tear, perhaps, and still a murmuring groan, to see the comely posture of his passion, how well all was carried by him, and how honourably; and the honest circumstances may not improbably take off from the sadness. Why should I grieve that death which had such a living glory in it; or dishonour that blood with feeble tears, which was shed so like the holy Martyrs? All that knew this person, cannot but witness his general resolution, and whether his great courage fell less than itself (as that viper hissed), or did not rather rise greater now, when the christian was twisted with the gentleman, let this faithful Relation witness: in which, though all terms and syllables may not be exactly the same, yet if there be a material falsehood, or a wilful flattery, may his neck that wrote it feel a viler destiny than axes are, or halters. Amicus Gerardus, sed magis Amica Veritas.

From the first day of his Imprisonment he foresaw the heavy sentence hovering upon him, and therefore gave all diligence to secure himself against it; that however he underwent a temporal condemnation, he might escape an eternal. But after that sad doom was pronounced, then he bestirred himself again, and made double haste for Heaven: It was for his life, and therefore he would lose no minute, but the same night gave directions to a dear friend for a minister, whom he knew to have long honoured his family, to be brought to him early next morning; and it pleased Authority to gratify him in this great desire, so that an Order was sent freely for the quiet admission of any such person to him. With this spiritual friend he spent some hours every day in prayer, and other ghostly refreshments; which, God be praised, were not without sweet effect and impressions upon his soul. There were some other ministers, Mr. Bond and Mr. Caryl, of great observation for gravity and godliness in these times, who visited him, and who I am confident will put their seal to this truth with me, that they found him meek, humble, modest, penitent, comforted, and not far from the kingdom of God, if not already in it; but I have good hope he was in possession, and so had he, through grace. Upon the morning (which was the last he must see until that of the Resurrection) he submitted to some wholesome orders of the Church, and received her comforts by them. That done, he proceeded to, the highest enjoyment of grace that can be administered upon earth, the Holy Communion, whereof with his brother sir Gilbert Gerrard he was a partaker, with as much reverence, zeal, thankfulness, holy sorrows, and holy joys, as a devout soul could evidence: He wept as if he would have washed his Saviour's wounds, which his faith presented in his tears; and yet he said he was admirably ravished with all inward peace and comfort in his own conscience. This passed ; he had now nothing to do but to die, which he expected that morning very speedily : But by the pleasure of Authority both the time and the place of his execution were altered ; so that he was to wait a little longer until evening, for his release. Many friends and persons of honour came to take their last leave of him, who can gladly witness his undisturbedness, and civil cheerfulness to every one of them. His brother tarried continually with him, and they eat together ; and though some eruptions of passion could not be restrained now and then, where nature was so much concerned, yet they were generally pleasant ; and at last parted, about half an hour before he was led forth to death, with as much calmness and placidness as if they had been to meet again anon safe and unhurt, as they had done formerly. So have I seen a windy and stormy day conclude in stillness and sun-shine, as if weary, and desiring to rest without any breath of trouble. The Minister only waited on him to the last ; and about five o'clock enters the Lieutenant of the Tower, and the Sheriff of London ; (two sure friends, that will not leave him, as long as he hath life remaining in him :) They told him a sour message, That they were come to conduct him to his death's blow. He replied, They were very welcome ; and received them so fearless and untroubled, that the Sheriff told the Minister, He was sorry to see him so unfit for that condition ; but, under favour, he mi-took his condition : That which he accounted fitness to die, our Pamphlet-monger would have called Flagging and Cowardice. So hard a thing it is to satisfy all curiosities, even with our blood, and nothing more ingenious than to carry this bitter cup even, when so many misconstructions shake it. At his lodging, he desired the Sheriff that he would permit the Minister, and three others that were his friends and servants, to go upon the scaffold with him ; which, as it was a seasonable wisdom in him to desire, so was it a fortunate kindness from them that granted it, else it may be their testimony might have been wanting to his injured reputation. He took leave particularly of the houshold, where he was a prisoner, and was so clearly collected in every thing he did, that he went out of his way into the kitchen, to bid his landlady farewell, giving thanks for her respects during his bonds, which he said he should die in to her. As he passed by the guards in the Tower, he gave them money twice, and told them, he should trouble them no longer, being on his remove to better guards. He walked along to the Scaffold on Tower-Hill, shewing a great deal both of humility and respect to the people, who generally lamented him, and prayed for him. As he went, he was bare-headed for the most part, carrying his hat in his hand, and sometimes resting it in a careless bravery on his left side. When he came to (or rather leaped upon) the scaffold, (for he was so far from flagging when about to tread that tragical stage, that many observed how sprightly he seemed to skip up the steps to it, as if he had gone to dance there, rather than to die) his grim Executioner presented himself to him, to whom, with a cheerful smile, he said, 'Welcome, honest friend ;' and desiring to see his axe, he took it into his hands, and kissing it, with a pretty glance of his eye, which was a natural loveliness in him, towards the minister, he said, 'This will do the deed, I warrant it.' The scaffold was very much crowded with people, yet, as well as he could, he made some turns to and fro upon it, with a Paper, which he had taken out of his pocket, in his hand, wherein, it seems, he had prepared some heads for a Speech, which he intended to have delivered ; but the Sheriff and Lieutenant told him, if he spoke any thing, it must be very brief, and that they must not suffer him to speak any thing that was seditious : 'Well, gentlemen,' says he, 'your will be done ; but, God be praised, I never yet had to do with any thing that was seditious ! I would fain have spoken something to clear myself to the world, according to the custom, if it might have been : But come, Sir,' (says he, turning to the minister,) 'let you and I speak to him that will give us leave ;' and so kneeling down together in a corner of the stage, the minister prayed with him a short time ; which done, they stood up again : Then turning himself to the people, and putting off his hat, he told them, That he was not permitted to speak a few words, according to his intention, yet he doubted not but what he would have said would come to their eyes, though it must not come to their ears ; 'But this I desire all to take notice of,' (and this he spoke with a double vehemence,) 'that I die a faithful subject and servant to king Charles the Second, whom I pray God to bless, and restore to his rights ; and had I ten thousand thousand lives, I would gladly lay them all down thus for his service.' Here he was interrupted, and the Sheriff wished him rather to confess what he knew concerning the horrid Plot he was condemned for ; he answered, That he had confessed all that he knew concerning any Plot ; that he thought they knew more of the Plot that condemned him, than he did, but he heartily forgave them. The Minister told him, it was well done to forgive and pardon those that persecute us, that was an act of true Christian love, but, as his case stood, love was not enough ; he ought to deal in this business, upon which his life lay, with all candour and sincerity, not concealing any thing of that nature, as was charged against him, as far as he might glorify God, and serve the public good. Upon which, lifting up his eyes towards heaven, and laying his hand upon his breast, 'Oh ! Sir,' says he, 'if there had been any such thing in this breast, would I not have revealed it before this time ? I protest, in the sight of Almighty God, I know no more of any such design, but only what I have often acknowledged, that it was motioned to me by Henshaw, (who, I confidently believe, is in their hands,)

‘ and debated twice or thrice, when I was with him ; but I never entertained it at all, and at the last flatly disowned it, and told him, I would have nothing to do in it. He was many times pressing me to nominate what persons I knew I could bring, and to have their names ; but let them shew any such thing, if they can, against me : But I am certain he is in their hands.’ Pausing here a little, and fetching a turn or two on the Scaffold, being very hot, as he had been all that morning, he called for some small-beer, which he had given order to be ready, and was brought thither in a stone bottle, of which he drank a little once or twice. Then the Minister went to him, and minded him, that something might be expected from him, as to his religion and disposition to die : To which, gathering up an extraordinary resolution in his face, he replied, ‘ I die a Christian, a true Christian, according to that faith and religion, which was professed by the church of England, in the time of our late king, of blessed memory. And I praise God, I am so fitted and ready to die, that I am confident, by the merits of Christ Jesus, that my sins are pardoned, and my salvation is at hand.’ Then turning about, he called for his waistcoat and cap, and throwing off his doublet, put them on, whilst his servants helped to put up his hair. His waistcoat was not very clean, which he took notice of to his man : ‘ But it is no great matter,’ said he, ‘ if the heart be clean, all is well enough.’ Being thus prepared, he calls for the block, and viewing it, as with delight, laid himself down upon it, to see how it would fit, and was so far from sinking at the sight of it, that he almost played with it ; and rising quickly, pulls a little Prayer-Book out of his pocket, which he gave to the Minister, willing him to find that particular prayer which was proper for that occasion ; but the crowd being great, he could not quickly find it, so that he kneeled down with the book open awhile in his hand, as if he had read, but quickly shut it, and prayed with great expressions of fervency by himself. When he had done, the Lieutenant said something to him, as it seems, concerning his brother Charles, that had witnessed against him ; I know not what the Lieutenant said, for he spake low, but Mr. Gerard spake aloud, and replied passionately, ‘ Oh ! Christ, Sir ! I love my poor brother with all my heart ! He is but a youth, and was terrified ; I know how he was dealt with ; tell him, I love him as well as ever I loved him in my life : And commend me to my brother sir Gilbert, whose release I beseech you, Sir, to assist ; there being no more cause, that I know of, for his imprisonment, than only that he was found in the same bed with me, which, I sure, is no capital crime.’ Having said this, he took his leave with him, and the Sheriff, and all he knew on the stage ; and turning about once more to the people, desired them to pray for him ; himself kneeling down with the minister, laid his head in his bosom, and they prayed together the last time. After this, he bid them all farewell again, and besought them to remember they had a poor sovereign abroad, who deserved to be remembered. Then forgiving the Executioner, and saluting the Minister with his last embrace and kisses, he bowed himself to the stroke of death, with as much Christian meekness and noble courage mixed together, as I believe was ever seen in any that had bled upon that altar : And this all the people, that were spectators, did seem to understand and acknowledge, beholding his fatal blow with a universal sadness and silence ; whereas, when the other gentleman fell quickly after, upon another score of blood and riot, they gave a great and general shout, as applauding the justice of the Portugal’s death* ; but pitying and bewailing the untimely fall of so brave and magnanimous a spirit, as did, through all the clouds of death, shine gloriously in this unfortunate gentleman.

His Speech.

“ Gentlemen, As this kind of spectacle is no new entertainment to your eyes, for you have had a late glut of such objects, so is it no strange thing to me to be made such a spectacle ; for I have been bred upon the theatre of death, and have learned that part so well, though, I confess, a very hard one, as to perform it pretty handsomely, both as becomes a gentleman and a Christian. Only I must desire you to expect no fine Prologue, or Speech, from me ; I never studied to make orations : A very unfit man to lay plots against a state, who am scarce able to lay a few lines of plain English together, as I ought ; but though I cannot speak happily, I doubt not but I shall die happily.

“ I confess myself a great sinner ; Who is innocent ? God be merciful to me, a miserable sinner. I adore the justice of God in all this that is come upon me ; I have deserved to die long since, and blessed be God, who hath given me such time to prepare ; but for this crime I stand condemned for to-day, I do protest mine own innocency, as to any consent or engagement to act in it. I hope you will believe me, when you consider upon what slender Proofs and Testimonies I suffer ; none of them legal, or positive, but circumstantial.

“ For my brother Charles, alas, poor youth ! how he was wrought upon ! But I desire all my friends to think honourably of him. For my brother sir Gilbert, this imagination of a Plot is said to have been hatched in France, but I fear the nest was at Whitehall. As for the king, so far from concurring to such a deed, that I am only unsatisfied in this, whether I shall die right in his favour, because suspected of any thing so unworthy of him. I fear he lost his kingdom by such practices; but whether he would recover them so, is a question: God hath better ways, when it shall be good in his sight to plead his cause.

"I was lately in France, but on mine own score; for I have commanded there and probably might again.

"For my past life, it hath been but a troublesome one, but now I hope I shall rest! Since I was any thing, I have served the king, as I was bound; and I wish all that did so had done it as faithfully: he was condemned for a tyrant, but God——

"For my religion, though a soldier, I am able to profess I am a Christian soldier, a true son of the church of England, as constituted under queen Elizabeth, king James, and king Charles, of blessed memory: her doctrine and government I embrace, her truth and peace I pray God to restore. I humbly give thanks to God Almighty, for providing me the comfort of a minister, on whose fidelity I might repose my soul. And I pray God to bless the poor faithful ministers of this church, and give you hearts to esteem them? the want whereof is no small cause of our misery. My days have been few and evil, yet, God be blessed, in all the vanities and folly of youth, I have been far from Atheism, or contempt of God's worship; I had always awful impressions of God's honour and service, which is now my comfort.

"And now, dear countrymen, fare you well! I pray God bless you all, and this whole nation. Alas, poor England! when will these black days be over? When will there be blood enough? I wish mine may fill up the measure.—I forgive all. Once more fare you well! Commend me to all my friends, pray for me. I pray God make you as faithful and loyal as I have lived, and as happy as I shall be by-and-bye when I am dead. Come Lord Jesus! come quickly! Father of mercies, have mercy on me! Saviour of the world save my soul! O Lamb of God, that takes away the sins of the world, hear my prayers! Into thy hands, O Lord, I commend my spirit! Lord Jesus! receive my soul!"

The DYING SPEECH of Mr. Peter Vowell, executed July 10, 1654. [From the MS. of Dr. Richard Drake, late Chancellor of Sarum.]

"Gentlemen; At this earthly bar, from them that pretend to have a great measure of sanctity, I had hard measure: But to that bar I am now going, the Bar of Heaven, where I shall have justice; yea, one day justice against them, except they water their beds and couches with tears of repentance.

"The Court gave severe and rash Judgment on my body; and sent a pitiful fellow (but pitiless) that gave as rash a judgment on my soul: But that precious jewel none of them could touch to hurt. The souls under the altar cried for vengeance, loud, long ago: How many more of late years have been added to them to help the cry! The cry is loud of those lately, whose blood hath been unlawfully spilt. But vengeance is God's, and I will leave it to him. The Court at my Trial said I was confident, and held it as a fault: He also whom they sent to the Tower (I know not if to intrap me) under pretence to comfort my soul, told me also I was confident. I say the same; and the same confidence bring with me now; and by God's assistance, I hope, shall carry it out of this world with my innocence.

"Gentlemen Soldiers, Amongst the ancient and most savage sort of Heathens they had a law, one every three, six, or twelve months, to offer up a sacrifice of human blood to their God; and that their God was a Devil. Amongst us, whether Heathen or not you best know, of late years, we have had a fatal custom, once in three, six, or twelve months, to make not only a sacrifice, but many sacrifices of human Christian blood: Our scaffolds have reeked and smoked with the choicest sort of blood; but unto what God, do you judge. What God is he that delights in the blood of a man? Baal, the God of Ekron; Beelzebub, the God of Flies.

"Amongst the primitive Christians, that lived nearest the time of our Saviour Christ, the greatest tyrants and persecutors of the Christians lived. The persecution was great; and yet the courage of those persecuted Christians was so great, that it excelled the fury of the persecutors; that they came in faster to be killed, than they could kill: they offered their bodies and throats so thick unto the slaughter, that the hands of the tyrants were weary with killing. And yet Sanguis Martyrum was Semen Ecclesie: And many heathens came in with the Christians, and died Christians, and died with them; the Christians still increased the more.

"Of late years there hath been a great persecution in this nation; and yet the sufferers have been so many, and presented themselves so thick, in the vindication of their king, country, and laws, that they startled the very enemy himself; their constancy so great, that the eyes of their judges dropt tears; whether real or true, let the Judge of Judges judge: They still stand amazed at their constancy; though they exceed the old heathens, are not weary of killing.

"Oh Soldiers! how many of you have been brought up and led on by blind principles, wronged in your education, or seduced by your indiscreet, heedless, and heady teachers? How many of you, young, have for some small discontent departed from your loving masters, dear friends, or tender parents, and fled into the army? How many of you driven by tyrannous oppression, poverty, or cruelty, have left your dear wives and children? And some for novelty or wantonness adhered to this imployment, not considering the great danger of spilling innocent blood. How many of you have drawn your swords, you do not know for what? How many of you keep drawn your swords, you do not know for what?

"You have put to death a pious and just king; and in his stead have reared up even another Jeroboam, that makes Israel to sin: What his goodness is, you best know.

"You have put down a good old law, and raised up another of your own to judge the people by. For my calling for the benefit of the former, and for the equity even of your own law, I am in part condemned here to die. Be you judge of the proceedings.

"How many of you have had a hand in putting down the ancient true Church, and raised up in your own imaginations a new one; But, alas! you know not what you do: If you did, you would grieve to see what a glorious church you have ruined; you would never have pulled up the hedges, and broken down the fences, that the wild beasts of the forests should come in; that the little foxes should devour, and the wild boar root out so stately a vine.

"When the Jews were led into captivity, their godly and magnificent temple was burnt: But in process of time they obtained favour amongst the heathen kings they dwelt amongst, and had liberty wherewith to rebuild. Rebuild they did, and finished a second temple; at which sight all the young men rejoiced, to see so gallant a temple; but the old men wept, to see how far different and short the second temple was from the glory of the first. So you, young men, rejoice at your imaginary church; but the old men, methinks I see some weep. Oh! weep not for me! weep for your country! weep to see religion, liberty, and laws taken from you! weep to see so many good men snatched away, but indeed from the miseries to come! and weep for what miseries your unhappy selves will suffer!

"Soldiers, However you flourish for a time, and perhaps many of you may rejoice at our deaths, believe it, as Samson pulled the house of the Philistines down, when he fell; so shall we give you and your cause a greater blow by our deaths, than living we possibly could have done. You may for a time flourish; but remember what our Saviour said: 'All you that make use of the sword, shall perish by the sword.' You shall be cut down like the grass, and wither away like the green herbs.

"But do you behold yonder glorious place? Do you behold the spangled heavens, where the holy Angels dwell, where God himself is surrounded with thrones, principalities, powers, and the celestial spirits of just men? When the trump shall blow, when the dead shall rise at the dreadful day of judgment, how will you answer all your rapes and murders? Do you think that your hands, which have been bathed in the blood of your king, the blood of so many of your eminent countrymen, so unjustly: that have been bathed in the blood of many of your friends, your kindred, perhaps your parents, can ever reach yonder glorious place, without repentance? Oh! no. Repent now, therefore, it is not too late; Shake off your bloody Protector; rescue your ancient laws; and call in your royal young Prince, whom you have long enough wronged. Make your addresses to the great Protector of heaven and earth; and desire him, as I now do for myself, for a pardon, for a pardon for all your former and present transgressions.

"I die an obedient son of the church of England, and with a dutiful heart to the king; and desire that none present that loves them would be disheartened by my death, but continue faithful to the end. And so farewell, I forgive all the world."

196. Proceedings of the Commissioners, appointed by Oliver Cromwell, for ejecting Scandalous and Insufficient Ministers, against JOHN PORDAGE, of Bradfield, in the County of Berks: 6 CHARLES II. A. D. 1654. [Wrote by Himself.]

I WAS first warned by this subsequent summons, to appear before the Commissioners:

Monday, September 18, 1654.

Berks, ss. By the Commissioners appointed by an Ordinance* of his highness the Lord Protector and his Council, for ejecting of Scandalous Ministers.

"Whereas several scandalous Articles have been exhibited against Dr. J. Pordage of Bradfield, in the said county of Berks; which said Articles lying now before the said Commissioners, it is thereupon ordered by the said Commissioners, that the said Dr. Pordage do make his personal Appearance before the said Commissioners, on Thursday the 5th of October next, at the Bear in Speenhamland, by Newbury, at 9 o'clock in the morning, to answer the said Articles exhibited against him: Whereof he is not to fail. Given under our hands

* Collier, whose account of ecclesiastical affairs during the period, between the death of Charles 1. and the restoration of his son, is extremely brief, says of this Ordinance merely, (vol. 2. p. 867, of his Ecclesiastical History) "Their next Statute provides for removing scandalous and insufficient Ministers and

School Masters; that is, those who had continued firm to the church and crown. For this purpose, a considerable number of secular Commissioners are nominated for each county. There is likewise a list of ministers throughout the same divisions of the kingdom, appointed for this purpose. By the Act the and seals in Reading, the day and year above said.

S. Wightwick,	W. Natkine,
R. Fincher,	W. Cooke."

Accordingly at the time prefixed I appeared, about 9 o'clock in the morning, in the place above expressed; where I waited till betwixt 3 and 4 o'clock before I was called in. Then came the door-keeper to tell me that the Commissioners called for me.

I presently obeyed, and followed their servant, with two friends that accompanied me. Then the door-keeper commanded my two friends to go forth of the room. I told him they were to be there. He replied, That he was ordered by the Commissioners to let none in but myself; and therefore they should be put out: And so began in an uncivil manner, by violence, to thrust them forth. Whereupon I applied myself to the Commissioners, telling them these two were my friends; and that I brought them as eye-witnesses of the proceedings; and that it was no reason that I should be alone. To which it was answered, They must depart, it being resolved upon by them to have none but myself there present. Then the door-keeper began with violence to pull them forth, crying out, Do you not hear the sense of the Commissioners? I turning towards them again, said, I desire none present but these my two friends. It was replied, it should not be so. Upon this I was necessitated to ask them, against my will, what they were, whether a public Court of Justice, yea or no? For if they were, I demanded the liberty of a subject, that their doors might be opened, for all to come in that would; that so their proceedings might be open. Moreover, I shewed how this was the custom of all Committees above, and of all such Courts of Judicature. Whereupon the doors were opened, and the people came in; Mr. Wightwick openly averring that I should fare the worse for it. Thus was I necessitated to contend for this just and reasonable privilege; for which my cause was unjustly threatened.

The Commissioners then sitting were these, with one or two more; Mr. Fettiplace chairman, Mr. Samuel Wightwick, Mr. Samuel Dunch, major Fincher, major Allin, Mr. Cox, Mr. Strowde, Mr. Angell Bell. The ministers lay-Commissioners could determine nothing without the approbation of the Ministers, who were joined in Commission with them. It must be said, these Usurpers did not plunder and persecute without some resemblance of compassion. For by the Act, a fifth part of the profits of the benefice, is allowed to the wives and children of the ejected Ministers."

It is to be lamented that this resemblance of compassion, was not imitated in lord Clarendon's Act of Uniformity, stat. 13, 14, Car. 2. c. 4. Of the proceedings under this Ordinance or Statute as he calls it, Collier says not a word.

were these, with some other, Mr. Hewes, Mr. Tickle.

But to proceed: As I stood silent before them, Mr. Dunch turned to me, and with much seeming bitterness and passion spake thus: Dare you deny Christ to be God? And again, How dare you deny the God-head of Christ? To whom I replied, I came to know my Charge which was exhibited against me; and that I hoped he had not judged my cause before it was heard.

Hereupon the Chairman commanded Langley the Clerk to read these following Articles in open Court.

ARTICLES against DR. PORDAGE of Bradfield.

1. That the Fiery Deity of Christ mingles and mixes itself with our flesh.

2. That the imputative righteousness of Christ is a sapless righteousness.

3. That the discoveries of the sinfulness of sin, the terrors of the law, the death of Christ, the free grace of God, are fleshly and flashy discoveries.

4. That the liberty and freedom spoken of, purchased by the Blood of Christ, and applied by the clinging and cleaving of the soul to, is not a liberty or freedom from the guilt of sin, the curse of the law, the wrath of God; but the Fiery Deity of Christ in the centre of our souls.

5. That by male and female, Gen. i. we are to understand by male* the Deity, by the

* This seems somewhat to resemble one of the fundamental doctrines of the Moravians: What a tissue of absurdity, obscenity, and impiety they derived from it may be seen in "A Candid Narrative of the Rise and Progress of the Herrnhuters, commonly called Moravians or Unitas Fratrum, by Henry Rimius, Lond. 1753." "A Supplement to the Candid Narrative, &c." "A Solemn Call on count Zinzendorf, to answer all and every Charge," &c. and "A Second Call on Mr. Zinzendorf, &c. Lond. 1757," (All by the same author.) "A True and Authentic Account of Andrew Frey, &c." "An Expostulatory Letter, addressed to Count Zinzendorf, &c. by George Whitefield, A. B. Lond. 1753." "Queries humbly proposed to the Right Reverend and Right Honourable Count Zinzendorf, Lond. 1755." And "The Moravians compared and detected, (by Bishop Lavington) London 1755." See also Art. Zinzendorf in the Biographia. In a Conference concerning some of their religious doctrines, count Zinzendorf their founder, thus expressed himself. "In ipso actu conjugali inbruiturus possem dicere salvatori, Veni de isto actu, h. e. quem nomine tuo peregi." Zinzendorf, by the addition of blasphemy, has given to the profligacy of Ovid's wish,

—' Mihi contingat Veneris languescere motu,

' Cum moriar, &c.'

perhaps the only aggravation, of which it was susceptible, The learned and penetrating female the Humanity; and that these two became one flesh. These things were delivered without any limitation whatsoever.

6. That gifts and graces of the Spirit are but flesh.

7. That Christ is a Type, and but a Type.

8. That Christ is not God.

9. That Christ is not Jehovah."

Tickle witnesseth.

After these Articles were read the chairman demanded my Answer. To whom I replied, That I had been acquitted from all these, four years since, by the Committee of Plundered Ministers, and that after a full hearing and debate; therefore I desired that (according to law) they would pass by these old ones. But if they had any that were new, I told them I was ready and willing to receive and answer them. I further replied, I hoped they would give me the liberty of a felon, who, after trial and acquitment, cannot be questioned for the same thing again. To which Mr. Dunch replied, with much seeming fierceness, You are worse than a felon, for aught I know. Which language coming from a Judge to the Defendant before trial, let all sober persons judge of, who are acquainted with the rules of civility, morality, or Christianity.

Here Mr. Hewes the minister interposed, affirming, That a felon might be acquitted at one assize, and hang for the same thing at the next: of which he gave an instance in a story not worth the relating. To which I replied only this, That it could not be for the same he was acquitted of before. But I seeing that he had gone ultra crepidam, beyond his office, and beyond reason, said no more to him; though he was very bitter and pragmatistical, speaking oft as judge, although he was but an assistant, and that only in reference to Ignorance and Insufficiency.

But afterward, applying myself to the Chairman, I further urged, That these Articles were not within the cognizance of the Commissioners, in that I had been discharged from them, by those who had full power and authority to do it.

After this, all were commanded to withdraw; and about an hour after I was called in again, and asked for my Discharge. I answered, I came now only to know my Charge; and that I had not my Discharge there, but should bring it when they would appoint me. Then they declared, That notwithstanding my Discharge in another court, yet it was the judgment of the Commissioners, that they had power to take cognizance of the Articles exhibited. Whence they made this Order, viz.

Bayle, thinks that Laïs herself would not have participated in the abandoned dissoluteness of this sentiment, but would rather have deprecated such a fate; though, indeed, we learn from a fragment of Philæterus (quoted in the 13th book of the Deipnosophists of Athenæus) that it actually befel her; αὐτὴν βλάψεν.

Berks, &c. By the Commissioners for ejecting of Scandalous Ministers, &c. October 5, 1654, at the Bear in Spæenhamland.

"Dr. John Portage, Rector of Bradfield, in this county, hath in obedience to our warrant, dated the 18th of September last, to him directed, this day attended, and pleadeth that he hath been already discharged from the Articles that are exhibited to us against him, by the Parliament and the late Committee of this county, and therefore not again to be questioned or proceeded against for the same by these Commissioners. But the said Doctor hath produced no such Discharge.—Resolved, upon the question, That by virtue of the Ordinance of his highness the Lord Protector and his Council, for ejecting of scandalous, ignorant, and insufficient Ministers and School-Masters, the said Commissioners have power to question the said Doctor upon the said Articles; and that notwithstanding his Plea, as aforesaid, of a former Discharge.—And it is thereupon ordered, That the said Doctor do give his positive Answer to the said Articles unto us on this day fortnight, being the 19th instant, at this place: Whereof he is not to fail."

Now this was the substance of the things which were transacted the first day of my Appearance; which I have here presented in truth, and righteousness to the impartial reader.

My second Appearance before them was the 19th of October, at the same place. The Commissioners then sitting were these: Mr. Wightwick, Chairman, Mr. Dunch, Mr. Evelyn, Mr. Bell, Mr. Mills. The Ministers, Mr. Woodbridge, Mr. Fowler, Mr. Hewes, with some others. The first thing they demanded, was my Answer to the Articles exhibited against me. But I desired them to receive my Discharge, which I hoped would be instead of a full and satisfactory Answer. So I produced it; and it was received by them, and delivered unto the clerk; who, after it was read, took a copy of it, and then returned it to me again. The tenor of it was as followeth:

At the Committee for Plundered Ministers, March 27, 1651.

"Upon hearing the Cause, in presence of parties and counsel on both sides, concerning Dr. Portage, Minister of Bradfield, in the county of Berks; and upon reading the Papers and Examinations depending against him before this Committee, and full hearing what could be said by both parties; this Committee hath taken the said cause into serious consideration and debate: And do thereupon order that the said cause be dismissed. And the same is hereby dismissed. GILB. MILLINGTON."

Afterward they asked me how they should know that it was a true copy. I returned answer, I received it from their clerk there present, who knew it to be true: and besides, I had a friend by, who being with me when I received it, could attest the truth of it by oath.

Then they waved my Discharge, and called for my particular Answer to the Articles, alledging, that notwithstanding the Discharge, the Commissioners had judged the Articles under their cognizance. So that after I had pressed my Discharge with as much earnestness as in modesty I could, they still hastily calling for my further Answer, I was necessitated to give in this which followeth :

My Answer to the Articles exhibited against me, consists in these Particulars.

Partic. 1. I humbly conceive that none of the Articles exhibited against me are comprehended in the Act, entitled, 'An Act against several Atheistical, Blasphemous, and Execrable Opinions, derogatory to the honour of God, and destructive to human society;' without the sense and meaning of the words expressed in the Act be stretched and wrested beyond the literal scope and drift of the Act. And this is not my judgment only, but the judgment of some pious and judicious lawyers of this land. Which thing in all humility I leave to your serious considerations.

Partic. 2. I humbly conceive that the forementioned Act cannot take into cognizance those Articles exhibited against me; because they are acknowledged by the accusers to have been uttered a year before this Act had a birth in the world. Now can any guilt be legally imputed from any law, before the original being of it? This seemeth contrary to reason. Now those Articles were charged upon me Aug. 16, 1649, and this Act made and published Aug. 9, 1650.

Moreover, these Articles are not punishable by that Act; because, according to the conclusion of the said Act, no person is to be impeached, molested, troubled, or punished, for any offence mentioned in that Act, unless he be for the same offence accused, presented, indicted, or convicted within six months after such offence committed. Now it is six years since some, and four since any of these expressions were pretended to be uttered by me.

Partic. 3. I humbly conceive that the forementioned Act cannot take into cognizance the Articles exhibited against me; because, upon Examination of Witnesses on both sides, I was cleared by the Vote of the honourable Committee of Berks, who had full power, by an Act of Parliament, to put out and to put in Ministers in this county.

Partic. 4. I humbly conceive that the forementioned Act cannot take into cognizance the Articles exhibited against me; because, after Examination of Witnesses, and after a full hearing, I have been dismissed and acquitted from all guilt and offence charged upon me from them, by the honourable Committee of Plundered Ministers, who had full power to put out, and to keep and put in Ministers. Now the judicious lawyer saith, That these Articles having had their original dependence before two Committees of Parliament, who had an absolute power, by Act and Ordinance of Parliament, to put out and put in ministers, and they having cleared and acquitted me from the pretended guilt of such Articles, it is not according to the liberty of the subject, or tenor of the law, that it should be within the cognizance of this Act, or of this Committee; it being against that fundamental maxim of Magna Charta; 'Nemo bis punietur pro uno delicto.'

Moreover, it seemeth contrary to the sixth Article in the "Instrument of Government," published by his highness the Lord Protector's special command; in which it is expressed, 'That the laws shall not be altered, suspended, abrogated, or repealed, but by consent of parliament, save as it is expressed in the thirtieth Article.' Therefore my former legal Discharge, according to the former Acts and Ordinances of parliament, is still in force, and holds good, not being abrogated by the government, or by any thing expressed or included in the said thirtieth Article of Parliament.

I shall now proceed to answer each Article in particular.

Art. 1. "That Christ is not God: That Christ is not Jehovah."

1 Part. Answ. I do acknowledge that such expressions were uttered by me: But I hope the bare expression of such negations doth not make me come within the guilt of the act; for it must be known what words preceded such expressions, and what followed. To say in preaching, 'There is no God,' doth not make the preacher guilty of Atheism, if the words going before be but annexed, 'The fool hath said in his heart, there is no God.' So do but annex the subsequent words to the former expressions, That Christ is not God, viz. the Father; that Christ is not Jehovah; Jehovah taken strictly for the person of the Father, the first person of the glorious Trinity: I say, add but these words, and there is nothing blasphemous or culpable in such expressions.

2 Part. Answ. Though I do acknowledge that such expressions fell from me, yet I never avowedly uttered or maintained such propositions; for they were only uttered by way of dispute, and that upon this occasion: Mr. Daniel Blagrove, then being Chairman of the Committee, demanded of Mr. Tickle what blasphemy was. He answered, evil-speaking against God the Father. I replied, a lame definition of blasphemy. Had Mr. Tickle said evil-speaking against God, which is a word implying the Trinity in Unity, then there had been no occasion given of contest; for the ground of these expressions arose from the weakness of his definition of blasphemy, in that he said blasphemy was evil-speaking against God the Father. To which I replied, His definition of blasphemy doth not reach that of which he accused me; for that which he charged me with, is not blasphemy against God the Father, but against Christ, God the Son. And I have uttered no evil-speakings against God the Son, but seemingly to my accuser, in saying, That his imputative righteousness would prove a sapless righteousness to all those that had not the fiery deity of Christ in the centre of their souls, burning up their lusts and corruptions. Mr. Tickle then replied to the Committee, pray take notice that the Doctor denieth that Christ is God, which I prove out of John i. 1. To which I replied, Christ was not God the Father, but God the Son. Christ is Jehovah, and so called the Lord our Righteousness, said Mr. Tickle. To which I replied, Christ is not Jehovah, if you take Jehovah for the person of the Father. And this is the truth, as the whole Committee of Berks then present can testify; by whose Vote I was then cleared of all these unworthy aspersions, and dismissed; and since, upon proof of witnesses, acquitted and dismissed; and that after a full hearing by the Committee of Plundered Ministers.

3 Part. Ans. I do humbly conceive, that although the former act did expressly adjudge and condemn evil-speakings, or blasphemy against Christ, yet my delivering such expressions in an extemporary dispute, viz. That Christ was not God, or Jehovah, did not make me obnoxious to the guilt and penalty of that act; because p. 980 & 981, they only are condemned as guilty, who shall avowedly profess, maintain, or publish in word or writing, such or such execrable opinions: which I never did. Nay, I profess avowedly the contrary, and do declare in the sincerity of my heart, That the thought never entered into my heart, to deny the God-head or Deity of Christ; but I have avowedly in words maintained, and published by preaching, That Christ is God, out of that text, John i. 14, 'The Word was made flesh, &c.' From whence I did maintain and publish, That Christ was God, co-equal, co-eternal, and co-essential with the Father, contrary to all those blasphemous and execrable opinions, that deny Christ to be God. So that now I hope the mere uttering such expressions, by way of dispute, before a judicious and understanding Committee, doth not make me a transgressor, according to the true sense and meaning of this act.

Artic. 2. 'That the imputative righteousness of Christ is a sapless righteousness.'

Ans. I thus deliver the truth: As I was paraphrasing on that portion of Scripture mentioned in Dan. ix. 24, of everlasting righteousness, I did say words to this effect: 'That the imputative righteousness of another was a sapless righteousness to all those that had no right or interest in it.' I shall desire a little to explain myself on this proposition, that the imputative righteousness of Christ in this sense will prove a sapless righteousness: For he that hath not the Spirit of Christ dwelling in his heart by faith, notwithstanding all this application of Christ and his merits, yet to him it is but a sapless righteousness: so saith the Scripture, 'He that hath not the Spirit of Christ, is none of his,' notwithstanding his application of the imputative righteousness of Christ to himself: But here I do not deny the imputative righteousness of Christ, nor his active and passive obedience to be the material cause of his justification; yea, I own and acknowledge Christ's righteousness to be the soul's righteousness in point of justification, when it is applied upon a true ground, according to the true sense of the Spirit in the Scriptures.

Artic. 3. 'That they should look to the fiery nature of Christ's Deity in the centre of their souls, burning up the dross and chaff of their lusts and corruptions.'

Ans. For the explanation of this Article, we must consider these are scripture-metaphors, and Christ is often clothed with a garment of fire, according to that of Paul, Heb. xii. 29. 'Our God is a consuming fire;' and in another place, 'Christ shall come in flaming fire.' None, or few, understand these Scriptures, or the like, of elemental material fire; but either of the fire of his divine love to burn up our lusts and corruptions, or the fire of his divine justice or wrath in destroying sin and sinners.

Artic. 4. 'That the fiery deity of Christ mingles and mixeth itself with our flesh.'

Ans. I was then speaking of the mystical Union betwixt Christ and his Church: and in the illustration of this Union, I applied that expression out of the 5th of the Canticles, 'he mingleth his wine and his milk together.' So in this Union, Christ's divine nature minglith itself with our humanity, his spirit with our flesh. This expression Mr. Tickle was pleased to charge with blasphemy; asking me what I meant by flesh. I answered in conference, by flesh I understand not the sinful and fleshly part of the soul, that lusteth against the spirit; for with this there can be no union. 2. By flesh I mean not the outward elementary flesh of the body; but by flesh I understand our pure humanity, the pure regenerated part of the soul; the converted part of our spirit: and thus the spirit of Christ and regenerated part are really in union one with the other, according to the Apostle's phrase, 'We are made partakers of the divine nature.' And against this answer he had nothing to reply.

Artic. 5. 'That Christ was a Type, and but a Type.'

This was in conference; he asked me whether Christ was a Type or no. I answered, Christ was a Type, so expressed 1 Tim. ii. 21. How was Christ a Type, replied Mr. Pendarvis? I answered, his life and conversation was a Type, that is, a pattern and example for us Christians to square our lives and conversations by. Who denies this? said he. Why, I affirm no more, said I, than that Christ is a Type. Is he but a Type, replied Mr. Pendarvis. I answered, why he you thus upon the catch? I say Christ is a Type; but I will not affirm Christ is but a Type. And this they both confess in their answers.

Artic. 6. 'That the gifts and graces of the Spirit are but flesh.'

I confess I said the common gifts and graces of the Spirit were but flesh; but this I opened after this manner, that they were but fleshly, weak, and carnal in point of justification, in point of trust and confidence in regard of salvation and life eternal; and no otherwise, as their own witnesses on examination confessed before the honourable committee of Berks.

To conclude: as for these Articles, especially all the latter, I look not upon them as under the cognizance of the act; yet for your satisfaction I have transcribed my former Answers, and do here present them again to your consideration, by which you may clearly see my innocency in reference to the horrid opinions for which I am accused. JOHN PORDAGE.

This being read by the clerk, we were all commanded to withdraw. About an hour or two after, I was called in again; and they told me, if I would, I should have an order to fetch in my witnesses to prove what they could on my behalf in reference to that charge. I replied, that I hoped my discharge and answer were sufficient, and that they would not put me to the trouble and charge of traversing this business, viva voce, by my witnesses again; in that besides my Discharge I had brought all their Depositions delivered by oath to the Committee of Plundered Ministers; which I desired might be then read before them, because the witness could but say, viva voce, what was there wrote down.

Hereupon I delivered them to be read; and so being handed to the clerk, the commissioners asked me how they should know them to be true. I replied, the clerk delivered them as a true copy, and I would affirm on my oath, that they had not been altered since I had them. But notwithstanding this, they rejected them, alledging that they would not take notice of any written depositions taken out of another court; but that I must again bring in the former witnesses, to testify what they could by word of mouth: So that all the reasons and arguments I could use, could not prevail with them to free me from the charge and trouble of bringing in my witnesses again; for which the clerk was then commanded to draw me up an Order.

"Berks. By the Commissioners for ejecting of Scandalous Ministers, Octob. 19, 1654. At the Bear in Speenhamland.

"Dr. Pordage of Bradfield hath this day again attended; and hath exhibited an Answer in writing to the Articles exhibited against him. Ordered, that the said Doctor do attend again before us on this day fortnight at this place; at which time he is to give answer to the additional Articles now exhibited against him, and to produce his Witnesses, if he have any, for proof of his Defence; and summons are to issue out for that purpose, if he desire the same. Then they told me they had a new Charge of Articles against me; which were these that follow, then openly read by the clerk.

ARTICLES against Dr. Pordage, Parson of Bradfield, to prove his Ignorance and Insufficiency for the Ministry.

1. Imprimis, one mistress Lewyn being with child, and near the time of travail, sent for Dr.

Pordage's mother to be her midwife; but he would not suffer her to go, saying, they would not be guilty of such a beast-like life, meaning mistress Lewyn's being with child by her husband.

2. The said Dr. Pordage coming to the house of Mrs. Lewyn, in his discourse with Mrs. Lewyn, blamed her for having children by her husband, and argued with her the unlawfulness of having children by her husband.

3. In his discourses to Mrs. Lewyn concerning the same subject, endeavoured to maintain the unlawfulness of their having children, and said that Adam was made male and female in himself, and had he not fallen, he had brought forth children himself; and seemed to maintain and prove the same by Scripture and otherwise.

4. In his discourses with Mrs. Lewyn, which was about the time that one Everard was with him in his house at Bradfield, who was generally reputed to be a conjurer, he asked Mr. Lewyn whether he would not be afraid if he should see his own picture or shape; intimating that he himself had used to see his.

5. The said Dr. Pordage hath had for some weeks together in his house the said Everard, and one Tawny who stiled himself king of the Jews, who had been questioned (as it is generally reported) for holding dangerous and unsound opinions; as, That there is no hell, and the like.

A True Copy,
Mat. Langley Regist.

JOSEPH COOK.

After these were read, I desired the Court in the first place to finish the first paper of Articles: urging, that if they were sufficient, they might save both them and me much trouble. But this they denied, though I much urged it: Whereupon they commanded this subsequent Order to be drawn up, viz.

"Berks, ss. By the Committee for ejecting of Scandalous, Ignorant, and Insufficient Ministers and School Masters in this County, Oct. 19, 1654.

"Ordered, that Mr. John Tickle, Mr. John Pendarvis, Mr. Francis Pordage, John Higgs, Gifford Luinton, Richard Luinton, Mary Pocock, and Roger Stevens, do make their personal appearance before the said Commissioners on Thursday the second day of November next, by eight of the clock in the morning, at the Bear in Speenhamland by Newbury, to testify their knowledge of all such matters as should be propounded unto them concerning Dr. John Pordage of Bradfield in this county; whereof they are not to fail. Given under our hands and seals, the day and year above-mentioned. SAMUEL WIGHTWICK. SAMUEL DUNCH. AR. EVELYN. ANGELL BELL." ED. MILLS.

But this I must speak on the behalf of Mr. Wightwick and Mr. Evelyn, that by their presence things were transacted that day with much more seeming modesty and calmness than at other times; the ministers then containing themselves within the limits of due silence, which gave me some hopes that the latter part of my trial might be transacted in some moderation, equity, and civility. But these two sitting no more after that day, there broke forth much confusion, rashness, and incivility in their carriage; some ministers (who were bitter enemies against me) acting the part of Commissioners, and seeming to have great influence upon all their proceedings, being suffered to break forth into uncivil scoffs and railings against me in the open Court, as it will afterward appear. But thus much for my second day's appearance, here represented according to the line of truth and equity.

On the second of November I appeared before them again at the same place, according to their last Order, at which time major Fincher was chairman; besides whom there were present, Mr. Dunch, Mr. Stroud, Mr. Cook, Mr. Bell, with two or three more Commissioners: the ministers were Mr. Fowler, Mr. Woodbridge, Mr. Hughes, Mr. Tickle, &c.

The first thing they demanded of me, was to give in my Answer to the second Charge of Articles exhibited the last day against me. I replied that my Answer was ready; but I desired that they would keep to their own order, and first hear my witnesses, and so finish my first Charge, that we might not run into confusion. But they would not hearken to this rational request, importuning me for my Answer, resolving to hear nothing till I had given it in: So being necessitated to yield to their command, I gave in this subsequent order.

My Answer to the second Article exhibited against me, is as followeth:

In the first place, I shall take liberty to reply to the title of the Articles: which is, To prove my ignorance and insufficiency for the ministry, by the Articles produced.

1 Part. Answer. I do here humbly desire, that ignorance and insufficiency for the ministry may be preserved as distinct heads from scandal and heresy, according as it is intended by the authors of the ordinance: For certainly it is against the judgment of the Lord Protector, and the intendment of his Council, who made the ordinance, to confound that which may be called scandal or heresy, and insufficiency, together. We see it is usual this day among us, for knowing and learned ministers to differ in their judgments, both in doctrine, worship, and things indifferent; who yet thereupon are not accounted ignorant and insufficient for the ministry. So that although these Articles could be proved true, they are to be referred either to scandal or heresy, and not to ignorance and insufficiency.

2 Part. Answer. If ignorance and insufficiency for the ministry be taken for the want of an inward special gift, as it is qualified with human arts and sciences, attained by much pains and industry, in relation to academical learning: Or if ignorance and insufficiency for the ministry are taken for the want of inward abilities, qualified with spiritual gifts, as with those of prayer, utterance and preaching: Or, if ignorance and insufficiency be taken for the want of a saving principle of grace, manifesting itself in convictions of sin, legal terrors or evangelical illuminations into the free grace and love of the Father, or into the meritorious death of Christ for the redemption of lost sinners: Or, if it be taken for those effects flowing from such a saving principle of life, as that of saving faith, true repentance, pardon of sin, peace of conscience, a holy life in all universal obedience to the holy will and righteous commands of God: Then I humbly conceive, that mere ignorance and insufficiency, without the pretensions of heresy and scandal, will be found a bed too short, and a covering too narrow for my ejection out of the work of the ministry, according to the true intent of the ordinance.

3 Part. Answer. Hence my humble desire to you for time to come, is, that you would not make your Ephah of ignorance and insufficiency so small, that heresy and scandal may not stand distinct in it; and that you would not make your Shekel of ignorance and insufficiency so great, as to swallow up heresy and scandal into the boundless and endless extent of it: For what is this but to falsify the balances of justice and equity by a deceitful weight, in not preserving insufficiency as a distinct head from scandal and heresy; which in time may prove very prejudicial to that liberty of conscience, which of late years hath been, and is still preserved and asserted by the rulers of the nation:

In the Second Place, to the Articles themselves I thus reply:

Answer. 1. As to the four first, I know not how or what positively or directly to answer to them, till I see them first proved by oath, and that by such persons who are without just exceptions; and then I shall be capable of returning a more full and complete answer.

Answer. 2. Neither do I see, that seemingly to maintain and argue, by way of dispute only, the unlawfulness of Mrs. Lewyn's having children by her husband, for the sifting forth of truth from error, could it be proved that I did so, could argue or evince my ignorance and insufficiency for the ministry: For this, though it were evinced to be my crime, cannot in justice and equity be referred to that head of insufficiency, but to scandal; except ignorance and insufficiency be resolved into the boundless liberty of the wills of the judges, that what they deem ignorant and insufficient, must be ignorant and insufficient, whether ignorance and insufficiency be real in such a subject or not.

As to the Fifth Article, which concerns my giving entertainment in my house to one Everard, reputed a conjurer, and to one Tawny, reported to hold unsound opinions, I thus answer:

As to the first part of it, I confess that one Everard, about four years since, was received into my house at Bradfield, for the space of almost three weeks, and no longer; and that after this manner: He came in harvest-time with a new pair of harvest-gloves on his hands, to shew his willingness and readiness to work; and asking to speak with me, told me, that if I pleased to employ him in harvest-work, he came to offer his service. Hereupon I entertained him as a workman. And thus you see both the manner of his coming, and the cause of his entertainment.

Whereas it is said he was generally reputed a Conjuror:

Ans. 1. I answer, I never heard any the least intimation from any, that he was ever suspected to be a conjurer, till after his departure from my family: If he was a conjurer before he came, it was more than I knew, or had heard of; but after his departure, I confess there arose a general report up and down the country, that he was a conjurer. But from that time to this, I have never seen him, nor known what is become of him.

Ans. 2. After his absence, I do further affirm, that I was strongly inclined to believe, according to the general rumour, that he was a conjurer. Hereupon I was in a great strait in my own spirit, whether I should prosecute him or not; my zeal for God's glory, and my obedience to the command of God, that saith, "Suffer not a Witch to live," giving me some impulsions to do it. But after serious debate and consideration within myself, I resolved this case or scruple of conscience thus: That my own persuasions and jealousies, though they had some ground of probability, yet not being certain, afforded me not a sufficient ground of prosecuting him as a conjurer, or of swearing positively he was such. Now I leave it to your serious considerations, whether this tenderness of conscience keeping me from prosecuting of him, or swearing against him, for fear of that heinous sin of perjury, makes me either ignorant or insufficient for the ministry.

As to the second part of the Fifth Article, which concerns my entertainment of one Tawny, reputed (as it is there expressed) to be one that holds unsound opinions:

Ans. I answer, It is well known, as I invite none, so I turn away none that come to visit me, though their principles in matter of doctrine, worship, and discipline, be different from mine. I will here shew you briefly my grounds and ends: My grounds are these: I look upon it as my duty, according to the gospel of Christ, to entertain all strangers that be in want and necessity, professing the name of Christ. If enemies hunger, we are to feed them; if they are naked we must clothe them; and as for strangers, we are to lodge and entertain them, Heb. xiii. 2. And as in the practice of this I break no law of God, so no law of man. And you may remember, that in the 37th Article of Government it is expressed, That all such as profess faith in God by Jesus Christ, though differing in judgment from the doctrine, worship, or discipline publicly professed, so as they abuse not this liberty to the civil injury of others, nor to the actual disturbance of the public peace, shall be protected; and then surely their hungry bellies may be fed, their backs clothed, their wants supplied, and their persons lodged and entertained.

And further, my ends are these, which are pure and evangelical, That I may prove all things, and hold fast that which is good: that I may try the spirits, for many false spirits are gone forth into the world. Now how are they to be proved and tried? Not by carnal weapons, as by penalties, mulcts, imprisonments, and other external punishments; but by convincing of them with sound doctrine, christian discourse, spiritual arguments, and by the example of good conversation. And thus God's glory and the good of others are my only ends, in giving entertainment to all strangers that come in civility to visit me.

Now the cause of many strangers coming to me as guests from all quarters of this land, ariseth from these lying printed pamphlets, which have hardly a word of truth in them; these draw all seeking inquiring minds to visit me, for divers ends best known to themselves: Let it but be proved that ever I gave entertainment to any common swearer, or to any open drunkard, sabbath-breaker, or to any known profane person, and I shall judge myself obnoxious to your censure; but all that I give free entertainment to, appear clothed under some shew of Godliness or other: but if they have not the power, it will be their own misery.

In a word, the strength of this article doth but amount to thus much, that as Christ was supposed to be a friend of publicans and sinners, so am I supposed to be a friend to all people that profess religion, and walk orderly, be their opinion in matter of doctrine or discipline never so much differing from mine own, or from those commonly received: yet this doth not argue my ignorance or insufficiency for the ministry; but if in it any thing be culpable, it is to be referred to the head of scandal. But here being no law of prohibition, I cannot see any transgression in it, either against the law of God or man.

To conclude, I cannot give a more direct answer to these Articles, being matter of fact, till I see them proved, and each Article referred to its proper place, either of scandal or heresy, or ignorance and insufficiency.

JOHN PORDAGE.

This being read, we proceeded to the proof of the first Charge of Articulless attested by Mr. Tickle, one of the assistants whom I desired to see sworn in the open Court; alledging that I was altogether ignorant whether he had sworn or not; but the clerk affirmed that he had done it already: But after much dispute, it was granted that I should hear him sworn in the open Court. Then I craved liberty to cross-examine him openly, and began to put my interrogatories to him; but this just privilege they peremptorily denied me, though I used many reasons and arguments to shew the equity and reasonableness of it. Then they commanded me to write down my Interrogatories, which should be proposed and answered in private, without my presence, according to their fixed resolution. Then all being commanded to withdraw, I wrote down my Interrogatories; and when I gave them in, I desired they might be asked in the open Court: but it was denied. Then I requested that I myself might be present at the cross-examination, though all the rest withdrew; urging, that although I had given in my Interrogatories, yet there might be many necessary circumstances and questions emergent in the examination, which I could not then give in in writing, nor make use of without I was present, which yet might serve very much to clear the truth: but notwithstanding this, and more which was then said, I could not prevail, but was commanded to withdraw.

After this I was called in again, and as I thought, to receive Mr. Tickle's answers to my interrogatories; which, though I pressed it with much earnestness, was denied, they resolving, as it seemed to me by their answer, to keep them private till publication: which appeared to me very partial dealing, in regard I could not know how the questions were answered, against the time of making my Defence by negative witnesses.

But afterwards importuning the Court to examine my witnesses according to their own order, I was interrupted by their commanding of the clerk to read a third Charge of Articles exhibited against me by Mr. Fowler, an assistant Minister to the Commissioners; whose zeal moving swifter than the clerk's slow reading of the Articles, caused him to take them out of his hands, and to read himself, with much courage and resolution. The Articles were these that follow:

Further additional ARTICLES exhibited against Dr. Pordage, by Mr. Fowler, Minister of St. Mary's, in Reading.

1. That the righteousness of Jesus Christ was a poor, vain, sapless righteousness.

2. That Jesus Christ was not perfect, alledging that Text to confirm it, because he cried out, 'My God, my God, why, &c.'

3. That the Blood of Christ was not meritorious of any man's salvation.

4. That it was a poor thing to live upon the blood of Christ; and fetching it over again, in a contemptuous kind of speaking, 'Pish,' said he, 'thou art a babe, thou knowest nothing; to live upon the blood of Christ, is a poor thing.'

5. That one speaking to him of the glorious Persons in Trinity, he replied, 'Persons in Trinity! Pish, there is no such thing.' And again, 'There is no such thing as Persons in Trinity.'

6. That it was a weakness to be troubled for sin.

7. That he might say any thing to the men of the world.

8. That he asserted he knew nothing to the contrary, but that a man might company with more than one woman; being taxed with keeping carnal company with a woman in London.

9. That he hath very frequent and familiar converse with Angels.

10. That a great dragon came into his chamber with a tail of eight yards long, four great teeth, and did spit fire at him: and that he contended with the dragon.

11. That his own angel came and stood by him while he was expostulating with the dragon; and the angel came in his own shape and fashion, the same clothes, bands and cuffs, the same bandstrings, and that his angel stood by him and upheld him.

12. That Mrs. Pordage and Mrs. Flavel had their angels standing by them also, Mrs. Pordage singing sweetly, and keeping time upon her breast; and that his children saw the spirits coming into the house, and said, Look there father: and that the spirits did often come into the chamber, and drew the curtains when they were in bed.

13. That the said Mr. Pordage confessed, that a strong enchantment was upon him, and that the devil did appear to him in the shape of Everard, and in the shape of a fiery dragon; and the whole roof of the house was full of spirits.

14. That Mrs. Margaret Pendar acquainted with this doctrine of spirits, and pretended to be converted by visions of angels, doth think that she was bewitched by them of Bradfield.

Her Confession.

She was taken ill upon Wednesday in the afternoon, in July 1653. About 9 of the clock the same night, there appeared the vision of a man standing at her bed's-foot: on Thursday the next day he had a book in his hand, and stood by her all that day and said nothing. On Friday it spake audibly unto her, saying, Why art thou so discomforted? I answered, 'A wounded conscience who can bear?' He replied, He that hath wounded thee, will make thee whole. I spake much of my own unworthiness; he answered, There was worth in Christ, and he hath paid a ransom for me. Then he told me, that that book in his hand was the book of the Lamb, and that my name was written in it. I saw the book, a broad book with a parchment-cover: and I saw writing in it, and then was I lifted up with a great deal of joy. And about 4 of the clock the same Friday, the dark angel came and stood by the other vision, with a knife in his hand, and said, Thou hast had a great deal of joy: and offering her the knife, bid her dispatch herself, and she should enter into that eternal rest her soul so much thirsted after. Upon this she trembled, the bed shook, and my mistress held me. The same Friday I had visions presented upon the wall; I saw the world, and the resurrection of the dead, and the Son of Man appearing in the clouds of heaven.—She saw clearly the vision of a friend of her's in London, in her chamber at Southcoot; her friend was much inclined this way; she much wondered at it, and told Mrs. Pordage of it; who answered, Alas! so do we see abundance of those we never knew before, when once they come into our way.—On Saturday Dr. Pordage came to her, being sent for, and prayed in a very strange language, she did not understand well what he said: she heard him say, Lord; but nothing of Jesus Christ, but the abyss and bottomless eternity. She heard a great noise of drums and trumpets. She asked the doctor what the rattling of drums and trumpets meant? He answered, It was an alarm to the spiritual war.—One of the nights she saw the vision of young Mr. Daniel Blagrove, which came to her bed-side: She took him by the hand, and it felt cold. She asked the doctor what it meant? He answered, The coldness of the hand did signify his beginning to be cold to vanity.—She asked Dr. Pordage what the visions meant? He answered, They durst not reveal one another's visions; he did not question but God would discover himself, and reveal wonderful things to me.—She was from Wednesday noon till Monday noon, and did not eat one piece of bread, but sometimes a little water and sugar; and she saith she was not sick at all, after the first two hours: and when she was about to eat, she heard a voice come to her; 'We are not to live upon bread, but upon every word of God.' And upon that voice she did not eat.

She saith, that she hath oftentimes seen at London flasbes of light in her chamber, and at last heard a voice which put her into a very great fear and sweat, saying, Thou hast married a lump of clay; but thou must return to thy first husband, who is thy Saviour, and thou must go to Joppa. And upon this she was convinced that these visions were of the devil, because the voice was clean contrary to the scriptures. She saith, that she hath heard it reported at Southcot, That ere long Dr. Pordage should have power from him to bestow saving graces, on whom he pleased; as also, that marriage was the way of beasts.

Francis Knight of Wallingford saith, That discoursing with some of Blewberry, that use to go to Dr. Pordage's, they spake very much against the lawfulness of marriage; he wondered at it, and asked them whence they now came.; They answered, We came just now from the Doctor's from Bradfield.

16. Doctor Pordage's chamber at Bradfield hath sometimes been almost filled with spirits.

17. That Doctor Pordage preached, That water-baptism was not the ordinance of Jesus Christ.

18. That about Michaelmas 1653, he was commanded by his angel, or from heaven, to give off preaching, and take no more tithes; but since he conceives he hath had a dispensation.

19. That in July last, 1654, he was to be taken up into heaven; and it is said by some he hath been there, and dismissed again about his business.

20. That in the midst of these visions he is scandalously covetous.

21. That he cursed the people at Bradfield in his pulpit, and their posterity for ever in this world, and in the world to come.

22. That he preached at Bradfield, and afterward did labour to defend it pertinaciously; That the little Horn in Dan. vii. 8, was Christ; and being told that the little Horn made war with saints, yet he persisted to say it was Christ; and endeavoured to make his hearers believe that he was falsely charged.

23. That he saith Goodwife Pocock singeth the highest hymns very sweetly; that she knoweth not a word when she begins, but is taken with a burning about her heart; and when she hath done, she cannot repeat a word of it, if it were to gain the world.

24. That Goodwife Pocock lately came to colonel Evelyn, and told him, she had a word to him from God, viz. Have nothing to do with that just man.

25. And that on or about the tenth of this month Dr. Pordage sent to invite Mr. Snelling, and his wife and children, to come to the Doctor that day; and the same day Mr. Snelling and his wife did go to the Doctor's house; and when he came, Mr. Snelling desired to know wherefore he sent for him? Dr. Pordage told him, to go with him and meet his bridegroom. And then Mr. Snelling told the Doctor he knew not what he meant, and so departed. And the next morning Mr. Francis Pordage met with Mr. Snelling, and told him he had lost his part in heaven, being he did not wait upon the Doctor at that time.

26. That Dr. Pordage sent his man Bolt, in a very rude and uncivil manner to fetch Mrs. Forster to his house; that she being frightened at the message, and enquiring to what end she was sent for, the said Bolt answered, she should there see the heavens opened, and the colours flying in the air, and hear the drums beat, and the trumpets sound.

27. That Mr. Forster going to the Doctor's house, he told him at his first coming in, that he should see such things, as if he were emperor of a thousand worlds, he would give them all to see it. After asking him for his wife, and he answering, she was not well, and could not come, the Doctor called to them to send forth a winged messenger to fetch her, for she must come.

28. That two days after, one Goodwife Pocock coming from thence to Mr. Forster's house, and they enquiring of her, what was the cause of those behaviours in the Doctor's family? she answered, They had a foul spirit sent amongst them, and the Doctor had fought many hours with the black power, and had overcome it; for which she should ever think him a bright man: That all his family had been strangely acted, the power taking them, some in their legs, and others in their arms, and that then they spake very glorious things.

29. That Mrs. Flavel was in a trance, and when she came out of it, spake many precious things which she had seen in that trance; what was the philosopher's stone, that so many learned men had sought after, which she knew to be the Divinity in the Humanity: and many other things to the same effect.

Further ARTICLES preferred against Dr. JOHN PORDAGE, Minister of Bradfield Parish, by some of the Inhabitants of the same Parish.

1. That Dr. Pordage, about eight years past, did carry Mrs. Flavel behind him on horseback on the road to London, and about Hounslow did enquire for a private house, and was directed to one Goodman Loader's a smith, who lives in Heston parish, half a mile out of the road between Hounslow and Brentford; and when he came, asked if his friend behind, being sick, might have entertainment? 'Twas answered, Yes. Then the Doctor left her there, but never owned she was with child, till she was in travail.

2. Mrs. Flavel in a short time fell in travail, and then desired no company might be called in; yet the woman of the house, Goodman Loader's wife, called in three or four. And Mrs. Flavel was then brought to bed of a daughter, having then no husband that the world knew of, Mr. Flavel being dead.

3. That Dr. Pordage came to that house, and christened that child, and named it Hannah; and the Doctor came often to visit her there, and always alone by himself. 4. That the child being put to nurse in the same parish, the Doctor moved Mrs. Flavel to Kensington, and paid the smith for her being at his house: That a little while after the nurse went to Kensington to enquire for Mrs. Flavel to pay her some money; but she was removed: and the nurse saying, she left a child with her, the company smiled, and said, They thought she was such a woman. After this the nurse's husband wrote a letter to the Doctor to Bradfield, that he was twenty weeks pay behind, and could not forbear; whereupon he was paid: and shortly after sent for the child away from the nurse's.

5. That a little while after, this Mrs. Flavel came again to the Doctor's family, and a little child called Hannah, it was also brought thither; and Mrs. Flavel took the care of it ever since. And Mrs. Flavel, being by neighbours asked whose child it was? said, a dear friend of her's: but none could ever hear in the house whose child it was. And some telling Mrs. Flavel that the child was so like her, that they should take it to be her's, had she not said the contrary; she answered as before, 'Twas a dear friend of her's, but never named whose.

6. That this child, who was called Hannah, this last summer they changed her name, and called her Ruth: they have also changed all their names: the Doctor is called Father Abraham, his wife is also called Deborah, and old Goodwife Pocock is called Rahab, and so the rest.

7. That Goodman Loader's son being a soldier, saw Mrs. Flavel in Bradfield-street, and spake to her, but she took no notice of it. Afterward Mrs. Flavel coming to his father's house, his mother in discourse asked, Whether she lived at Bradfield? Mrs. Flavel answered, she knew no such place. I will call my son in, who saw you there. Mrs. Flavel said, People be given to lying, and would not have him called; and presently called for her horse, and went away, though before she had resolved to stay all night: and never since was there, except since the Doctor hath been questioned.

31. That Doctor Pordage is extreme covetous, and hath exacted five shillings at a time to marry one man, or else told him he would not marry him. The man told him, he could not justly demand so much: The doctor answered, without five shillings he would not marry them; and took five shillings.

32. That his preaching doth not tend to edification.

33. That he is a very ignorant and insufficient man for the work of the ministry.

September 9, 1650.

34. "I came into Bradfield parsonage in the evening, and there I heard a very mournful cry, as if it had been one in extreme pains; but what it was I know not; for it continued all the time I was at the door, which was well near a quarter of an hour; and so it continued when I went away. And then the 10th day in the morning I came unto Mr. Francis Pordage at the parsonage of Stanford Dingley; and he enquired of me what I did think of the noise that I heard? I told him I could not tell. Then he related to me, that the Lord was about a great work in this kingdom, and to this nation; and the cause of this cry was one in travail: and the pain was so extreme, that had I staid there a little longer, I might have heard it as far as the town; but now she was delivered of a man-child, and the travail was at an end, and that he and others were eye-witnesses to it."—The Testimony of Richard Seward.

35. That in Dr. Pordage's house in Bradfield, lately the New Jerusalem hath been seen to come down from heaven, all of precious stones; and in the New Jerusalem was a globe, which globe was eternity; and in that eternity were all the saints.

36. That at the Doctor's house the face of God hath been seen: not as Moses saw him, but the very face, as one man may see another's.

37. That one being in the said Doctor's house in a trance, the said Doctor's daughter being by her, said, That she saw two Angels all in white, with crowns over her head.

The Examination of Goodman Seward concerning Mr. Pordage.

This Deponent saith, That Mr. Pordage did affirm marriage to be a very wicked thing, contrary to the word of God. Goodman Seward telling the aforesaid Mr. Pordage, that a friend of his had buried his wife, and intended to marry again; Mr. Pordage replied, That it was a very wicked act, and wondered at it. The Deponent replied, That he took marriage to be an ordinance of God. Then demanding if his wife should have died, what he should have done? He replied, Would you be so wicked as to marry? This the above-mentioned Deponent will aver with his oath.

A true Copy examined by
MAT. LANGLEY, Regist.

After he had done, it seemed not enough to him to have read such a horrid, scandalous, confused Charge to the people against me; but he proceeded to speak to them, desiring them to take notice what a strange person I was, representing me to be guilty of Blasphemy, Devilism, and of looseness in my conversation; promising to prove that Charge of Articles, or to be counted a slanderer. After which prevaricating speech he suddenly departed.

After, I further urged the Commissioners to hear the testimony of my witnesses, in reference to the first Charge of Articles, that so it might be dispatched, that so I might be freed from the trouble of answering so many together, which would unavoidably bring confusion and disorder to mine and their proceedings. I further shewed, that according to their appointment, my witnesses were present and ready, desiring them to consider that I had been at trouble and charges in bringing them; and that I must unavoidably be at more, if they would not then hear them: Notwithstanding this, they denied to hear them at that time, calling for two witnesses which they had summoned to attest my second Charge of Articles. Here I desired, that as my Charges had been openly read to the people, so the examination of the witnesses might be open, that so the people might as well hear the proof as the accusation: But this could not be granted. Then I requested that I might be present; this was also denied: So two witnesses were privately examined to the second Charge, whose examination concluded that day's transactions, in reference to me; and I received an Order to appear before them again the 22d of November, at the Bear in Reading:

Berks. By the Commissioners for ejecting of Scandalous Ministers, November 2, 1654, at the Bear in Speenhamland.

"Ordered, That Dr. Pordage of Bradfield (now present) do appear again before us on Monday the 22d instant, at the Bear in Reading and that he then give in his Answer to the further additional Articles now exhibited against him. And it is further ordered, that the said Doctor do then produce his witnesses, and bring in his interrogatories in writing, upon which he will examine the witnesses in his Defence, or cross-examine them, produced for proof of the several Charges against him."

On the day prefixed I appeared at the appointed place; the Commissioners then sitting being Mr. Dunch, chairman; major Fincher, Mr. Trapham, Mr. Stroud, Mr. Cook, Mr. Nutkins. The ministers, Mr. Fowler, Mr. Lee,

VOL. V.

Mr. Woodbridge, Mr. Tickle, Mr. Hewes, with two more.

Just as they were going to dinner, I was called in, and asked for my Answer to the last Charge of Articles: I told them it was ready, but I should be very long in delivering it; but if they thought fit, I would give it in before dinner. At this, one Mr. Trapham, a Chirurgeon and Commissioner, began to be very rough, pressing me to give in my Answer, and to leave it with them. I replied, That it was in my power whether I would give it in writing only, or by word of mouth, and that I resolved of the last. So I was commanded to withdraw.

After dinner, being called in again, I read this Answer following, and then delivered it to them in writing.

My Answer to the third Charge of Articles, I present in this form following:

I shall first present something by way of general preface, and so descend to particulars.

In the first place, then, I look upon the first Articles charged upon me by young Mr. Tickle, to be as the casting of my innocent person, with Daniel, into the lion's den: But those articles, as the mouths of the lions, I conceive, were stopped, so that they could not hurt me, because the authority and just proceedings of two former Committees, authorized by acts and ordinances of parliament, with some other legal privileges, had sufficiently muzzled the mouths of those lionish Articles.

And as for the second, subscribed by an unknown name, I believe there hath not been, nor cannot be any thing proved, which may render me obnoxious to any legal guilt.

As for my third Charge brought forth by Mr. Fowler, who is both my accuser and my Judge; I look upon it as the design of the evil one, to cast me with the three children, into the hot fiery furnace of unparalleled wrath and envy: For I know it will one day appear, that these Articles were raked together from a spirit of bitterness and spleen, which seem to me as the furnace heated seven times hotter by the fire of wrath, to burn up and consume my name, liberty, estate, and posterity.

But be it known unto you, O you Judges and Commissioners! I am not solicitous what the event may be; I know the God whom I serve in the integrity of my heart, who is Jehovah, the true and only God, is able to deliver me from this hot fiery furnace, and to punish those who cast me in: But however God as yet may order and dispose of me, in reference to the execution of my enemies intents, I believe my strict and holy conversation, with my holding forth what God in the riches of his grace bestowed upon me, will clearly demonstrate that I am no such person, as the false and unworthy aspersions of these Articles represent me to be.

As to the particular Articles, which are raked together in such confusion, without reducing of them to their particular heads, of scandal or insufficiency, many of them being incapable justly to be referred to either, I thus begin my Answers.

Art. 1. 'That the righteousness of Christ was a poor, vain, sapless righteousness.'

1 Part. Answer. This Article was in my former Charge, and I was cleared of it by two committees, who had power legally to acquit me, even as they did.

2 Part. Answer. I do cordially acknowledge, That Christ's righteousness is not a poor and sapless righteousness, but very precious, being the material cause and spotless robe of a Christian's justification; and that every Saint ought to be found in this righteousness of Christ in point of justification, and not in his own self-righteousness.

3. Part. Answer. I deny that ever I spake such words, without some limitation; which limitation, if annexed, would free me from any guilt resulting from such expressions: And though any one should swear I spake these words, yet that would not render me justly guilty, it not being declared what preceded, or what followed in the series of my discourse; and I have many witnesses sufficiently known, and pious, who being constant hearers of me, have testified by oath, and will upon occasion again, that the scope of my ministry drives not against the due application of Christ's righteousness to the souls of believers, but against the misapplying it to those who have not the spirit of Christ living in their hearts, purifying their consciences, and subduing their lusts.

Art. 2. 'That Jesus Christ was not perfect; alledging that scripture to confirm it, My God, my God, why hast thou, &c.'

1 Part. Answer. I do nakedly, without any veils, profess that I ever did, and still do look upon Christ as a most perfect copy and pattern to square our lives and conversations by; yea, to be a perfect mediator, in reference to that work he undertook for the redemption of the world, being free from the least tincture either of original or actual sin: And truly the thought of any such thing never lodged in my heart.

2 Part. Answer. But suppose I uttered such expressions as these, yet the manner of it will sufficiently free me from that guilt my accuser may hope, and believe I am obnoxious to by it: I confess I uttered these or the like words, yet it was only by way of relating what I heard in a sermon of Mr. Erbery's in Somerset-house, who at that time endeavoured to enumerate Christ's (supposed) imperfections, whereof he made his crying out upon the Cross, in those expressions, one. Now I leave it to your considerations, whether my relating to some that are wise and knowing, what I heard from another, with much grief to my soul, makes me any way culpable or guilty.

Art. 3. 'That the blood of Christ was not meritorious of any man's salvation.'

Answer. I call heaven and earth to witness, that such thoughts never entered into my soul; nor did such words ever come out of my mouth: For my judgment ever hath been, and still is, that the blood of Christ is satisfying, reconciling, cleansing blood; that it is interceding, redeeming, meriting blood, in relation to all those who through faith and patience come to inherit eternal life.

Art. 4. 'That it was a poor thing to live upon the blood of Christ; and fetching it over again in a contemptuous kind of speaking, Pish, said he, thou art a babe, thou knowest nothing; to live upon the blood of Christ, is a poor thing.'

1 Part. Answer. I acknowledge that about four years since such expressions were uttered by me to one Mrs. Grip; but without any such intent as may be supposed by my accusers, and not with that circumstantial aggravation of repeating it in a contemptuous manner; which is but a supposition of my adversary, and cannot be attested by an oath, without this witness pretends infallibly to know my thoughts and purposes.

2 Part. Answer. Again, this being spoken to a particular person, on a particular occasion, might be true, if the circumstances of the discourse were accordingly added; though as here presented it seems very monstrous.

3 Part. Answer. Therefore to make things clear, I shall here insert some particular circumstances, which may present this Article, though in a new yet true face. I coming to to Mrs. Grip's house, she took me into a private room to have some conference with me alone; where she brake forth into a violent passion of tears, weeping, and wringing her hands, and pouring forth bitter complaints and invectives against Mr. Fowler, as that he was a graceless man, a liar, a slanderer, not worthy to come up into a pulpit, or to have the name of a minister of Christ, with other such bitter expressions. The cause of which was, as she then told me, Mr. Fowler's reporting about, that she then lived in adultery. And after her passion was somewhat allayed, she brake forth into these or such-like expressions of high assurance; Christ hath loved me, and died for me, and justified me by his blood, from all guilt of sin; I am an elect person, a justified person; and what is this Fowler to charge sin upon me? These and other expressions fell from her to this purpose: from some of which I feared she was drenched with Antinomianism, and told her more than once, it was a poor thing to live upon the blood of Christ, and to look so much upon that, except she had the nature of Christ, and the spirit of Christ; asking her, where was the meekness of Christ, and the patience of Christ, to suffer as an innocent lamb quietly? but still she crying out, she lived on the blood of Christ; I told her, it was a poor thing to be thus exalted with notions of the blood of Christ, without mentioning sanctification, and those holy graces which flow from Christ's nature dwelling in the soul. Now by these expressions of mine, my scope was to make Mrs. Grip see the necessity of Sanctification, and of a pure and holy life, and not to make void the blessed effect of the blood of Christ, applied according to the mind of God, and the true meaning of the Scripture. And now having related the circumstances as near as I can remember, I believe a sober and knowing Christian will not judge me either scandalous or ignorant for these expressions.

Art. 5. 'That one speaking to me of the glorious persons of the Trinity, I replied, Pish, there is no such thing as persons in the Trinity.'

1 Part. Answer. I do here profess and avow from the sincerity of my heart, that I believe the Trinity of persons as an article of my faith, viz. that there are three persons distinct from each other; the person of the Father, the person of the Son, the person of the Holy Ghost, yet not so as to prejudice the Unity in essence; and I so believe the Unity, as not to confound the Trinity of persons.

1 Part. Answer. I never uttered such expressions in that way, as to give any just ground of suspicion of my denying the Trinity. But I remember, about four years since, being before the committee of Berks, Mr. Fowler, or Mr. Gilbert, I remember not which, desired the committee to give them liberty to ask me two or three questions: amongst the rest, they asked whether there were three persons in the Deity. I answered them, I believed the Trinity as it is recorded in 1 John v. 7. There are three that bear record in heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Ghost. Thus you see I believe the Trinity. But do you believe the Trinity of persons? said they. I replied, I find not the term Persons in the text; but to put you out of doubt, I do not stumble at the word Person. And this afterward I told to the above-mentioned Mrs. Grip in a private conference some years since; to whom I affirmed, that I found no such expressions as persons in Trinity in the Scripture; and that the word Trinity being a school-term, was very difficult to be apprehended by common capacities. But I never spake thus to prejudice the true notion of the persons in the sacred Trinity, which I do cordially believe; but only to shew that ordinary Christians should not be too curious in prying into that deep mystery of the three persons in the Trinity, but rather content themselves with what the scripture plainly affirms of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, as distinct, yet one. But to conclude this answer, pray consider what hard measure it is, thus to pick a broken sentence out of a long discourse, and so to accuse one without relating the circumstances which might serve to clear what otherwise may seem very strange to prejudiced persons.

Art. 6. 'That it is a weakness to be troubled for sin.'

Answer. I do not remember that any such expression as this ever dropped from my mouth, either publicly or privately; and I am persuaded that no one dare assert it with an oath: which if they did, would not make much to the purpose: for with a charitable qualification it may be thus made forth, that it is a weakness for one to be troubled for sin, who hath the assurance of God's love, his sin pardoned, his person justified, sanctified, and his will converted from, and crucified to Sin: for such a one should be triumphing in the power of faith and love, enjoying sweet heavenly communion with God, and saying, O Death, where is thy sting? And there is no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus, who walk not after the flesh, but after the spirit. Whereas trouble for sin thus pardoned and mortified, may be an engine of Satan to make a soul question God's love, and to bring it out of a blessed spiritual enjoyment of God, into a slavish fear and disturbance.

Art. 7. 'That he might say any thing to the men of the world.'

1 Part. Answer. I answer, to the best of my remembrance, I never uttered any such unchristian maxim, much less ever held it as my judgment; and I confidently believe there is no one on the earth that dare witness it with an oath.

2 Part. Answer. I know very well that Mr. Fowler hath been, if not the author, yet the reporter of my holding this monstrous tenet; for he hath confidently averred, and often insinuated into some of the gentry of this county, and into his own proselytes, that I am a familist; and that it is my principle to say or unsay any thing that may make to my own advantage. Which God knows is a sad scandal and a monstrous untruth; and clearly appears, to those who know the integrity of my principles and conversation, to be a blur cast upon me from the contrivance of subtle Machiavellian policy, to prejudice all I say or answer to those horrid things objected against me; for if this be once settled in those who are to be my judges, it is vain for me to answer, deny, or avow any thing. But the Lord forgive my adversary for this his unchristian dealing, and grant he may repent of it before he comes to give up his last account before the great tribunal of Christ!

Art. 8. 'That I asserted I knew nothing to the contrary, but that a man might company with more than one woman; being taxed for keeping carnal company with a woman in London.'

Answer. I never kept scandalous company with any woman in London; neither was I ever taxed for any such things except once by Mrs. Grip, who I believe is the witness against me; and that upon this occasion.

At the time I had my former conference with her, the heat of her passion being over, she told me that I was also taxed for keeping of carnal company with a woman in London. I replied, I am a man born to all kind of sufferings; and told her, that she saw and knew the manner of my conversation; asking her whether she believed it. And she answered, No, truly. And then I solemnly protested the contrary. And this is all the taxing I ever had from any one. At which time I was earnest with Mrs. Grip to discover to me from whom she heard it: but she put me off, telling me she did not believe it, and that she would tell me some other time. But from that long discourse I had with her, fearing, as I said before, she was deeply tainted with the principles of Antinomianism, and not knowing whether she might not be tainted with some notions of Rantism, which at that time was every where frequently discoursed of, I took this occasion to try her; telling her (as near as I remember) that there were some that affirmed they knew nothing to the contrary, but that a man might company with more than one woman. But to speak the truth, she let it fall, without seeming to approve of any such thing. And this I solemnly avow to be the truth, as near as I can remember. And I believe Mrs. Grip dare not swear that I maintained any such thing as my judgment, or produced one Scripture or argument to defend it.

I profess to the whole world, in the presence of that eye that seeth through all hearts, that all such loose principles, which turn the grace of God into wantonness, and that run opposite to the laws of morality, civility, modesty, and sobriety, or that any ways indulge wantonness and lasciviousness, are as inconsistent with my principles as heaven and hell, light and darkness, are opposite one to another; which will one day clearly appear to the world, whatever I am now thought of.

Art. 9. 'That he hath frequent familiar converse with angels.'

Ans. As this Article is presented in general terms, without expressing whether the communion be visible or invisible, I do not see how it can touch me, though my enemies were my judges; because every true Christian hath frequent communion or converse with angels, as you may see solidly and clearly proved from Scripture by the lord Lawrence, one very learned and pious, now president of the Lord Protector's Council, in his book, entitled, Our Communion and War with Angels.

Art. 10, 11, 12, 13. 'Concerning the vision of a dragon, and the apparition of spirits.'

Ans. 1. I may deny these four articles as they are taken together, and expressed in those terms, and in that manner in which they are set down in my accusation; for I believe none dare swear the measures and teeth of the dragon, with the appearance of my own angel, &c. without the crime of perjury.

Ans. 2. I will not confess any apparitions in particular till they be proved, lest I should seem to accuse myself; they being brought in as a crime against me, and as instruments to condemn me.

Yet in general I acknowledge, that some 4 years since there were many strange and wonderful apparitions seen in my house. But what can these in justice amount to, though attested by oath, and confessed particularly by myself, when brought before those who profess themselves Christians, and acquainted with the history of the holy Scriptures? Pray was not Job a pious, sincere, and eminent righteous man? Yet how was he scared with dreams, and terrified through visions! Chap. vii. ver. 14. Did not Zechariah the prophet (Zech. iii.) see Satan standing at the right-hand of Joshua to resist him? Did not John (Rev. xii.) in a vision behold a great red dragon, that made war against Michael and the holy angels? And was not Christ himself tempted of the devil by voice and visions? Matth. iv. 6, 8. Now the servant is not greater than the Lord, John xv. 20, and therefore not exempted from the like attempts of the devil. I beseech you consider, whether this earth be not the place where the devil walks up and down, seeking whom he may devour? How then can Bradfield, or any other place, be exempted from his appearing, when God permits? And may not all this be for the manifesting of his glory, goodness, and power? And who can tell whose family may be next exposed, by God's permission, to be tried and proved by the representations of Satan? And I desire you seriously to consider how any such apparitions, raised by the devil, and permitted by God for his own glory, argue me either scandalous, ignorant, or insufficient? Surely it rather argues that he hath blest me with a strong faith, in that he permitted such great trials, and made me instrumental to overcome them by prayer and fasting. If it can be proved that I ever so much as looked toward the unlawful art of black magic, or that any evil spirits were raised up by any compact of mine, explicate or implicate, or that those of evil apparitions were subdued and overcome by any other means than by God's blessing upon our fasting and prayers; I shall judge myself worthy of punishment. But otherwise it is hard measure to be prosecuted and prejudiced for the malice of the devil towards me, inflicting what I was passive in, and could not help; especially by those who profess the Christian Religion, and know that the God of heaven rules over all, permitting and disposing of whatever comes to pass.

Art. 14. That Mrs. Margaret Pendar doth think she was bewitched by them of Bradfield.

1 Part. Ans. Here is a long and tedious relation, in which truth and untruths are mixed together: the whole structure of which relation, so far as it concerns me, depends upon this weak basis and foundation, that she thinks she was bewitched by them of Bradfield. But what a sad thing is this, for my accuser to impeach me for that which might endanger, if true, my estate and life, upon the thoughts of a discomposed maid! Because she thinks I sent those visions, therefore I must be thus arraigned. But, for my part, I do not believe she dare say so, much less swear it, having no ground at all for it.

2 Part. Ans. I shall briefly relate some circumstances which concern this business, and may serve something to clear it up. Before these visions of hers, I had never seen her, as I know of, nor exchanged so much as a word with her. In the time of her visions, Mr. Daniel Blagrove, whose servant then she was, came for me himself, to fetch me to his house to visit her.

To which motion I yielded, being suitable to the Law of Christian Charity. And when I came, I had no conference with her but in the presence of Master and Mistress Blagrove, with others that were then present. And from this visit there arose a rumour that I was a Conjuror and a Sorcerer: Which report was spread abroad by two that carry the name of ministers of Christ, Mr. Fowler and Mr. Ford. The last of which so exceeded the bounds of charity and Christian moderation, as in his sermon, at the assizes, to call me a horrid blasphemous, asserting that the devil was as visibly familiar in my family as my own servants; and so excited the magistrates to persecute me.

3 Part. Ans. As for those untruths which are mixed in the relation, I shall not trouble myself to answer them; for I know when they come to be sworn to, and to be cross-examined, they will appear to be the fulfilling of that wicked maxim 'Calumniare audacter, aliquid hærebit;' calumniate and asperse boldly, something will stick. Which being a piece of jesuitical policy, hath been practised by my accuser in this confused rhapsody of Articles.

ARTICLES of one Francis Knight of Wallingford.

Art. 1. 'That some of Blewberry, who spake against marriage, said they came then from my house.'

Ans. I hope I have enough to do to answer for myself; what need the assertions of others be alleged as Articles against me? They speak against marriage, having lately been at my house, therefore I must be guilty of it: Surely this consequence is neither according to natural, artificial, nor divine reason.

Art. 2. 'That my Chamber hath been filled with Spirits.'

Ans. I hope none will be so unadvised as as to swear to this Article, being spirits are immaterial, and cannot take up place, or fill a room.

Art. 3. 'That I preached that Water-Baptism was not an ordinance of Jesus Christ.'

Ans. It was never so preached by me. All that I then affirmed was this: That Water-Baptism could not be proved to be the Ordinance of Christ, by way of eminency so called, from that Text of Scripture, Matth. xxviii. 19. 'Go teach all Nations, baptizing them in the Name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost:' For that baptism may very well be understood of the Baptism of the Spirit; which by the Disciples was instrumentally administered to all converts. Yet I denied not Water-Baptism to be a Gospel Ordinance, instituted by John; as the chief instrument under God, from whom he received his Commission. And that this was the sum of what I then preached, I can prove by oath.

Art. 4. 'That about 1653, I was commanded by my Angel, or from heaven, to give off preaching, and to take no more tithes; but that since I have had a dispensation.'

Ans. I believe no one, that hath the fear of God before his eyes, dare attest this Article by oath, which is here stated. This is answer enough to such a thing, which is merely brought in as an odium by my accuser the more to prejudice me.

Art. 5. 'That in July 1654, I was taken up into heaven, &c.'

Ans. If Paul were now upon the earth, he were in danger to be accused by my accuser; for his rapture into heaven or paradise. But this concerning me will prove but some idle dream, created by somebody's fancy to make people wonder at me.

Art. 6. 'That I cursed the people of Bradfield in my pulpit, and their posterity for ever, &c.'

Ans. This Article was one of those heard and examined four years since by the committee of Plundered Ministers, from which I was acquitted by them; these witnesses, viz. Richard Linton, John Hambleton, Mary Pocock, Richard Holmes, with four more, attesting by oath that I did not curse the people of Bradfield, so as is expressed in the Article. The testimony of these witnesses was this: That they being present Sept. 29, the Doctor expressed himself thus: 'Bradfield is a place partly made famous, partly infamous, by reason of the false and lying reports that are abroad: But I say, Cursed be the tongue and mouth that shall say, That what is done by the power of God, is done by the power of the devil.' What one parishioner is here cursed by me, except any one's conscience accuseth him of the guilt of that forementioned blasphemy?

Art. 7. 'Concerning the little horn mentioned Dan. vii. to be Christ.'

This Article was four years since exhibited against me, from which I was discharged by the committee; Richard Higs, John Higs, and Richard Linton, attesting on oath that I paraphrasing on the seventh of Daniel, and speaking on the little horn, said, That some interpreters would have the little horn in the letter to be meant of Antiochus Epiphanes, a bloody and persecuting tyrant; others think the little horn to be the Turk, who is a great persecuter of Christians: But in the mystery, in regard of its power, he will apply it to the power of Christ in a Christian, who is often in scripture resembled to the horn of David, and to the horn of salvation; and that upon three Considerations:

Consid. 1. In regard that Christ's power in the soul doth appear to be a little horn, a small despised instrument to sense and reason; for flesh and blood look on it as a poor instrument, in regard of bringing down the strength of sin in us.

Consid. 2. In regard of sin and Satan, who laughs the power of Christ in the soul to scorn, yet before him his accursed kingdom must fall.

Consid. 3. In regard its birth and beginning in the soul is at the first a very little grain of mustard-seed, yet in due time it will destroy the kingdom of sin, and set up the kingdom of holiness in us.

Having thus drawn away the veil from this Article, I hope it appears with a more tolerable and innocent face.

Art. 8. 'Concerning Goodwife Pocock's 'singing hymns and spiritual songs.'

Ans. She acknowledgeth it as her gift bestowed by God, being according to the gifts of christians in the primitive time. But this doth not directly concern me.

Art. 9. 'Concerning the same person's coming to colonel Evelyn's, and saying she had a 'word from God, viz. Have nothing to do 'with that just man.'

Ans. She owneth these words, and looks upon me as a just man, and a true christian; and believeth that colonel Evelyn will one day know she gave good counsel upon good grounds.

Art. 10. 'Concerning Mr. Snelling and his 'wife coming to my house, &c.'

Ans. This Article hath as little of truth as sense or force to prejudice me; and I believe none will be found to swear it: However, I think it not worthy of a larger answer.

Art. 11, 12. 'Concerning the sending of my 'man Bolt in an uncivil manner for Mr. 'Forster, with his speaking of strange things 'there to be seen, and of my telling Mr. Forster he should see very wonderful things, &c.'

1 Part. Ans. These Articles were heard, and I acquitted four years since by the Committee of Plundered Ministers, and are of so little consequence, that they might well have been omitted, but that my accuser thinks he hath never enough against me.

2 Part. Ans. I believe Mr. Forster dares not swear to these particulars, some of which are very untrue.

3 Part. Ans. The forementioned Robert Bolt asserted on oath that I sent him not with any message, but that it was his mistress that sent him to desire Mr. Forster and his wife to come to my house.

Art. 13. 'Concerning Goodwife Pocock's 'coming to Mr. Forster's, and saying, the 'Doctor had fought with and overcome an evil 'spirit; and that the family had been strangely 'acted, the power taking some of them in one 'part some in another; and that they spake 'glorious things.'

1 Part. Ans. This was another of the Articles heard, discussed, and I acquitted by the forementioned Committee, because nothing material could be made of it.

2 Part. Ans. The said Mary Pocock attested on oath she saw no apparitions in my house, being cross examined concerning that particular. And though she did say, God gave extraordinary power to sustain both our spirits and bodies in an extraordinary trial, what hurt was there in that? Why should it be brought as an Article against me?

Art. 14. 'That Mrs. Flavel was in a trance, 'and in it saw the philosopher's stone, which 'she knew to be the Divinity in the Humanity.'

Ans. Not to speak any thing concerning the mystical writings of the deep hermetic philosophers, or what the judgment of some of them is, concerning this secret, I myself being not here accused to have seen it, or to have affirmed it was the Divinity in the Humanity; all that I shall answer is this, I wonder that this is brought in as an Article against me, to prove me scandalous, ignorant, or insufficient; it not directly proving any thing against me, being affirmed of another, and being one of those Articles I was discharged of by the Committee for Plundered Ministers.

Art. 15. 'Touching Seward's depositions 'of the birth of a child, and one being in 'travail.'

Ans. 1. This was one of the Articles of which I was acquitted by the forementioned Committee.

Ans. 2. Mrs. Elizabeth Pordage and Mary Pocock asserted on oath, that there was no woman in travail, nor any child born, nor any other cry heard, but of those at prayer; which was also witnessed on oath by Mr. Francis Pordage.

Art. 16. 'That in my house the New Jerusalem hath been seen to come down from 'Heaven, and that in it was a globe, in which 'globe was eternity, and in that eternity all the 'saints.'

Ans. As to the substance of this Article; if God hath favoured any with such a vision, surely they would be no more ashamed to own it, when called to it, than John was, when he wrote, Rev. xxi. 1. That he saw the holy city, New Jerusalem, come down from God out of heaven; where he also describes it by all the most precious stones in the creation. But in reference to my family, I believe none dare attest they heard this spoken by any of them, which I believe will prove but some groundless imagination.

Art. 17. 'That in my house God hath been 'seen face to face, &c.'

Ans. As this Article is stated, I shall give no other answer but this, that I shall wait to see who dare swear to it, or what proof can be brought of it.

Now I am come to the Articles exhibited against me by some of Bradfield parish.

And as to those which concern Mrs. Flavel, I shall answer, 1. Somewhat in general touching their import and nature. 2. By way of negation. 3. By way of acknowledgment or affirmation.

Ans. Gen. This charge of Articles hath no legal reference of charge at all to me, but is merely scandalous, importing but a libel, nothing of fact really criminous being laid to my charge; which will more clearly appear, when the erroneous circumstances of it are detected: by which also the subtilty and envy of my adversaries will be discovered, who positively alledge nothing against me that may bear any action of damage at the common law, by which they might suffer for their injurious dealing; yet by plausible prevaricating circumstances would seem to make me highly criminous and guilty.

Now I shall answer negatively to many erroneous prejudicing circumstances, which are by design heaped together, to put a plausible face upon an envious libel or illegal charge.

1 Circ. It is said, it was some eight years since I brought one Mrs. Flavel to goodman Loader's, &c.

Ans. neg. Which is an error, though one of the smallest, brought in to prejudice the more, for it was some nine years since.

2 Circ. It is further said, this was carrying her to London.

Ans. neg. Which I deny; for it was coming from London, where she had for some time been.

3 Circ. That I asked whether my friend behind me, being sick, might have entertainment, &c.

Ans. neg. This I also deny; she was not then sick, neither did I use any such expressions.

4 Circ. That I never mentioned she was with child.

Ans. neg. Though I did not, it not concerning me to do it, yet she herself did not deny it.

5 Circ. That in a short time she fell in travail.

Ans. neg. A short time may seem to imply some few days, or weeks, being brought in as an aggravating circumstance; whereas it was some four or five months after.

6 Circ. That she had no husband then, as the world knew of.

Ans. neg. She owned then to the people where she was, and doth still, that she had had a second husband, which some in the world knew of very well, whose testimonies she can and will produce when she hath sufficient occasion offered by a legal call thereto: who is also able and ready to give a sufficient account, when occasion serves, of her not openly assuming her second husband's name, her estate then standing as it did; which having concealed for that time she was in law, she thought good ever since to be called by her first husband's name. But this subtil dealing of her adversaries by libelling scandals, without positively asserting she was not married, makes her incapable of recovering any damage of those who now enviously, yet indirectly, asperse her: which the commissioners ought to take notice of, who should not receive such libels, which tend to the blasting of one's credit and good name, which all sober Christians ought (for the gospel sake) to value; and yet absolutely prove nothing of such criminous fact, which they design seemingly to prove, nor yet give sufficient ground of calling them to an account for such evil malicious scandals. But this not directly concerning me, I shall omit much which might be spoken of it.

7 Circ. That I came often to visit her.

Ans. neg. This is not true: it was rather seldom, being but three times in three quarters of a year, and that in term-time, upon urgent occasions at law.

8 Circ. That I removed her to Kensington.

Ans. neg. This is false, for I knew not when she removed thither.

9 Circ. That I paid the smith for her being at his house.

Ans. neg. This is another untruth; I never paid him a penny, neither did I ever agree with him for her being there.

10 Circ. That the nurse's husband wrote a letter to me at Bradfield, for money for the child's nursing.

Ans. neg. This is a mere lye; for no such letter was wrote, neither did I ever agree to pay for the nursing of it, as the nurse and her husband can witness.

11 Circ. That shortly after he sent for the child away.

Ans. neg. This I also deny, it containing two untruths in it: for first, the child was not shortly after sent for away, neither did I send for it at all, for it was fetched away by the mother herself.

12 Circ. That a little while after the said little-one was brought into my family.

Ans. neg. This is also false.

13 Circ. As to the seventh Article of this libelling charge, in which many circumstances are produced to scandal the gentlewoman, as though she had told a great untruth; it deserves no other answer but this, that it is compacted of many lies, nothing being there true that really tends to prejudice her, as I believe will appear by the event.

Thus in this short relation, wherein there is some truth, pray take notice how many untruths and mere lies are mixed with it, to put a beautiful face upon an envious and unchristian design: And is not this to bear false witness against one's neighbour? May not any one's innocency and integrity be in this manner undeservedly clouded, aspersed, and wounded? Which I leave to the serious consideration of the judges.

As to my affirmative answer, what I acknowledge is this:

Ans. Affirm. About nine years since I brought behind me from London the fore-mentioned Mrs. Flavel, who had been of ancient and near acquaintance with me and my family, to one goodman Loader's, a smith in Hessen, wheresome four or five months she was brought to bed of a daughter, which she owned to the people where she then was, to be by a second husband, even as she still acknowledgeth. And further, that I visited her three times in the space of three quarters of a year, at term-time, being then engaged in a law suit that concerned her; that one of those times I christened her child, and called it Hannah: that afterward her occasions not requiring so much privacy, she came to live with her ancient acquaintance at my house, where also for some years her daughter hath been with her.

Now to take away any thing that may seem to reflect upon me in this my acknowledgement, pray consider these subsequent particulars.

1. That I and Mrs. Pordage being of a very near and long acquaintance with her, it was but a friend's courtesy, for me upon her desire to carry her to this house behind me.

2. That she had sufficient ground to retire into some such place in the country: first, in that the city-air was offensive to her health: secondly, in that by the counsel of able lawyers she was advised to retire into some private place, she being then in law-engagements, and continually subject to arrests, by the entanglement of her first husband's estate; her brother-in-law, who was her adversary, then threatening to seize on her if she were above ground.

3. In referente to my engagement in her law business, I think it material briefly to relate the ground and occasion of it. In the time of her widowhood, her brother-in-law began a suit with her in the common law, which fearing he should there be overthrown, he removed to the chancery: now she being very unfit and incapable to manage this herself, she earnestly desired me, as an ancient and trusty friend, to undertake it. Upon this I went to judge Rolle and Mr. Chute with her, who looking into her evidences, and into the will of her late deceased husband, found that for want of one clause in it she was liable to many suits, and arrests, and to great entanglements, and that her interest could not be established, but by much difficulty; and at length this was the result of the counsel, that she must let all her estate, which was under mortgage, be forfeited into the hand of some faithful friend, and so sell it away. Hence I through much importunity laid down some hundred pounds, rescued the mortgage, and so became interested in a suit at chancery, which lasted three years.

Now from this may further appear sufficient ground why I brought her to that private house: secondly, why I came to her in the time of her retirement, I then receiving money from her to follow her suit: thirdly, why I came alone, it being then her interest to be concealed, being subject to arrests.

I shall now proceed to add some few circumstances more, which may serve to clear me before all sober persons.

1. At my coming, I told the people my name, and that I dwelt at Reading, and that I was minister of St. Lawrence church, knowing the gentlewoman to be sober and pious. Now had I been as my enemies enviously pretend, I might have concealed my name, quality, and place of residence.

2. We discovered to them that the gentlewoman had an estate in the Bulwark at London, and rents there to receive, which they might enquire after, as they did, for their security: Now this was not the way to cover a work of darkness.

3. She sometimes went to London to the lawyers, whilst she was there, some belonging to that family accompanying her; who found, that as she had related, she was in great troubles at law, and were convinced that she returned on that account.

Now in reference to most of those particulars, in which I have contradicted, and denied the alledged circumstances, and further vindicated myself, they are exactly agreeing with what I have in writing confessed and acknowledged by Louder himself, from whom this Charge is pretended to be received, and by the nurse of the child, subscribed by them both before witnesses; which Acknowledgment I shall produce when I see occasion.

And by this I hope it may appear to moderate, sober, and judicious men, that this libelling Charge, drawn up so falsely, enviously, and yet so subtilly, calling from the dead a business past some nine or ten years since; (which though it were criminous, as it is not, were invalid legally to prejudice, by the Act of Oblivion, or General Pardon, as all other things pretended to be spoken or acted by me before 1651, according to the judgment of judicious men, which I leave to the Commissioners to consider of) I say, that this is but the effect of the evil and wicked policy of my accuser, brought forth to prejudice and overcloud that pure and innocent principle, which I profess and faithfully live to; and the better to cover that evil design they have against my person and livelihood.

And now I appeal unto you the Commissioners, and to all that are pious and sober-minded, whether my enemies do not deal very unreasonably, enviously, and unbeseeming Christians, from this business, so long since past, in which nothing criminous is positively objected against me, to draw such horrid conclusions, as commonly to report that I now live in base lust and wantonness, notwithstanding my commending of and owning the virgin-life; I say, whether this be not exceeding hard measure, and ungodly dealing, let all judge. But I see the design of the Devil in it, which my enemies may be ignorant of, which is to overcloud and darken by monstrous lies and scandals, which are the smoke of the bottomless pit, that life of purity, chastity, mortification, self-denial, and heavenly enjoyment, which God hath favoured me to live in, and so to affright all from my acquaintance, which otherwise might very much prejudice and overthrow his kingdom. For the old serpent knows very well, as also my near friends and acquaintance, that for these four years, even since the time of my great trials, by the extraordinary temptations and representations of the Devil, that I have been abstracted more than ordinary from all outward things, giving myself up wholly to prayer, watchfulness, mortification, and constant self-denial, in dying to all earthly pleasures, even to things permitted and accounted lawful; as finding many things which ordinarily are embraced, to be great hindrances of the soul's progress to God, and great burthens to a spirit which hath tasted much of that tree of life which groweth in the midst of the paradise of God, and great clogs to a soul that sees through the veil of the sensitive nature into the spiritual glory of eternity. But what I have enjoyed and experimented, in this time of my extraordinary mortification and self-denial, in the death of the animal man, and rising of Christ's image in me, is not seasonable now to declare; yet for the glory of my God and the undeceiving of those who strangely mistake me, this much in all humility I must say, that did my accuser, and my enemies, know what I have enjoyed in this way of the cross, of the secret hidden treasures of eternity, and of the out-goings of divine goodness; were they but acquainted with these discoveries of celestial glory, instillations of the heavenly dew, and secret touches of the Holy Ghost; did they but know those bright irradiations of eternal light, those strong motions of divine life, and pleasant streams of eternal love, together with those deep sufferings in bearing Christ's cross, which I and many in my family have in this time experienced; they durst not thus condemn me, and judge me as an evil-doer, and one that lives in the lusts of the flesh. But my God hath taught me to bless whilst they curse, to pray for them whilst they design to ruin me, and to love them whilst they hate me; and to say with Christ, 'Father forgive them, for they know not what they do.'

This I thought fit in all humility to annex to that libelling charge concerning Mrs. Flavel, from which I have undeservedly suffered so much, by the malice of the devil. And now I shall proceed to answer the remaining Articles, one of which is intermixed with the former seven that concern Mrs. Flavel, which is this:

Artic. 'That we have changed our names.'

Ans. It is well known that we own and subscribe our names in our civil converse with the world, as this and my former Answers testify; I shall therefore wait to see, whether any one dare swear to this Article: and though we did in our own private family call one another by scripture-names, yet I conceive it did not concern the civil magistrate to take cognizance of such a thing, it being not practised to make any disturbance or confusion in the state.

Artic. 8. 'That I am extremely covetous, taking five shillings at a time to marry one.'

Ans. I wonder my accuser should let this Article pass, whose consequence is so much against reason, as to argue me extremely covetous for one such poor inconsiderable act done six or seven years since: and I appeal to the inhabitants of Reading, and Mr. Fowler's own conscience, whether he hath not taken ten shillings oftener than five for marrying.

Artic. 9. 'That my preaching doth not tend to edification.'

Ans. I can bring those that are knowing and spiritual, and sober Christians, who will assert that my preaching doth tend to edification, and to the building up of souls in the true knowledge and love of Christ; and I believe these my accusers will be found to be like those of Chorazin and Bethsaida, of whom Christ said that "if the mighty works which were done amongst them had been done in Sodom and Gomorrah, they had repented long since in dust and ashes." And was Christ's ministry ineffectual, because they did not believe, but remained in the hardness and impenitency of their hearts? Neither doth it follow that my preaching doth not tend to edification, because those that bring this Article, through their unbelief, are not edified by it: for there are many, that come from places round about, that are edified, strengthened, and refreshed, by it; and that there are many that have been enlightened, convicted, and converted by it, who still receive quickening growth and comfort under it, confessing that God is in it of a truth, as finding it instrumentally effectual to the pulling down of the kingdom of sin and Satan, and to the erecting the kingdom of Christ in their hearts; for which I bless God, and praise his grace, by which it is what it is.

Art. 10. 'That I am very ignorant and insufficient for the work of the ministry.'

Ans. I believe those that exhibit this Article against me, upon trial will be found very ignorant and insufficient to judge of it; and as to those that are to be my judges, I hope they will not make their own wills the rule of ignorance and insufficiency, but proceed according to the canons of pure reason, or supernatural revelation, in giving judgment concerning this particular: the event of which I leave to God.

Now to conclude: Though in reference to this, and the two last Charges of Articles, I stand free from any guilt in the sight of God, and I hope, by my Answers to them, in the sight of all judicious and sober men: yet to leave any inexcusable that my design, whether by law, or without law, absolutely to condemn me; I crave the benefit and privilege of the Act of General Pardon in reference to all those things that are pretended to be spoken or acted by me before the year 1651, as most of these are, that seem to be of any moment and consequence.

JOHN PORDAGE.

After this was read, not knowing but that the commissioners retained their former resolution of examining their witnesses in private, I pressed them to an open examination, for the satisfaction of all parties, and for the more full discovery of the truth; alledging, that I hoped they would not deal worse with me than the Jews did with Christ, and the ethnic Romans with Paul, who suffered them to hear their accusers face to face. So after some dispute it was granted, and agreed upon.

But before I proceed to give you an account of the Depositions taken pro and con, I must inform you, that the 22nd of November was the time of my fourth appearance, which continued three days; all which three days were wholly spent in taking the Depositions of my accusers witnesses, to make good the first and last Charge: And when they had ended their examinations on the 24th being Friday, late at night, they called upon me to produce my witnesses, if I had any. I answered them, I had witnesses, but they were not then present, neither had I received any summons for their appearance; whereupon I desired a summons to call in my witnesses, which they, after much debate, and many outcries against me for not having them ready, granted; together with an Order by which I was to appear at the Bear in Speenhamland at Newbury the 30th of that month, which was just a week after, to make proof of my Defence by witnesses. I seeing they had prescribed so short a time for making my Defence, alledged that it was impossible for me to be ready with my witnesses so soon, and desired a fortnight's time: which though I urged it with many reasons, could not be granted me.

But I was afterwards prevented by a vehement cold, in reference to my appearing at Newbury on the day prescribed: whereupon I sent three friends to attest my inability to appear on that day before them; who likewise presented the commissioners with a letter from me, in which I gave them an account of my great distemper. Whereupon the truth of my extraordinary weakness being attested by those I sent, this Order with a new Summons was granted by the commissioners.

Berks. By the Commissioners for ejecting of Scandalous Ministers, November 30, 1654.

"Whereas Dr. Pordage was required this day to appear before us in the cause depending concerning him; and it is now attested that the said Doctor is sick, and cannot, without further danger of his health, this day appear: It is therefore ordered, that he shall have further day given till the seventh of December next, at the Bear in Reading; which day is to be peremptory unto him."

According to which Order I appeared at Reading the seventh of December, with my witnesses; where two days were spent in examination, (now this was my fifth and last time of appearance) the transactions of which cannot distinctly be set down by themselves, in regard of my joining the Depositions then taken, with those of the adverse party, according to this subsequent method.

Now then I shall proceed to the merits of the cause, secundum allegata et probata.

Here then I must present you with the Depositions of the Witnesses, and first with those that concern the first Charge of Articles; in reference to which, Mr. Tickle gave evidence by oath against me, first at Newbury the fifth of October, and again at Reading the 22d of November, being the day in which my Answer was read.

Now to the first Article:

John Tickle, minister of Abingdon, sworn at Newbury the fifth of October, deposed, That I delivered in the pulpit, That the fiery deity of Christ mingleth and mixeth itself with our flesh.

On farther examination upon oath at Reading, November 2, Mr. Tickle affirmed, That he charged blasphemy on the former expression, and that I repeated my sense to be thus, viz. That I did not mean with our corruption, but with our flesh; holding my hand over the pulpit.

The said Mr. Tickle being cross-examined touching this Article, upon this interrogatory, viz. Whether he did swear positively to this Article, as thus delivered by me in the very same terms, and order, without any addition or diminution; or only so, according to his best remembrance; thus replied, That the sum and substance of that Article was clearly and fully delivered by me, and as far as he could remember in these words, or words to that purpose.

The same person being sworn again, and further examined at the Bear in Reading, November 22, after some expostulation with me, in which he grew somewhat passionate, further said, That after I had held up my hand, as he had formerly deposed, I said I did not mean our flesh, but with the soul of Christ; and that this was delivered without any the least limitation as to the sense of it.

'Now these last depositions were taken by the Court from Mr. Tickle occasionally, (after he had answered the cross interrogatories by writing) when Mr. Tickle was sometimes raised into seeming passion against me, from accidental discourses that fell in upon examination.'

But I shall here discover my own meaning, and bring in the intended evidence of my witnesses in reference to this Article. My meaning then (notwithstanding Mr. Tickle's rash allegations) was this; by flesh I meant the pure regenerated part of the soul, with which the spirit of Christ is united, according to that of the Apostle, Eph. v. 30. For we are members of his body, of his flesh, &c.

'My evidence was this; there were present three witnesses, viz. Mr. Francis Pordage minister, Mrs. Mary Pocock, and one Robert Bolt, who offered to attest upon oath, That they being present at the Committee of Plundered Ministers, about March 27, 1651, heard me upon the interpretation of this Article, That the fiery deity of Christ mingles itself with our flesh,' explain myself thus; That by flesh I understand not the sinful and fleshly part of the soul, that lusteth against the spirit, for in this there can be no union, for these are contrary; neither by flesh did I understand the outward elementish flesh of the body, but by flesh I understood the pure regenerated part of the soul.

'But this testimony they rejected, and would not receive it as evidence, denying to examine the witnesses, in regard they were not present at Ilsley, where Mr. Tickle alledged this was spoken. But I believe the judicious reader will find this testimony to be more pertinent to the clearing of the truth, in reference to my sense in the former proposition, than what Mr. Tickle hath uncertainly, according to his best remembrance, asserted.'

To the second Article:

Mr. Tickle saith, That I delivered, 'That the imputative righteousness of Christ is a sapless righteousness.'

And being further examined by interrogatories, he answered to the first of them, That this was fully and roundly delivered in my sermon at Ilsley.

But to the second interrogatory, which was this, Whether it was with a limitation, or without? he thus answers, That he doth not remember any addition therein, unless it were in opposition to the righteousness, which (as he said) I called sapless.

Being further examined, Nov. 22, the same deponent said, That I did not deliver any such limitation, as I made in my answer therunto, and that there was no such word as except spoken, nor any thing like it.

Roger Stevens, sworn to the same Article, deposed, That I delivered in a sermon at Ilsley, 'That the righteousness of Christ was a sapless righteousness.'

And that he doth not remember any thing to the contrary, but that the same was an entire sentence, and only so. And that to his apprehension the drift of my sermon was to take away the strength and efficacy of the righteousness of Christ.

And this deponent further said, That in the aforesaid sermon at Ilsley I delivered these words, 'That you are not to look to this,' (meaning, as the deponent apprehended, Christ's righteousness) 'but to the fiery deity burning in the centre of our souls, consuming and destroying sin there.' Which said words did not immediately follow the words that I used, when I said the righteousness of Christ was sapless; but the same were further off in my sermon, to his best remembrance.

Now I shall present the Depositions of my own Witnesses touching the second Article.

Mrs. Mary Pocock being sworn and examined December 7, was asked by me whether she heard me deliver the second Article at the Sermon at Ilsley, viz. 'That the imputative righteousness of Christ was sapless;' she replied, she was then present at the sermon, and did hear these words delivered. Then being further asked, Whether delivered with a limitation, or without a limitation? she answered, That it was with a limitation. Then she was further asked, What that limitation was? she re-answered, That it was with this limitation, 'except the fiery Deity of Christ be in the centre of our souls, burning up our lusts and corruptions.' And being further asked, Whether these last words were spoken together with the other words, to make up one sentence? she said, Yes, in these express words, viz. 'That the righteousness of Christ was sapless, except the fiery Deity of Christ be in the centre of our souls, burning up our lusts and corruptions.'

After this I brought three witnesses more to be sworn touching this Article.

Their evidence was this, which every one in particular intended to give in, in writing, after this manner, viz. I do confess I was present before the Committee of Plundered Ministers, the 27th of March, 1651; where I did hear the Doctor, upon his examination touching that Article, 'That the imputative righteousness of Christ is a sapless righteousness,' deliver himself to this purpose; That to him that hath not the spirit of Christ indwelling in his heart by faith, notwithstanding all his application of Christ and his merits, it is but a sapless righteousness: So saith the Scripture. He that hath not the spirit of Christ is none of his.

But this testimony and evidence the Commissioners rejected, and would not suffer the witnesses to depose it upon oath.

In the next place, I certified the Commissioners, that I had present divers knowing Christians that were constant hearers of me, who were ready to depose on oath what the scope of my ministry was, and what they had frequently heard me hold forth in it, touching Christ's imputative righteousness.

But the Commissioners rejected this testimony also, and would not hear the evidence of these intended witnesses; saying, that it was not to the purpose, but merely dilatory. To which I replied, That although the proofs were weak and altogether impertinent, yet being Judges, they ought to bear them, and afterwards to judge of their force or invalidity: and I further told them, That this proceeding of theirs, in thus preventing and rejecting the testimony of my witnesses, in not suffering them to depose what they could, did much strengthen my belief of the common report spread abroad the country, That they had resolved before-hand to condemn and eject me, whether by right or wrong. At this Mr. Trapham's choler seemed much to be stirred, that the Court, of which he was one, should thus be charged; saying with much passion, That this should be looked upon as a contempt and an affront against the Court.

But the Commissioners peremptorily resolving not to take the evidence of the forementioned witnesses, because it contradicted not Mr. Tickle's testimony, quoad idem tempus, in reference to the same particular time; I was forced to tell them, that I must be subject to the determinations of the Court: but I hoped they would be more ingenuous and Christian-like, than condemn me for a word or expression, though proved ever so clearly, if the drift and tenour of my ministry were otherwise.

But I shall here insert, and so leave it to the judgment of the reader, what eight substantial witnesses, who almost constantly hear me, would willingly have deposed upon oath, touching this article, viz. That the scope of my ministry is not to take away the due application of Christ's righteousness, but the misapplying of it in reference to those who have no interest in it.

After this, I further pressing the Commissioners to hear those witnesses which were to attest this, they seemed somewhat to change their resolution, and to admit one or two of them to be examined. So I mentioned Mrs. Mary Pocock, a very pious and experienced Christian, and so known to be in the place where she lives. Against whom it was objected, that she was one of my own tribe. Then I mentioned another discreet prudent Christian, by name Richard Higgs, who is known to be one of a very good conversation. Against whom Mr. Fowler having somewhat to object for his supposed Judgment, was willing to have him called to examination.

So this Richard Higgs being sworn, deposed, That he had been a hearer of me at certain times for five or six years last past, and that during that time, for ought the deponent knew, the scope of my ministry hath not been against the right and due application of Christ's righteousness, but against the misapplication thereof, for ought he knew or ever understood. And being asked, Whether he had been a constant hearer of me? he said, he had heard me very often, but that he was usually at his own parish in the morning, and that sometimes he was absent, but had often heard me.

And being further asked, What he had usually heard me preach concerning the imputative righteousness of Christ, he said, he could not charge his own memory; but had a note to which he would reflect, for recollecting his memory; and thereupon produced a note, which he confessed was given him from the Doctor.

[Here, upon this, were many outcries against me, from the accuser, and others of the ministers and Commissioners, as though I had committed some heinous act in suborning a witness to swear what I pleased: whereas there was no such thing; for this man and two more, meeting at my house, compared their notebooks together, out of which this was taken. which was in that paper, which he after mature deliberation, and reflection upon it, could with a good conscience swear to; as looking upon it more safe, than to swear upon sudden memory.]

But I shall now proceed to the further examination of this witness, as it was taken by the clerk, but very partially, as you shall see presently.

This Richard Higgs being asked, what he meant, or what the Doctor meant by the righteousness of Christ? he saith he cannot depose: but the Doctor interposing, said, Christ's righteousness was his active and passive obedience. And thereupon the deponent being asked, what was Christ's active obedience? presently denied his words again.

To this he refused to subscribe.

The clerk hath left out something touching Richard Higgs's answer to that question about Christ's active obedience; which answer being caught up by the clerk, before he had liberty to express his meaning, he might very well deny, though the clerk had wrote it down, it being not according to his meaning and purpose; and so not fit to be subscribed.

After this, Mr. Fowler, the accuser, openly attested against this deponent, that he denied the Bible to be the word of God, and said, that the same was but old declaratives; which the said deponent denies.

Here the clerk's partiality is again apparent; who left out a weighty distinction which the deponent made, concerning the word of God, in answer to Mr. Fowler's accusation, which was this; that he never denied the Scripture or Bible to be the written word, but had said, it was not the essential word: And this very distinction the deponent had formerly given to the minister of the parish, who being present confessed it before the court, acknowledging that he walked like an honest and sober Christian in his conversation.

But to proceed: Although this deponent's written evidence would not be received, yet I shall here present it as it was to be given in, and attested by seven more witnesses besides himself. The form of it was this; I confess I have heard the Doctor preach at Bradfield about the year 49, out of Dan. ix. 24, thus: Quest. What is meant here by this righteousness? Ans. By this righteousness is meant Christ's righteousness, Jer. xxiii. 6. 'The Lord our Righteousness.' And Paul desireth not to be found in his own righteousness, but in the righteousness of Christ, Phil. iii. 9. 'Christ's righteousness is the soul's wedding-robe;' Isa. vi. 10. 'He hath covered me with the robe of righteousness.' As to the nature of Christ's righteousness, it is a pure, spotless, perfect and compleat righteousness, Eph. v. 27. That he might present to himself a glorious church, in this righteousness of his not having spot or wrinkle.

This which follows was also intended to be given in, and was to be attested by three witnesses: I confess, I heard the Doctor preach in Bradfield church, out of Luke i. 68. That the free grace of God the Father is the first cause of the soul's justification.

Quest. What is the matter out of which a sinner cometh to be justified in the sight of God? Ans. It is righteousness. As a man cannot live without a life, so a Christian cannot be just without righteousness; and this righteousness is called Christ's righteousness; no other righteousness, but the righteousness of Christ, can justify the soul. Therefore he is stiled, Jer. xxiii. 6. 'The Lord our righteousness.' 1 Cor. i. 30. 'Christ is made unto us wisdom and righteousness;' that is, for our justification. This righteousness of Christ, in its own nature, is an everlasting righteousness, Dan. ix. 24. 2 Cor. v. 21. 'That we might be made the righteousness of God, in being clothed upon with Christ's righteousness.' Phil. iii. 9. We are not to be found in our own self pharisaical righteousness, but in Christ's righteousness, which is the righteousness of justification. And the formal cause of a sinner's justification, is his union and communion with this righteousness of Christ, through faith and believing on it; Rom. x. 6. 'The righteousness ‘ of faith speaketh on this wise, &c. that is, the righteousness of Christ apprehended by faith.

‘ This was also intended to have been given into the court in writing, being transcribed out of three or four note-books compared together, and afterward seriously considered and weighed; to which the witnesses could swear with good consciences, notwithstanding all those outcries were against this evidence by some of the ministers and commissioners, as though I had prescribed what they should swear; and that we were all combined to commit a heinous sin, and bring the guilt of perjury upon ourselves: whereas we all stood in innocency as to this thing, having no other end in it, but the stable assurance of the truth of what was to be attested by serious reflections upon it, after the comparing of divers note-books together, which served to help and strengthen the memory of the witnesses; together with the avoiding of the clerk’s prevarications in writing, by partially taking the depositions, in which we often found him defective.

‘ But to conclude this Article, I have produced these testimonies to shew my judgment touching Christ’s righteousness, which (with the positive deposition of Mrs. Mary Pocock, that I spake that of the imputative righteousness of Christ with a limitation) may in justice outweigh the depositions of the other two witnesses against me, being neither of them are positive, and so not effectual in law or reason.’

Now I shall pass to the third Article;

To which Mr. Tickle being sworn, saith, that I delivered, that the discoveries of the sinfulness of sin, the terrors of the law, the death of Christ, the free grace of God, are fleshly and flashy discoveries.

Afterward being cross-examined by me to this interrogatory, whether this Article was delivered in the same express words, and in the same order? He answered thus:

That the very sum and substance of this Article was delivered fully and roundly by me, and in the express words for the substance of them, and to the best of his remembrance.

‘ Now I not remembering that ever I said that these were but fleshly and flashy discoveries, and knowing that it was but his single testimony, and not positively sworn to, and so no legal evidence to condemn; and besides, that it was not comprehended in the act of blasphemous opinions, to which the ordinance refers: I passed it by formerly without any answer. But now to satisfy knowing Christians concerning my judgment in this particular, I shall here present this answer; that I then held forth, and do still own it, that the discoveries of the sinfulness of sin, the terrors of the law, the free grace of God, the death of Christ, were but preparatory works under the Father’s dispensation, to the higher and more powerful workings of God under the dispensation of the Son, in changing and transforming

‘ the heart into his Image; and so but weak in comparison of the more full and clear manifestations and operations of God upon the soul, in bringing it up into divine union and fruition.’

To the fourth Article;

Tickle saith, that I delivered, that the liberty and freedom spoken of, purchased by the blood of Christ, is not a liberty and freedom from the guilt of sin, the curse of the law, the wrath of God, but the fiery deity of Christ in the center of our souls.

Tickle being further examined on this Article by me, to this interrogatory, viz. Whether this was delivered first in the same express words? Secondly, and in the same order? Answers:

First, the very sum and substance of this Article was delivered fully and roundly by the Doctor. Secondly, that it was delivered in the express words, for the substance of them.

To a third interrogatory proposed by me, viz. Whether this Article was thus expressed by me, without any addition of diminution of his own? He thus answers; to the best of his remembrance, without any limitation, addition or diminution of his own.

‘ But here, courteous reader, you must give me leave to shew you Mr. Tickle’s uncertainty and disagreement with himself in delivering this Article, which cannot but make it invalid in the eyes of those that are judicious.

‘ In his attesting of this Article three several times, he never agreed with himself, but either diminished or added. The first time he swear to this Article, he had this clause (and applied by the clinging and cleaving of the soul to Christ) as you may see in the first paper of Articles, which, being sworn again Octob. 5, he left out: and neither of these agreed with his own deposition given under his own hand some four years since, to the Committee of Plundered Ministers, when it was more fresh in his memory, and yet not delivered so fully and positively as now; which you may see by his own words (taken out of his former depositions) which were these.

‘ Another preparation was the instating of the soul into a glorious liberty and freedom, in these expressions: which liberty and freedom is not that liberty and freedom from the guilt of sin, the curse of the law, the wrath of God, brought about (or in an expression of the same signification) by the death and blood of another; and applied (or a word like it) by the clinging and cleaving of the soul to Christ.

‘ Now you may take notice, that in the two former, this clause was added, viz. ‘ But the fiery deity of Christ in the center of the soul;’ which here is not mentioned. Moreover the order is changed, and some doubtful expressions are inserted; which shewed his uncertainty four years since. All which compared with that answer of his, given by oath at my late trial, that this Article was delivered in the same express words, for the substance of them,

‘ cannot but shew that he hath almost, if not ‘ altogether, incurred the sin of perjury. Now
‘ all this being well weighed, cannot but demon‘ strate that this testimony is of no force at all.

‘ And although I formerly gave no answer
‘ to this Article, because it was not sworn to ‘ positively; but with reserves and alterations,
‘ and that by one witness only, and came not ‘ under the act of scandalous opinions; yet I ‘ shall now speak something to it, and shew you
‘ the deponent’s mistake, which was in leaving ‘ out this word (only) which inserted, makes it ‘ appear with a more innocent face.

‘ But now I shall further answer, that I
‘ delivered this sentence thus, which I still own, ‘ viz. That the second preparatory work that ‘ Christ did in the soul of a true saint, for the ‘ manifesting of his glory in it, was the insta‘ ting of the soul into a glorious liberty and free‘ dom, which doth not only consist in the ‘ liberty and freedom from the guilt of sin, the ‘ curse of the law, the wrath of God; but also ‘ in the enjoying of the spirit of Christ in the ‘ center of the soul, there purifying our natures, ‘ mortifying our lusts, and restoring us into the ‘ image of God. And so this, truly represented, ‘ is a glorious truth; though as Mr. Tickle by ‘ mistake delivered it, it seemed monstrous.’

To the fifth Article.

Tickle saith, that I did deliver, that by male and female, Gen. 1, we are to understand by male, the Deity; and by female, the Humanity; and that these two became one flesh. These things were delivered without any limitations whatsoever.

Tickle being further examined on this Article, viz. Whether I spoke this as my own avowed judgment, or as the judgment of some other person? Answers thus: that I delivered those expressions of the Article with approbation, and that therefore he had cause to believe it was my judgment; and, as far as he remembers, it was delivered as my judgment.

‘ Here the reader may observe, that Mr.
‘ Tickle doth not answer directly and nakedly
‘ as a Christian should, but subtilly and indirect‘ ly, like a sophister; for he answers, that I deli‘ vered this with approbation: but whether this ‘ approbation was from myself, or from ‘ some other (I might then cite) he doth
‘ not express, passing it over in silence. After‘ wards he saith, he hath cause to believe it was ‘ my judgment; which is a mere prevarication,
‘ but no answer to the question; which was ‘ not, whether he believed it to be my judg‘ ment, but whether I delivered it as my judg‘ ment, or as the judgment of another? To ‘ which in the last clause he answers somewhat, ‘ viz. That I delivered it as my own, as far as ‘ he remembers. But though this be somewhat
‘ to the question, yet not much to the purpose, ‘ it being no legal proof or evidence; for his ‘ memory might fail him.

‘ Now the reason of this interrogatory was,
‘ in that Mr. Tickle, some four years since,
‘ when this was better in his memory, than

‘ now it can be, gave in this that followeth,
‘ under his own hand, to the Committee of Plan‘ dered Ministers, viz. That Gen. 1. by male,
‘ we are to understand, saith Mr. Pordage, the ‘ Deity; by the female, the humanity. This ‘ he gave from a Rabbi, with that appro‘ bation.

‘ Now how consistent this is with his late an‘ swer, to my interrogatories, let all judge; es‘ pecially with that part of it in which he af‘ firms, that as far as he remembers, I deliver‘ ed it as my own judgment.

‘ But now to answer something positively
‘ to this, which may give satisfaction to judici‘ ous and knowing Christians, I acknowledge ‘ that, in the sermon before-mentioned, I deli‘ vered for substance, this which follows, viz.

‘ That another preparatory work that Christ
‘ did in the soul of a true Christian for the ma‘ nifesting of his own glory in it, was the bring‘ ing up the spirit of the soul into a glorious, ‘ mystical, yet real union with himself: And ‘ after I had proved the truth and substantia-‘ lity of this union betwixt Christ and a Chris‘ tian, from several texts of scripture, which ‘ directly evinced it; I came by way of illus‘ tration to speak of that scripture, Gen. 1. out ‘ of which I said, that by male and female, ac‘ cording to the judgment of a learned Rabbi,
‘ the Deity and pure humanity might be sha‘ dowed forth, which by union become one;
‘ the male representing the Deity, the female
‘ the pure humanity, or regenerated part of the ‘ soul, which by union is made partaker of ‘ the divine nature.

‘ By this you may see, that if Mr. Tickle had ‘ been but a charitable and knowing Christian,
‘ he needed not have troubled himself and me
‘ about this Article.’

To the sixth Article;

‘ Mr. Tickle saith, that he heard me deliver ‘ in discourse with Mr. Pendarvis, that the ‘ gifts and graces of the spirit were but flesh.

Being further examined, he said, That to this sixth Article, there was no limitation whatsoever in the delivering of it.

‘ Here the reader must know that Mr. Pen-‘ darvis was summoned by me to witness to the ‘ truth in this particular, but he came not;
‘ alledging that he could say no more than ‘ what he had already deposed. Whereupon
‘ I desired the Commissioners (after information ‘ that I had summoned him) to hear his former ‘ deposition read; but they peremptorily deni‘ ed it. By which I clearly saw that they had ‘ more mind to take all occasion of advantage ‘ against me, than to be fully informed of the ‘ truth of things.

‘ But Mr. Pendarvis’s deposition given in ‘ before the Committee of Plundered Ministers, ‘ was this, viz. That the Doctor, in conference
‘ did say, That the gifts and graces of the spi‘ rit were but flesh: and I opposed him: but ‘ then the Doctor replied, by way of explanation, ‘ that he understood them only to be flesh;
‘ that is weak in point of rest and trust on them

‘ for eternal life and salvation : and in this I agreed with him.

‘ Correspondent to this, was my answer to, and explanation of this Article before the Committee of Plundered Ministers, which three witnesses were ready to depose on oath before the present Commissioners, who refused to hear their testimony.’

To the seventh Article ;

Mr. Tickle saith, That he heard me deliver in discourse, That Christ is a Type and but a Type.

Being further examined he saith, That I endeavoured to prove that Christ was but a Type, out of Peter, where he is called τύπος.

Further, Roger Stephens being sworn to this Article, depose, That the Doctor, in dispute with Mr. Pendarvis, delivered, That Christ was but a Type, and went to prove it by that scripture, 1 Pet. 2. “ He is our example.” To which Mr. Pendarvis replied, That is not meant by way of righteousness to justification, but by way of example, as to reproaches. To which the Doctor answered, You understand it one way, and I another ; or words to that effect.

Now to balance these depositions, the reader must take notice,

‘ 1. That my true sense of this Article, may be seen in my answer to this first charge, in which I have truly shewed in what sense I owned Christ to be a Type, viz. as he is a pattern and example for us to imitate and follow.

‘ That this discourse being with Mr. Pendarvis, it is requisite I should here insert his deposition taken by the justices of peace of that county and afterward presented to the Committee of Plundered Ministers ; which was as follows :

‘ This Examinant (which was Mr. Pendarvis) further saith, That the said Dr. Pordage, in a conference had with him at the same time, after his sermon at Ilsley, said, That Christ was a Type and but a Type : but this expression was immediately waved by him, but he constantly affirmed that Christ was a Type.

‘ But because Mr. Pendarvis could not be there to witness viva voce, the Commissioners would not admit his evidence.’

But Mrs. Mary Pocock being sworn and examined on this Article, saith, That she heard the Doctor maintain in that discourse with Mr. Pendarvis, that Christ was a Type ; and proved it out of Peter “ He was an example,” and that she heard the Doctor say, he would not stand to the word “ But.”

And further, John Pordage, son to the Doctor, aged between 19 and 20 years, and examined December the 7th ; this deponent saith, That in dispute between the Doctor and Mr. Pendarvis, about five or six years since, about Christ’s being a Type, the Doctor said, that Christ was but a Type. To which Mr. Pendarvis asked, Do you say but a Type ? Whereupon the Doctor answered, he did not stand to the expression, “ but a Type ;” it was but the slip of his tongue, but he maintained that Christ was a Type.

‘ You see here are three witnesses that attest I never owned or stood to that of Christ’s being but a Type.’

Correspondent to which testimony, I gave in my answer before the Committee of Plundered Ministers which I offered to prove by three witnesses then present, who heard me, who were ready to attest this which follows, viz.

‘ That they being present (about the 27th of March 1651,) before the Committee of Plundered Ministers, heard me touching this Article “ That Christ was a Type, and but a Type,” deliver myself thus ; That I had owned Christ to be a Type, that is, a pattern and example for us Christians to square our lives and conversations by ; but that I had not owned him to be but a Type, or a Type only ; but the Commissioners would by no means hear this evidence.

‘ After this I earnestly pressed them to hear what my witnesses could further say, touching what I had publicly delivered in my ministry about this subject ; telling them that such evidence was in justice more to be respected, than a mistake in sudden speaking, presently retracted : but they denied all such evidence, and would not hear ; which clearly shewed their partiality, and that they little regarded what my avowed judgment was.

‘ Notwithstanding, I shall here insert what some were ready to witness, in reference to this Article, who had been constant bearers of me ; whose testimony was this : We confess we have heard the Doctor preach out of Luke i. 68. First, this by way of doctrine, viz. That God’s free grace is the first and chief cause of our redemption. Then he proceeded thus ; That the inward man was redeemed in, for, and through Christ, Rom. iii. 24, “ through the redemption that is in Jesus Christ.” How through Christ ? Answer. Through Christ’s death and passion ; Isa. liii. 5. “ He was wounded for our transgressions, he was broken for our iniquities.” 1 Pet. ii. 24. “ Who bare our sins in his own body on the cross.” Rom. iv. 25. “ Who was delivered for our offences to the death of the cross.” 1 Cor. v. 7. “ Christ our passover is sacrificed for us.”

‘ Now this clearly shews, that Christ is more than a Type, and that he is a complete Redeemer.’—So much for this Article.

To the Eighth and Ninth Articles ;

Mr. Tickle saith, That he heard me deliver before the Committee of this county, sitting at Reading, That Christ was not God ; and that he was not Jehovah.

Being further examined to this Article, my interrogatories to him were these :

1. Whether these words were not expressed in a hot dispute before the Committee ? To this Mr. Tickle replied, That I endeavoured in dispute with great seriousness before the Committee, to maintain, That Christ was not God, that Christ was not Jehovah.

My second question was this, Whether, in the same dispute, this Article was not limited and explained by me ?

' But this question was wholly waved and passed over in silence; but whether voluntarily by Mr. Tickle, or by the clerk's deceit, the interrogatories being given in writing, I do not know; but this I am sure, it was much to the prejudicing of my cause to let such a weighty question pass without an answer.'

3. Whether this Article was held forth by me as my avowed judgment?

Ans. To this he thus answers: The Doctor did maintain and defend this Article as his avowed judgment.

' Here Mr. Tickle is very peremptory in a rash answer, though that interrogatory before could be slid over in silence; the answer to which, if Mr. Tickle had not easily incurred perjury, would have much cleared the truth, in regard I meant and explained myself, of God the Father, as you shall see afterward.'

This deponent, Mr. Tickle, further deposeth to the eighth and ninth Articles, That there was no such expression, of the Father, used in the definition of blasphemy, as is mentioned in the Doctor's Answer; but saith that the definition was, That blasphemy was an evil-speaking against God, derogating from his glory, either in his name, nature, word or works. Mr. Tickle further affirms, that my immediate words thereupon were, Hark! he answereth, blasphemy is an evil-speaking against God; and in his paper chargeth me with blasphemy against Christ, as if Christ were God: and hereupon we began a hot dispute about the Godhead of Christ.

' The reader must here know, that upon Mr. Tickle's defining blasphemy to be an evil-speaking against God the Father, as I then really apprehended, I immediately cried out, Hark! he defineth blasphemy to be an evil-speaking against God the Father, and in his paper chargeth me with blasphemy against Christ, who is God the Son. Whereupon began a dispute; in reference to which Mr. Tickle further deposeth,

That he asked the Doctor if Christ were God: who did deny it, and put the deponent upon proof of the same. Whereupon he cited that scripture, 'In the beginning was the word,' &c. To which the Doctor replied, He is called God, but he is not Jehovah. To which the deponent replied, He is Jehovah; which the Doctor likewise put him upon proof of. To which he answered that Scripture, 'His name shall be called Jehovah, our righteousness:' and, as he remembers, the Doctor did disallow of that proof, as being out of the Old Testament; to which he cited that scripture, 'He that was, is, and is to come,' as of the same purpose with Jehovah.

' 'Tis well that Mr. Tickle adds, according to his best remembrance, which saves him from perjury: for I esteem the Old Testament to be Scripture as well as the New; neither did I disallow of that proof as being taken thence, as he would insinuate: but I said that Jehovah in the Old Testament most commonly signified the person of the Father.'

But now we shall pass to the next witness.

Thomas Trapham, one of the Commissioners, sworn and examined, deposeth; That, to his remembrance, the word Father was not in Mr. Tickle's definition of blasphemy; and that the Doctor did then deny Christ to be God; which the deponent did acquaint Mr. Blagrove with. To which Mr. Blagrove said, If he say Christ is not God, we must take further course with him. To which the Doctor replied, Christ is not Jehovah: and that when Mr. Tickle had confuted him in that argument, (I must now tell the whole truth) the Doctor replied, He was not God the Father.

' Note, This was rather a confutation of Mr. Tickle's own apprehensions concerning me, than of my meaning in what I then spake: and, if he swears truly that the term Father was not in his definition, then as he mistook me, I mistook him; upon which mistakes his need-less proofs were grounded.'

But now to the next.

Mr. Roger Stevens, of Reading, sworn and examined, November 22, deposeth, That the Doctor did confess in the deponent's hearing, in a sermon, That Christ was not Jehovah.

' Note, Before I proceed any further, I cannot but desire all sober Christians to take notice what a bitter and envious spirit this deponent is of; which will appear by what follows.'

After his before-expressed depositions, I put these interrogatories to him: 1. Where did you hear me preach this? To this he replied, In a sermon at St. Lawrence's church. 2. I asked him before whom? He answered, Before the Committee of Berks. 3. I demanded of him how I explained myself, when in the sermon I affirmed openly, That Christ was not Jehovah? He replied, he did indeed explain himself thus, That he had said that Christ was not Jehovah, in opposition to the Father.

' Note, Here the reader must know that this sermon was delivered at Reading by the appointment of the Committee, (before which we had the dispute about the Godhead of Christ) in which sermon I openly cleared myself from that dismal aspersion of denying the Godhead of Christ; which so satisfied the Committee, that upon this they judged me innocent in that particular, and by vote cleared me. And now considering the scope of my sermon at that time, together with the deponent's deposition, viz. That he heard me in a sermon confess that Christ was not Jehovah, without adding any more to shew how I said it, till I cross-examined him: I say, weighing these well together, the judicious reader cannot but see this deponent's envy and partiality, and unfitness to take oath, or be much regarded after oath; who swearing to speak all the truth, dares yet take one sentence out of a whole discourse, without adding any further explanation of it, to make the Commissioners believe that I accused myself of blasphemy at that time, when my whole scope was to vindicate myself from the undeserved imputation of it.'

Now I shall present you with depositions and evidence given in on my behalf, touching the 8th and 9th articles, viz. That Christ is not God; and, That Christ is not Jehovah.

But in the first place I refer you to my Answer to these Articles; in which you may see the occasion of the discourse before the Committee, touching the Godhead of Christ; and that I never owned any such monstrous position, as, That Christ is not God.

In the second place I come to the witnesses: The first of which was Mr. Francis Pordage, brother to me.

Now this deponent being asked whether the words, That Christ was not God, and that Christ was not Jehovah, before the Committee at Reading, were not delivered in a hot dispute; he saith they were.

And being further asked whether in the same dispute these words, That Christ was not God, were not limited by me; he saith, The Doctor did express it with this limitation, That Christ was not the Father.

Now follow the cross-examinations of the accuser, and some other of the ministers.

Mr. Pordage being asked by them the ground of this dispute, he thus answered, That the dispute arose upon a definition of Blasphemy which Mr. Tickle gave to Mr. Blagrove, That it was against God. To which the Doctor replied, He saith it is against God, and yet chargeth me for speaking against Christ.

Note, Here are some things prevaricated by the clerk, the ministers at that time being very hot in examining this deponent.—I must here therefore a little correct it by the line of truth.

Mr. Pordage indeed said that the dispute arose upon a definition of blasphemy, which Mr. Tickle gave to Mr. Blagrove: But then a minister asking him whether the definition was not thus expressed, That blasphemy was an evil-speaking against God? he replied, He could not tell whether it was expressed against God, or against God the Father. But now I shall proceed as the clerk took them.

Mr. Pordage being further asked by me, whether in that dispute I did deny that I held Christ not to be God? he saith the Doctor did declare to Mr. Blagrove, That Christ was God.

Hereupon he was asked by the Commissioners and Ministers, whether there was not so much distance of time at the least between the Doctor's denial of Christ to be God, and his correcting of it afterwards, as required proof of Mr. Tickle, to prove him to be God and Jehovah? the deponent doth acknowledge the same.

And the deponent being asked whether he did hear Mr. Tickle speak any word of God the father in that dispute? he saith, he doth not remember that Mr. Tickle used any such expression.

This deponent being asked by me, whether frequently in that dispute, when I spake of denying Christ to be God, I did not speak it always in relation to God the Father? he thus answered, The Doctor did then speak it in relation to God the Father; but he cannot say frequently or always.

Moreover the former deponent being asked by me, How I did explain myself in St. Lawrence church concerning the divinity of Christ, when I was commanded by the Committee at Reading to explain myself in a sermon there? he saith, In that sermon the Doctor did clear himself concerning the Trinity of persons, and that Christ was God; and did assert the same as his avowed judgment.

After this, being asked by the Commissioners whether the Doctor did not make his limitation, if any, after he was confuted by Mr. Tickle concerning the deity of Christ? the deponent answereth to this, That it was after Mr. Tickle had cited many Scriptures to prove the deity of Christ.

But last of all being asked by me, whether he understood me at that time to be confuted or mistaken? he saith, mistaken.

FRANCIS PORDAGE.

The next witness is Mary Pocock, sworn again, and further examined.

Who being asked by me whether this expression, That Christ was not God and Jehovah, was not spoken in a dispute before the Committee at Reading? she saith, She was before the Committee of Berks, where she heard the Doctor in a dispute with Mr. Tickle concerning Christ; in which dispute she heard the Doctor say, Christ was not the Father: But she did not hear him deny that he was God the Son, neither then, nor at any other time, but owning him to be perfect God and perfect man.

And being further asked, whether she did not hear the Doctor express that Christ was not God with a limitation, and with what limitation? she answered, Yes; and that the same was thus, He was not God the Father.

And being further asked by the Doctor, Whether she did not hear him deny in that dispute, That he held Christ not to be God? she saith, she did apprehend him so, viz. That he did deny he held Christ not to be God; and so far as she was satisfied with it.

And being asked by the Commissioners, Whether she did not hear the Doctor in that dispute, deny Christ to be God? she answereth, she heard him deny Christ to be God the Father.

And being further asked, Whether the words of God the Father were not spoken by the Doctor, after Mr. Blagrove did tell him, If he held such opinions, they must proceed against him? To this she saith, Mr. Blagrove put some questions to him, what they were she cannot remember.

And being further asked, Whether the Doctor did not bring in the expression of God the Father, after many Scriptures cited by Mr. Tickle to prove Christ to be God? To this she saith, some scriptures Mr. Tickle did bring; but she is not able to say it was before the Doctor did express God the Father.

MARY POCOCK.

After this, I desired the Commissioners, that if they were not yet satisfied, they would hear my witnesses which I had there ready to be sworn; that I had formerly cleared myself of holding Christ not to be God and Jehovah; and that I had held forth the contrary as my avowed judgment, viz. That Christ was God and Jehovah, in a sermon before the Committee of Berks at Lawrence-Church in Reading; and how afterward I was cleared by their vote from these Articles now in debate, and particularly from this of holding Christ not to be God. But they would not suffer me to produce the evidence of these witnesses, replying, they had nothing to do with what other Committees before had done; they would proceed according to the proofs of the present witnesses.

But nevertheless I shall here present to the judicious reader the evidence which they through prejudice rejected.

Which was this that follows.

I confess I heard the Doctor deliver himself in a sermon at Reading in Lawrence-Church, where the Committee of Berks was present, out of Ezek. cap. ix. ver. 4, 5, 6, 7, after this manner, that Jehovah, taken intè, largely, including the Trinity of persons, so they are all Jehovah: but take Jehovah strictè, only for the person of the Father, and then Christ is not Jehovah. And hereupon he further said, what dealings have I had from my fellow-ministers, but as Jacob had from Esau, Obad. ver. 10, 12, who spake proudly against his brother Jacob in the day of his distress. And there he avowedly declared, that the thought of denying the deity or Godhead of Christ never entered into his soul. Moreover,

These following witnesses were present to attest on oath their former depositions, taken before the Committee of Plundered Ministers, which were these.

This deponent (Mr. Francis Pordage) further saith on oath, that he was present before the honourable Committee of Berks, when the Doctor was cleared by the vote of the whole committee, touching the business at Ilsley, and concerning those Articles, that Christ is not God and Jehovah.

This deponent (John Hambleton) saith on his oath, that he was present before the honourable Committee of Berks, when the Doctor was cleared by the vote of the whole Committee, concerning Ilsley business, and these Articles of Christ's not being God and Jehovah.

And this deponent further saith on oath, that he was at Reading before the Committee of Berks, where the Doctor was cleared of the business at Ilsley, and from the false aspersions laid to him, as if he denied Christ to be God or Jehovah, and that by the vote of the whole Committee.

But the Commissioners not receiving these testimonies, I earnestly desired them they would hear the evidence of some witnesses there-present, touching the tenor of my ministry since that dispute concerning Christ's being God, which I looked upon more considerable than one expression uttered in a dispute upon a mistake, (if Mr. Tickle swears the truth.) But they denied this reasonable request, saying, they were in haste; and that these testimonies were but dilatory and impertinent. Which notwithstanding I shall here present, to be weighed by the judicious reader.

These four witnesses (Mr. Francis Pordage, Richard Higgs, Mr. Samuel Pordage, John Higgs) were ready to attest this which follows upon their oaths, which was writ down in some of their note-books.

We confess we heard the Doctor preach out of Matth. i. 23, in the year 1652, concerning Christ's birth; at which time he speaking of six wonders, delivered the four last after this manner:

The third wonder in Christ's birth was this, That he was born a perfect man, a true natural man, Luke i. 42, where Christ is called by Elizabeth the fruit of the Virgin Mary's womb; Gal. iv. 4, made of a woman; Gal. i. 1, not only in and through a woman, but out of the substance and nature of the virgin. Fourth wonder, that Christ was born perfect God, John i. 14. 'The Word was made flesh:' who is meant by this Word? The eternal Word, the Word Christ, Heb. i. 2. Fifth wonder, behold two distinct natures born in him, viz. The deity and humanity, the godhead and the manhood, Rom. i. 3, 4. According to the flesh, he is of the seed of David; and according to his divine nature, he is the Son of God. These two natures remain distinct in Christ's person; John viii. 58. 'Before Abraham was, I am.' According to his divine nature, he was before Abraham; and according to his human, after. Sixth wonder, behold two natures hypostatically united in one person! These two natures do not make two persons, two Christs, but both these natures hypostatically united together, make up but one person, Matt. i. 23. 'Emmanuel, God with us.'

The nature of this union was after this manner explained:

It was an inconvertible union, an indivisible union, an inconfused union, an inseparable union, a substantial and real union, yet a mystical union.

We also heard the Doctor in Bradfield church, at another time, about 1653, deliver himself (out of John i. 14, concerning the Word's being made flesh) thus, viz. That this Word was Christ, the eternal Word, that is co-eternal, co-essential, and co-equal with the Father, Prov. viii. 22, 23, 24, 25. I 'was set up from everlasting, &c.' John x. 30. 'I and my Father are one.'

Besides, we can with a good conscience testify, that in his public ministry, out of divers texts of Scripture, we have heard him clearly hold forth Christ to be God.

So much for these Articles, as to the testimony of witnesses.

‘ And now we must inform the readers, that ‘ I have hitherto in truth, without partiality
 ‘ toward myself, or passion and prevarication
 ‘ toward my adversaries, presented the depo‘ sitions and evidence on both sides, touching
 ‘ the first charge : I would therefore request,
 ‘ that these following particulars, drawn toge‘ ther by way of recapitulation, may be seri‘ ously weighed and considered.

‘ Part. 1. That to most of these nine Arti‘ cles they have but one witness, without any ‘ concurrent testimony, which is not sufficient ‘ proof, according to the Ordinance they are to ‘ act by ; in which it is expressed, that at ‘ least there must be one witness with concu‘ rent evidence.

‘ Part. 2. That wheresoever the accuser
 ‘ hath two, I have also two to balance them.

‘ Part. 3. That although many of the Arti‘ cles are in gross sworn to positively, yet in ‘ the cross-examinations you will find such ‘ limitations as these, ‘ according to our best ‘ remembrance,’ and ‘ according to our appre‘ hensions, in the same express words for the ‘ substance of them, &c.’ which cannot there‘ fore amount to legal evidence, being invalid
 ‘ in point of law ; because, as the judicious
 ‘ lawyer saith, if the deponents swear not posi‘ tively and syllabically, they may by changing,
 ‘ adding to, or taking from the express words,
 ‘ usurp the place of judges, and so prevent ‘ their work and duty, which is to judge whe‘ ther such express terms are criminous or not ;
 ‘ which they cannot do after the terms be ‘ altered, and made criminous already by the ‘ witnesses misrepresenting them.

‘ Part 4. That my witnesses in reference to ‘ the most substantial questions, are positive ‘ in their answers.’

Now I come to the second Charge of Articles in reference to the proof, being exhibited against me by one Joseph Cook, an unknown person.

Art. 1. One Mrs. Lewyn being with child, and near the time of travail, sent for Dr. Pordage’s mother to be her midwife ; but he would not suffer her to go, saying they would not be guilty of such a beast-like life, meaning
 Mrs. Lewyn’s being with child by her husband.

Depos. Mr. John Lewyn of Hamsted-Norris, sworn and examined the 2nd of November, at the Bear in Speenhamland, before the Commissioners, to this Article saith, he cannot depose.

Ann Lewyn. Wife of John Lewyn, minister of Hamsted-Norris, sworn and examined to the second paper of Articles exhibited against Dr.
 Pordage, saith, to the first Article she cannot depose.

Art. 2. The said Dr. Pordage coming to the house of Mr. Lewyn, in his discourse with Mrs. Lewyn, blamed her for having children by her husband, and argued with her the unlawfulness of having children by her husband.

Depos. To this article Mr. Lewyn saith he cannot depose.

To this second article Mrs. Lewyn saith, that the Doctor told her, when she had two children, a boy and a girl, she had enough, one for her husband, another for herself : to which the deponent answered, As it shall please God. Then the Doctor replied, Pish, it is as yourselves will.

 But she saith, the Doctor did never persuade her to live from her husband.

Art. 3. In his discourse to Mr. Lewyn concerning the same subject, he endeavoured to maintain the unlawfulness of their having children ; and said, that Adam was male and female in himself, and had he not fallen, he had brought forth children himself ; and to maintain and prove the same by Scripture and otherwise.

Depos. To this third Article Mr. Lewyn saith, that about three years since, the Doctor and this deponent had some discourse at the deponent’s house, about some principles of religion : the Doctor did urge that place in Genesis, that he made them male and female, but whether he meant Adam singly, or what mental reservation he had, the deponent knoweth not. And further to this Article he cannot depose.

To this third Article Mrs. Lewyn saith, she heard the Doctor and her husband in discourse to the purpose of the said Article ; but what the words were, she cannot depose.

Art. 4. In his discourse with Mr. Lewyn, which was about the time that one Everard was with him in his house at Bradfield, who was generally reputed a conjurer, he asked Mr.
 Lewyn whether he would not be afraid if he should see his own picture or shape, intimating that he himself had used to see his.

Depos. To this fourth Article Mr. Lewyn saith, That about the time mentioned in the Article, the deponent met the Doctor in London ; in discourse with him the Doctor asked him, if it would not be terrible to see apparitions ? but did intimate nothing, that he used to see any himself.

To this Mrs. Lewyn saith she cannot depose.

Art. 5. The said Dr. Pordage hath had for some weeks together in his house the said Everard, and one Tawny, who stiled himself king of the Jews, who had been questioned, as it is generally reported, for holding dangerous and unsound opinions, as that there is no hell, and the like.

Depos. To this Mr. Lewyn deposed nothing, and Mrs. Lewyn saith she cannot depose.

‘ Now all that I shall say to this Charge, and ‘ the proofs of it, consists in these three subse‘ quent particulars.

‘ Part. 1. What Paul saith, Acts xxiv. 13.
 ‘ ‘ Neither can they prove the things whereof
 ‘ ‘ they now accuse me,’ I may say here ; for ‘ many things are laid to my charge, but nothing ‘ proved by this unknown accuser. But it is an ‘ act of subtile policy, to charge boldly, though ‘ they prove little of it, which hath been prac‘ tised against me in this Trial, as every one ‘ may see.

‘ Part. 2. For the further satisfaction of the ‘ reader, in reference to this Charge, let him

‘look back upon my former Answer, given unto it before the witnesses were examined.

Part. 3. I look upon myself in some measure obliged here to give a short account of my judgment concerning marriage; the holding forth of which may have occasioned my enemies to have framed some of the precedent Articles against me. I must therefore acknowledge, that I prefer virginity before matrimony, the single state before the conjunct; and that persons, though in a married state, [1 Cor. vii. 38.] may by consent abstain from the enjoyments of that state, and so be in it as though they were not in it, living as single, though in an united form. This now is my judgment and deliberate practice, being according to that of Christ, Mat. xix. 12. ‘He that is able to receive it, let him receive it:’ where he speaks of the law of Abstinence, and Christian Eunuchism; which these words immediately going before shew, viz. ‘There be Eunuchs, that have made themselves Eunuchs for the kingdom of Heaven’s sake.’ Here is the practice, and the end of it, which ought to be the growth and increase of God’s kingdom in the heart; to which the mortification of the affections, and the abstraction of the soul from the corrupt sensitive nature, does make way. And certainly it were well, if Christians, in this corrupt declining age of the world, did more eye and imitate the pattern of Christ’s life, who as he was born of a virgin, so lived in virginity, and the single devoted life; leaving an example to all that are able [Mat. xix. 12.] to tread in his steps, and follow him. And further it is fit for all that are either single or married to consider, that all private bands, laws, and engagements, ought to strike sail to our highest laws and engagements to God; and that whensoever they cross one another, the highest and supreme law, by which we are obliged to live to God in purity and integrity, must have the precedency. Now my holding forth and declaring this my judgment, together with my own practice, hath given occasion to many (who are as the generation before the flood, eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage, and taking complacency in the delights of the flesh) to speak evil of me, as one that breaks bonds between relations, though no such thing can (in truth) be proved against me: for it is not my design to make proselytes to my judgment, being willing to leave all to the rule of light in their own conscience. Though I have said, and cannot but say, that it were well if Christians would more labour after, and pray for the gift of Continency, and not involve themselves in the entanglements of the world, till they had used all means of mortification prescribed in the holy Scripture, to subdue their natures: and it were happy if the present generation could clearly distinguish betwixt those marriages that are idolatrous, adulterous, and bestial, and those that are holy, pure, divine, being made in the Lord according to his will, and so lawful and honourable. But alas! most people now are as those in the days of Noah, who being insensible of God’s intended judgment by the deluge, so-laced themselves in the pleasures and delights of the earth, till the flood came and destroyed them. Hence there is much need of some at this time, to call people to self-denial and imitation of Christ’s life, to live up to the highest and purest rules of Christianity, in the mortification of their flesh, and in the compleat devoting of themselves to a constant attendance upon the Lord, as waiting for his coming in spirit to destroy the man of sin, and overthrow Babylon with all its idols. So much for the third and last particular, which shall conclude the things of this Charge.”

Now I am come to the depositions of my third and last Charge, some of which were taken Nov. 22, being the fourth time of my appearance; the other Dec. 7 and 8, being the fifth and last time of my appearing before the court.

But before I present the particular Depositions, I must here inform the reader of two things, which relate to the last time of my appearance, and to this last Charge; one of which shews the cruelty, the other the unjustness of the Commissioners. The first then is this: The seventh of December having been taken up in the examination of my witnesses to the first Charge, which continued till it was late in the night, the Commissioners called for more lights, that they might proceed to the examination of witnesses in reference to the third Charge. Whereupon I replied it was late, and I had many witnesses to examine upon the last Charge. At this Mr. Fowler the accuser rose up, and urged the proceeding to the last Charge; saying, it would quickly be dispatched. Then the Commissioners cried out, Fetch us more candles, we will make an end of it this night. To which I replied, Gentlemen, I have here stood very long before you, and having not dined, (through the urgency of my business) I am not well, being very faint, and much spent and wearied; I desire you would therefore stay till the next morning. But they peremptorily denied this just request, and resolved to proceed. But they permitting me to withdraw for a little space, through emptiness and weariness I fell very sick, and was forced to go into my bed: at which the Commissioners were very much troubled, seeming to consult whether they should proceed to judgment. The second thing is this: on the morrow the Commissioners requiring me, against many objections which I made, to give in my interrogatories by writing; afterward judged most of them dilatory and impertinent to the business, and so not fit to be examined. To which I objected, whatever my proofs were, they ought in justice to hear them, by examining the witnesses to my interrogatories, and afterwards to judge of them, whether valid or invalid. But nothing I could speak prevailed with them, to obstruct their rejecting most of my testimonies.

But now as to the particular depositions, relating to the third Charge, exhibited by Mr.

Fowler, I shall here present them to be weighed in the scales of justice by the reader.

Art. 2. That Jesus Christ was not perfect; alledging that text to confirm it, 'He cried out, My God, my God, why,' &c.

Mr. Christopher Fowler sworn and examined (at Reading, Novem. 23.) to this Article, saith, That about five weeks or a month since, he acquainted Mr. Daniel Blagrove the younger, that the Commissioners did intend to summon him to testify what he knew of Dr. Pordage in relation to Jesus Christ; and the deponent asked him, if he heard the Doctor say, 'That Christ was not perfect? To which he answered, Yes.

Now as to my defence against this testimony, not repeating the illegality and invalidity of it, I have these things to say.

1. That the clerk hath left out some cross-interrogatories, which were proposed by me to the accuser, in reference to this his deposition. As first, whether he asked Mr. Blagrove, whether I spake it from myself, as my judgment, or related it as delivered by and heard from another? which question the accuser waved. And secondly, If he did ask it, what was replied to it by Mr. Blagrove? which likewise was waved by him without any positive answer. Whereupon I said to the Commissioners, I hope you will not take this deposition as evidence against me, without summoning Mr. Blagrove himself, who only can resolve the truth of these particulars.

2. In the second place, I shall refer you to my answer to this Article; in which you may see, that I only related what I had heard another speak at a public meeting in London, the thing being much against my judgment.

3. In the third place, I must tell you that I had three witnesses ready to depose on oath, That after my coming from London they heard me relate this, as spoken by Mr. Erbery in a public sermon at Somerset-house; which testimony was according to my answer to this Article, though accounted impertinent by the Commissioners, and so rejected, without examining the witnesses.

4. Farther to clear my innocency in this particular, I desired them to hear what my witnesses could say, as to the tenor of my ministry, touching Christ's being a perfect Redeemer: But this was also rejected as impertinent. But whether this subsequent testimony, intended to have been given in, was not as weighty as the accuser's deposition or hearsay, let the reader judge.

We have heard the Doctor preach in Bradfield church (about 1652, out of Coloss. i. 14. 'In whom we have redemption,' &c.) after this manner. These words he divided into three particulars; 1. Into the Redeemer, in whom. 2. The Redeemed We. 3. The act itself, Redemption. As to the first particular, he thus enlarged himself: Who can this redeeming person be, but Christ? Acts iv. 12. 'Neither is there salvation in any other; for there is no other name given under heaven, whereby we must be saved.' 1 Cor. iii. 7. 'For other foundation can no man lay, than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ.' As to the second particulae The persons redeemed, he said they were the whole mystical body of Christ. Thirdly, As to the third particular, the act itself, redemption, he said it implied a deliverance from a state of bondage into a state of liberty; which he opened at large in every particular, setting forth the riches of this redemption to us by Christ.

And we heard him farther preach in Bradfield church, about 1654, from these words out of 1 Tim. i. 15. 'That Jesus Christ came into the world to save sinners,' viz. That Jesus Christ was a perfect Saviour, in reference both to his prophetic, priestly, and kingly office, every one of which heads he opened at large.

Now let the reader but impartially weigh the accuser's illegal deposition, with the particulars here recited on my behalf, and judge whether the Commissioners have not broken their own law, the law of nature, and the law of Scripture, in taking this deposition of my accuser's into their sentence of ejection, in which they expressly condemn me for holding, 'That Christ was not perfect.'

Art. 3. That the blood of Christ was not meritorious of any man's salvation.

To this Mr. Christopher Fowler, sworn and examined, deposes, That about three weeks or a month since he asked Mr. Daniel Blagrove the younger, whether he did not hear the Doctor say, That the blood of Christ was not meritorious of any man's salvation? he answered, he heard him to that purpose.

To balance this deposition, let the reader consider,

1. That the accuser is here deponent, which is against law.

2. That the deposition is but a story or hearsay, and no legal testimony.

3. That the deponent was not able to answer to any of my interrogatories, so as to declare where, before whom, or on what occasion this was spoken; only protested as he was a Minister of the Gospel, that Mr. Blagrove told him so.

4. That I am not guilty of holding any such thing, as my Answer to this Article shews.

5. That seeing I had no other way of clearing my innocency, but by shewing my judgment, and producing proofs of the tenor of my ministry touching this particular; I desired them to examine some witnesses, that were there ready to attest this which follows:

We heard the Doctor in Bradfield church (about 1652, out of Coloss. i. 4, viz. 'In whom we have redemption through his blood') deliver himself thus: That the fourth particular in this text, was the means of this redemption, expressed in the last words, 'Through his blood,' to be understood per modum meriti; through his meritorious blood. 1 Cor. vi. 20: 'Ye are bought with a price,' that is, the price of blood. 1 Pet. i. 18, 19. 'Forasmuch as ‘ ye know that ye were not redeemed with ‘ corruptible things, as with silver and gold,

 ‘ from your vain conversations, but with the ‘ precious blood of Christ.’ Acts xx. 28.
 ‘ Which he hath purchased with his own blood.’

‘ We also heard the Doctor in Bradfield ‘ church, (about 1654, out of these words, Isa.
 ‘ xxxv. 6. ‘ In this mountain will the Lord of ‘ Hosts make a feast of fat things,’ &c.) speak ‘ thus; That one dish amongst the dainties of ‘ this feast, was the blood of Christ; which he ‘ opened, to be cleansing purging blood: 1 John
 ‘ i. 7. ‘ Having cleansed us from all our sins
 ‘ through his blood.’ And reconciling blood,
 ‘ Coloss. i. 20. ‘ Reconciled through his blood.’
 ‘ And pardoning blood, Coloss. i. 14. ‘ Through ‘ his blood, even the forgiveness of our sin.’

‘ And we have oft heard him in his ministry ‘ thus set forth the efficacy of the blood of ‘ Christ.’

‘ But you must know that this testimony
 ‘ would not be received, for they judged it inva‘ lid, though they received the accuser’s hearsay
 ‘ as evidence against me. Now whether this ‘ dealing was not more suitable to corrupted eth-‘ nicks, than to such professors of religion, let ‘ knowing persons judge.’

Art. 4. ‘ Pish! It is a poor thing to live ‘ upon the blood of Christ.’

Depos. Susannah Grip, wife of John Grip of Reading, joiner, sworn, deposeth, This depo-nent told Dr. Pordage, that it was a high thing to live upon the blood of Christ. To which he replied; To live upon the blood of Christ, that is a poor thing; and repeated the same again, and said, Thou art a habee, thou knowest nothing; to live upon the blood of Christ, that is a poor thing. Whereupon the deponent’s heart fell almost dead with fear at his words.
 And being asked by the Doctor, whether the same were delivered in the same very words?
 she answered, Yes, in the very same words.
 Being asked where? she replied in the kitchen:
 Being further asked when? she saith, four years since to the best of her remembrance; but who was then present, she doth not remember.
 And being asked by the Doctor, upon what occasion the same was spoken? she saith, the Doctor was speaking something in a rambling manner, which she did not understand: but she said, she thought would speak something to him, that he should understand and rejoice with her for it; and that was the occasion of the discourse; and that the Doctor’s words were without explanation. This deponent being ready to faint, said, What then, Doctor?
 He answered, I know not what the matter is, that I must speak to you; I do not use to discover myself: but he told her something of the man that died at Jerusalem, which she did not remember, being then so amazed.

The Doctor’s Answer to the eighth Article being read unto her, she saith, that all the circumstances mentioned in the said Answer, are all of them false and untrue.

Now as to this deposition, what is further to be added, to give the reader more light to judge of both the Article and Deposition, is this:

Not to speak any thing of the levity and rashness of this woman, which is well known to the inhabitants of Reading, and may make her testimony the less to be valued? she in her rash denial of the circumstances of my Answer, confidently spake a known untruth upon her oath, and so made herself guilty of open perjury.

Whereupon, when I came to make my defence to invalidate her testimony, I presented four witnesses, who were ready upon oath to prove her perjured.

The first of these was one Mr. Richard Stockwell, esteemed by all moderate persons that know him to be a sober and pious Christian.
 Although he was excepted against by Mr. Fowler the accuser, as an Erberist, as this subsequent deposition sheweth.

Mr. Fowler being sworn, as to his knowledge of Mr. Stockwell, deposeth, That he conceives the said Stockwell is an Erberist; because that when the deponent (being charged to be a slanderer of him) did offer to make a public recantation, and to confess himself to be a slanderer, in case the said Mr. Stockwell would deny the doctrine and opinion of Mr.
 Erbery, which he refused.

Notwithstanding which, the Commissioners would examine him, if the Doctor would ask him any material question; but do not think fit to examine him to their due or undue taking of Mrs. Grip’s examination which the Doctor insisteth on.

Now let the reader judge whether the question was not material, which this witness would have answered to by oath, viz. Whether Mrs.
 Grip did not aver on oath in open court, That she never railed against Mr. Fowler? To this one Mr. Tench was ready also to be sworn in the affirmative: there were also many others which heard it. And further, I had two more substantial witnesses, who offered to swear they had heard Mrs. Grip rail against Mr. Fowler in public meetings before many witnesses.
 Mrs. Eleanor Burleigh was willing to depose,
 That she heard Mrs. Grip say, That Mr. Fowler was a son of Belial, &c. and one Mrs. Kent would have attested, that she heard her rail against Mr. Fowler in the same and the like speeches, with much more. Now because the clerk had not taken that expression of hers, That she never railed against him, therefore the commissioners made it their pretence, of not examining the witnesses to it, as a thing impertinent; though by the attestation of that, with the testimony of the other two witnesses, she hath been proved directly perjured. But Mr.
 Fowler the accuser, being a great friend of the woman’s and seeing she was in danger to be proved perjured, and so an insufficient witness in all her testimonies, prevailed with the Court against the importunate, rational, and legal pleas of my counsel, to reject these fore-mentioned witnesses. The unjustness, palpable partiality and illegality of which action I leave to be weighed in the balance of equity by the impartial reader, who in justice may esteem this woman as really perjured, as though the witnesses had proved it, and value her testimony accordingly. And truly, some of the godly party at Reading hearing with what impudence and rashness she affirmed on oath she never railed against Mr. Fowler, confessed they could not but wonder at her, being it was so commonly known.

But to conclude, let the reader take notice, First, that this Article may be either true or false, according to the applying of it to particular persons. Secondly, That though it were taken in the worst sense, yet it were not within the act of scandal. Thirdly, That there was only one witness to it, to whose testimony what credit is to be given let the foregoing particulars declare. Fourthly, That I had witnesses ready to depose, That in the tenour of my ministry, I had often held forth Christ's blood to be of a cleansing, redeeming and justifying nature. Fifthly, That in my Answer to it, I have given the true ground and occasion of it.

Art. 5. 'Pish! there was no such thing as Persons in Trinity.'

Depos. The former Susannah Grip saith, That the Doctor came into her kitchen at another time, as she thinks from the committee, and said, That whereas ministers spake of Persons in Trinity, there is no such thing; "There are Three that bear record in heaven:" but there is no such thing as Persons in Trinity.—Note, in that Scripture, 1 John v. 7. should be added; and that in reference only to the terms.

Now my interrogatories to her upon this Article, were these; 1st, When I spake these words? She saith, When I came from the committee; which was two or three years since, or thereabouts. 2dly, Before whom? She answereth, Whether her maid, or any body else, or who was present she doth not remember. 3dly, Being further asked, whether this expression was delivered without any further limitation or explanation? She replies, Without any, as she remembers.

Now what I have more to add, to clear the truth in reference to this Deposition, is this:

First, I refer the reader to my Answer to this Article, in which you may see that I made a relation to this woman of what had passed before the committee, where some questions were proposed to me concerning the Holy Trinity. Secondly, I had a witness present to testify on oath, That what I said before the committee, was only this, That there was no such word as Persons in Trinity in that text, 1 John, v. 7, a relation of which I made to this woman, who, as it seems, mistaking my meaning, comes now four years after to accuse me; though at the very time she seemed to assent to what I spake, and made no exception against it; nor so much as asked me to explain myself for her satisfaction, though she had a very convenient opportunity. Thirdly, she is but a single witness, and her testimony not positive, she adding, 'as she remembers.' Fourthly, I desired the commissioners to hear what my avowed judgment was, from the testimony of some witnesses who were ready to depose what I had held forth in my public ministry, touching the Persons in the Holy Trinity. But the commissioners refused to examine the witnesses, whose evidence was this:

'We heard the Doctor in Bradfield church (about 1653, from these words, John, 1, 14, "The Word was made Flesh,") deliver himself thus: For the understanding of the person that was made flesh, you must consider the utterable mystery of the Holy Trinity; the Unity distinguishing itself into three persons, the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost: Mat. 28, 19. "Baptizing them in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost." 1 John, v. 7. "There are three that bear record in heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Ghost." Now which of these three Persons are made flesh? It is not the first Person, the Father, nor the third Person, the Holy Ghost; but it is to be understood of the Son, the second Person in the Trinity.

'We have also heard him out of these texts, Ezek. ix. 4, 5, 6. Psalm cx. 1. Mat. xxviii. 19. 1 John, v. 7, deliver in Bradfield church, the Distinctions of the Persons in the Trinity; as that the Father is not the Son, nor the Son the Holy Ghost, and the Holy Ghost neither the Father nor the Son, but each distinct.'

So much for this Article.

Art. 6. 'That it was a weakness to be troubled for sin.'

Depos. Mr. Benjamin Woodbridge, minister of Newbury, sworn and examined, deposeth, That Mr. William Twiss of Dorchester told the deponent, That Dr. Pordage maintained it to him, or spake in his company, That he was no Christian that could not commit the greatest sin, and not be troubled for the same; or words to that effect, to his best remembrance.

To this I replied before the Court.

I knew not the said Mr. Twiss, and to my knowledge I never saw his face. Being then engaged in the business of examining my witnesses, I said not much to the vindication of myself, as to this horrid imputation; the testimony being but a mere hear-say, and the deponent rendering it more invalid by these expressions, viz. "or words to that effect," and "to his best remembrance."

But I desire the reader here to take notice of the weakness or envy of Mr. Woodbridge, that he should thus with a hear-say only, which he himself did not exactly remember, thus endeavour to asperse me, and render me odious, when he saw there were so many horrid things laid to my charge before: But I believe he will one day be touched in his conscience for dealing thus with me; for the Lord knows I am innocent as to the acting or holding of what he saith.

'I therefore (for the satisfaction of the reader) solemnly protest in the presence of Al‘mighty God, that I never held any such opinion; for it is diametrically opposite to my principles; neither did I ever utter any such expressions as my judgment: and am confident, were that Mr. Twiss brought to my face, he durst not aver any such thing.’

To the seventh Article nothing is deposed, being contrived and reported abroad by the accuser, to draw an odium upon me, as you may see in my Answer to it.

Art. 8. ‘That he asserted he knew nothing to the contrary, but that a man might company with more than one woman, &c.’

Depos. Susannah Grip saith, she told the Doctor, That she heard it was reported of him, he should keep unlawful company with a woman in London, and asked him if it were true? To which the Doctor asked her, Who said so? the deponent replied, She would not tell him. Whereupon the Doctor smiled, and was not troubled, but denied it, saying, No: but he made her a further answer, That he did not disallow of any such thing, as she understood him. But what his express words were, she cannot now remember.

Note, This last clause makes all invalid, and shews her rashness in swearing, that I did not disallow of any such thing; being she hath forgotten my words, by which only she can judge of my sense.

And the Answer of the Doctor to this Particular being read to her, she thus replied: She doth not remember the Doctor uttered any such passages as are therein mentioned; to wit, That he should say, I am a man born to all manner of sufferings.

It was further read to her, that the deponent knew his life and conversation: This she could remember; and doth confess, she did then reply, she did not believe any such thing of him.

Being further asked by the Doctor, Whether this was expressed as his own judgment, or the judgment of some other? She thus replied; As far as she conceived, the Doctor did speak that passage of allowing that a man may have more than one woman, as his own judgment, not as another man’s.

Note, she did conceive amiss; for if ever I spake it, it was in reference to the Ranters, who then were much talked of: for such carnal principles are very much against my judgment, and questionless against the truth.

Being further asked, Where it was spoken? she saith, in the deponent’s own court. Being asked before whom? she answers, Nobody else was then present. Being asked when? she saith, It was about three or four years since.

But let the reader here take notice,

1. That this Article is not within the limits of the act. 2. That her testimony is not legal, in that it is single and not positive, she confessing that she had forgot the express words. 3. That this is against my avowed judgment; to prove which, besides my own assertions, I had present three witnesses, who were ready to depose, That I had often affirmed in conference, that although this principle was owned by the Ranters, yet it was much against my judgment, as you may further see in my Answer.

Art. 9. That he hath very frequent and familiar converse with angels.

Depos. Mr. Christopher Fowler of Reading, sworn and examined, deposeth, that about three weeks or a month since, he asked Mr. Daniel Blagrove the younger, whether he could not speak to the Doctor’s converse with angels? He answered (as far as the deponent remembers), he could speak much.

Mr. Fowler sworn again, and further examined, November 28, at the Bear in Reading, before the commissioners, deposeth, that about Michaelmas last, the deponent speaking with Mr. Daniel Blagrove the elder, concerning the visions of angels that were at his house, in reference to Mrs. Pindar: the deponent told him, he the said Mr. Blagrove was able to say much to the purpose, it being in his house: and desired him thereupon to speak his knowledge of the truth, both in point of conscience and reputation, being censured for supporting such a man as Dr. Pordage.

The said Mr. Blagrove answered, Why, the Doctor doth converse with angels; and I believe when he comes before the commissioners, he will not deny but he doth converse with angels.

The deponent thus replied to Mr. Blagrove, If the Doctor will confess them angels, we will prove them devils.

Note, how full of pride and rashness was this speech of Mr. Fowler’s, and how unsuitable to the Scriptures, and the law of charity! For there are two sorts of angels and spirits, good and evil, light and dark, holy and wicked, which are continually tending upon men in this world: the evil, to tempt and draw men into the same condemnation with themselves: the good, to guard and preserve them from the evil influences and malicious designs of the other. But doth not the accuser seem to forget, that the ministration of the holy angels still abides; who are ‘ministring spirits sent forth to minister for those who shall inherit salvation?’ Heb. i. 14. And the Psalmist says, ‘The angel of the Lord pitcheth his tent round about those that fear him.’ How then dare Mr. Fowler affirm, that if I confess I have communion with angels, they will prove them devils? How dare he thus limit the holy One of Israel, and shut up his favours within the narrow limits of his own conceptions and enjoyments? And why may not God, for the support and comfort of some precious saints, who in humility, self-denial and abstractedness of spirit, serve him day and night; I say, why may he not afford such a sweet and heavenly converse with the holy angels? What Scripture is there that speaks against it? Is it not suitable to what he afforded the patriarchs, prophets and apostles, and the primitive Christians? But if my accuser lives so much in his senses,

‘as to have no sense or knowledge of it, yet why should he thus rashly condemn others?’

But the accuser proceeds in his deposition:

And further, this deponent saith, That he hath credibly heard something tending to this purpose, that Dr. Pordage hath seen the vision of the said Mr. Blagrove, somewhat a bright vision.

But here I put in a question, which was this: Mr. Chairman, I do confess in my Answer, communion and converse with angels; but pray ask Mr. Fowler, what converse with angels Mr. Blagrove understood, visible or invisible?

To this the deponent further saith,

That the entrance of this discourse with Mr. Blagrove, was in reference to visions that were seen with a bodily eye; and mentioned the visions of Mrs. Pindar, that were by her reported to be such. Upon this, he understood Mr. Blagrove, that the purport of his Answer was a visible converse with angels.

And the deponent further saith, That he delivered a summons for Mr. Blagrove to attest these things in person, to Mr. Cook, one of the commissioners, who sent the deponent word by letter, that he had shewed the same to Mr. Blagrove, who hath notwithstanding refused to appear.

And further, he spake thus in open court against Mr. Blagrove, though the clerk did not take it, viz. I do verily believe, such a judge as he was in this case before, such a witness he would have been, were he now present: But I say, it was the plague of this county to have such a cursed committee.

Note, Mr. Fowler here asked me some questions to ensnare me, as, whether I had not seen the vision of Mr. Daniel Blagrove? To which I answered, To this profound question I will answer when I see it attested upon oath. And further asking me concerning converse with angels; the clerk took this answer:

The Doctor doth confess that he hath daily converse with angels: But he desires Mr. Fowler to declare what converse with angels Mr. Blagrove did inform that the said Doctor had.

The Doctor doth further say, that he heard it credibly reported, that he hath every day two angels dressing of him: to which he added, that they that reported it to him, said they had it from the mouths of two godly ministers, that would not lye, viz. Mr. Fowler and Mr. Ford.

Note, I brought in this story to shew the vanity and invalidity of such proofs as the accuser had before produced, as that he had credibly heard somewhat to that purpose, that I had seen the vision of Mr. Blagrove. And, for all the accuser knows, that which he heard so credibly reported might be as great an untruth as that which I heard reported of myself, as coming from him and his brother Ford, whose function seems very unsuitable to that of lying and slandering.

Afterward Mr. Fowler asked me again, whether I had seen the vision of Mr. Daniel Blagrove? I answered, as long as it is attested only upon report, I would not answer to it.

VOL. V.

Art. 10, 11, 12, 13. Concerning the apparitions of spirits, and of a great dragon.

Here I must intreat the reader seriously to weigh the following Depositions, from which my enemies have charged me to be a conjuror and a sorcerer; that so it may be seen, whether they have any better ground thus to esteem me, than they have to esteem Job, who was terrified through visions; and Christ who was tempted by voice and vision in the wilderness; and John, who in visions saw a great red dragon, and terrible locusts go forth of the bottomless pit, and three unclean frogs, the spirits of devils, going forth to deceive the world; I say, than they have to esteem these conjurors and necromancers for such sights.

But now to the Depositions:

Depos. Susannah Grip, wife of John Grip, of Reading, sworn and examined, deposeth, that the Doctor told her, that a great many spirits hovered about his window, and kept a noise; but the Doctor said, he told the company there should come in but one at a time; and that a dragon did come in with a long tail, and great eyes and fangs, and did spit fire at him.

And this witness further saith, that his angel stood by him in his own shape, in the same cloaths, band, and cuffs, and did protect him.

Note, Where this woman speaks truth, I shall not contradict her: But where she mistakes, I must inform the reader of the truth, and shew that she rashly swears untruths. This then I told her, that I had an angel of God that stood by me, assisted me, comforted me, and protected me, when that dreadful apparition was before me; and that the dragon was then over-come.

And I further told her that the angel or spirit of one Everard appeared in his own shape, cloaths, band, and cuffs, &c. Which compared with Mrs. Grip's deposition, shews her mistake. This Everard I suspected to be a conjuror, and to be instrumental in the raising of those apparitions; though I was not so sure of it as to prosecute him, or to swear he caused them: for the devil may take up any one's shape by God's permission, as it is generally thought he did Samuel's.

Further this deponent saith, that the Doctor likewise told her, that Mrs. Pordage and Mrs. Flavel had their angels standing by them; and that he overcame the dragon; and that he said the children saw the spirits, and said, look there, Father! Being not afraid, after they had fasted and prayed. And that the Doctor further said, that the spirits did afterward come into their chambers, and drew the curtains, and looked on them; but they would not take notice of them: And that the spirits did come about three days after he had fasted and prayed, and flashed open the curtains, and looked upon them.

' Note, For three weeks or a month there were very many, and very strange apparitions; but the curtains were never drawn but once, and that was by a spirit in the shape of Eve-rard. For some other particulars of this deposition, I do not remember whether I spake them or not.'

Depos. The Doctor being asked by Mr. Fowler, what he saith concerning the apparition of the dragon? the Doctor doth confess before the commissioners, that he hath seen very many dreadful apparitions of devils at his house; and that some of his family did see them; and that a dragon did come into his house with a long tail and great teeth: but that he said his angel did protect him, he denies. But he further saith, that about four years since he had apparitions both of good and bad angels, for three weeks together, at his own house: but from that time to this, they have ceased in that manner.

Being further asked by Mr. Fowler, the Doctor doth deny, that ever any angel appeared in his cloaths, band, and cuffs; and further saith, that his angel never did appear to him in any visible shape.

And being asked, whether he ever saw Mrs. Pordage's and Mrs. Flavel's angels standing by them? He answereth, he never saw them standing by them; but it doth not therefore follow that they might not stand by them: and though he can, yet he will not answer to any questions, but such as concern himself immediately.

And being further asked by Mr. Fowler, whether he did not relate to Mrs. Grip, that Mrs. Flavel and Mrs. Pordage had their angels standing by them? He answereth, he can neither affirm nor deny it; for he doth not remember whether he did, or no.

And being further asked by Mr. Fowler, whether he did not relate to the said Mrs. Grip that his children saw the spirits come into his house, and cried, Look there, father! And that the spirits did often come into his chamber, and drew the curtains when they were in bed?

To the first part of the question he answereth, he cannot affirm or deny it; for in truth he doth not remember whether he did, or no. To the second part of the question he saith, he doth deny it positively; and will prove the deposition to be perjury.

And the Doctor being farther asked, whether or no he knows that the children did see the spirits come up and down the house, or no, and whether they thereupon did say, Look there father!

To the first part of this question, he saith, he cannot know what the eyes of children do see; and otherwise he will not answer. And to the other part of the question, he answers, he cannot remember whether the children did say so, or no; and therefore will neither affirm nor deny it.

2nd Witness. Susannah Grip, daughter of the aforesaid John Grip, aged 21 years, sworn and examined, deposeth:

That about three or four years since, in her mother's kitchen she heard Dr. Pordage say, that a dragon came into his chamber, and that he expostulated and contended with it; and that he said the dragon did spit fire at him; and that his angel did appear to him in the shape of a man, with his band, and his clothes, and bandstrings, and did support him while he contended with the dragon. The deponent further saith, that she heard the Doctor say, that the spirits did come into his chamber, and drew the curtains, and looked upon him; and that the Doctor likewise said they were affrighted at it at first, but afterward, when they were used to it, they were not.

She saith she heard several other things to this purpose, which she cannot now remember to depose.

And being asked by the Doctor, whether the Doctor said that the angel that appeared with the band and band-strings, was the Doctor's own angel, or the angel of some other? She saith, to her best remembrance, he said it was his own angel.

3d Witness. Elizabeth Benwell, servant to Mr. Ellis of Shinfield, and formerly servant to the Doctor, sworn and examined, deposeth:

That she saw something like a star in the red chamber in the Doctor's house by the bed's leg: it was light, and somewhat like a star; but the deponent cannot say it was a star. Yet it was in the night, and no other light in the room, to the best of her remembrance.

She further saith, that she hath heard music at several times at the Doctor's house, when she did not know that any instruments or musicians were in the said house. She saith she hath heard it in the kitchen, and in her mistress's closet; did apprehend the same to be near her, but saw none playing.

She further saith that Mrs. Flavel did usually lie in the Doctor's bed-chamber during the time the deponent was servant there, which was about a year and a quarter.

But immediately to this the maid added, But I never lived in such a family for piety and holiness, as that was; and I believe never shall again, except I return thither.

But this, by the clerk's knavery, was left out, although I stood by, and asked him why he did not write down those words. To which he replied, If you will have me, I must. I said, I will have it. Yet he neglected it; and I believe by the command of some of the court, who were troubled at any thing that seemed to make for me: but what unjustness this was, let the reader judge.

' But from these preceding apparitions of spirits in my family, in which we were merely passive, and by which we were excited the more to wait upon God in prayer and fasting my enemies have scandalized me for conjuration and sorcery, reporting so confidently that I am a conjurer, that many who are not acquainted with my principles and conversation, believe it so in earnest. But these horrid scandals I take up as my cross, and ‘see myself in them conformable to Christ’s sufferings, who was reckoned amongst conjurers and transgressors by the Jewish Zealots.

‘But the Lord hath given me peace in my conscience, whilst my enemies have railed against me in their pulpits, as Mr. Ford in his Sermon at the assizes held at Reading, Feb. 28, 1653. In which, page 22, he saith, that there is one of the most eminent church-livings in the county possessed by a blasphemer, and in whose house the devil is as visibly familiar, as any of the family; and shall the horns of these beasts never be pared off by the civil magistrate?

‘Here you see he endeavours to brand me for a conjurer, and calls me blasphemous, exciting the magistrate to prosecute me. And this was he who was chosen by the commissioners to make a speech in the court before they gave Sentence against me, who there by envious prevarication shewed himself a second Tertullus, though no orator.’

Art. 14. That Mrs. Margaret Pindar, acquainted with this doctrine of spirits, and pretending to be converted by visions of angels, doth think she was bewitched by them of Bradfield, &c.

Depos. Mr. Christopher Fowler, sworn to this Article, and examined, saith, that Mrs. Pindar, being asked by him, did acknowledge on Thursday last, at London, that at Mr. Blaggrave’s house, at Southcot, she heard a great noise of drums and trumpets; which Dr. Pordage (who was then sent for to her) told her was the alarm to the spiritual war. And that one night she had the vision of young Mr. Daniel Blaggrave come to her bed-side, and she took him by the hand, which hand felt cold; which Dr. Pordage expounded to her thus: that the coldness of his hand signified that he began to be cold to vanity. And that she asked the Doctor what the visions meant; and he replied to her, We do not use to reveal one another’s visions.

The Deposition taken on my behalf was this that follows:

Mrs. Elizabeth Blaggrave, wife of Mr. Daniel Blaggrave, sworn and examined: This deponent saith, she never heard Mrs. Pindar say that she was bewitched by them of Bradfield; but the said Mrs. Pindar told the deponent that her visions were from God; and that the said Mrs. Pindar told the deponent she never spake with the Doctor in her life.

This deponent further saith, that Mrs. Pindar told her she had been at Mr. Fowler’s house; and that Mr. Fowler examined her touching her visions, and the deponent asked her what she said: to which she replied, she was sure she had said nothing to him that could hurt the Doctor. Hereupon the deponent asked her if she told Mr. Fowler that the Doctor did send these visions? To which she answered, She could not say the Doctor sent them, for a world.

This deponent further saith, that Mr. Pindar told the deponent that his wife said, when she came to London, she would not say what she had said to Mr. Fowler, if it were to do again; for she perceived it was a snare, or a trap.

This deponent further saith; she was by when the question concerning the coldness of young Mr. Blaggrave’s hand was put; and the deponent asked it herself to one in the room: and the answer was, that the coldness of his hand, as far as they knew, signified his dying to vanity; which was delivered in a jesting manner. Which answer was not delivered by the Doctor. And the deponent saith, the Doctor never gave such an answer in his life, as she knows.

Here follow the Depositions of John Grip of Reading, joiner; who being sworn and examined, deposeth:

That he was at Mr. Blaggrave’s when Mrs. Pindar saw the visions that are mentioned in her confession; and that she said she saw a man in white, (as she thought) with the Lamb’s book; and that the said man told her her name was written in the book; and that she heard a watch going, and that there appeared another in the likeness of a black man, with a knife, which he offered unto her.

And this deponent further saith, that at another time, at the deponent’s house, the said Mrs. Pindar did inform the deponent that Dr. Pordage had said he had power to bestow the gifts and graces of the spirit on whom he pleased.

Note, That this disagreeeth from Mrs. Pindar’s confession, under the head of the 14th Article, where she saith that she heard it reported at Southcot, That ere long the Doctor should have power—to bestow saving graces on whom he pleased.

And this deponent further saith, that another time he was at Mr. Blaggrave’s house, when the said Mr. Blaggrave was ill, and kept his chamber; and Mr. Blaggrave and the deponent fell into discourse concerning Dr. Pordage in presence of Mrs. Blaggrave; that in the said discourse Mr. Blaggrave said to his wife, that the Doctor held strange opinions, such as were not agreeable to the word of God: for he did maintain that Jesus Christ was not God; and that he was a Type, and but a Type; man, and not God; a shadow, and not the substance. And Mr. Blaggrave did labour very much to take off his wife’s affections from the Doctor and his ways; but could not prevail. This was about three quarters of a year since, to the deponent’s best remembrance.

In reference to these two last particulars, touching Mr. Blaggrave and his wife, consider this following Deposition and Evidence.

Mrs. Blaggrave, sworn and examined, deposeth, that she never knew any thing of the Doctor’s judgment; neither did he ever bring the deponent into any judgment; and that she had never any discourse with the Doctor, till she did first begin with him; and that if ever he had confirmed her in any thing, it was in nothing disagreeable to the word of God.

As to that part of the former Depositions, which concerns Mr. Blagrave's relation of what opinions I held, I had a summons for his personal appearance to witness the truth in that particular: but he being detained in London by earnest business, could not appear according to the summons, and therefore wrote this following Letter to the commissioners, which was exactly copied out by a friend of mine, who had the favour from Mr. Blagrave to read it.

"Gentlemen; Understanding by this bearer, Mr. Samuel Pordage, that one John Grip of Reading, upon his examination against Dr. Pordage, did affirm upon oath, that having discourse with me lately touching the Doctor's opinions, I should say that he denied that Christ was God, and that he held him to be a man, and not God; a type, and but a type; a shadow, and not the substance; the things are highly blasphemous, if true. But this I assure you, if ever any such language fell from me, (which truly I do not remember) it was spoken as relating to that charge he lay under at that time, raised by some who seem to know men's meanings and opinions better than I do. In short, this I do affirm, and shall readily attest upon oath, when required, That the Doctor hath several times most solemnly avowed the contrary; and to me by scripture, under his own hand, evinced it; for the truth is, I have with much boldness charged the Doctor with things of that nature, having received them upon report. But upon debate he hath given me such clear satisfaction, both touching the divinity of Christ, and other matters of faith of the highest concernment, that I have stood silent, having nothing to object against him. I did therefore apprehend it a duty incumbent upon me thus to write; for as I will never be instrumental to clear him in what he is guilty, so not to condemn him wherein I believe he is innocent.

"Thus, desiring the just and all-knowing God to direct you in this great work, I remain, Gentlemen, your friend and servant, DAN. BLA-GRAVE. Novemb. 28, 1654. Westminster."

I desired that this Letter might have been read in the open court: but they denied it, though I alledged that it was evidence on my behalf. But whether this was not more considerable, and so more fit openly to be read, than Mr. Grip's stories and hearsays to be openly received as evidence, let the reader judge.

But Mr. Grip further on oath deposeth, that at other times he hath often had conference with Mr. Blagrave. And at one time, above the rest, walking over the fields towards Southcot, we fell into discourse concerning Dr. Pordage; and the said Mr. Blagrave did then tell him that the Doctor did go about to persuade him to leave off all employment, and to sell his estate, and retire to his house; for his house was the Ark, as Noah's Ark was, to receive all those that must be saved. This was some time the last summer. And that Mr. Blagrave did seem very much to slight and scorn it, and asked the deponent what he thought he should have got by it, had the Doctor prevailed. To which the deponent replied, that he thought the Doctor had a grand design in it: for Mr. Blagrave being taken notice of to be one of the wisest men in the county, if the Doctor had prevailed to draw him away, he might likewise have drawn away most of the county; and then the Doctor would have set himself up like a Mahomet.

In opposition to this story, Mrs. Blagrave, sworn and examined, deposeth, That she had heard a muttering that Mr. Grip should say that the Doctor had persuaded Mr. Blagrave to leave all, and come and live with him. Whereupon the deponent asked Mr. Blagrave, about five or six weeks since, concerning it; and the said Mr. Blagrave answered to the deponent, that he did not remember that the Doctor ever said any such thing.

This deponent, John Grip, further saith, that Mr. Daniel Blagrave the younger told him, when the spirit came upon the Doctor, he could leap over pales of a great height, about five foot and a half high, as the deponent could conceive by his relation; and that this was told him within five months last past.

This deponent further saith, that Mr. Charles Blagrave told him some time the last summer, that Dr. Pordage should say that Christ was not perfect; and that he quoted that place of Scripture, mentioning our Saviour's passion, when he cried out, My God, my God, &c. to prove the same.

Art. 28, 29. Concerning Mrs. Mary Pocock's relation to Mrs. Forster, of what was acted in my house; and of Mrs. Flavel's being in a trance, and seeing what was the philosopher's stone.

The Depositions of Mrs. Mary Pocock, taken at the Bear in Speenhamland, November 30, before the Commissioners, for the proof of the two former Articles.

Mrs. Pocock, sworn and examined, deposeth: the question being asked, Whether the deponent did not tell Mrs. Forster and Mrs. Evelyn, that the Doctor had contended with the dark Power in his shirt two or three hours? she answereth, It is so long since that she cannot remember any thing positive she then said: but she saith there was some great Power then amongst the Doctor's family.

And being asked, whether she did not say to the aforesaid parties, That when the Doctor contended with the dark power, there was such an expostulation between them, as, Thou lyest; and thou lyest, &c. she answereth, she cannot tell.

And being further asked, Whether upon this conquest of the dark power by the Doctor, she did not tell the aforesaid parties she should think the Doctor to be a bright man? To this question she answereth, If she did not say so, she hopes she shall, when he hath the victory.

And being asked, whether she did not tell the aforesaid parties, the Doctor's family were strangely acted, some in their legs, thighs, and arms? To this she answereth, she cannot tell.

And being further asked, whether she did tell the said parties, that Mrs. Flavel did see in a trance the philosopher's stone? She saith, she cannot tell.

And being further asked, whether the philosopher's stone, seen by Mrs. Flavel in a trance, were not the Divinity in the Humanity? she answereth, she knows no such thing.

Art. 30. This consists of seven particulars, being the first that relates to scandal in my conversation.

Depos. Roger Laughton of Heston in the county of Middlesex, locksmith, sworn and examined, deposeth:

That about nine years since, or upwards, Dr. Pordage brought to the deponent's house Mrs. Flavel behind him under the name of Mrs. Fruin; and that both the Doctor and the said Mrs. Flavel did ask for entertainment for her; and that they did ask what they should give for her board, and her son Stephen's: and that they did bargain for eight shillings a week, and then he carried her away; and she came not till after Christmas. But he saith, how she then came, whether in a cart, with her trunk and clothes, or otherwise, he knoweth not: but the Doctor did not then come with her. And after she had been there a while, the deponent's wife conceived she was with child; which she denied, saying it was a Tympany. And that she remained there till betwixt Easter and Whitsuntide, where and when she was brought to bed of a daughter; and she did not desire any store of company to come to her labour, though the deponent's wife did desire it. And after she had been a short time delivered, the Doctor came and baptised the child in the deponent's chamber, and named it Hannah. And after that the Doctor called the deponent aside into his orchard, and prayed him to find out a private place, two or three miles from the deponent's house, where the said Mrs. Flavel might come now and then to see her child. The deponent said it would be inconvenient, because it was a time of soldiers, and the corn was high; and thereupon the deponent did not look out as he desired. And he further saith, when the nurse did bring the child oft-times to see the said Mrs. Flavel, she would not permit her son Stephen to call her sister, saying, Stephen, it is nurse's child. Afterwards the said Mrs. Flavel departed from the deponent's house to Kensington, where she remained about a month. And that the deponent having occasion to go to London, called at Kensington by the way, to speak with her; but she was gone: whereupon the deponent said her child was not well. Then two gentlewomen of the house told the deponent, that she denied unto them that she had any other child but her son Stephen. And the deponent further saith, that the Doctor came to the deponent's house three or four times, in term-time only: And that both the Doctor and the said Mrs. Flavel did inform the deponent that she was married to one Mr. Fruin, a minister; but was now a widow, as both of them said when they came to the deponent's house.

For the clearing of truth, in reference to this deposition, I shall here annex the Confession of the same person, as subscribed by him, and owned before two sufficient witnesses; which is as follows:

That about nine years ago Dr. Pordage brought a gentlewoman, by name Mrs. Fruin, behind him from London, as he said, to one Roger Laughton's house, a smith in Heston parish; that the said Mrs. Fruin agreed with him herself for her boarding.

That she told his wife, at her first coming, she knew not certainly whether she were with child, or not; but thought she was.

That her first husband's name was Mr. Flavel; and that she had had a second husband, by name Mr. Fruin, who also was then dead.

That the cause of her private living there, was in that her brother-in-law threatened he would have her body, if it were above ground, she being then in law with him.

That at the same time the Doctor owned that he dwelt at Reading; and that he was minister of St. Lawrence church; and that he knew the gentlewoman to be sober and godly.

That she told him, for his security, he might enquire at the Bulwark by the Tower of London; where he might know that she had there an estate in houses.

That after she had been in the said Roger Laughton's house about four months, she was brought to-bed of a girl, which was christened by the said Doctor, and named Hannah. That the time of her continuance with him was about three quarters of a year; in which time the said Doctor visited her some three times, or four at the most, and that in term-time, when he went to London.

That by enquiry he came to know she was in great troubles at law.

That the said Doctor never agreed with him, nor paid him for her board, nor removed her, so far as he knows, to Kensington from his house.

R. L.

This was delivered in to the Court after Laughton had finished his deposition: but they would not suffer it to be enrolled among the depositions, it in some particulars crossing Laughton's present testimony, and in others, tending to clear the truth, in reference to the occasion of Mrs. Flavel's being there. But the accuser asking him whether he would not stand to his present deposition? he said, Yea. Whereupon the Clerk returning me the paper again, wrote this at the bottom of it, "Mr. Laughton acknowledgeth the two letters R. L. to be his writing; but will stick to what he hath now deposed."

"There was not a word altered after he had subscribed the paper, as two witnesses then present could attest by oath. Now the particulars in which he crosseth himself, cannot be all true. And if a man will solemnly own and subscribe an untruth, he may after swear an untruth: But the Confession he wrote last is much to be regarded, being he owned and subscribed it before the other, being then in a calm, sober posture; but the other he deposed after my adversaries had been a whole day tampering with him at the Bear in Reading, and possessing him with prejudice against me; which he openly shewed in the court by bitter expressions, and by those circumstances in the former deposition, which tend to blast the gentlewoman's good name and reputation.

"But for further satisfaction, 1. I refer you to my Answer; in which I have largely shewed the reasons of her private retirement there, which may in justice clear me from that undeserved aspersion my enemies have cast upon me.

"2. Consider that this, as to me, is no legal proof of any crime, but a mere circumstantial thing, brought to raise suspicions and prejudices against me, being but of the nature of a libel, and so unfit to have been received into a judicial court: for whose name and reputation may not be blasted, if such libellous illegal things, so long past, should be received into courts of judicature as accusations to condemn them?

"Though that crime, which my accuser would render me suspected for by this circumstantial deposition, had been ever so clearly proved, yet the date of it (being nine or ten years since) had put it quite out of the cognizance of the commissioners, not only by the Act of General Pardon, but also by another law, made particularly by the parliament in reference to things of this nature, which takes away all legal guilt from any persons that are not accused within a year after the commission of any such crime; besides, the act to which the commissioners are confined, as their rule to judge of scandal, was made many years since. Therefore, I say, they neither had nor have power to take a business so long past, though otherwise ever so criminal, into their cognizance.

"But notwithstanding these things, the commissioners sent a summons for Mrs. Flavel, though they had no positive charge against her; and after her appearance, would have forced an oath upon her, and examined her to questions concerning herself. But she, as in justice she might, refused to answer them, alledging, That if any one durst lay any positive crime to her charge, she would answer by the mouth of her lawyer. Whereupon the commissioners threatened to send her immediately to prison, though they durst positively accuse her of nothing."

Art. 33. 'That he is a very ignorant and insufficient man for the work of the ministry.'

George Hastlett, of Bradfield, weaver, sworn and examined, deponeth, That he heard Dr.

Pordage in a sermon, in the church of Bradfield, about two years since, deliver, That it was a vain thing to trust in the blood of him that died at Jerusalem 1600 years since, or more, unless it were acted in me, or in thee; for that was but in the type, the substance must be fulfilled in us: And that Christ must be crucified in us, we must have the Jews and Pilate to put him to death in us; otherwise it was a vain thing to believe in him that died at Jerusalem 1600 years since without us.

"Note. As I own and embrace the historical birth, life, death, and resurrection of Christ without us, with the blessed effects of them, clearly held forth in the gospel; so do I also believe the mystical birth, death, and resurrection of Christ in us, according to the scriptures, Matt. xii. 50. Gal. ili. 1. Ephes. ii. 5.

"And to say that both these are necessary to be known, at least experimentally enjoyed by all that will be saved; and that it is vain to depend upon the first, without some sense and feeling of the last, as it is to depend upon a notional justification without a real sanctification: I say, to aver this, is not against, nay, altogether according to the holy scriptures; 'For we know that Christ Jesus is in us, except we be reprobates.' And if we have not his spirit, we are none of his."

This deponent further saith, That the said Doctor, about a month since, in Bradfield church, did deliver, That doubtless the apostles by that text, 'Know you not that your bodies are the temple of the Holy Ghost?' did not mean these earthly bodies.

"Note. I never denied our elemental bodies to be the mediate temples of the Holy Ghost, but the immediate: For the immediate temple of the Spirit is the image of God in us, which is renewed in righteousness and true holiness, and may truly be called the body of righteousness and life, in opposition to that body of sin and death, Rom. vii. 24, which hath many members, Coloss. iii. 5, being the evil corrupt inclinations and habits of the old man. This inward body, which is the immediate temple of the Spirit, is called, Rev. xvi. 15, our garments, which we are exhorted there to keep, lest we walk naked; and the armour of light, Rom. xiii. 12, which we are there commanded to put on, in opposition to the works of darkness, which we are to cast off. This may also be called our pure flesh, in opposition to that sinful flesh spoken of, Rom. vii. 18. And as in the last there dwells no good thing, so in the first nothing but good, being it is the immediate tabernacle of the Holy Ghost, Joel ii. 28. 'I will pour out my spirit upon all flesh.'"

And this deponent further saith, The Doctor did deliver, that by the text (Gen. xviii. 19, 'I know him, that he will command his children and his household after him,' &c.) was not meant the outward household of Abraham, but his inward household, his will and affections, which he was lord paramount over; and he quoted that text in the last of Joshua, 'As for me and my house, we will serve the Lord,' which he likewise said was the inward house, and not the outward. This was about two years since, as far as this deponent can remember. And the deponent saith, He judged the same contrary to the mind of the Holy Ghost.

"Note, Had the commissioners allowed me so much time as to have brought in what evidence I could against this man's deposition, I should have proved, that in the tenour of my ministry I never denied or rejected the historical or literal sense of the scriptures, for which there can be no just ground; but that I have usually joined the literal and allegorical interpretation together, even as Paul doth, Gal. iv. 24, 25, 26. which sweetly united, cannot but make an amiable harmony. And the deponent mistakes, in saying I excluded the history; for I had before opened it in the plain historical sense, and afterwards came to open it mystically, in making a spiritually moral use of those scriptures, in applying them to the work of God upon the inward man.

"Let the reader further know, that the commissioners could not in justice take this as evidence against me, because it was all brought the very day of my Sentence, I having no time allowed me to make my Defence by the testimonies of some others that constantly hear me, who might have certified this deponent's mistakes, in misrepresenting both my words and meaning, by shewing I excluded not the literal meaning of the texts produced. 2. In regard I objected against him as a drunkard, and so an insufficient witness. 3. In that there was no concurrent testimony. 4. In that he wrote not this down, and so could not exactly deliver so much word for word, as I spake it, especially so long after some part of it was delivered, and so by a little mistake might prevaricate my sense and meaning."

This deponent further saith, That Goodwife Knap told him about a month since, that she being at the Doctor's house, Mrs. Flavel was very angry with her, and threatened to have her whipt, for saying the child Hannah was Mrs. Flavel's child; and that she then denied she had any other child except Stephen her son. And that when the said Goodwife Knap denied she had said any such thing, and began to be outrageous, both old and young Mrs. Pordage desired her to be pacified, saying, happily it might be another woman might speak so.

"Note, The woman here mentioned hath under her hand, before witness, denied what the deponent here relates of her; so that either the deponent is perjured, or this woman ashamed to stand to so gross an untruth, as the deponent pretends she related to him. But the Sentence being given the day in which this deposition was taken, I had not time to bring this woman face to face, to the deponent, so to see where the guilt of perjury, or a lying slander lay. Though as to the strength of this testimony, there was no such thing necessary, it being a mere hear-say."

Art. 34. The Testimony of Richard Sawood, who was neither sworn nor examined in public Court.

I came into Bradfield Parsonage in the evening Sept. 9, 1650, and there I heard a very mournful cry, as if it had been one in extreme pains; but who it was, I knew not, for it continued all the time I was at the door, which was well near a quarter of an hour; and so it continued when I went away. And then on the tenth day in the morning I came to Mr. Francis Pordage, at the Parsonage of Stanford-Dingley, and he enquired of me, what I did think of the noise that I heard? I told him, I could not tell. Then he related to me, that the Lord was about a great work in this kingdom, and to this nation. And the cause of this cry was one in travail, and the pains were so extreme, that had I staid there but a little longer, I might have heard it as far as the town; but now she was delivered of a man-child, and the travail was at an end, and that he and others were witnesses of it.

Mr. Pordage, Minister of Stanford Dingley, sworn and examined to the former Deposition of Richard Sawood.

This deponent being asked; Who it was that was in travail of the child in the said deposition mentioned, and what became of it? To this question he answereth, that it was one Mrs. Flavel. And he further saith, that above four years since, Mrs. Flavel was very earnest in prayer, on a day when they were fasting; which was at the time when one Sawood came to the door: the said Sawood knocking, the deponent went to the door to him. And he saith, he doth acknowledge that Richard Sawood did come to him (about the time mentioned in the examination of the said Sawood) to the Parsonage of Stanford; and he saith, it is probable he did ask the said Sawood, what he did think of the noise he heard in the Doctor's house the day before? And that when the said Sawood answered to this foregoing question he could not tell, it is very probable the deponent did relate to him, that the Lord was doing a great work in this kingdom, and to this nation; and doth confess, that unadvisedly he told the said Sawood, that the cause of the foresaid cry was one in travail; but doth not remember he spake any such thing, as that the pains were so extreme, as that, had he staid longer, he might have heard it as far as the town: but doth confess, that he said she was in travail of a man-child, and that he and many others were eye-witnesses of it.

And being asked who it was that was in travail? he answered, Mrs. Flavel. And being further asked, what became of this man-child? he answereth, It was the birth, death, and resurrection of Christ, in her nature. And being asked, How the birth, death, and resurrection of Christ in the nature of Mrs. Flavel was so great a work that God was doing to this nation? he answereth, he never said any such thing. And being further asked, whether himself (being demanded what this man-child was) did not answer, The child of reformation? to this he answereth negatively.

He further saith, That this travail of a man-child was not any natural birth of a child out of the womb; but the cry that was then made was nothing else but the groanings and intercessions of the spirit in her prayer.

"Note, This last part is the real truth of the business, which I could have proved by many witnesses more, who were present in my house at the time, and whom I had ready before the court, to attest upon oath, that there was no natural travail, nor any natural birth, nor any such child born; but only the gentlewoman was then very earnest in prayer. But this was thought superfluous, being that the deponent Mr. Pordage, from the mistake of whose discourse this came to be made an Article against me, cleared the business himself by oath. But how my name hath suffered from this groundless business, is known very well, both to my friends and enemies; some of which, as the accuser Mr. Fowler for one, in open court, scoffed at me, threatening to prove great things against me from this deposition of Sawood's."

To the 35th and 37th Articles:

Mr. John Tickle of Abingdon, sworn again, and further examined, deposeth, That a summons being issued for the appearance of Susanna Day, the messenger went for her, and met with her on Tuesday night last, being the 5th instant, at the deponent's house, and that she was willing to come, and could not in regard of her distemper at present: but the said Susanna having reported to several people in Abingdon, and particularly to the deponent's wife, that she was at Dr. Pordage's house, and that the people there told her her eyes were opened, and she said she saw at that time the New Jerusalem to come down from heaven all of precious stones, and so on, according as in the Article.

The said Susanna told the deponent on the said Tuesday night, That the last time she was at the Doctor's house, she saw the New Jerusalem to come down from heaven, a city four-square, with borders and precious stones. And being asked, whether it was not her fancy only? she answered, she saw it really.

The deponent saith, That he asked the said Susanna, whether she saw any angels in the Doctor's house? To which she answered, No. But she said the Doctor's daughter did see two angels holding a golden crown over her head.

Thus have I finished this last Charge of Articles, being in number 37. Of these, 21 were passed by without any depositions brought to prove them; and of those Articles to which somewhat was said to prove them, most part was attested but by hearsays and reports from others; as the depositions of Mr. Fowler the accuser, of Mr. Woodbridge, Mr. Tickle, and John Grip clearly shew; which cannot be accounted so much as concurrent testimonies, being they are not any way testimonies in law. The rest were attested but by a single witness (except those of visions and apparitions, which I acknowledged myself, and which are no way criminalous, nor under the cognizance of those Commissioners), viz. Mrs. Grip, who in her testimony is not wholly positive, though she did swear very desperately to two or three of the Articles; the particulars of which are no way included in the act of scandalous opinions, as to their nature or time: for as to the last, I was so far from being accused within six months after the pretended speaking those words, as it was four years before they were alledged against me. Besides, this woman speaking an untruth upon oath, was really perjured, and had been so proved, had I had just dealings from the Commissioners; whence in equity her testimony is to be accounted invalid, as in law it might have been, had my witnesses been but examined, who were ready to prove it.

Now as to that Article of Ignorance and Insufficiency, I have before shewed, That the depositions of George Hastlet, brought to prove it, cannot in justice and equity weigh any thing to condemn me, for the reasons before expressed.

And now let the reader consider, whether Mr. Fowler was not very rash to proclaim in the open Court at Newbury, That if he did not prove the greatest part of these Articles, he would be accounted a slanderer. Which title, whether he deserves or not, I leave to the judgment of the judicious reader.

But to proceed: The depositions on both sides being ended, I presented into the hands of Mr. Dunch the Chairman, this following Protestation, to be read publicly before the Court and the people; but they privately consulting of it, would not suffer it openly to be read, but suppressed it, as before they did Mr. Blagrove's letter.

My Protestation was this:

I, John Pordage, do solemnly avow and protest, before the all-seeing eye of Almighty God, That I do maintain, hold; and embrace these following principles of Divine truth, as my real and avowed judgment.

1. That there is a Trinity of persons in the Unity of the Divine essence, viz. The Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, distinct from each other.
2. That Christ is God, co-eternal, co-essential, and co-equal with the Father, and therefore Jehovah.
3. That Christ is a perfect Saviour and Redemer of his Church, and so more than a Type.
4. That Christ's righteousness is a most holy, pure, spotless, complete, and perfect righteousness for the satisfaction of lost sinners.
5. That the blood of Christ is not only redeeming and ransoming, in reference to hell and damnation, but also purchasing in reference to salvation, as having purchased an open gate and way to glorification and life eternal for purified saints.
6. That all arts of necromancy, and black magic, all compacts with evil spirits, whether explicit or implicit, direct or indirect, are unlawful, being against the holy Scriptures, and never looked into or practised by me; but, on the contrary, abominated, even as they are to be detested and abhorred, not only by all Christians, but by all mankind. 7. That Polygamy, and all such practices that tend to the indulging of the flesh, are contrary to the mind of God, and not to be owned by Christians.

I do moreover disown and reject these subsequent positions, which are contrary to the former principles.

1. As to maintain that there is no such thing as persons in the Holy Trinity. 2. That Christ is not God; that Christ is not Jehovah. 3. That Christ was not perfect, and that he is no more than a Type. 4. That Christ's righteousness is a poor, vain, empty, and sapless righteousness. 5. That the blood of Christ is not meriting and redeeming blood, or that it is a poor thing to live upon the blood of Christ. 6. That it is lawful to have communion with evil spirits, or any compact with them, explicit or implicit. 7. That it is lawful for a man to keep company with more women than one.

Now this most solemn Protestation I make in all humility and reverence before the Divine Majesty, the Omnipresent God, the searcher of all hearts, and from a true intention, without any veil or covering, as I shall answer it at the great day, when the secrets of all hearts shall be revealed. And now if you my judges have not so much as a grain of faith, to believe this my cordial and solemn Protestation; let God, angels, saints, and all here present, bear witness that I have left every one of you inexcusable.

And now having performed what I could, and what I thought myself obliged to do in reference to the vindication of that pure truth I own and live to; I am as ready to receive any Sentence from you, whether of acquitment or ejection, as you are to deliver it.

'Now although the Commissioners would take no notice of this solemn declaring of my judgment, yet it is of great moment, as you may see by that passage in the Ordinance, by which the Commissioners are to act, page 613, where it runs thus: such ministers shall be deemed and accounted scandalous in their lives and conversations, as shall be proved guilty of holding and maintaining such blasphemous and atheistical opinions, &c. In which you see the time present is only respected: what then have the Commissioners to do to judge any for things many years past, though then guilty, as I never was, if now they disown them, and own the contrary as their judgment?'

But to proceed in relating the transactions of the last day of trial: after the particulars before recited, Mr. Dunch the chairman said to me, if Mr. Starkey (being of counsel for me) had any thing to present on my behalf, he might have liberty to speak. Whereupon Mr. Starkey, being desired by me, recited all the evidence, with much acuteness, method, and judgment; shewing, that if they squared their proceedings by the rules of law they were to act by, they could have no ground to give sentence against me: which he demonstrated so clearly, by enumerating both the testimonies on both sides, and also the particular laws and privileges which freed me from the imputation of any legal guilt, that many, though prejudiced persons, were much staggered, doubting of the issue in reference to sentence. But after this speech, we were all commanded to withdraw; and about an hour and a half after, we were called in again, and the register was commanded to proceed to publication. Whereupon all the depositions on both sides were read: which being done, Mr. Ford was ordered by the Commissioners to make a speech in justification of their intended Sentence against me; which office he performed as wretchedly, as he undertook it willingly, misrepresenting the evidence with confused paraphrases and mistakes, labouring to refute the law of my counsel's speech, with such assertions as these, viz. That although many of the proofs brought against the Doctor, were not proofs according to law; yet to the Commissioners, who are a court of equity, and of an ecclesiastical jurisdiction, and so not obliged to judge according to positive laws and statutes, they were, and might be esteemed sufficient proofs.

'Many such speeches as these he used, contrary to the liberty of the subject, the rule of reason and scripture, endeavouring to persuade the people, I was as monstrous as he and some others had represented me in their pulpits and discourses; but I shall say no more of him and his speech, leaving them both to the righteous Judge of all things, who one day will justify whom he and others of his way have condemned.'

After this speech of Mr. Ford's was ended, I desired liberty of Mr. Dunch, the chairman, to speak something to the people, in reply to some things Mr. Ford had untruly said against me: but it would not be permitted.

Then I desired them to receive in this my last request, and to weigh it seriously, before they proceeded to Sentence; which though it was returned into my hand again before it was read, I shall here present, for the satisfaction of the judicious reader.

Gentlemen; Before you proceed to judgment and pass sentence, I desire you seriously to consider these subsequent particulars.

1. That I was according to law acquitted of that Charge attested by Mr. Tickle, whence I produced my Discharge before you, which according to the judgment of judicious lawyers is undoubtedly legal, and will hold good, notwithstanding all pretensions to the contrary.

2. That the matters of the same Charge are acknowledged by the witness to have been spoken a year before that act was made, intitled, An Act against several blasphemous atheistical opinions, to which the Commission refers, as the rule to judge of scandalous opinions, which make a distinct head from matters of ignorance and insufficiency, according to the tenor of the commission.

3. That the same act cannot take into cognizance any crime for which the offender was not accused within six months after the committing of it; therefore nothing in either the first or last charge that hath been any way proved, can be judged as an offence against that act.

4. In reference to my third or last charge, there hath been nothing directly proved against me; but some words and expressions dropt from me in a private discourse to one single witness: which expressions, as you see, are capable of a harmless interpretation, being never owned in that sense the witness took them, as my avowed judgment, but solemnly disowned, as contrary to it, and therefore incapable legally to prejudice me; for the former act doth not make one an offender for a word, but for avowedly maintaining or holding forth in words or writing, any thing there prohibited.

5. That in reference to those words in both my charges, which have been any way proved to have fallen from me, I never owned them as my judgment, in that sense my accuser takes them; but have openly denied and disowned them: which therefore cannot render me guilty, either by the law of that former act, or by the law of Scripture, which denounceth judgment against those who make a man an offender for a word, Isa. xxix. 20, 21, which deserves your consideration.

6. That the particular Articles both of my first and last Charge, that seem to be of worst consequence, cannot justly be brought within the cognizance of that act, according to the literal and genuine scope of it; being chiefly made against the principles and practices of those called Ranters.

7. That nothing of scandal in life and conversation being proved against me, my free owning and confessing the appearance of evil spirits for some time in my family, permitted by God, opposed and overcome by the Christian weapons of prayer and fasting, ought not in equity to prejudice any against me, so as to sway them in their sentence or judgment; I having cordially, solemnly, and sincerely protested my innocency, as to any communion or compact with evil spirits: and that you would consider that things of this nature, though criminalous, are not under the cognizance of the act, but to be tried by the common law, according to the usual custom of this nation.

8. That the act of general pardon doth clearly take away all legal guilt from things done or spoken before 1651, that are not excepted in the said pardon. Now the particulars of my first charge, and all those of my third or last, which seem to be of moment, and to be any way proved, were spoken or done before the year 1651. Now this being the positive judgment of able lawyers, who have seen it experienced in things of more dangerous consequence, may give you the Commissioners sufficient ground of serious reflections upon it.

9. That (according to the judgment of wise, judicious, and knowing men, your Commission having been long since, and being now again under consideration and debate, whether to be confirmed or altered) you the Commissioners in the interim have not compleat power to act, especially in reference to sentence, judgment, and execution: which I believe is the reason why so few of the Commissioners have sat, and why others that were at first so earnest in their proceedings, have since withdrawn themselves.

10. That in reference to judgment and sentence concerning me, scandal ought to be preserved as an absolute distinct head from ignorance and insufficiency, according to the letter of your Commission, and the undoubted judgment and intent of the authors.

11. That the testimony of any one, though by oath, concerning what another related to him touching a third person, (i. e. the defendant) is no proof at all according to law, being not so much as concurrent testimony, if the defendant deny it, and do not own it himself: moreover, that the testimony Mr. Fowler gave, is not legally valid; because, besides the former reason, he is the accuser, and incapable to be witness, according to law.

12. That in the day of sentence, Mr. Dunch and Mr. Trapham cannot by law sit as judges, because they condemned me long before proof; threatening me before witness, to turn me out of my living, at the sitting of this parliament; and the last was a witness against me. That Mr. Fowler, Mr. Woodbridge, and Mr. Tickle, cannot by law sit as assistants to the judges, or give their votes in the day of sentence; the one being my accuser, the other two witnesses against me.

After I had delivered this to be read, and had received it again, we all withdrew; and about two hours after were called in again: when the room being full of people, one Mr. Lee a minister, the gravest man amongst them, began a very formal speech to me, in which he very rhetorically expressed what a grief and trouble it was to them to pass sentence against me, and that he durst not judge that I then was guilty of holding those monstrous tenets I was accused of; yet they must proceed secundum Allegata et Probata. Afterward he proceeded to give me many exhortations and secret reproofs, in which he, with much artifice, made me guilty of all I was accused of. Whereupon, after I had heard him for a pretty space, being very sensible of his disguised prejudicing discourse, and his design in it, I was forced to stop him, by replying, that if he had any brotherly exhortations to give me, he might come in private with me: but thus to pretend to admonish and exhort me, yet really to represent me as guilty of all I was accused of, and that before the people, was the custom of the Scribes and Pharisees, who were wont to hide foul designs under fair colours, witness their dealings with Christ. Whence I desired him to spare his admonitions, and to leave off twisting such silken halters, saying, I was prepared for sensence, and that I desired him and the rest to take heed of condemning and betraying the innocent. Upon this, the man being struck somewhat silent, Mr. Dunch the chairman commanded the register to do his office; who presently read the Sentence of my ejection in the open court, which was then very brief, though afterwards enlarged with many circumstantial aggravations, and great untruths; as this following copy sent to me from the clerk, on the next day after my sentence, clearly shews.

Berks, ss. By the Commissioners appointed by Order of his Highness the Lord Protector and his Council, for ejecting of Scandalous, Ignorant, and Insufficient Ministers and School-Masters. Reading, Dec. 8, 1654.

Whereas several Charges have been exhibited to us against Dr. John Pordage, rector of Bradfield in this county, who hath given in several Answers in writing thereunto; and thereupon we have proceeded to examination of several credible witnesses upon oath, for proof of the said Charges in open court; which witnesses the said Doctor hath been permitted fully and freely to cross-examine: and the said Doctor hath been required to produce his witnesses for his justification, and to bring in his interrogatories, upon which he would examine his said witnesses, and hath had day after day assigned him for that purpose; but notwithstanding hath peremptorily refused so to do, persisting in his own way, and refusing to observe our direction in his proceeding; and hath publicly, by his evil and contumacious expressions, slighted and affronted the said Commissioners, and instead of producing his interrogatories in writing, according to our order, he hath now verbally offered several questions, which he desires to have propounded to several of his said witnesses, which the Commissioners (upon consideration of) have judged impertinent to clear him from the matters charged against him, but merely to delay and weary out the said Commissioners; and therefore they have examined only to two of the said questions, which they conceive might somewhat tend to his justification: and upon full hearing what the said Doctor could say, and Mr. Starkey, of counsel in his behalf, upon the whole matters; and upon due consideration, it appeareth, that the said Doctor is guilty of denying the deity of Christ, and the merit of his precious blood and passion; and hath asserted and maintained, that Christ was a Type, and but a Type, and not perfect, and that his imputative righteousness was sapless, and several other bellish opinions; and is otherwise scandalous, as by the said depositions may more fully appear. And it is likewise declared under the hands of six of the said commissioners, and several ministers their assistants, that upon the matters proved against him, the said Dr. Pordage is ignorant, and very insufficient for the work of the ministry. It is therefore ordered, That the said Dr. Pordage be, and he is hereby ejected out of the rectory of Bradfield aforesaid, and profits thereof: but the said Commissioners do grant him time to remove himself, family, and goods and chattels out of the said Parsonage-house, till the second of February next; and further time to remove his corn out of the Parsonage-barns, till the 25th of March next.

(A True Copy.) MAT. LANGLEY, Regist.

Neale writes at some length of the proceedings as to Ecclesiastical Matters during the usurpation. After giving an account of the ordinances appointing the Commissioners for Examination of Ministers (they went by the name of Tryers) and regulating their proceedings, he says, "But to humble the Clergy yet further; and keep them within the bounds of their spiritual function, his highness, by the advice of his Council, published an Ordinance, bearing date Aug. 28, 1654, entitled, 'An Ordinance for ejecting scandalous, ignorant and insufficient ministers and school-masters.' The Ordinance appoints, and nominates certain Lay-Commissioners for every county, and joins with them ten or more, of the gravest, and most noted Ministers, as their assistants; and empowers any five, or more of them, to call before them any public preacher, lecturer, parson, vicar, curate, or school-master, who is, or shall be reputed ignorant, scandalous, insufficient, or negligent; and to receive all Articles or Charges, that shall be exhibited against them on this account; and to proceed to the examination and determination of such offences, according to the following rules.

"Such ministers and school-masters shall be accounted scandalous in their lives and conversations, as shall hold or maintain such blasphemous, or atheistical opinions, as are punishable by the Act, entitled, An Act against several blasphemous and atheistical opinions, &c. or that shall be guilty of profane swearing and cursing, perjury, and subornation of perjury; such as maintain any popish opinions, required to be abjured by the oath of abjuration; or are guilty of adultery, fornication, drunkenness, common haunting of taverns, or ale-houses; frequent quarrellings or fightings; frequent playing at cards or dice; prophaning of the Sabbath; or that do allow and countenance the same in their families, or in their parishes. Such as have frequently read, or used the Common Prayer Book in public since the first of Jan. last; or shall at any time hereafter do the same. Such as publicly and prophanely scoff at the strict profession, or professors of godliness. Such as encourage or countenance Whitson-ales, wakes, morrice dancing, may-poles, stage-plays, or such like licentious practices. Such as have declared, or shall declare by writing, preaching, or otherwise publishing, their disaffection to the present government.

"Such ministers shall be accounted negligent as omit the public exercise of preaching

‘ and praying on the Lord’s day (not being hindered by necessary absence or infirmity of body;) or that are, or shall be non-residents. Such school-masters shall be accounted negligent as absent themselves from their schools, and wilfully neglect to teach their scholars.

“ Such ministers or school-masters shall be accounted ignorant and insufficient as shall be so declared and adjudged by the Commissioners in every county, or any five of them, together with five of the Ministers mentioned in the Ordinance.’

“ The Lay-Commissioners were to proceed upon oath both for and against the person accused; but in cases of ignorance or insufficiency, they were to be joined by five of the assistant Clergy at least; and if ten of the Commissioners, whereof five to be Ministers, gave it under their hands, that the party was ignorant or insufficient, then the said minister, or school-master was to be ejected, and the said judgment entered in a register book with the reasons thereof. After ejection the party might not preach or teach school in the parish from whence he was ejected; but convenient time was to be allowed for his removal, and the fifths reserved for the support of his family. The rightful patron was to present to the vacant living an approved preacher; and in case of lapse it fell to the Protector and his Council.

“ This Ordinance being confirmed by the parliament of 1656, gave great offence to the old clergy; Mr. Gatford, the sequestered rector of Donnington, published a pamphlet, entitled, ‘ A Petition for the vindication of the public use of Common Prayer, &c.’ occasioned by the late Ordinance for ejecting Scandalous Ministers; as also thirty seven Queries concerning the said Ordinance; which he presented to the parliament, which began Sept. 3, 1654, but they took no notice of it.

“ Mr. Gatford observes, That the Protector and his Council had no legal authority to make this, or any other Ordinance, without consent of a parliament; whereas the Instrument of Government empowered them to provide for the safety of the state by making laws, till the parliament should meet. He observes further That such a proceeding must justify his late majesty and council in all their illegal proceedings before the civil wars; that it would justify the High Commission Court; and, that by the same authority, an ordinance might be published to eject freeholders out of their estates.

“ He complains, That the power of the Commissioners is final, and admits of no appeal; that looks back to crimes antecedent to the law for a twelvemonth; whereas it ought only to declare, that for the future such offences shall be punished with deprivation.

“ That the Commissioners who were to sit in judgment upon the clergy were all laymen, the ministers being called in only in cases of ignorance and insufficiency; that the ordinance admits of the oath of one witness, provided it be supported with other concurrent evidence, which is contrary to the laws of God and man.

“ That some crimes in the Ordinance were none at all, and others of a very doubtful nature; as, how often a minister omitting to pray and preach in his pulpit should render him negligent; and what shall be deemed non-residence. Above all, he complains that the public reading of the Common Prayer should be ranked with the sins of swearing and drunkenness, and be an evidence of a scandalous life and conversation; which observation was unquestionably just.

“ To give the reader an example or two of the proceedings of the Commissioners: Those for Berkshire summoned Dr. Pordage, Rector of Bradfield, to appear before them at Speenham Land, near Newbury, to answer to divers articles of blasphemy and heresy. After several days hearing, and witnesses produced on both sides, the Commissioners determined Dec. 8, 1654, that the said Doctor was guilty of denying the Deity of Christ; the merits of his precious Blood and Passion; and several other dangerous opinions. It is further declared under the hands of six of the Commissioners, and a sufficient number of Ministers their assistants, that the said Doctor was ignorant, and insufficient for the work of the ministry; it is therefore ordered, that the said Doctor be, and he is hereby ejected out of the Rectory of Bradfield, and the profits thereof, but the said Commissioners do grant him time till the 2nd of Feb., to remove himself, his family, his goods and chattels, out of the said Parsonage house; and further time to remove his corn out of the barns, till the 25th of March.

The Oxford Historian says, this Pordage was a Dr. by Charientismus, and had been preacher of St. Lawrence Church in Reading before he came to Bradfield. That he was a mystic enthusiast, and used to talk of the fiery deity of Christ dwelling in the soul, and mixing itself with our flesh. He dealt much in astrology, and pretended to converse with the world of spirits. After his ejection he writ against the Commissioners a pamphlet, entitled, ‘ Innocency appearing;’ which was answered by Mr. Christopher Fowler, vicar of St. Mary, Reading, in his ‘ Demonium Meridianum.’ However, the Doctor was restored to his living at Bradfield at the Restoration.”

197. Proceedings of the Commissioners,* appointed by Oliver Cromwell, for ejecting scandalous and ignorant Ministers. In the Case of WALTER BUSHNELL, Clerk, Vicar of Box, in the County of Wilts : 8 CHARLES II. A. D. 1656.

THIS Narrative was published by Bushnell presently after the Restoration with the following Preface, and a Dedication to sir Anthony Ashlie-Cooper and John Earnly, esq. knights of the shire for Wilts ; dated July 4, 1660.

To the Readers.

Whom I shall precaution in some few things. As 1. When they meet with the word Commissioners, they are not to understand me, as intending thereby all those gentlemen whose names were put into the Ordinance ; as charging them with those unworthy and unjust proceedings. Many whereof, (as to my business,) never acted : yea further I desire them to know ; that some of those who sometime acted, I do hereby acknowledge and report for gentlemen of much civility and moderation. But the Commissioners and ministers which I here speak of, are those that made ejecting of ministers a kind of a trade : And questionless to themselves it was a very bene-

* " The Wiltshire Commissioners summoned Mr. Walter Bushnell, Vicar of Box, near Malmesbury, before them, to answer to a charge of drunkenness, prophanation of the Sabbath, gaming, and disaffection to the government ; and after a full hearing, and proof upon oath, they ejected him. The Vicar prepared for the press a Narrative of the Proceedings of the Commissioners appointed by O. Cromwell for ejecting Scandalous and Ignorant Ministers, in the case of Walter Bushnell, &c. but it was not printed till the King's Restoration ; and even then the Commissioners did themselves justice in a reply, which they called, A Vindication of the Marlborough Commissioners, by the Commissioners themselves. And Dr. Chambers, who was reproached by the said Bushnell, did himself justice in a distinct vindication. However, the Vicar was restored to his vicarage in a lump, with the rest at the Restoration.

" Upon the whole, the industrious Dr. Walker says, he can find no footsteps of the numbers of clergy that were ejected by the Commissioners, though he imagines they might be considerable. But I am well satisfied, there were none of any character ; for there were not a great many zealous loyalists in possession of livings at this time ; and those that were, had the wisdom to be silent about public affairs, while they saw the eyes of the government were upon them in every corner of the land. The Commissioners continued to act for some time after the Protector's death, and were a greater terror to the Fanatics, than to the regular clergy of any denomination." 4 Neal's Hist. of the Puritans, p. 103.

ficial one : such who were constant, and frequent, and furious in the business, and were these, Mr. Blisset, Mr. Thomas Bayly, Mr. Hunt of Marlborough, and of the ministers, Dr. Chambers, Mr. Byfield, and one of Marlborough, I think they call him Mr. Hughes. Understand me to mean these especially ; when you meet with any hard words uttered against the Commissioners, I say especially ; for although some others acted to my prejudice, yet because they never appeared but once, and then, as it was conjectured, upon the solicitation of these men, according to whose influences they acted, I shall for the present, only point to them in the margin.*

And these respective persons I shall charge, and make good this charge upon them. 1. The Ministers that they were ever meddling with that, which they had nothing to do withal. And 2. The Commissioners for often violating that Ordinance by which they sat, and according to which they were to act, and that in many particulars. As in admitting and countenancing such to swear, (if they appeared against me) which their Ordinance excepted against. In excluding such witnesses, if appearing for me, yea, after they had been sworn, which by their Ordinance they were to admit of ; and at last making a peremptory order, that such as would might appear against me, but no more in my behalf. I charge them again for endeavouring to suppress many informations which were taken upon oath, and discountenancing, interrupting, and thwarting with many witnesses, who would have deposed to the infamy of their witnesses. And their clerk, Mr. Blisset's son, I charge for entering many depositions by halves : for confounding the order in which they were taken ; for shuffling up two depositions into one ; for leaving out very material clauses, which might have been to my behoof ; for endeavouring to insert such words which the deponent never spoke, which might have been to my prejudice ; for leaving out in his copy delivered to me, a whole, yea a very material deposition, notwithstanding he had formally taken it, together with the subscription of the deponent : and I charge them all, Commissioners, Ministers, Clerk, for countenancing and encouraging infamous persons, such who had forsworn themselves, and touching some of themselves, in their hearing. Such as appeared out of malice by their own confession, and were proved guilty of suborning, and of being suborned, to their faces : Yea, and such as we should have proved guilty of forgery likewise, had not these commissioners and ministers by a notorious piece of injustice prevented it : So that possibly the readers may say, that they have met with a story somewhat like to that of Naboth. Such Judges, such witnesses, such a sentence, and such a malefactor : The judges, although most unjust, yet pretending not only to justice, but piety likewise. The witnesses most infamous, and yet countenanced and made use of by these judges, although they knew them to be such. And, although the sentence be not altogether the same, yet, the malefactor's crime being either the witnesses malice, or else that he held something which they were sick for. These things being premised by way of caution, I take my leave.

The TRANSACTIONS at the time when first I appeared before the Commissioners sitting at the Bear in Marlborough. February 14, 1655-6.

Sect. 1. By virtue of an Ordinance of Oliver called the Protector, and his Council, intituled, An Ordinance for the ejecting of scandalous, ignorant and insufficient ministers and schoolmasters, bearing date Aug. 29, 1654, wherein certain Commissioners with ministers assistant were impowered to proceed according to several instructions therein specified, as by the said Ordinance, whereunto for further satisfaction I refer thee, appears : I was by warrant from Marlborough delivered unto me by Tho. Cox, bearing date Jan. 21, 1655-6. under the hands and seals of Tho. Bayly, Tho. Hunt, Gabriel Martin, Willam Shute, William Blisset, and Richard Phelps, summoned to appear before the said commissioners at Marlborough on the 14th day of February then next following in these words.

Wilts. By the Commissioners for the ejecting of scandalous Ministers, &c. sitting at Marlborough, this 21st day of January 1655-6.

These are to will and require you Walter Bushnell clerk, minister of Box, to make your personal appearance before us at the sign of the Bear in Marlborough, upon Thursday come three weeks, the 14th day of Feb. next coming, to answer to a Charge of Articles, purporting matter of Scandal and Insufficiency, before us this day exhibited against you. Hereof fail you not at your peril. Given under our hands and seals, the day and year abovesaid.

To Walter Bushnell clerk, these.—On the outside, Mr. Bushnell of Box.

Sect. 2. Which personal appearance I accordingly made, and after I had waited till about eight of the clock at night, I received a copy of the Charge in these words.

Wilts. ss. A Copy of the Charge against Mr. Bushnell, exhibited January 21, 1655-6.

1. That the said Mr. Bushnell is guilty of profaning the Sabbath day.
2. That he is guilty of frequenting Inns, and Alehouses, and drinking to excess.
3. That he useth the form contained in the book of Common Prayer, and baptizeth with the sign of the cross.
4. That he is guilty of playing cards and dice.
5. That he is guilty of several attempts by him made on his servant woman to have committed uncleanness with her.
6. That he hath expressed his disaffection to the present government, in associating himself with several persons who were chief actors in the late insurrection.

Ex. per me William Blissett.

To these Articles I pleaded Not Guilty, which I subscribed at the foot of them, adding further to Mr. Shute, and Dr. Chambers (the only persons that to my knowledge I had ever seen before) that if those Articles were true, then was I notoriously scandalous; but if false, then were the informers notorious slanderers, or words to that purpose. To which Dr. Chambers replies to this purpose, That the several parties should be brought face to face. So that waiting only for a copy of the Articles, for which I gave the clerk, (Mr. Blisset's son) 2s. 6d. I was at that time dismissed until further summons.

Sect. 3. Now I must acquaint thee that these Articles were exhibited by one John Travers of Slaughtenford, commonly then called capt. Travers. This trade of information and such unworthy shifts being conceived to be almost all that he had to live by, he being looked on as a fellow merely mercenary, framing complaints against men for no other cause but that he might be hired to hold his peace: and endeavouring to displace ministers, for this reason, that he might have his reward for making room for others to come into their livings. And I make no doubt of it, but that as it was hope of reward which moved him to act, so at first it was indifferent to him from whom he had it. A good crust would have so charmed this Cerberus, that he would not have opened his mouth unless it had been in my behalf. Nor do I make a question of it but that as some reward from me would have kept him quiet, or made him for me, so that he had some promises given him, or somewhat assured him in case he would appear against me. The man whom they have put in my place hath complained of the Charges he hath been at in getting of it; (one must have 20l. another 10l. another 10l. and 10l. it cost him in such a business) now there is no doubt but that John Travers had his share in this dividend as well as in the service: Neither can I think that Mr. Sterne would have beknaved him (ask William Blisset the younger, and Tho. Cox how) as he did some others, if John Travers had travelled and swore for him upon his own Charges. And for some such kind of man was he looked upon by Mr. Chambers himself, when he first delivered in these Articles against me; who (as he hath reported) called for the Articles with a purpose to have torn them, because they were exhibited by such a hand.

Sect. 4. And since I have mentioned the Articles, and the person that delivered them in, and the entertainment which they were like to find from Mr. Chambers because they were delivered in by such a hand; let me now tell thee what (as he hath reported it) was the cause which made the Doctor forbear tearing of them, and that was because he saw there the names of many whom he knew, and took to be honest men. And here (for an introduction to the honesty and discretion of the Doctor,) I shall observe this unto thee, that (as I have been told) he observed it, that although there were several names subscribed, yet they were all written in the same hand, from which it must needs follow, that by the Doctor's confession, the whole writing both Articles and hands might be all forged as indeed they were; so that methinks the Doctor hath very much overshot himself in point of discretion, for he looks upon the Articles the more, because subscribed with such and so many names; and yet, 2. he acknowledgeth all the names to be written with one hand, which would have made any sober man the more to have suspected it. But yet the Doctor had an evasion for this, for at my appearing before them at Caln, some of those whose names were subscribed, desired a sight of the Paper that they might know who had thus abused them, which they could not obtain: yet the Doctor (that we might not prove his friends guilty of forgery) endeavours to preserve their reputation with a Salvo to some such purpose, 'That their names were written only by way of a memorandum, that in case they were called upon, they could depose to these Articles, that that might be done without their knowledge.' I think he added, 'That it was an usual course in the proceedings of these Commissioners.' But now I must tell thee, that many of them whose names were subscribed to those Articles, did touching myself first under their own hands, certify to these Commissioners the quite contrary to these Articles, and afterward being before them and sworn, were so far from testifying any thing to the sense of the Articles, as that all they said was to my vindication, all which was industriously declined by the Doctor and his Commissioners, for although there were many of them before them, who said much, yet we have not so much as their names in the Depositions. So that this Salvo of the Doctor's, although with him it be but gloria ordinaria, yet is it after the rate of some of such principles who draw up their Memorandums as they quote Texts and Authors to the quite contrary of their intents.

Sect. 5. But to return to John Travers, the reason which (beside common report which rendereth him such a man) moves me to think in this particular that some feeling would have stopped John Travers's mouth, is this: Sometimes before he delivered in these Articles to the Commissioners, he did several times, and at several houses, Alehouses and others, speak of them, yea and read them to several Companies, which I believe he therefore did, that the report thereof might come to my ears: and that that report might alarm me to make in, and to take some timely course that this storm might be diverted: But now I considering, that he who goes about privately to practise with an Informer, doth first on the matter confess himself Guilty: Next, that he doth reward him for one crime, and thereby encourage him to commit another: I considering again, that such sort of fellows will be no longer quiet than they are fed, and that they have (as strong stomachs, so) quick digestions: Considering again that the crimes which I was charged with, were gross and scandalous, and if true, deserving a greater punishment than Ejectment: Considering again that the Commissioners mentioned in the Ordinance were many of them gentlemen of eminent rank, and looked upon as men of discretion and integrity; and considering that the instructions by which these Commissioners were to proceed were such that had they been duly observed, it was almost impossible that a person not guilty should be prejudiced: For they were to examine witnesses upon oath on the behalf of the person charged, and the proof of the charge was to be made by credible witnesses, (the sequel will shew thee how they observed or kept to their instructions) being confident likewise of mine own innocence as to those crimes which were there charged upon me, and persuading myself that I should find nothing but justice allayed with equity and candor in my judges, I say, considering these things, I cast myself upon my trial. But now how much I was mistaken in some of these men, how disproportionable their proceedings were to the Ordinance by which they acted, how little justice I found where I expected lawful favour, this ensuing discourse shall acquaint thee. And indeed calling to mind that abundance of godliness which some of these men pretend unto, making that the symbol to difference themselves from other men, and yet observing their actings and proceedings, I cannot but say as Solomon did, Eccl. iii. 16, 'And moreover I saw under the Sun the place of judgment that wickedness was there, and the place of righteousness that iniquity was there.'

The Transactions at my second time of appearing before them at the Antelope in Lavington, April 28, 1656.

Sect. 1. I heard no more of this business from the 14th of February, 1655-6, until the 24th of April, 1656, at which time there came a soldier to my house and delivered me a piece of paper in these words :

‘ Mr. Bushnell, I am commanded by our Commissioners, to let you know, that they expect your appearance before them upon Monday next, at the Antelope in Market Lavington, where they will examine the witnesses for proof of the Charge against you ; if you intend to make Defence thereunto, you are then to bring your witnesses with you.—New Sarum, March 31, 1656.—Per me, William Blisset, Clerk.—To Mr. Bushnell Minister of Box, these.’

As I said before, I received not this paper till the 24th of April, (for his pains the soldier required and received 2s. 6d.) And notwithstanding I could then easily have absented myself, and justified my non-appearance, both because the Monday next after the 31st of March, on which by this warrant I was to appear, was April 7th, and so elapsed more than a fortnight before the paper came to my hands : as likewise because I had not five days warning before hand, as the Ordinance enjoins. Yet because the soldier told me that the Monday next mentioned in the warrant did not refer to March 31, on which it was dated, but unto the 24th of April on which he delivered it, and so must be April 28th, as also being unwilling to move a question, whether by five days mentioned in the Ordinance were to be understood five days inclusive, or exclusive, I say I being unwilling to make use of such poor shifts, which might rather render me suspected than any way vindicate me, and desiring nothing more than a fair and speedy hearing, I repair to Lavington accordingly : I shall observe this unto thee from the last clause of their warrant, that they command me to bring witnesses for my Defence, when as none had deposed against me, and yet afterward when they had received depositions against me, they rejected whom they pleased of my witnesses, and at last made a peremptory Order, that no more of my witnesses should be admitted, of which more hereafter.

Sect. 2. At this time at Lavington there appeared as witnesses for the Common-wealth (for that was the name by which they were called) William Pinchin, Peter Webb, Thomas Powell, Mary the wife of Henry Workman, and Jane Hendie widow of Box, and Obadiah Cheltenham of Ditcheridge, who being all sworn, were required to speak their knowledge touching the charge against me. I must tell thee that William Pinchin (as I take it before he was sworn) desired to be excused in regard of some near relation of kindred which was betwixt us two ; but this I opposed, knowing it to be a piece of himself ; he I knew for a long time had been the prime contriver of all ; and that the others who appeared there, were there by his procurement ; and that some of them acted according to his instructions. I conceived likewise that this might be to gain the greater opinion from the Commissioners that he seemed thus to hang back (for in such cases forward witnesses, even amongst Heathens, were not so well thought of) and therefore he pretends an unwillingness to that which he most desires ; for I am assured, that he would never have gone about so to excuse himself if he had believed that such an excuse would have been accepted of. Somewhat it was which Mr. Blisset then spake unto him, that he had been lately sworn before other Commissioners (yea and there he approves himself a valiant knight) which I conceive was spoken either out of wonder, that William Pinchin should now be so calm who was lately so fierce, or else by way of invitation to encourage him to go on.

Sect. 3. But this hindrance being removed, William Pinchin goes on in these words :

That about eight years since, when Mr. Bushnell came first to Box, he feasted his friends on the Lord's day, and having drank liberally that day there, one Thrift, one of the guests, was killed in the Tower there, but by what means this deponent knoweth not. And saith farther, That he knoweth, that Mr. Bushnell have usually till within this two years frequented alehouses in parish business, and have there drank hard in Mr. Speke's and Mr. Long's company ; and have seen him sit there drinking after they have been gone, but cannot say that ever he saw him drunk. And saith further, That Mr. Bushnell have alway baptised infants by the form of the Common Prayer till the last Sabbath day, excepting the sign of the cross.

Sect. 4. Where I shall offer to thy consideration, 1. That although William Pinchin, pretends he came unwillingly to swear, yet we see he comes not unprepared. I shall therefore desire the reader to take some notice of this Deposition, which consists of three parts, answerable to the three first Articles exhibited against me.

1. Profanation of the Lord's Day.
2. Frequenting Alehouses.
3. Using the Common Prayer at the Baptising of Children.

I shall observe something to the touching all these accordingly as they lie in order.

Sect. 5. And first I shall tell thee that whatsoever William Pinchin deposeth touching my feasting on the Lord's day, or drinking liberally on that day, or of the death of John Thrift, he hath only upon conjecture, or else upon hearsay : For he then upon oath acknowledged before the Commissioners, that he was not that day at Box, but at Broughton, which is four or five miles distant from Box, and it is like enough he was there at the Revel, that being their Revel day.

2. He then deposed likewise that this Lord's day was Mid-Lent Sunday.

3. He then deposed, that I preached not that afternoon, imputing it to excessive drinking ; and yet we have not one word of this in the copy of the Depositions which we received from their clerk. Whether it were ever taken, or if taken, whether index expurgatorius hath dashed it out I will not say.

Sect. 6. I must not forget to tell thee, that whilst the Clerk was taking William Pinchin's Deposition, Mr. Byfield did often interpose, as if it had belonged to him to teach Wm. Pinchin how to swear, and the Clerk how to enter it. Adding, that if he wrote so, or so, it would not amount to a Charge, for that the latter part of it would contradict the former, or words to such a purpose: (No Deposition pleased him but such as had poison in it.) And here I must tell the reader, that this Mr. Byfield seemed wholly to have forgotten both the place and the purpose, for which his name was put into the Ordinance, for by that it is clear that neither Mr. Byfield, nor any other minister, hath any thing to do but only to assist the Commissioners, in their adjudging who shall be accounted ignorant and insufficient; whereas it is well known, that Mr. Byfield intermeddled in the matter of scandal more than all the Commissioners beside. I appeared nine times before them, where Mr. Byfield ever made one; and, when the pipe was out of his mouth, his tongue was seldom silent: but either dictating to the Clerk; encouraging some Witnesses, thwarting with, and threatening and turning back others; thrusting some out of doors, that they might not hear how things past: charging the Clerk that he should give no Copies of the Depositions, making Orders which were for his purpose, reversing others which were not; reading and explaining Acts and Ordinances; concealing some other which were not for his purpose, instructing and catechising some of his Commissioners: Of all which thou shalt have particular instances in the sequel. But now in the business which was properly his Examination, my man was as mute as a fish, for I remember not that he proposed so much as one question unto me. Indeed he hath not been so favourable in that particular to every body: For he hath, as I have been told, pressed a neighbour of mine with a question very earnestly and closely; and wot you what it was? It was (doubtless with Mr. Byfield a fundamental one) "What was the yearly value of his living?" and indeed, when Mr. Chambers preaching at Bath, Nov. 11, 1657, on those words, Joh. xiv. 22, made this observation, That Judas Iscariot proposed no question, but about earthly things, as, What will you give me? Might not this have been said? &c., I could not choose but think of Mr. Byfield.

Sect. 7. But to return to the Deposition, William Pinchin acknowledgeth himself to be absent, and yet he swears as if he had been at Box. I am not so much a lawyer as to know how far forth an oath will extend, or to what it will amount, if a man depose nothing but what he hath received by hear-say. Amongst the people of God heretofore, the matter was not established, but at the mouth of two or three witnesses, Deut. xix. 15; they could not, if absent, send in their testimony under their hands, and then certainly much less could they give evidence of a thing which they never knew. In after ages it is reported that they deposed after this sort.

1. They must testify from their own sight.
2. What day of the month such a thing was done.
3. What month of the year such a thing was done.
4. What seventh year of the Jubilee.

And sure enough it is, that whatsoever is deposed in such a case, is no testimony but a report, and so as to the testimony and the witness, it is false, although the thing reported were true. 'Testis falsus est, non is modo qui mendacium dicit, sed qui etiam quod verum est testificatur cujus certam et indubitatem notitiam non habet, id est, testatur quod nec vidit, nec audivit, nec expertus est.' Cartwr. in Pr. 21, 28.—I presume they will not dislike my author. He is a false witness, not only he who tells a lie, but he also who testifies a truth whereof he hath not a certain and undoubted knowledge, that is, if he testify that which he hath neither seen nor heard, nor hath had any experience of; which I speak not in any wise by way of granting that to be true which Wm. Pinchin hath informed in this particular; for I shall manifest it hereafter unto thee, that this report is both false and slanderous, but only to evidence thus much unto thee, that be it true, or be it false, yet William Pinchin could be no competent witness of it, because, by his own confession, he was at the same time at another place about four or five miles off. It hath been observed, as a most senseless and imprudent piece of malice in the Chief Priests and Elders, (and indeed malice is always such,) that after consultation they should order it in Sanhedrim, That large money should be given to the soldiers to say, that his disciples came by night, and stole him away while they slept. Matt. xxviii. 11, 12, 13. 'Si dormierunt quomodo furtum viderunt? Si autem non viderunt, quomodo fuerunt testes?' Jansen in Concor.—If they slept, how saw they the theft? and if they saw it not, how could they be witnesses? Proportionably say I, if William Pinchin were then at Broughton, it is impossible that he should see it? And if he saw it not, how could he be a witness? Such conjectural reports or informations upon hear-say, I have known to have been rejected by justices of peace, in matter of tithes; and shall such an oath in one case be insufficient to help a man to a shilling, and yet in another case be enough to undo him? And clearly these Commissioners gave me here a taste both of their justice and discretion, as likewise hinted unto me what I was to expect from them, in that they did not only receive such a Deposition as this, from such a man as this; but also set it in the fore-front, and make it the leading Deposition to all the rest.

But now as to some other parts of his Deposition, as to the first Article, William Pinchin swore positively at this time at Lavington, that the day whereon Thrift was killed, was Midlent Sunday, and that I usually kept feasts on that day: Yet at Marlborough afterward he takes a greater latitude, and swears, that he was assured that it was betwixt Candlemas and Easter (it seems he was not assured of what he swore before) whereas upon search in the Register, it was found to be on the 13th of Sept. (which as Mr. Byfield who perused the Register book said) was nothing near it. As I remember it was at this time that Mr. Blisset, to reconcile these clashing oaths, and to strengthen his evidence, said that this mistake was only in a Circumstance, the Time; and such a mistake is enough to mar the whole Action. 'Malum ex quolibet defectu.' And if circumstances are enough to specificate moral actions, then much more divine. Oaths, as they are not to be urged, but in weighty and intricate causes, so they are not to be taken without much deliberation and precaution. He who hath sworn to speak the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, forswears himself if he speak any more, any thing less, or any thing beside, 'Qui in juramento assertorio aliter dicit quam res est et si in re levissima pejerat.' The least aberration in an assertory oath, makes it no less than perjury. Thou shalt swear the Lord liveth in Truth, in Judgment, and in Righteousness; in truth, not falsely; in judgment, not rashly or unadvisedly; in righteousness, not wickedly. These three are called Comites Juramenti, the companions of an oath, without which no oath can be lawful. 'Judicio caret juramentum incautum, veritate juramentum mendax, justitia juramentum ini-quum, seu illicitum.' And yet no less than two of these three hath William Pinchin neglected in his oath; Judgment, for he swears rashly and unadvisedly, mistaking the Spring for the Autumn, and March or April for September: and that he made as little regard of swearing in truth, as he did to swear in judgment, I am next to tell thee.

Sect. 9. For William Pinchin at this time at Lavington deposed that I preached not that afternoon when John Thrift was killed, imputing it to excessive drinking. Whereas at Marlborough he deposeth, that I had received 6s. 8d. from the widow Hedges for preaching a funeral sermon upon a Lord's day in the afternoon, at the burial of her husband John Hedges. Now it appeared by the Register then in place, and examined, that John Hedges was buried on the self same afternoon of the same Lord's day whereon John Thrift was slain. So that William Pinchin having formerly sworn that I preached not that afternoon, swears afterwards, that I received money for preaching a funeral sermon at the same time. Another circumstance for Mr. Blisset. I could not perceive it, that any of the Ministers took it amiss, that I received such a reward; (perchance Mr. Byfield looked upon it as a piece of sacrilege that I took no more) but if they had, it would have been testified to their faces, that some one among them had on a time received three times as much for the like service.

Sect. 1. And now had you seen how William Pinchin did then look, being thus palpably convicted by himself, and caught in his———what shall I call it? Perjury: perchance some may say, that according to the ancient notion of the word Perjury as with reference to our Municipal laws it was not so much: or, shall I call it false witness? it was more, because he was sworn, and the rule of the Civil law is, that whoso shall depose any falsehood in testimony, shall be held guilty of perjury. But the reader may call it what he please; yet of this I am sure, that with God, and in Scripture phrase false swearing and perjury are all one: with Him the crime is the same wheresoever committed; and as the crime, so doubtless the punishment will be the same: I say had you seen how ghastly William Pinchin then looked being thus surprised, you would have said, that there needed no more to have stopped William Pinchin's mouth from swearing, or the Commissioners ears from crediting him.

Sect. 11. But pass we to the next part of his deposition, which refers to the second Article of Charge against me. And he saith further,

That he knoweth, that Mr. Bushnell hath usually till within these two years frequented alehouses in parish business, and have there drank hard in Mr. Speke's and Mr. Long's company, and have seen him sit drinking there after they have been gone, but cannot say that ever he have seen him drunk.

Sect. 12. Touching which I shall offer to thy consideration.

1. That we have here expressed, that he swears upon his knowledge; whereas we have not the word in the former part of the Deposition, which may confirm thee, that what he had deposed before, was either upon conjecture or hear-say.

2. Those words, that I have frequented alehouses in parish business, I shall in this sense admit to be true. As often as there were meetings at alehouses, touching parish business, (which was but very seldom) I might frequent them; that is those meetings there, my interest engaged me thereunto as much as any man's: and that those meetings were there, it was not long of me; it is well known, that there was a room at the Church-house reserved for that purpose; which room William Pinchin (it is like) thought not so fit to carry on his contrivances in; and therefore it might be a design in him to remove those meetings thither, because he was resolved (if swearing would do it) that to that place with safety I should not come. It is well known, that within these few years William Pinchin hath been a great rate-maker, and seldom out of offices; that he hath brought in large accounts, and in those his accounts it will be made appear that he hath made but little conscience either of honesty, or of his oath.

Sect. 13. The next thing in the deposition is, that I have ere drank hard in Mr. Speke's and Mr. Long's company. As touching the first of these gentlemen, Mr. Speke, I shall say, that (as I have heard) this was not the first time wherein William Pinchin forswore himself, to wrong him. And it is not unlikely, but that this consideration, that Mr. Speke was my patron, (and now he is gone, and so in no capacity either to be pleased or offended with any thing which I shall say, I assure thee, if ever any was such he was to me, verè Patronus, a Patron indeed; one who most freely bestowed the place upon me, and I think he never repented that he had so bestowed it :) and I his clerk, that he was loving to me, and I as in duty bound, respectful toward him; might move William Pinchin (a professed enemy 'et Parentibus, et Patronis,' to parents of all sorts) to level at us both. And I believe it that William Pinchin and I should have been better friends, if I had done by my patron, as he hath done several times by his parents, cozen them, curse them, and beat them out of doors.

Sect. 14. But further touching Mr. Speke; I could never hear it reported by any one (unless by him who will swear any thing) that this gentleman was ever given to intemperate drinking, no not in his healthy and younger years: but now in his latter days, (and this was the time to which this Deposition refers, and in which I had any knowledge of him) it is well known that he was so valetudinary and crazy, that his own infirmities would have constrained him to have kept a temperate diet, although he had not been disposed to it.

Sect. 15. And then as touching the other gentleman, Mr. Long, that he should be within two years, (that is within two years of the time wherein William Pinchin thus deposed, which was April 28, 1656,) in such a place, and with such company drinking hard, will seem very strange to any one that shall peruse the Register book of the parish of Corsham, for there it appears (and so much was certified to the Commissioners, at their last sitting at Lavington, under the hand of the sworn Register of Corsham,) that this Mr. Long was buried, December 9, 1651. So that if William Pinchin swore truly, it must needs follow that this Mr. Long was drinking hard at Box, more than two years after he was in his grave at Corsham. Another circumstance for Mr. Blisset.

There is in the close of this part of the Depositions, That he cannot say that ever he saw me drunk: Which clause I would have the reader to bear in his mind until the transactions of the next day.

Sect. 16. Pass we now to the last part of his Deposition which refers to the third Article of Charge exhibited against me, it is this,

That Mr. Bushnell have always baptised infants by the form of Common Prayer, till the last Sabbath day, excepting the sign of the cross.

To which for present I shall say but only this, that for any thing William Pinchin knew, it might be so, or it might be otherwise; for (excepting the Sabbath which he speaks of in his Deposition, whereon he staid for a godly purpose no doubt) it was none of his use in those few times he came to Church to stay so long till children were baptized.

Sect. 17. The next Deposition taken, was the Deposition of Peter Webb, in these words:

That he have often seen Mr. Bushnell at Alehouses, but only about parish business. And saith further, That at Michaelmas was twelve-month he baptised this Deponent's child by part of the Book of Common Prayer, and that about four or five years since, he saw him playing at cards at Mr. Speke's.

This Deposition (because it hath nothing singular in it but playing at cards, which will fall under another Deposition) I shall at present pass over.

Sect. 18. Next comes Obadiah Cheltenham, and swears, That he have often seen Mr. Bushnell at Clark's Alehouse in Box, and at the George at Corsham, from five years past, till within two years, but never saw him drink to excess.

No nor so much as drink neither, for his words were, That at Corsham he did only look into the room where I was, belike he means the room where (after the sermon was ended) the Ordinary was kept. I wonder he had not charged me with frequenting Inns and Alehouses at Lavington, Caln, Marlborough, in attendance to these Commissioners: For I can assure thee, that since I came to Box, I never lodged so many nights in Inns and Alehouses, nor have spent a tenth part of money in those Inns and Alehouses, as I have parted withal in this business: And perchance somebody, who knows the pulse of the Marlborough Commissioners very well, will (when I have told him all which I intend) say, that my discharge might have been procured at a much easier rate than mine undoing.

Sect. 19. But I must tell thee, that Obadiah Cheltenham was far more fierce at Lavington than his Deposition represents him: For (beside that he there thwarted with one witness, and prompts another) he then upon oath informs the Commissioners, 'That I had used a prayer before sermon so often, that the very boys of the street could repeat it and laugh at it.' Which passage it seems, Mr. Chambers noted, for (as I have been told) he reported it in another place: Now since Obadiah Cheltenham had always free admission to them, and a gracious countenance from Mr. Chambers and Mr. Byfield, I may conjecture, that in private at least this was looked upon as matter of Charge against me.

Sect. 20. In order to my vindication in this particular, I shall offer to thy consideration these things.

1. That I conceive it not to be any crime in a minister to use a set Form of Prayer.

2. That I conceive it not any crime in a minister, to use the same set form of prayer more than once. I am not the first that saith, That the gift of Prayer doth not exclude means, and endeavours of our own; as premeditation, diligence, study, both of matter, order, words:

Nor did I ever take praying in, or by, or with the spirit, and extempore, unthought of, unpremeditated prayer, for one and the same thing. My present judgment is, that as to the public there is no such praying by the spirit as when we have seriously considered and bethought ourselves aforehand, both of what we have to pray for, and of whom we are to ask it. Nor am I singular in it if I should say, that the spirit doth then help our infirmities, when as with due affections, and requisite ardency of desire, we pray as we have premeditated, or have been taught. And if it happen, that the people are well acquainted with it, it is so much the better, the business is their own, and of such a nature as that it is a business which nearly concerns them, and as I conceive it the minister's duty to fit his public prayers so as they may be most for public use, so I conceive it fit likewise, that the congregation be well acquainted with both the matter and order of them, that both the one and the other may engage with the greater serenity, because they all know, how nearly they are concerned in it; and can all joyfully say Amen unto it. And to give thee my thoughts in this particular, I say, that as the example of those who have attempted this unpremeditated way could never encourage me to attempt the like, so neither have the arguments which they urge against this premeditated way of prayer prevailed so far with me, as to make me change my mind.

Sect. 21. But now as to mine own particular, I shall say thus much, That I have formerly made use of the same prayer in congregations far more judicious and numerous than is that of Box, yet I could never hear any thing taxed in it, as misbeseeching or ridiculous; No nor at Box neither, unless it were by William Pinchin, and Obadiah Cheltenham, or such like, who may have the impudence to dislike what they have not the grace to practice. Nay, even at Box, I am confident of it, Obadiah Cheltenham may go throughout the whole parish, and be so far from finding boy, or boys that laugh at it, as that he shall not find any one that remembers so much as three lines of it: And therefore I look upon this as a double slander, against the boys and myself.

Sect. 22. It was at this time and place likewise that Obadiah Cheltenham prompted Thomas Powel another witness, to inform, That I had preached unprofitable doctrine; what it was, we shall have when we come to Tho. Powel's Depositions. And doubtless, Obadiah Cheltenham would have had the Commissioners believe, that there was nothing but good meaning in all this; that the desire of his heart, and his utmost aims were, that they might be fed with food both wholesome and convenient for them; and therefore I must be represented as an unprofitable teacher, and so to be laid aside, so to usher in an expedience to these their godly desires: But see now how the event hath bewrayed all. Mr. Stern hath lately told me, that these men, William Pinchin, and Obadiah Cheltenham, invite him to Box with much importunity, and many promises, even beseeching him to come and preach Christ among them, of which for a long time they said that they had a great want; and therefore (like the man of Macedonia in Paul's vision) they pray him to come unto them and help them: But (said he) all this was but for some interest of their own, their gain (belike) being their godliness; William Pinchin of late coming but seldom to church, and Obadiah Cheltenham being (as it is said) a frequenter of the meetings of the Anabaptists.

Sect. 23. Next comes Thomas Powel, and deposeth, That sometimes, till within four years past, he have seen Mr. Bushnell in Raynald's and Baylie's Alehouses in Box, but knows not what drew him thither: but never saw him drink to excess. And saith, that till within three or four years past, Mr. Bushnell have baptized by the form of common prayer: And that about two years since, Mr. Bushnell preaching against malice, said, that malicious persons were the devil's nymphs, and wished them with him for their wages.

Sect. 24. To which I shall say, that if Thomas Powel had been then demanded when he had been last at Raynald's, he would have been made confess that he had not been there in six years before, and therefore possibly he could not see me there within four years. But now whereas he adds, he knew not what business drew me thither, I doubt me that he wilfully forgets himself, for he cannot but remember that the business which once drew me to Baylie's, was his own; to compose a difference then depending betwixt himself, and a neighbour whom he then maliciously and spitefully prosecuted, about which we spent the greater part of the night; and I believe that he cannot forget that the business which drew me to Baylie's at another time was to beg relief for Marlborough, where on the Lord's day we found him sitting at a table with a jug before him: when and where with some ado he bountifully advanced a groat towards that charitable work; which was not so much as we received from some who lived in the church-house, and received alms of our monthly collection: Nor had our benevolence to Marlborough amounted so high as it did, unless some amongst us had been far more liberal than Thomas Powel was. Now I cannot readily remember that I ever saw Tho. Powel at Baylie's but only at those times.

Sect. 25. And since I have on this occasion mentioned Marlborough, I must tell thee, that some of that place (such whom I believe had their share in the dividend) have since made me a very sorry requital, either for my pains for them, or my charity towards them. I little thought it, when I went about from house to house throughout our whole parish and tythings, for several days together, with much importunity too, to beg for Marlborough, that Marlborough men, (within three years after, sitting in their stately houses, built at the country's and other men's charges) should be with the first that should turn me out of doors: That those who (had it not been for the benevolence of the country, which was much advanced by the industry of the ministers) might have sat without doors, should with a breath leave us in as sad or a sadder condition than the fire left them. And thus much will I say more unto mine own particular, that my purse as well as my pains went very far for them, for they received more from me, and my little family, than from all those 22 whom they countenanced and encouraged to swear against me: I recorded it in our parish register book, both the sum which was collected for them, as also the names of the persons who bestowed their pains in collecting of it. Which one of the Marlborough men, (Mr. Tho. Bayly perusing the register book) noted, how he liked it I know not, perchance not so well. I have read of those of that disposition, that being once aloft, cannot endure to be told that ever they went, or sent a begging; but when they were on their legs again, their main endeavours should be to remove or crush them who lifted them up, for fear it should be known that they had been down. Now whether I incurred the Marlborough men's displeasure in being so saucy as to commit their, some time, indigent and begging condition to posterity, (they though most willing to receive, yet as unwilling to be told of it) I will not judge. I have not now our register book at command, but for want of that let these papers remain as a record to testify to the present and future times how these Marlborough men have requited me.

Sect. 26. But to return, the next thing in Tho. Powel's Deposition is, that he never saw me drink to excess: Which I shall desire the reader to keep in his memory till the transactions of the next day. Next he swears, that till within this three or four years, Mr. Bushnell have baptized by the form of Common Prayer. To which I shall reply only this, that as this was nothing to the Ordinance by which these Commissioners sat and acted, so it was more than Thomas Powel knew, for he was a man that seldom came to church, nor do I remember that I ever saw him stay the time during the administration of that sacrament: For present I shall desire thee to observe how Thomas Powel trends in William Pinchin's track, and swears as if he had taught him his lesson.

Sect. 27. The next branch in his Deposition, is, that about two years since, Mr. Bushnell preaching against malice, said, that malicious persons were the devil's nymphs, and wished them with him for their wages.

And where lies the matter of charge here? Or to what article doth this Deposition refer? Is malice become a virtue? And if a vice, is it so rare in the land, that it is unseasonable to reprove it? And what have we next? I said that malicious persons were the devil's nymphs:

Risum teneatis—

Indeed I could not forbear, which doubtless (had he seen it) would have much offended Mr. Byfield, as he was on the like occasion at another time. The clerk, as wondering at the expressions, for some time withheld his hand, belike, conceiving that Tho. Powel might mistake, but he continuing earnest, and often iterating these words, nymphs, nymphs, the clerk enters it accordingly. Doubtless, Tho. Powel conceived these to be some stabbing words, he was so zealous for them; and yet to any understanding man they will not amount to any charge, unless it be of simplicity, falshood, or malice, in the reporter of them: For

1. Few that know me will believe it, that I should ever say so. And

2. In case I had said so, the most that I could have been charged with, had been impropriety or incongruity of speech, although we read of the devil's children often, yet of his nymphs never, untill in Thomas Powel's Depositions.

Give me leave to adventure my conjecture how this might come to pass. I told thee a little before, that Tho. Powel in his Depositions did trend in William Pinchin's steps, I doubt me that he had William Pinchin for his tutor here, and that he taught him to say, that I had said that malicious persons were the Devil's imps; which Thomas Powel misapprehending, or remembering, might swear that I said, malicious persons were the Devil's nymphs. I have read of a guide, that by mistaking Casilinum for Casinum was likely to have hazarded Hannibal's whole army. What hazard Thomas Powel hath brought upon his soul by this, I leave it to him who will one day call vain and unadvised swearers, much more false swearers to an account.

Sect. 28. And although at first I smiled at the ridiculousness of the expressions, yet afterward considering that Thomas Powel was upon his oath, and so bound by that sacred tie, wherein our great God was called in as a witness to the truth, and consequently an avenger if he spake false; and he bound to speak the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, should then depose such words as spoken by me which never were spoken, and I believe, looked on by many even of the Commissioners themselves as even impossible to be true, I say that this did much sadden my spirit; and sorry I am that it was so much or no more looked upon by these Commissioners: But indeed, (considering what kind of testimonies they received against me, as likewise what use they made of those testimonies) I much doubt it that they made use of such testimonies against me, which they in their consciences knew to be false. And this they might do, (although without equity or conscience, yet) not without precedents, such as they are, both from the Old and New Testament; but methinks, the example and the ends of these men, are enough to frighten any others to adventure the same way. 'Hast thou marked the old way which wicked men have trodden?' Job. xxii. 13.

Sect. 29. I have often proposed it unto myself, what, and when, and where any words should be spoken by me which Thomas Powel could wrest to such a sense; at length I lighted upon this conjecture, wherein, from some words which Thomas Powel hath formerly let fall in some company, I am confirmed. Some years past (I am sure more than two twice told) I took for my text those words of our blessed Saviour, Matth. xii. 32. 'But whosoever speaketh against the Holy Ghost, it shall not be forgiven him neither in this world, nor in the world to come.' Where, having told them the usual definition of this sin unto death; towards the conclusion of my discourse, by way of caveat, I advised my hearers, that as they desired not to come at it, so neither to come near it, no nor so much as toward it neither: In order whereunto, after several other caveats, I told them, that men must take heed of raising and reporting malicious slanders; such which their own consciences cannot but tell them are false, and yet some base by-respect will put them on both to report and justify them: adding further, that a man might come towards this sin against the Holy Ghost by slandering, or maliciously reporting a known falsehood of but a man: for I had told them before, that the sin against the Holy Ghost, was not so called because it was against the person of the Holy Ghost, but because it was against those graces whereof the blessed Spirit by way of appropriation is said to be the author or giver, which I clearly manifested unto them from the case in the text; for otherwise with what congruity could our blessed Saviour have now taxed them with this sin, when as their malicious slanders were against himself? It is without doubt that these Pharisees, with whom our blessed Saviour had now to do, came near it. And therefore they came near it (Peter calls it 'a resisting of the Holy Ghost.' Acts vii. 51.) because that wilfully and wickedly, against knowledge, and against conscience, they contemned his person, reproached his life, miracles, doctrine, and laboured the multitude to believe and report such things of him which they themselves must needs know were both false and slanderous: and all this for the carrying on of their hypocritical pomp, and vulgar esteem. After which I added, that such who are busy to suggest false reports of men, and are desirous to publish such things of them which they know are false, on purpose to make them odious, that they may the better compass some base end of their own, and make no conscience of what they report, but only labour that they may get credit to it, such men as these are in that way which leadeth to that sin, which is the sin which shall not be forgiven. And indeed such men do so properly perform the devil's work (for he is ὁ ἀποστόλος, calumniator, a malicious slanderer) that it is the great pity or mercy of God, that they are not with him for their wages.

This was the sum of the discourse which I made upon that part: And if I shall be convinced of any thing therein as contrary to sound doctrine or good manners, as containing any thing false or unseasonable, I shall most willingly retract it; and be beholden to the man that shall instruct me better: till then I shall remain in the same mind as formerly I was, but shall not cease to wonder at somebody, (and considering that it was the wickedness of the Pharisees which occasioned this discourse, as likewise considering the end which in likelihood hath befallen them for this wickedness) I say considering these things, I cannot but wonder at somebody, as Cicero did at Mark Anthony: 'I wonder at thee, Anthony, that thou dost not tremble at those men's ends whose actions thou dost imitate.' Tert. Phil. Temor. Antoni. &c.

Sect. 30. I must trouble thy patience a little further about this same Thomas Powel; I have already told thee what I spake, as likewise the occasion upon which I spake it; but now why should Thomas Powel take this amiss, and keep it so long in his mind, and article against me for preaching against malice? It is well known, that (if deducible by good consequence from the text) I was as plain, and as high against others as against the malicious; was malice at this time Thomas Powel's Herodias? This it is for a man to have a guilty conscience about him: he confesseth himself guilty of the crime by his fretting and storming at the reproof. I can clearly say, that my pulpit reproofs were far from particularising of persons, yet I shall give thee another conjecture, upon which Thomas Powel might imagine that by that discourse after an especial manner I aimed at him.

Sect. 31. About the year 1651, there happened some difference betwixt this Thomas Powel and Robert Rainalds, the clerk of the parish; the person whom I said that this Thomas Powel maliciously and spitefully prosecuted. Of him Thomas Powel complains, and before some Justices of the Peace takes his oath, or procures William Cottle to swear it, that Rainalds had sold beer on the Lord's day, as likewise by unlawful measures.

Here I shall desire thee to observe, 1. That he neglects our own neighbouring Justices, and makes his complaint before Justices of another division. 2. This oath was merely upon hearsay. 3. That the complaint is only against him that sold, no mention made of him or them that bought.

I shall have nothing to say touching the first of these: but now as to the second, that this oath was only on hearsay, I am confident that Thomas Powel dares not say that he saw it, or knew of it, but only by report: and here William Pinchin and Thomas Powel concur again: William Pinchin swears touching things done at Box, when as he was then at Broughton, and William Cottle or Thomas Powel swear of selling of ale at Rainalds, when as perchance they were abroad at some other alehouse, or asleep at home. But now as to the third thing: If he knew that Robert Rainalds sold ale on the Lord's day, then must he needs know who bought it likewise, and how comes it that there is no mention made of him or them? There is a penalty to the one as well as to the other, and I take it, the like penalty to the one as to the other. And had it been pure zeal, and zeal like Phinehas, they had been pares in peccato, equal in the offence, so Thomas Powel would have made them like Zimri and Cozbi pares in pana, equal in the punishment. Nay further, I am sure that it will be made appear, that to Thomas Powel's knowledge others have sold ale on that day, as well as Rainalds, yea and by as small measures, yea and that Thomas Powel hath been at the drinking of it, yea and hath paid part of the reckoning; and yet we have not one word from Thomas Powel of this: and how comes he to be so zealous for the Lord's day, and lawful measures now? Certainly not out of any regard he had either to the one or the other, but to satisfy his own leavened spleen, in doing Rainalds a discourtesy. This same partial indirect information was among the hearthen accounted most unjust and unworthy: 'Quis hoc statuit, quod æquum sit in quintum, id iniquum esse in neviū?' But now amongst the people of God (if proceeding from a wrong ground in the informer, as envy, malice, or the like, or looking towards a wrong end, as benefit to himself, or revenge or mischief towards him against whom he gives the information) it was accounted a lye, although the informer had spoken nothing but the truth. And when it shall be upon oath that a man affirms so, I doubt not but that as he who speaks so, speaks falsely, so he that swears so, swears falsely. 'Ominino idem sit accedente juramento perjurium, quod est in nuda pollicitatione mendacium.' Dr. Sanderson, de Jur. Præt. 2, § 6, in fine.

Sect. 32. Now possibly I might thus discourse on those words, near about the time that these differences depended betwixt Thomas Powel and his neighbour, and Thomas Powel (for hypocrites are very touchy) might cut his own heart with them; his conscious breast giving him that when I reprov'd the fault, I meant him, and might watch for an opportunity (for hypocrites are very revengeful) to do me some displeasure. This I remember, when there was a Jury at Chippenham employed to enquire touching ministers, and the value of their livings, this Thomas Powel and William Pinchin, and another miller, I think they called him Stanmore, were as I heard very busy about me, but then they had not Commissioners which were for their turns, and therefore as to my prejudice they did nothing. But since Thomas Powel makes this an article against me, That I preached against malice, and said that malicious persons were the devil's nymphs, I must needs conclude him to be guilty of the crime; I shall tell him further, that I have read of such a one, (yea and a good one too) heretofore. 'Master, thus saying, thou reproachest us also;' Luke xi. 45. where you may observe that the lawyer freely acknowledgeth himself guilty of those crimes which our blessed Saviour there reproves; and yet the impudent proud thing counts himself slandered or reproached in that he is told of them.

Sect. 33. We have no more to say touching the Depositions which were taken at this time: but yet for a conclusion to the transactions of this day, give me leave to observe a few things unto thee.

1. That the Deposition of Mary Workman, who was examined upon all the Articles, and that Deposition carefully taken, (for said Mr. Blisset, she was a midwife, and so might know much) is wholly left out.

2. I told thee before that Obadiah Cheltenham then thwarted with a witness which was this Mary Workman, he then affirming when she had denied it, that I had within a quarter of a year, signed two children with the sign of the cross, she holding them in her arms; which he said were the children of Mr. Speke, and Mr. Snell. [Quid jurant? de veritate dicenda non modo super articulis datis sed in iis omnibus quæ ad causam faciunt. Cod. lib. 4. num 9, in marg. ad litteram a.] This made the poor woman amazed, considering that Obadiah Cheltenham being sworn with herself but a little before to speak the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth; and she rightly conceiving that the same oath bound him still all the while he was before these Commissioners, and speaking to my business, I say it made her amazed, that he should swear that I signed two children within a quarter of a year, when as one of those children, Mr. Speke's, was baptized Octob. 28, 1653, and almost a year older than the Ordinance by which these Commissioners sate and acted. Another circumstance for Mr. Blisset.

Sect. 34. Nor must it be forgotten, that at such time as William Pinchin was giving in his testimony touching my use of the form of Common Prayer, he having informed that I began with the Lord's Prayer, and afterward read some Psalms, Mr. Byfield asks him whether after the end of the Psalms, I said, Glory be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost. He then asked likewise whether (after I had baptized children) I said, Forasmuch as this child is regenerate. I remember not what answer William Pinchin made to one or other. But to me Mr. Byfield seems to intimate by his questions, that it should have been matter of charge against me if I had used either. I assure thee, reader, that this made me wonder: and what may there be in that Doxology that should offend Mr. Byfield? The thing itself? And is it a crime to give glory to the Blessed Trinity? Or will he be angry with us because we say as the heavenly host did, Glory to God in the highest? Were we not all baptized in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost? Which I conceive to mean more then Beza's 'Invocato nomine Dei Patris,' &c. and to import as much as to devote ourselves unto, or to resign ourselves up to the service of the Blessed Trinity: and are we charged for this, that we now make public profession of it? Or was it disliked by him because looked upon now as altogether useless, it being composed by the Council of Nice, in confutation of the Heresy of Arius? But now what if I should prove it to be more ancient than that Council, and formerly put to another use, and that those Fathers did not so much constitute as quote it: and quote it thereby to overthrow the blasphemy of the Arian, because it was contrary to that Doxology, which was appointed in the Apostolical and Primitive times? But yet admitting that Heresy to have been the cause of it, is it therefore now a crime, such a crime as may deserve ejectionment, to continue it? Is our field, our church so free from those tares? Is the orthodox doctrine of the Trinity so sincerely taught and believed, and so unanimously? tell me, you reformers, have you never since you began your reformation, heard of some that have plucked off no less than two or three of the persons of the Blessed Trinity? Stripping one of his being, another of his deity? And indeed had I not found it by experience, I should not have believed it, that the use of this Doxology should be imputed to a minister as a crime, or that a man should be reputed scandalous for this, because he made public profession that he was no Arian.

Sect. 35. And as touching Mr. Byfield's next query, whether I said, Forasmuch as this child is regenerate? I answer, that I believe that Mr. Byfield had small mind to engage himself or me in any of the public schools on that question touching baptismal regeneration, possibly he might have read what Dr. Burges and Mr. Bedford have said upon the same argument; yea even Mr. Baxter himself doubts not but that baptism is an instrument of relative regeneration and sanctification. But to put this matter (as to Mr. Byfield) out of doubt. In that confession of faith set out by the Assembly (whereunto there was no doubt Mr. Byfield's consent and approbation as well as his hand) we have these words:

"Baptism is a Sacrament of the New Testament, ordained by Jesus Christ, not only for the solemn admission of the party baptized into the Visible Church, but also to be unto him a sign and seal of the covenant of grace, of his ingrafting into Christ, of regeneration."

Doth Mr. Byfield under his hand acknowledge it to be a sign, and seal of regeneration, and yet is it in his judgment a crime in me to say so? If it be among men, when once a man hath put to his sign and seal, the person so engaging, as to all purposes and covenants expressed in that instrument, stands obliged to make them good: and the person to whom the grant is made, will from that day rest himself assured of his bargain, because he hath it under hand and seal. And dares any say that the covenant of God is not authentic, when as he hath put his sign and seal to it? And if it be authentic, can it be a fault in a minister to publish so much? I shall sum up all into an argument thus:

Baptism is a sign and seal of regeneration to infants, of believing parents: but the child or children by me baptised were such: Therefore it is a sign, and seal of regeneration to them.

Mr. Byfield hath under his hand acknowledged the major proposition, and the minor he dares not deny; and yet he was angry with me for inferring and pronouncing the conclusion.

Certainly his spleen conceived against the Liturgy, had now so far prevailed upon him, that in his passion he forgets what he had formerly written and published for orthodox. So that methinks Mr. Byfield might have then done as did one of whom I have heard heretofore, who stiffly denying a thing wherewith he was charged, and after being convicted of the truth of that charge by a writing under his own hand, fell to smite and complain of his head in some such upbraiding words as these, 'Why head, head, head, hast thou forgotten what thy hands have wrote.'

Sect. 36. But I shall put an end to the transactions of this day, desiring the reader to observe only this, that as we were leaving the room about eleven or twelve of the clock at night, William Pinchin and Obadiah Cheltenham delivered in a Paper to one of the Commissioners, which (as we guessed by the sequel) contained either that they had other matter of charge, or else some other witnesses which they desired might be heard against me.

The Transactions at my Third Time of Appearing before them at the White Hart in Marlborough, May 8, and 9, 1656.

Sect. 1. Shortly after my being at Lavington, there came a piece of paper unto me in these words:

Mr. Bushnell; You are hereby required to take notice, that the Commissioners for ejecting Scandalous Ministers, have appointed their next meeting at the sign of the White Hart in Marlborough, to be holden on Thursday the 8th of May next, by nine of the clock in the forenoon; when and where they expect and require your appearance before them, with your witnesses for your Defence, to receive their judgment according to the demerit of your causes. April 29, 1656. Signed in the Name and by the Order of the Commissioners, by me
For Mr. Walter Bushnell W. BLISSET.
Minister of Box, these.

Sect. 2. In order whereunto I repair unto Marlborough, where I find at the White Hart a very great appearance. For the Commonwealth, summoned in by the procurement of William Pinchin, there appeared (besides William Pinchin) Thomas Powel, William Clement, Nicholas Spencer, John Cottle, William Rawlins, Thomas Stevens, Anthony Balden, William Cottle of Rudloe, Henry Harris, John Harding, (Obadiah Cheltenham being gone thence for London that morning) these being all sworn, were required to speak to the Articles. But before any Deposition was taken, Mr. Byfield made a motion that all my witnesses (for I had many at that time there) might be withdrawn or turned out, while the witnesses for the Commonwealth were in examination; giving this reason, That it was not meet that they should hear what the other witnesses testified. Not meet indeed, for they would have noted and remembered many of their contradictions and perjuries, which Mr. Byfield would not that they should be public. This man in his proceedings desiring to be as close and as just as the Inquisition. This motion of his was soon condescended unto, and accordingly put in practice: he had before taken order that I should have no copy of their Depositions, from the clerk; which order was so strictly observed, that (which was strange) even money would not procure it; and here he takes a course that we shall not hear them from their mouths. But now when my witnesses came to be examined, the others were permitted to stay still, yea and encouraged to contradict, control, except against, and turn back whom they pleased; of which the reader shall have more hereafter.

Sect. 3. The leading men at this time were William Pinchin and Tho. Powel, who (for in the clerk's copy they are both yoked together) depose thus, that about seven years since Mr. Bushnell drank so hard upon the Lord's day (as they then conceived) that when he was at church he could scarcely read plain and distinctly, and John Jones and Lawrence Pinchin came from his house with him.

Sect. 4. Where I shall offer to thy consideration:

1. That whereas Thomas Powel swore formerly in William Pinchin's track, here they swear in a breast together.

2. That they had both sworn before that they never saw me drunk, or drinking to excess, and yet now upon the matter, and by consequence they depose it.

3. That this their deposition is grounded merely upon conjecture, neither of them seeing me drink a drop. Let us next see the reasons or grounds which moved them thus to conceit.

1. When I was at church I could scarcely read plain.

2. That John Jones, and Lawrence Pinchin came from my house with me.

Sect. 5. As to the first ['When I was at church 'I could scarce read plain';] and could no body observe this but Thomas Powel and William Pinchin? by what I have charged them with, and proved upon them in the Transactions of the former day, these two must needs appear, (to such as are of honesty or discretion) to be very unfit men and incompetent witnesses against me, much less to be ringleaders to the rest. I am confident that there were more at church at that time as well as they, and such as were as attentive and sate as near as they; and how comes it about that William Pinchin could find no swearing mate but Tho. Powel? This may be the reason of it, Thomas Powel had the last day approved himself to be a very hopeful scholar, and having then deposed, that about two years since, I said, that malicious persons were the devil's nimps; he might well depose now that about seven years since I could scarcely read plain; and yet, should I ask them, what chapter or psalm it was, or in what words I faltered, I believe (for all their good memories) they would say that they could not remember it: if the faltering had been often, the congregation must needs have noted it; and if but once, how come they to forget what it was? And in such cases I conceive it necessary that depositions and examinations should descend to particulars, and as they had charged me with indistinct reading, so ought they to have given instance wherein I failed. If they had charged me with treasonable words, or lascivious debauched speeches, it would have been demanded, but what were those words? what were those speeches? I told thee not long since what an excellent faculty Thomas Powel had to remember, when he came to particulars; and I believe that at this time (had they been urged to it) we should have had some such wise answer now as we had then; It was at this time that William Pinchin informs upon oath that I had used some of the Common-Prayer at the thanksgiving for his wife; and being asked what I said, he answered, That I prayed that the Moon should not burn her by day, nor the Sun by night; doubtless this man remembers himself accordingly as he teacheth Thomas Powel.

Sect. 6. But farther, in case I read not plain, the cause might not be in me, but in the book, wherein there are many typographical errors, some of which I might unexpectedly light on. It might proceed likewise from dimness of sight, darkness of the afternoon, or from many causes beside. But if they will needs have it that he who reads indistinctly must undoubtedly have drunk hard before, I shall from their antecedent infer this conclusion, that their man since at Box never came to church sober, for I have heard from some of the place that he hath not read a chapter plain and distinctly since he came among them.

Sect. 7. And to what end is this added that John Jones, and Lawrence Pinchin came from my house with me? The one is my uncie, the other my brother in law; living both in Corsham parish, a parish next adjoining. Touching whose behaviour if you enquire of their neighbours, I believe you shall be answered, that it is sober and civil; unless William Pinchin or some such like seduce them into their company. And as touching the occasion which drew them thither, I am confident that it was far more warrantable than what hath drawn William Pinchin on the Lord's days to Broughton, or Thomas Powel (on the same day too) to an alehouse at Corsham. I am apt to think that a main reason (besides his malice) which moved William Pinchin to swear that there was hard drinking at my house, was this, because it is his usual custom to do so at his own; for I can make it appear unto thee, that this William Pinchin together with no less than four of those who have appeared against me, have at his house from Saturday night till Sunday morning, set up drinking and singing, dancing and quarreling, inasmuch that William Pinchin conducted his neighbour Chet-tenham on his way homeward, belike for fear he should be assaulted.

Sect. 8. There was at this time another clause in their joint Deposition, as rational as the former, and it was this : that when John Jones and Lawrence Pinchin came to church they had high colours. Whether this clause were ever taken, or whether Index Expurgatorius hath dashed it out, I cannot say. But of this I am sure that some discourse there was about it in my hearing, while the Depositions were in taking : and as I have heard among the Commissioners after they had dined, when and where it was observed that some of them (having feasted themselves belike at the cost of Incident Charges) had very high colours : and this might be the cause why this branch should be cut off, because that from this dangerous topic, the same conclusion might be drawn against some of themselves. But now as touching John Jones and Lawrence Pinchin (admitting it were as they swore yet) their colours could be no argument of their hard drinking, for they that know them, seldom see them otherwise, but all times and seasons, high coloured and ruddy. If arguments may be deduced from complexions, I should then have argued with Mr. Byfield, that if ruddy complexions be a competent medium to prove excessive drinking, in them that look so ; then, that pale, wan, livery countenances were a competent medium to prove an excess of envy or malice in them that look so.

Sect. 9. Next comes William Pinchin alone in these words : And this deponent Pinchin saith farther, that about five or six years since, Mr. Bushnell was at a stabbal match with Mr. Edward Long and others, when they came to Rainald's alehouse aforesaid (this deponent being one of the company) and there they drank very hard, and healths were put round, and Mr. Bushnell drank them with his hat off, and did then drink excessively as this deponent conceives.

Sect. 10. Where first I shall desire thee to observe that William Pinchin in this deposition seems to contradict what he had sworn before. There he swears that he cannot say, that he ever saw me drunk ; and yet now that about five or six years ago, in his company I drank excessively, which is as much as if he had sworn I was drunk. It is like enough he may say (it is usual for him so to do) that at that time he did not mind it ; but since searching and bestirring of his memory, he hath by recollecting of himself recovered it, and can depose accordingly ; and now give me leave to tell thee (for this was not the first time that he made use of it) of the strange faculty of this man ; to see what gradations and pauses, he makes in his Depositions, how he remembers best at a distance ; how he mends himself in his recollections, and can swear more punctually of a thing done many years ago, than he could when it was but newly acted, and this is remarkable, that his second thoughts, his roused oaths, are most pernicious : he never swearing so desperately as when he hath most bethought himself, which will give any intelligent man cause to think, that what he deposeth in the second or third place, he doth not remember, but invent.

Sect. 11. I shall instance touching this man, in a particular besides my own, in the year 1646, he swore before the Committee of Wilts, sitting then at Marlborough, that he had heard that Mr. Speke rode in arms in the king's quarters ; but in the year 1656, he swears before some Commissioners sitting at the Devises, that he had seen Mr. Speke ride armed in a troop of the king's part, along by his father's house ; which clause of the Deposition riding armed in the troop must needs refer to some time before the year 1646. Then he could depose only that he heard of such a thing ; but ten years after he can depose that he saw it, which he swears accordingly. Touching which Deposition, although the gentleman suffered some prejudice in his estate ; but more in his thoughts, yet he seemed to be of the same mind, as an eminent knight once was, who being falsely accused upon oath, replies, That he was more sorry for the witness's perjury, than he was for his own danger. This gentleman Mr. George Speke, (although he freely forgave him, and prayed that God would forgive him likewise, yet) even to his dying day often protested, that by such strong asseverations, wherein he called God to witness, (which amounts to a voluntary oath) that Wm. Pinchin had sworn falsely against him.

Sect. 12. This and some such like passages gave a country farmer (as I have heard) occasion to say, that William Pinchin in his Depositions did usually 'fetch trip', it is like that his allusion might be to running leapers ; with whom it is not usual to do their best at first, but they assay again and again, and in their latter ever striving to out-do the former, in order whereunto, they fetch the larger or swifter trip. Now observe how William Pinchin observes this method in his swearing.

1. Against Mr. Speke, against whom he swears, first, That he had heard that he rode in arms ; but now this would not carry it, nor reach the mark at which he aimed, and therefore the next time he fetcheth a swifter trip, and swears that he saw it.

The like against me at Lavington, he swears, that although he hath seen me drinking yet he could not say that ever he saw me drunk, but now this oath was not mortal, nor did it cleave the hair ; and therefore he fetcheth a swifter trip at Marlborough, and swears that he conceives that I drank to excess in his company. He would have made the Commissioners believe at their last sitting at Lavington, that he had sworn further yet, and that the clerk had not taken it ; but the clerk offering to depose that after he had in private a perusal of the Depositions, with a power to add, alter, or amend what he pleased (for this was a favour which was shewn them) and that William Pinchin had left it, as the clerk had entered it, there was an end put to his leaping or fetching trip any more.

Sect. 13. And now methinks William Pinchin shews himself like such a witness which the chief priests and elders sought for heretofore, and could not find; for after their utmost search it is said of theirs, that neither so did their witness agree together; which disagreement, or inequality, or imparity of their testimony, I conceive lay not so much or only in this that they thwarted one with another: (For St. Mark reports both the witnesses as testifying the same thing) as it lay in this that take it at most, and stretch it out to the utmost, yet that it did not reach unto, but fell short of the thing which the chief priests and elders aimed at, and that was to put out blessed Saviour to death; for these righteous men knew that all which hitherto been testified would not before Pilate amount to so much as to make him worthy of death, and therefore it is said, that neither so was their witness in equalis, per, or conveniens: not equal, or alike, or agreeing, because it was not answerable to the desires and designs of the chief priests and elders. But notwithstanding they had testified beside, against, beyond the truth, yet they still came short of the suborner's malice. Now in such a case William Pinchin would have fetched trip; and if he had fallen short at one time, his memory should have served him, and he would have reached it at the next. So that his former oaths did upon the matter make him find his legs, or give him aim how to cleave the pin, having been wide, short, or over shot before. And here let me observe this unto thee, touching such who swear out of malice, and such who swear for a reward. They both agree in this, that neither the one nor the other regards the truth; but the malicious swears any thing that will do a mischief; the hireling any thing that he is taught: the first looks upon the penalty of the law, and swears not the truth, but whatsoever shall render a man obnoxious; the other looks upon the reward, and swears (not the truth neither, but) any thing which may procure his wages; nor is it unusual but that he who hath so much malice as to swear falsely himself, will find so much money or somewhat equivalent, which shall prevail with some other so far as to swear, as he would have him. It being commonly seen that the malicious murderous spirits bait the hook, for the greedy and hungry to bite at and swallow. Of this the reader shall have examples in this William Pinchin and others hereafter, as they fall in their proper place.

Sect. 14. But let us descend to particulars, and take William Pinchin's Deposition apart. 1. He deposeth that I was at a stabbal match with Mr. Long, and others. 2. That afterward we came to Rainald's alehouse. 3. That he was one of the company. 4. That there they drank very hard. 5. That healths were put round, and that I drank them with my hat off, &c.

As touching the first of these, if by being at a stabbal match, his meaning be, that I was a spectator there, then it might be true; if his meaning be, that I was there as a gamester, then it was false. And what a crime it is to be there as a looker on, (or indeed as making one in the recreation) I am yet to learn. Those that there played were gentlemen of as good rank and repute, as were most in those neighbouring parts; and there they sometimes met to recreate themselves at that exercise, it being an usual game in that place; and it is like enough that it might be their pleasure to send to me, being of their ancient acquaintance, as having been born and bred amongst them; brought up at the same time, at the same school with them; and afterwards at the same time with some of them at the same university; upon which accounts thither I might come, and be then and there a looker on. And yet all this, (by their leave) with far less just cause of scandal or disrepute to my profession, than to be at markets or fairs, buying and selling, chapping and changing, matching and measuring colts and horses amongst jockeys and horse coursers.

Sect. 15. I add, 2, That Mr. Edward Long might be then and there in the company, and others likewise, but now how comes it about that some of those others are not expressed in particular as well as Mr. Long? I must tell the reader, that index expurgatorius hath been here again, for upon my cross examination I desired that William Pinchin might be required to instance in some particulars, in some other persons beside, which were there with Mr. Long, myself, and &c. as conceiving it to be somewhat ridiculous that it should be informed, that Mr. Long should play at stabbal with &c. or that &c. should come to Rainald's, and drink healths with hats off; all know actus esse suppositorum, that it is the person that acts, and not the species, or the individuum vagum. To which William Pinchin answers, that besides Mr. Long, myself, and &c. there were Mr. Ducket, and my brother. This I desired might be taken and entered accordingly, and Mr. Chambers (being then near to the clerk) told me that it was so entered, and yet we see not one word of it in the Depositions which we were to plead unto: And it is like enough that this was the reason why it was dashed out, Mr. Ducket and my brother were both living, and shortly afterwards before these Commissioners ready to vindicate both themselves and me, and therefore it was requisite that they should be left out; but now Mr. Long being dead, and &c. nobody, might be kept in as most competent pot companions with me, for Mr. Long being not to be recalled, and &c. no where to be found, could not with any possibility be called upon, to speak any thing either for themselves or me. And here let me observe this unto thee, that as companions in my intemperance they either quote such who are dead, and cannot speak, or if living, then are they such which they are resolved not to hear. I could willingly add something touching that gentleman Mr. Long, this is the second time that (in this business) his name hath been in question to his disrepute long after he was dead; but they have not yet done him all the wrong that they intend, and therefore I shall suspend what I have to say of him, till we hear of him again.

Sect. 16. And as to the next thing, To Rainald's we might come. That was the house where these gentlemen usually dined, and it is not impossible but that this deponent might be in the company. But now I shall add, as with reference to myself, that that clause of "his being in the company," renders the following passages, "that I drank hard, that healths were put round, that I drank with my hat off, and then drank to excess," even impossible to be true. I remember that that ingenuous knight sir Tho. More, observes it in Richard the Third, That ambition and malice had so far transported him, that in the contrivance of his designs, and the laying of his scene, he very far overshot himself in point of common discretion, and rational polity; for, saith he, Richard pretending his body to be wasted with sorcery and witchcraft, he charges his brother's wife, the queen, as a sorceress, and Shore's wife as a witch of her council, for working this mischief towards him: Whereas, says that observative knight, besides that the queen was too wise to go about any such folly, yet if she would, of all others she would not have made Shore's wife of her council, whom of all women she most hated. Proportionably say I, if I had been at any time intemperately given, or so idly disposed as to drink too much, yet certainly this could never be where William Pinchin was; I should not in any wise have made him my companion; for since I had any right understanding of his conditions, and that was in the year 1645, as I shall thee more anon, I discovered a mass of such ingredients in him, which were enough to denominate a man base and unworthy; and these further confirmed to me, by continued and frequent, barbarous and base pranks and practices, which had that influence upon me, that from that time, as much as I could, I shunned his company, much more his familiarity or intimacy, finding in him too much of what might be detested or feared; but nothing of that which might be desired or loved. And doth he now quote himself, together with Mr. Edward Long and &c. to be both a witness and companion of my intemperance? I have a confidence that those who well know both William Pinchin, and myself, will conclude, that there was no such thing, because William Pinchin says that he was then in the company.

Sect. 17. And observe next, whether he doth not swear like a jolly fellow indeed, as if his hand were in, That there they drank very hard, &c. this deponent being one of the company. From whence it must needs follow, That he himself likewise was one who drank very hard, that drank healths with his hat off, and that drank to excess, and yet such is his malicious impudence, that he chargeth me of those crimes whercof he acknowledgeth himself to have been guilty of at the same time; which is much worse than those worst of men, the hypocritical pharisees and scribes (the Godly of those times Mr. Chambers) for these, although justly convicted, and thoroughly ashamed and silenced, yet that we read of, were neither guilty of, nor ever confess the crime whercof they accused the woman. I have read the fable, I have read the moral of it too: but here we have an example of an envious man, who sticks not to pull out one of his own eyes, so that his neighbour might lose both his; in case that had been true which he informed (which was most false) yet in him it had been most false and base, because envy and malice put him upon it. But now what name is bad enough for it, if envy and malice did not only put him upon it to report, but to invent it likewise? I have read and heard of those who have employed themselves, or been employed by others, as spies, or decoys to insinuate themselves into men's affections; to mix with them in desperate designs, to like, to applaud and be with the foremost of the company, and all this, that they might afterward betray and accuse them. But this (however practised, however countenanced) employment always looked upon as unworthy a Christian, yea or of a man, although the end pretended be safety or security, or such which have the face of good, and what such may expect, the Apostle tells us. But now of a man that should belie himself to mischief his neighbour, and swear falsely against himself, that there might be the more poison and venom in his accusation, of such a one I have not read beside William Pinchin. The man that cometh nearest to him (as I remember) is that Amalekite. In this there lies a difference:

1. That this Amalekite only speaks falsely of himself; but William Pinchin swears falsely.

2. This Amalekite belies himself out of some hopes of reward which he expected; but William Pinchin swears falsely against himself that he may do some greater mischief towards me. There is a passage in that story which the Commissioners might have then made very good use of. David there takes him at his word, and according proceeds against him in these words, Thy blood be upon thy head, for thy mouth hath testified against thee, and accordingly punisheth him as a murderer. So might the Commissioners (for some of them were Justices of Peace) have said to William Pinchin, Thy mouth hath testified against thyself; thy punishment be therefore on thine head, and accordingly punished him as a drunkard. If William Pinchin's oath were true, then his fact was punishable; if false, then is perjury.

Sect. 18. But I shall not at present trouble the reader any longer with William Pinchin; the next that presents himself is Nicholas Spencer. And he being sworn, saith,

That he hath been oft with Mr. Bushnell at alehouses in parish business, and not at other times, nor did he ever see him drink excessively. But saith, that there they met by accident, and then discoursed of parish business.

Prythee reader, give me thy thoughts, Where lies the matter of charge in this Deposition?

He says we have there met by accident, I presume he means at Rainalds; it is very likely as just occasions (Robert Rainalds being clerk of the parish) might draw me thither, as were those that drew him.

Next comes William Clement, and he deposeth:

That in the time of the wars he found Mr. Bushnell at Rainald's alehouse: When Rainalds told him that the king had lost a garrison to the Parliament; at which Mr. Bushnell struck his breast, and said he was sorry for it.

Although I see no matter of charge against me in this Deposition, unless it were scandalous to be loyal, yet let me add something touching the person who thus deposed, and with what affections he did it. I shall therefore here give thee to know, that this William Clement is father-in-law to William Pinchin, and that William Pinchin hath had a great hand over him, and hath frightened him to do that which I believe hath troubled William Clement more than the taking of any oath whatsoever; of which thou shalt have more hereafter: for the present I shall only acquaint thee with what affections William Clement appeared against me, and afterward shall leave it to thee to judge whether he had not some malicious and spiteful intentions which set him on work. Sometime after this William Clement meets with one Thomas Morley, of Swanswick near Bath, whom (contrary to his former use) he bespeaks very fair, calling him cousin, proffering him the beer, that he was glad to see him, that he had been oftentimes coming to his house, or to some such purpose, but in the close, he falls to the business, which was, That the minister of Box was not right, that they were resolved to out him, that an especial witness which they had against him, was one Sanders who had done Thomas Morley some wrong [That is, had broken open and robbed his house] but in regard that this Sanders was so material a witness for their purpose his request to him was, That Thomas Morley would not at that time appear against him, because that might very much impair the credit of that witness, whose testimony was so useful. All that I shall now say touching this William Clement is only this, that he who laboured to stop another man's mouth, from speaking a truth which might have been to my behoof, may rationally be conceived to open his own mouth to report a falsehood which might be to my prejudice.

Sect. 20. The transactions of this day do now draw towards an end; for although there be seven witnesses yet behind, viz. Anthony Balden, John Harding, John Cottle, William Rawlings, Thomas Stevens, Henry Harris, and William Cottle of Rudloe for his mother; yet these being sworn and examined upon the several Articles, had not one word to say to either; which made one of the Commissioners in a kind of wonder to ask, Wherefore so many were summoned to appear having nothing to say? I cannot but tell thee, that one of the witnesses whom I named but now, conceived that at that time we should have had an end of it, in regard that all that said any thing which signified any matter of charge against me were William Pinchin and Thomas Powel, and in regard again, that it was so manifest that what they spake, they spake out of malice; which (said he) the Commissioners having more understanding than we, must needs perceive; and so they did some of them, and one of them, a minister too, (to the Doctor's credit be it spoken) reported it elsewhere. And yet, which is strange in this man, although he discovered their leaven, and so must know them to act from base principles, and with reference to a base end; yet he always vouchsafed to these men whom he knew thus to act, his favourable countenance and furtherance. I know that the comparison would be odious, and therefore I will make none, only let me observe thus much unto Dr. Chambers, That Pilate sought to discharge the person accused before him, because he perceived that they delivered him out of envy; and it is commendable in him: but now here we have one acknowledging that the prosecution of these witnesses proceeded from malice, and yet he backs and encourages the very worst of them to go on.

Sect. 21. It was at this time that I desired the Commissioners might have been informed upon oath, what a manner of man William Pinchin had formerly been towards grandfather in law, and grandmother, father and mother, father in law, and mother in law, uncle and aunt, brother and sister; and how barbarously he had used me, and what further mischief he had threatened against me, for no other cause that I can imagine, but only for entertaining, lodging, relieving, cloathing, furnishing with money his father, mother and brother, when he had beaten them out of doors; for I had a confidence that there were then amongst the Commissioners some gentlemen of discretion, and conscience, who (having a right understanding of his qualities and conditions, and being informed how he had been several times complained of, and convicted before several Justices of the Peace, of such horrid and barbarous crimes, as have scarcely been acted since Cain, and the father of Canaan, and Absalom lived upon the earth, (all which I could then, and at this present can easily prove) would never have taken him for a credible witness, or have countenanced him as an informer, or solicitor, no nor so much as looked on him, unless it had been in detestation. But now none more forward to withstand and oppose this than Dr. Chambers, who knew much of it to be true, but was not willing it is like, that it should come to the knowledge of these gentlemen, for fear that he should thereby have lost so precious a witness, or perhaps for fear that he should have heard something which would have nearly reflected on himself. This Doctor then acknowledging that there had been some small differences between them, praying that no more words might be made of it; together with an intimation that all differences were now composed, or to some such purpose: In order whereunto William Pinchin produces a large paper which he had then in readiness, written by himself, containing a large story of his own making, acknowledging that there had been some small differences among them; that he had 500*l.* with his wife; and that all was now composed and well, or to that purpose. This paper (being solemnly delivered in) was deliberately read by Mr. Blisset: That Mr. Blisset which would not then allow of cozening, and cursing, and parricide, to be sufficient exceptions against him or any man in point of testimony. These it is like he looked on as circumstances; and to tell thee my mind, when I had observed the manner of their proceedings, I could not but think of those elders and nobles that condemned Naboth; who (notwithstanding that they knew the witnesses which appeared against him to be sons of Belial, notwithstanding they knew them to be false witnesses of their own making, yet) passed sentence according to that false evidence which they themselves had put into the witnesses' mouths. But to return to the paper, of all other passages I cannot forget this that he says, That now all differences were composed; belike he means betwixt his father and himself. And such another certificate might Cain have framed and delivered in, and have said, that all was now sweetly composed, and there were now no differences remaining betwixt him and his brother, for that he himself had murdered him some certain years before. That good old man William Pinchin's father was dead near three years before this time: and although I cannot but believe that God gathered him to his grave in peace: (so knowing what I know) I cannot think otherwise but that this son of his hastened his fall; and so although the father were thereby the sooner with God, yet we may well think that the son is the farther from him by it: it being usual for wicked children, brothers, and other wicked men, to hasten God's servants to him by those ways and means and means by which they ruin themselves. And although our laws repute none parricides but such who lay violent hands on their parents, and by some blows and wounds give them some visible cause of death: yet I doubt not, but that divine justice will look upon many for parricides whom our laws do not reach; nor see I any cause to doubt of it, but that he who with frights, with threats, with curses, with blows, with gripes in the throat, with drawing knives, with continual horrid and barbarous vexations, shall even break his father's heart, (and so much William Pinchin the elder hath said that his son would do by him) is as guilty of his blood as if he had taken a knife and stabbed him. And I could advise Mr. Chambers to admonish William Pinchin that he would sadly consider of it in this his day: and I am confident of it, that they had done better service both to the church of God and to the Commonwealth, if (instead of encouraging him to swear falsely and maliciously himself, and instructing others to do the like) they had spent some pains with him to have made him know, that the voice of a father's blood is far more clamorous than the voice of a brother's.

Sect. 22. And it is more than Dr. Chambers knows, whether there have been any such love and unity amongst those who are there yet behind, as was then suggested and pretended to be. If he knows not of it already, I can tell him that since the time that I was thrust from Box, there have been notable clashing of doors, gnashing of teeth, sweet words passing from the son to the mother, and great thwarting and crossing betwixt them in their business, it being William Pinchin's custom to do by his mother as he did by me. To do himself some mischief, that he may do his mother a greater, pleasing himself in frightening away work and custom from their mill, as I have heard; belike thinking himself well satisfied with little or nothing, because his mother doth thereby lose her half. The Doctor, if he ask the neighbourhood, or the servants, or the children, may be told that there is little there that savours of a cordial union, or of a blessed reformation. Possibly it may not be so public now as it hath been formerly: but in case she be forced out of her house, she dares not say that she was kicked or beaten; and in case she comes to any of her neighbours, she must complain softly, and in a chamber, and buy her relief, or else want it. The recompence which she hath made me, being a fair warning for any one to receive, relieve, or else to pity her. Nay more, Mr. Stern hath told me since I came to town, that her son hath used a means to force her not only out of her house, but out of the county likewise.

Sect. 23. At the same time it was that William Pinchin produced another paper (I think he received from Thomas Powel) as the complaint of an honest man (I think he added Godly too) being at that time in the county of Somerset. The writing was but short, and the complaint as I remember;

That he had lived so long under my ministry, and was not profited; or to that purpose.

Which paper upon my request they shew unto me, upon the view whereof I find it to be the hand of William Sergeant, a man indeed living in Somerset, but in a parish adjoining to Box, a considerable part of his estate lying in that parish: about the tythes whereof (for he refuseth payment) he hath been questioned and cast by both parson and vicar, and so far proceeded against, that he lay in gaol upon the same score even to his dying day. This man William Sergeant, by report, hath gone through all opinions, and at that time was, and I think still continued as vehement a Quaker, as any whatsoever. Upon the redelivery of the paper, I told them I had much to shew from the same man, and written by the same hand. Now by this the Commissioners might have guessed what sort of men appeared against me, in that they laboured to strengthen themselves by such who are profest enemies to the profession and calling of ministers. Nor was this the first time that they received papers against me written by this William Sergeant. He it was that wrote the Articles against me, which were exhibited by John Travers, his brother in law. But since he was in person before the commissioners at my next time of my appearing; I shall trouble thee no more about him now, nor with any thing else touching the transactions of this day.

From Marlborough after an expensive reckoning we are discharged: and notwithstanding the warrant by which I appeared, expressed that I should then receive Judgment according to the demerit of my cause; yet as to sentence there was nothing then done; belike the testimonies came not up as yet to the expectations of these commissioners, or to Mr. Byfield's and Dr. Chambers desires, or else William Pinchin might give them in another paper, and that he had other witnesses yet behind, that could swear farther and testify more; but for that time discharged I was until another summons.

The Transactions at my fourth time of appearing before them, June 4, and 5, at the George in Caln.

Sect. 1. Being as I told thee thus discharged from Marlborough, May 9, within some short time after I received a piece of paper from John Travers in these words:

Mr. Bushnell; Your appearance is expected before our Commissioners at their next meeting at the George in Caln, Wednesday the 4th. of June, with your witnesses, for your further defence; if you intend any more.

May 14, 1656. WILLIAM BLISSET, Clerk.

Sect. 2. Whither we repair accordingly, and there we find for the Commonwealth William Pinchin, Jone Pinchin his mother, Elizabeth Pinchin his wife, Peter Web, John Gibbons, Nicholas Spencer, Thomas Hayward, Ann the wife of William Rawlins, William Cottle, and Henry Parsons of Box, John Gibbons of Corsham, John Travers of Slaughtenford, William Sergeant of Bathford, William Sanders of Chippenham, Obadiah Cheltenham, Richard Cottle, and Lawrence Cottle of Ditcheridge, who being all sworn were required to speak to the Articles, accordingly as they were proposed unto them.

Sect. 3. But before I descend to any particulars, I shall recommend to thy observation some few things. As,

1. That William Pinchin at this time leaves off to be a witness, and now takes upon him and acts the part of a solicitor or informer, for (as I can prove) he instructed and catechised some of the witnesses before, and so far prevailed with them, that they were contented to swear not what they had informed him of, but accordingly as he had written; and afterward he marshals his witnesses into a form, and accordingly as he looked upon his paper they were called upon, and examined upon those Articles to which he referred them. Obadiah Cheltenham being his assistant in the business; for notwithstanding it was much which they then said and did, yet we have not one word as from them in the Depositions which were taken that day.

2. I have told thee the last day, how no less than seven of William Pinchin's witnesses wholly disappointed him, and that two more said something to no purpose; so that he had none to stand by him then but his honest neighbour Tho. Powel. But now you may guess, having such hints and encouragements from his Commissioners and Doctors, he hath by this time fitted himself with men proper for their purposes and his own; for he hath now procured men of all sorts, and from several quarters, not only parishes but counties likewise; nor is it any wonder that some of them, considering their own quality, the encouragements from those Commissioners, and the virtues of their tutor William Pinchin, should fetch trip, and swear to the purpose. That he, (that is William Pinchin) suborned some to swear, and tampered with others, was, or would have been proved to the Commissioners faces: and this might be the cause why Will. Pinchin would not swear himself, because he had an assurance that he had now a sort of approved lads who would swear as he would have them; so that whatsoever is afterwards deposed you may look upon as William Pinchin's, having got this advantage by it, that whereas he swears formerly by himself, which could be looked upon only as a single testimony: now he swears by many proxies, which may be looked upon as several testimonies: when as in truth it is all Pinchin still, although conveyed by other pipes and feathers.

Sect. 4. Nor must it be forgotten that Mr. Byfield, as soon as he had taken his pipe of tobacco, coming from a window where formerly he was, made a proposal 'that all persons whatsoever there present should withdraw.' It is thought that he had some farther proposal to make, which was conceived to be touching some gentlemen then in the room, whose presence he did not, as it was thought, so well like of; but soon after we were all called in again, and all admitted excepting my witnesses; but Mr. Byfield would not by any means admit that they should be in the hearing.

Sect. 5. Something I must tell thee likewise, touching William Sergeant, whom I have lately mentioned. John Gibbons of Corsham, and he, were both at Caln before the Commissioners; but both soon thrust out of door because they would not take their oaths, and keep off their hats. Now I have heard that all which William Sergeant had then to say was against the calling; and that his coming thither was to have spoken to Mr. Chambers, or Mr. Byfield, against whom I am confident they had far greater exceptions than against me. And that this was William Sergeant's business at Caln appears by this; for it was he who after he was turned out of doors at Caln made that great stir beneath in the Court: it was he that then scattered the printed papers, one whereof was brought up into the Commissioners-chamber and delivered to them by Mr. Crump, who was much troubled at it, and put into a great sweat thereby. And now, is it not strange that the Commissions should receive Articles and Papers against me, from such hands? Nay, is it not more strange that they should retain, and file up his papers, and yet reject his person? that his papers should be carefully kept, and looked on as godly, and yet that the author should be turned out of door as a Quaker? I wonder not so much at William Pinchin that he should produce such men (for you shall see in the following discourse that he hath prepared and produced much worse) as at those Ministers who ever countenanced the person of the one, and made use of the papers of the other. It was an handsome argument which a woman used to the duke of Clarence, thereby to withdraw him from the earl of Warwick with whom he sided, to his own brother king Ed. 4, against whom he took part. 'That the especial aim of that part wherein Clarence was at present engaged, was utterly to extinguish and ruin the house of York, whereof Clarence was an eminent person.' And I say that the consideration of the designs of such sort of men, might have told the Commissioners, the Ministers at least, that as to this particular their case was as mine; and that had they opportunity to their will, they would do as much by them as they have done by me.

Sect. 6. But to come to the Depositions; the first in order as they lie in the copy received from their clerk, was the Deposition of John Travers; who saith,

That about four (1) years since he having by (2) order taken up some Malignant's horses at Box, (3) several addresses were made to him by Mr. Bushnell, (4) major Hunt, and (5) others who came altogether from Mr. Bushnell's house, having there drank very hard, being high in beer, as this deponent conceived.

Sect. 7. Touching which Deposition I shall observe to thee:

1. That the time when as John Travers came to Box, was in August, 1648, which is much more than four years before June, 1656. Another circumstance for Mr. Blisset.

2. What other order he had I know not, but I am sure that he then acted by virtue of a forged warrant written as from Mr. Edward Stokes, his name likewise being subscribed unto it; but disavowed by that gentleman, as neither written by him, or by his consent; and conceived to be contrived by Thomas Webb, John Travers his brother-in-law. That Webb who is so notorious for infamy with Mr. H. White's late wife; this Webb being at that time in the company, and a very busy man among them. By which you may guess John Travers to have been a very unfitting man to be looked on as a credible witness, when as I could then, and can yet prove him guilty of such crimes which our law punisheth with pillory, loss of ears, sitting of nostrils, and searing with an hot iron, and it may be rationally presumed, that he who will for an advantage make one man say what he never thought of, will likewise for a like advantage make another man do, what he never did.

And 3, whereas he adds that there were addresses made by me to him, I must tell them that this is like the rest. I make addresses to John Travers? I had known the fellow above thirty years before; yet cannot remember that he was ever so high, or myself so low, as that I that I should either need or fear him. And, says he, that I made addresses unto him? And these several addresses; whereas I am sure that I could have made him confess, that I was then never but once where he was; and then my business was to colonel Eyre, and not to John Travers. And next he adds that major Hunt and others came from my house. Here we have dead men and &c. my companions again; for although Mr. Hunt were then living, yet he was not at the time of my appearing before the Commissioners, in a capacity to vindicate either himself or me. And whereas he says that they had there drank very hard, it must be replied that it was more than John Travers knew whether they drank so much as a drop there, he saw it not, for he was not in the house, and therefore what he swears is either upon conjecture or hearsay. This is the third time that they have received such testimonies against me.

Sect. 8. I shall give thee an account of the story as it was; A party of soldiers (whereof John Travers was one) having taken up horses in the parish, amongst others light upon a horse or two of one Mr. Collier's, a gentleman then living in Dorsetshire, and a brother to Mrs. Hunt, whom he then came to visit; they being thus distressed repair to col. William Eyre for his assistance, which he promises, in order whereunto he repairs to Box, whither likewise repair Mr. Hunt, Mr. Collier, Mrs. Hunt, and two more of her sisters; who conceiving col. Eyre to be at my house, come thither, but not finding him there (after a very short stay) they make to another place where they understood he was, and I along with them. And I assure thee, that their haste was such, and their stay with me so short, that I cannot say that they ever sat down or drank so much as a glass of beer. And thus much would two soldiers at that time quartered with me in the house (who were more likely to know, and to speak the truth than John Travers) have deposed, if I could have had so much justice that they might be heard. Indeed John Travers was so far in the right, that one of the gentlemen was very high, which was this Mr. Collier, but it was in anger, and not in beer; and so I believe John Travers would have found him, if Mr. Collier had had him in a convenient place. I have told thee that we all came along together from my house to col. Eyre, where John Travers likewise was, and many more beside, where we made some stay, and had much discourse about those horses, and other matters. And it is strange that none should observe this distemperature in all that time, but only John Travers who never saw us drink. But doubtless John Travers expected some monies for his pains, and therefore right or wrong, true or false, he would swear something to the purpose that he might seem to have deserved his wages. I hear that afterward he wished that he had never meddled in it, (so did Judas too) for that he had thereby gained the disrespect of some gentlemen; nor can I wonder if that all men should abandon and abhor his society that sticks not at forgery and perjury. But since he is dead, I shall say no more of him but only this, (and this is tertium aliorum.) That notwithstanding he had been of a long time a contribution-gatherer, a plunderer, an informer, a kind of agent and sequestrator, yet it is said that he died very poor: and notwithstanding he had been many times absent from Slaughtenford, and for a long time together, yet divine Providence so orders it, that he should die a beggar in that place where his infamies were known and practised; touching the manner of his death I say nothing.

Sect. 9. Next comes Joan Pinchin widow, and says that about two years and a half since, Jane Hendy told her that Mr. Bushnell had attempted to lie with her: and withal said, that she did think that most of your parsons were fleshly given. And saith, That about two years since Mr. Bushnell baptised Mr. Speke's child by the Book of Common Prayer, and signed it with the sign of the cross.

Sect. 10. You may remember that in the transactions of the first day at Lavington, I told you that Jane Hendy was summoned in as a witness for the Common-wealth: but I made no mention of her information then, conceiving that it might be better deferred till another time. She was likewise at Marlborough, May 8, and was sworn there likewise, her Deposition being taken in these words:

That she never heard of any lascivious talk from Mr. Bushnell, nor did he ever attempt to lie with her, nor doth she remember that she ever spake of any such thing to Joan Pinchin widow, or to any other person.

This her Deposition, together with her age and poor withered countenance, had in all likelihood satisfied the Commissioners as to that particular; but now William Pinchin at Lavington boldly interposes and tells the Commissioners that his mother this Joan Pinchin had told him that this Jane Hendy had said so much to her: on which master Chambers adds that if Goodwife Pinchin had said so, he was bound to believe her. And again at Marlborough, May 8, when there were papers delivered in by William Pinchin written by himself, wherein it was affirmed under her mark that Jane Hendy should say so, the Doctor adds again, That if Goodwife Pinchin said so, he was in conscience bound to believe her.

Sect. 11. Now by the Doctor's leave I conceive these words of his, 'I am bound, and I am bound in conscience to believe her,' were not spoken by him either with discretion or charity.

1. Not with so much advisedness or discretion; for it is well known that William Pinchin had that power over his mother that she dared not but to say and to do as her son would have her; I believe so well known that the Doctor himself could not be altogether ignorant of it; and what an encouragement did these words of the Doctor give William Pinchin to teach his mother to say or to swear any thing, having this assurance given her before-hand, That whatever she said must be believed, and go for current? if she had not said so, yet he having such a hint given him and such a power with his mother, might easily order it that against her appearing before them she should attest it with confidence. When I consider the story of Herod and the Baptist, I am fully persuaded that Herod's unadvised promise, gave occasion to his wife's and brother's daughter to ask John Baptist's head. And (that notwithstanding they hated him to death) they would not have made such a request, unless they had been emboldened thereunto by Herod's promise; but now when such words shall fall from his mouth, 'Whatsoever thou shalt ask of me I will give,' and this promise confirmed with an oath; this is enough to make them fly high, and to bethink themselves touching some great demand, proportionable to his vast concession, and their vaster malice. One of the Evangelists reports it, that having such a promise, she consulted with her mother what she should ask, and there is no doubt of it, but that the consideration of such a promise moved her mother so to instruct her: and why might not these words from the Doctor, 'I am bound, and I am bound in conscience to believe her,' hearten up the son to instruct his mother what to swear, as well as those other words heartened up the mother to instruct her daughter what to ask?

Sect. 12. But yet in case that Goodwife Pinchin had said so, yet what sufficient grounds had the Doctor for so much confidence, 'I am bound, I am bound in conscience?' I shall allow it that the Doctor hath been a long time acquainted with her, that she may have entertained him and his often, and her carriage may have been such as to gain his good opinion of her; but yet all this will not amount to be a sufficient ground for so much confidence, that she should be so knowing as that she could not err from the truth, or so cordial and entire that she would not report a falsehood, for all Mr. Chambers knew she might be another woman than he took her for. And why might not the Doctor be mistaken in her as well as he hath been in many others? (women I mean, for there his acquaintance did especially lie, and these many of them such who had the hand over their husbands) who have followed him as far, and as oft as Joan Pinchin, and yet are now fallen off both from his doctrine and acquaintance? Nay, why might not the Doctor be mistaken in her, as well as he hath been in his friend and chaplain Blake late of Warminster:

no man can know what is in another's heart. Nay, why may not the Doctor be mistaken in her as well as many hundreds have been mistaken in the Doctor? Alas what just grounds of confidence have we that we cannot be mistaken in others, when as we are so often deceived in our own selves? When as the Prophet says that the heart is deceitful above all things, desperately wicked, who can know it? Doubtless he speaks of the deceitfulness and small knowledge which every man hath of his own heart, as well as of the hearts of other men.

Sect. 13. But yet (for all the Doctor's great confidence) others, who have had more and better means to be acquainted with Joan Pinchin in some particulars than I believe ever the Doctor had, have not met with so much upright dealing from this Joan Pinchin which deserves so great an encomium: I have heard of such that have discovered her to be very nimble with her Toldish, more nimble than became an honest woman: I have heard too from others who have been set by their parents (it seems they had cause to doubt her) to watch her that she might not mis-remember herself, and take toll twice; it was her own son William (as I have heard) that said she had driven away most of the custom from the mill, and certainly this could not be by any of her virtues. I love not to rake in dunghills, yet this I can say of my own knowledge, that she hath borrowed of me several and considerable sums which she hath neither paid me, nor will she confess that she ever borrowed them; and that she hath in money and account received several sums from me, which she will not acknowledge that she ever received. I lent her and her husband money out of my purse, when her son had beaten them out of door, they being utterly destitute, nor knew they where to go to relieve themselves, which is yet unpaid, nor can I gain any thing from them but base words and deeds in lieu of it. The Doctor may do well to advise them to make payment to me, (it is a piece of courtesy which he hath done for his friends in some other place as I have heard) or else let him abate of his good opinion of them. But if he will not credit me, let him ask his friend Mr. Stern what just and upright dealing he found with them, when he sojourned with them there? and what a reckoning they brought him in (as he hath reported it) for bread and cheese. [71.] It is true indeed, that it is believed that Mr. Stern had better provision there than bread and cheese, and therefore was it false in him to report it so; but yet it is believed again that he either paid for that which he never had, or paid to a far greater value than the provision came to, and that therefore the Doctor's good friend must be guilty of cozening and cheating. We know that in the Decalogue that command, Thou shalt not bear false witness, is in order immediately after that, Thou shalt not steal; it may be that the prohibitions are therefore so near, because usually the sins are so. He that hath stolen will not stick at a lie, nor is it any great wonder that such who have been light of their hands, should be false of their tongues.

Sect. 14. And now I shall add that these words, 'I am bound, I am bound in conscience to believe her,' were not spoken by the Doctor, with charity towards Jane Hendy, for the poor old woman had been twice before them before this time, and upon her oath (being never tampered with or prepared, as was William Pinchin's use, no nor so much as spoken with by me) deposed,

"That she never heard any lascivious talk from Mr. Bushnell; nor did he ever attempt to lie with her; nor doth she remember that ever she spake of any such thing to Joan Pinchin widow, or to any other person."

And now for Dr. Chambers (a man of so much reverence and learning) to say (when it had been good manners in him to hold his peace) that if goodwife Pinchin had said so he was in conscience bound to believe her, was (upon the matter) to say to this Jane Hendy's face, that she had twice forsworn herself; I said before, that the Doctor could not know so much of the widow Pinchin, but he might be mistaken in her. I now add further, that for any thing he knew, this Jane Hendy might deserve as good an opinion of her fidelity as he had of this Joan Pinchin; and is it not then a most uncharitable thing for such an one as the Doctor to pronounce the one as infallible, the other as perjured, upon such uncertain grounds? 'I am bound in conscience.' Beside the encouragement, which this gave to William Pinchin, of which I have spoken already, what consternation and amazement must this needs bring upon all my witnesses? When as a word from William Pinchin, (who will say or swear any thing to do a mischief) as from his mother (who must swear and say as he would have her) shall in this Doctor's judgment render them under that notion as to be looked upon as persons perjured.

Sect. 15. I report it with much sadness of spirit that these contradictory testimonies of Jane Hendy and Joan Pinchin (whereof one of necessity must be false) are both taken upon oath; one or other of them must needs be forsworn; and with me (and I believe that most that know us are of my mind) it is soon decided where the perjury lies: for I protest it in the presence of our great God, that there never was any such attempt made by me, no nor so much as thought of; and therefore I cannot possibly be so uncharitable as to think that the poor woman upon no grounds, and for no purpose, should belie herself or slander me. And now I shall add further, that I believe that this and many other false oaths had never been taken, had not the Doctor by those words, 'I am bound in conscience,' hinted unto them a kind of faculty, or dispensation of swearing, and that now they might be bold. And one thing farther, this oath being false, as I am confident it was, and as it is very probable this oath being caused by such an invitation, 'I am bound in conscience;' If an encourager or an abettor, or a persuader, be an accessory, I cannot acquit somebody (the Doctor may guess whom I mean) from being guilty of this, and many following perjuries. I remember that Ulysses lays a claim to all the heroic acts of Achilles, because that it was through his procurement that he went to the wars of Troy.

Ergo opera illius mea sunt.——Metam. 13.

And why may not these men be intitled to all the infamous actions which follow, since it was from them especially that they had their rise and encouragement?

Sect. 16. I must not forget one thing more: when the widow Pinchin had given in this testimony, I desired Mr. Blisset to ask her whether she believed it? To which she answered, that goodwife Hendy did say so. But this not satisfying, Mr. Blisset asks her again, But do you believe it to be true? To which she answers again, That it was true that goodwife Hendy said so: but this not satisfying yet, Mr. Blisset asks her the third time, But do you conceive Mr. Bushnell to be any such man? To which she answers, that she could not judge. Now I must tell the reader that not long before this, she having some discourse with several persons, ever acquitted me, saying that she believed that I was wronged, or to that purpose: but now she changes her note, and says, She cannot judge. Doubtless her own son William, or the Doctor (for I have heard that he was at her house betwixt April 28, and June 4) had instructed her, and taught her to fall short: and who might not he make the whole, as well as alter a part of it? It was observed that while the mother was on her examination, the son was in some agony and perplexity, which he expressed by rubbing, and wresting of his face and head, fearing belike that his mother should miss her trip, or forget or mis-report those instructions which he had given her.

Sect. 17. But now some may say, it is very unlikely, if not impossible, that all this rumour should be raised, that all this stir should be made about or upon nothing, upon no grounds at all. And indeed I am of the same mind, I made it my business therefore to enquire of Jane Hendy, since this business was over, to recollect herself, and to call to mind what discourse or communication she had had with Joan Pinchin which might be wrested to such a construction. Whereupon she told me, that during the time that she was my servant, I entertained a minister in my house (he called himself Page) who pretended that he was beaten out of Ireland, affirming that he had there escaped very great dangers and sustained very great losses: Insomuch that he was now very low, and both needed and desired the charitable relief of others. In order whereunto he desired that he might preach in my church, to which I condescended, which exercise and collection being ended, in regard that he made a great moan, I took him with me into my house, entertained him and lodged him all night: and (had it not been for his great importunity to be gone early the next morning) it is like I might have entertained him longer; but it appears since that he therefore made such haste to be gone, because he had already (lying in a chamber by himself, where there was a trunk and some boxes open) possessed himself of his errand; for he had stolen several pieces of clothes, stockings, and other garments both of mine and others, which he took away along with him, We missed not these clothes till some days after; nor did my servants (for I was the last that heard of it) discover unto me any suspicion that they had of him until one had told them he had lately seen this Page about five miles from Box, lying sleeping on the ground, near unto an hedge, by which there ran a little brook; and that two (habited like women) were in the mean time washing and hanging out to dry, several parcels of clothes; adding farther to my servants, that had they been there they might have chanced to have met with that which they had lost. This story Jane Hendy tells to Joan Pinchin, and was in some passion about it: for it seems that she had suffered in that loss; she speaks her mind likewise very freely touching Page and his laundresses; and to some who made themselves unwilling to believe that men of his profession should be of such a conversation, she adds to this purpose, that your parsons (naming me no more than she named Mr. Byfield or the Doctor) might be fleshly given as well as other men. This is the sum of the story, as she hath reported unto me; and as she says this was all she spake to Joan Pinchin, neither did she (as it is in her Deposition) mention my name at all. And see now what a story the son, and the mother, together with the Doctor's encouragement, have made of it. I believe that the Doctor knows already that there have been such heretofore, who were much given to mistake, and mis-remember, and mis-report other men's words, and all for the worse, to the prejudice of him that spoke them; and I believe that the Doctor knows what sort of men they have been. To all which let me add only this, 'And thinkest thou this that thou shalt escape that doest the same?' [Rom. 2. 3.]

Sect. 18. There is another branch in Joan Pinchin's Deposition, which I have not yet spoken to, which is this:

That about two years since Mr. Bushnell baptized Mr. Speke's child by the book of Common Prayer, and signed it with the sign of the cross, her son William's wife then deposing that she was then also present at the baptizing of Mr. Speke's child, and swears the same.

Sect. 19. And here I shall observe a wonder unto thee; That within six weeks a child should grow a year and three quarters old; (April 28, 1658,) for this is one of the children of which Obadiah Cheltenham spake at Lavington, and then and there affirmed upon oath, that I had signed it with the sign of the cross within a quarter of a year, it would be proved; it is likely he meant that William Pinchin's mother, and his wife, shall prove it. Here we have another circumstance for Mr. Blisset.

And here we have a story (such a one as it is) of a thing done about two years since. I shall desire thee to know that the child of whom they speak was baptized, Oct. 28, 1653, which was more than two years and a half before these Depositions were taken, and although that word 'about' may make it passable in some tolerable sense, yet it is in my thoughts that William Pinchin had some design in it that his mother and his wife should swear so indefinitely: for in this particular the space of six or seven months, nay of but a week would have very much altered the case. The Ordinance by which these Commissioners sate bears date, Aug. 29, 1654, and although it did look backward beyond the date of it, and questioned such things which were done before the law was made, yet it doth not look so far back as to Oct. 28, 1653. Then (nay on the last of Dec. 1653,) that might have been done with safety, which if one had done on the day following, he might have been questioned for; it might be therefore a design in William Pinchin to put it into such indefinite terms 'about two years,' it might be somewhat within, and under, as well as above; and such an interpretation as best pleased the Commissioners, (and that if Mr. Byfield and the Doctor could have procured it, should have been such as would have done me the most mischief) should have been put upon it: But of this Deposition I shall say no more, because be it true, or be it false, as to the matter of fact, yet as to the matter of charge it signified nothing.

Sect. 20. The next we have is the Deposition of William Cottle, who deposeth,

That when Thrift was killed, he did conceive him to be overtaken in beer, for that he could not scarce pull the rope of the bell without stepping into the fold; but where he had it, this deponent knows not. And saith also.

That about two years since Mr. Bushnell coming through Pickwick lane from Corsham bended to and fro upon his horse: and this deponent the morrow asking Brewer the inn-keeper what he had done to Mr. Bushnell, said, he was well enough when he went thence, having spent only ten-pence, but said he did use to fuddle a cup there now and then.

I conceive that the sum of this Deposition may be reduced to these heads. 1. Touching John Thrift. 2. Touching myself.

As touching John Thrift's ringing, and in what condition he was when he rang, I shall refer thee to the Deposition of another witness summoned in to appear in the same time and place by William Pinchin; which was this William Cottle's own brother, and taken in these words.

Richard Cottle of Box deposeth that Thrift aforesaid, ringing two or three pulls at the bell when he was afterward killed; this deponent did not conceive he was in drink, and having but the last week asked of him that gave him the rope, and took it of him again, (he being also of the said opinion) this deponent doth the rather believe it.

Here you see we have two for one, and those this William Cottle's brother, and William Love his brother-in-law: who gave him the rope, and took it of him again; and therefore in likelihood might know more of John Thrift's condition at that time than any man.

Sect. 22. But now (had these Commissioners been pleased to suffer it) I could have made it appear, that at such time as John Thrift rang, this William Cottle was not below in the church or belfry, but above in the Tower tolling of the great bell: from whence it was as impossible for him to see what was then done below in the church, as it was for William Pinchin to see what was done at Box when he was about five miles off at Broughton.

Sect. 23. And then as touching the second branch of his Deposition.

That as I rode homeward from Corsham, I bended to and fro upon my horse.

Certainly this will signify nothing with sober men, but only a distemperature in the informer. The several postures and motions of the body, the variety of gait and garb, the carriage of the hands or feet of men whether on horseback or on foot, as they are little thought of by him that useth them, so I think as little regarded by any rational man that shall behold them: We look upon these, and such as these, as done without any mature deliberation: and therefore barely as such, neither matter of commendation or reproof: nor are they usually called human actions, although he be a man that doth them.

Sect. 24. And whereas he cites Brewer an inn-holder of Corsham as his voucher, I shall acquaint thee with the information upon oath, which this Thomas Brewer gave before the Commissioners, and shall after leave it to the reader to judge, how this William Cottle hath represented both him and me. I must tell thee that this Deposition of Thomas Brewer was not taken at this time at Caln, but afterward at Marlborough, July 1, yet because it relates so much to William Cottle's Deposition, I shall anticipate the day, and insert it here; It is in these words:

Thomas Brewer of Corsham, inn-holder, being sworn, saith, That he did never tell William Cottle or Henry Parsons afore sworn, that Mr. Bushnell did use to come to his house to fuddle a cup as they have deposed; nor was he distempered at the time mentioned in their Depositions. And says, that he have known him these ten years, and never saw him drink to excess, nor did he ever go from his house distempered with beer as this deponent knows; yet says, that he have often been at this deponent's house in Corsham, but seldom save in business for the children, to whom he is a guardian, or to the lecture, or the like, and says that he have been there three or four hours at a time in the deponent's said house with his tenants, &c. and have not drank more than a jug of beer, or a pint of wine.

Sect. 25. All that I shall have to say at present is to the former part of the Deposition. That he never told William Cottle that Mr. Bushnell did use to come to his house to fuddle a cup. Here we have another sad story, contradictory oaths taken again. Of which (as I have said) of necessity one must be false. I am satisfied as to myself where the perjury lies; and it may be that the reader will be of my judgment before I come to the end of the story. It was at this time that we exhibited Articles of Exception against this William Cottle touching his credit and former conversation, every of which would have been proved upon oath. As,

1. That this William Cottle was a drunkard, and that on the Lord's day; and even in the time of divine service, he had usually seduced others to his house to drink. As

2. That this William Cottle was a thief, who, together with John Twyford the hangman, cut, carried and stole poles out of Hungerford Wood, supposing them to have been the minister's. As

3. That William Cottle was a scandalous and infamous person, who having been convicted for selling ale without licence, and other misdemeanours, and yet taking no warning, was by the justices of the peace sent to the House of Correction; from whence he made an escape, so that a justice of peace made him give bond to sell ale no more, because he could not otherwise restrain him. As

4. That William Cottle was a cozening and cheating fellow: for, putting himself into the office of a tithing-man, in the room of another man, he collected monies for the buying of drums and colours, which he keeps, or the greater part of it, in his hands, or else otherwise employs it: and suffers the cattle of one James Butler, for whom he was deputy, to be taken away by soldiers, untill full satisfaction were made. Inasmuch

5. That William Cottle was looked upon as one that regarded neither his word nor his oath, so that the Steward of the Leet discovering him, would not admit him (although he greatly thirsted after it) to serve in that place any more: conceiving him belike to be a person so unworthy and so unfit to be trusted, as that he was not held meet for so mean an office as a tithing-man. As

6. That William Cottle was a slanderer of the ministers, charging them in the general with greediness, and that he would trust none of them all: and that for instance he mentioned Mr. Chambers, who had left Claverton, and was gone to Pewsey.

Sect. 26. I say that all these Exceptions were then exhibited; and would have been every one proved upon oath; but my Counsel for that time waving all the rest, pitched upon the last, viz.

That William Cottle should say, that your parsons were greedy, and that he would trust none of them all, no not Mr. Chambers, who had left Claverton and was gone to Pewsey.

This Article was indeed, of itself, the most inconsiderable, although, perchance, it made the loudest noise with them, because it reflected somewhat upon their Doctor. Now William Cottle being charged with these words, confidently denies that ever he spake them, being still upon his oath; affirming, That no honest man would justify that he had said so: and drawing his finger athwart his throat, seemed to intimate, that he would give any man leave to cut his throat, if it were justified.

Soon after which comes in William Rawlins of Box, against whom William Cottle could take no exceptions, and being sworn, saith;

That on Whitsunday last, soon after the morning sermon, as they were in the churchyard (he named the particular place in the churchyard, as likewise others who heard it as well as himself) William Cottle spake these words;

"That your parsons were greedy, that he would trust none of them all, no not Mr. Chambers, for he had left Claverton and was gone to Pewsey."

Which words when William Cottle had heard, without more ado, he acknowledged that he had spoken, adding further, Why what if I did say so? The truth is, that the thing being considered barely in, or by itself, it mattered not if he had said so; for it was true as he said; Mr. Chambers had left Claverton, (nor was this the first time that he had left it,) and was gone to Pewsey, and this to his great advantage too, for the report goes that he is 300*l.* a year gainer by this remove. But now William Cottle having been sworn to speak the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, (and this oath always binding him whilst he was before these Commissioners, speaking upon his cross examination to my business,) and having upon this oath denied any such words to be spoken by him, and yet within a few minutes after, as our proverb goes even in the same breath, upon the same oath to confess that he had spoken them——! What greater or further testimony could these Commissioners have of this man's falsehood? or how could they look upon him as a credible witness against me, since he sticks not to forswear himself in their presence? Another circumstance for Mr. Blisset.

Sect. 27. It must not be forgotten, that Mr. Byfield kept much ado about this Deposition of William Rawlins; it is like enough that he was unwilling that it should be taken; sure I am that there was a kind of an heat stricken betwixt my Counsel and him about it; it may be that it was not only zeal to his friend the Doctor, which made him so earnest, but also respect unto himself, he rightly considering that in this saying, he himself was reproached likewise; for that the Doctor's changes might give occasion to men to enquire what a steadfast and settled man Mr. Byfield had been in his time: and how many removes he had made from that time he did officiate at Enford, till this time that he was now in the Parsonage at Collingborn. But yet my Counsel prevailed, and, although with some ado, entered it was, and subscribed by William Rawlins who had deposed it. And yet (reader judge of their equal dealing with me) we have not one word of this in that copy of the Depositions which we received from their Clerk, and according to which we were to frame our Answer. I have often told thee that they had an Index expurgatorius, yet formerly he came only with his knife, or his pruning-hook, and took away only some boughs or limbs of a Deposition, but here he comes with his axes, and takes away both root and branch.

Sect. 28. It were not amiss to tell thee that John Travers, sitting by during this debate, and hearing and noting all the passages, observed it, and so did others beside, and, as I have heard, hath reported it elsewhere with some complacency, that Mr. Chambers did hang down his head the while; Now we know that hanging down of the head doth usually signify this, there is shame and sorrow in the heart.

Pudet hæc opprobria nobis
Et dici potuisse et non potuisse refelli.

And whereas shame doth usually produce either amendment in the person so exposed: or else indignation, which the person so exposed, conceives against him whom he looks on as the cause of this exposure; I have some conjecture, that this wrought after the latter and worse way with Dr. Chambers; and that he did, for this, store up a good turn for me against he had an opportunity. Of which the readers shall have some account in due time and place.

Sect. 29. Next follows the Deposition of William Sanders; but because I shall have something touching him, and of the Doctor in reference unto him, which is very remarkable in the Transactions of the next day, I shall therefore forbear him till then.

Sect. 30. Next follows the Deposition of Lawrence Cottle, who deposeth:

That about one year and a half since, he and some others, that went to school with Mr. Bushnell, played at cards in Mr. Bushnell's house, when Mr. Bushnell took up one of the boy's games, and played it out for him at slam: after which some difference happening between the boys about their game, he snatched up the cards, and threw them into the fire and burnt them, and said he would have no more playing at cards in his house.

Sect. 31. And as touching this Deposition, I would fain know where the matter of charge lies? is it in this, That they played at cards in my house? I know nothing (all circumstances duly considered, and it was my care it should be so) that makes it either unlawful or inexpedient. The time was after supper; the company, mine own scholars; the stake (for any thing I knew) apples, or nuts, whereat in an harmless manner for some short time they might recreate themselves. If it happened otherwise (as the Deposition here says that it did) the beginning of the differences put an end to the game. As I remember Mr. Byfield disliked it that I had not burnt the cards before, but delayed it till the end of the game. To which I shall say only this, that had they been filling or smoking with a tobacco pipe, I should have looked upon it as a thing so disingenuous and misbecoming scholars, that I should have snatched it away and broken it without any more ado.

Next follows the Deposition of John Gibbons in these words;

John Gibbons of Box being sworn, saith, That about three quarters of a year past he played twice with Mr. Bushnell at tables in his own house, for good will only, and no monies. But saith that he was induced so to do at the request of this deponent.

To which we have near in place and substance, the Deposition of Peter Webb in these words;

Peter Webb before sworn, saith, That sometimes before two years past, he have played with Mr. Bushnell at tables in his own house; but for no money.

Sect. 32. Now I would willingly be satisfied touching the matter of charge in these Depositions. For

1. Are these games illiciti in se? unlawful in themselves? or in their own nature! Then are they such at all times, in all places, and to all persons. Never man did, never man can use them, but in the very use of them he offends. But perchance they will say, that they are illiciti quia prohibiti, and though indifferent in themselves, yet in being forbidden they become unlawful. To this I shall subjoin, and if they be thus forbidden, it must be either by some old law, or else by some new, I believe that Mr. Byfield would not say, by any old law, and if he had said by the new; that is, the ordinance by which they sate, and according to which they were to act: I shall answer, that then these two Depositions signify nothing against me, for the ordinance in this particular makes only such ministers to be deemed guilty of scandal who shall be found frequent players of cards or dice; and certainly then no man will say that I played frequently with these men, when as they depose that I never played with them but once a piece. I am confident that Mr. Byfield and the Doctor would not be termed frequent preachers, if they had preached no oftener than it is proved that I played at cards or tables. There was beside a concurrence of all circumstances, which being duly observed I know not the casuist so strict which accounts them absolutely unlawful. For

1. We made it matter of recreation.

2. We used them sparingly. And

3. Covetousness (which is usually the poison of all games, so far as to distemper and enrage the passions) could not be possibly there, because (as it is in their Depositions) we played for nothing.

One thing more let me now add touching John Gibbons, and his Deposition, of which he told me since I came to London; which was this, that the clerk Mr. Blisset's son had written somewhat as his Deposition which he never spake; as that we played at tables on the Lord's day, to which he would have had John Gibbons to set his hand, which he refusing, he takes the Deposition as is aforesaid; on which let me observe only this, that if John Gibbons had not read the Deposition over, he should have been made to testify that which was most false, which possibly some who could not read what he had written have done. This precious clerk having that faculty, that the witnesses shall say no more, nor less, nor any other thing than he will have them. So it might be to my prejudice, what they never spake shall be inserted; but if for my advantage, then what they spake plain and distinctly shall be left out. He told me likewise, that Obadiah Cheltenham bestowed a kind of a rebuke upon him, telling him that he swore but faintly, and that by his Deposition he had done them more harm than good.

Sect. 33. Next follows the Deposition of Thomas Hayward, who deposeth;

That about Paul's-tide last was two year, Mr. Bushnell did use some of the forms of Common Prayer at a funeral.

To which I say only this, that for any thing appears to the contrary, he might mean that I read 1 Cor. ch. 15.

Sect. 30. Next follows the Deposition of Nicholas Spencer, who being before sworn saith,

That oft times till within three quarters of a year past, there have been Stabbal playing upon the Sabbath in the Parish of Box, and playing at fives upon the same day in the Church-yard; and that this deponent have often complained to Mr. Bushnell thereof: who have replied that it was the officers and none of his business; but saith that the said Mr. Bushnell have often reprov'd and rebuked his Parishioners for the same in his Sermons.

Sect. 34. And he might have sworn that oftentimes within three quarters of an year, the widow Pinchin's and her son's fulling mills, had been set on work on the Lord's day; and that on the same day their servants have usually hanged out their clothes in the rack. That on the same day Obad. Cheltenham came usually from Marlborough to his own house. That on the same day William Cottle, and Nicholas Nowell, have kept tippling in their houses. That Thomas Powel have set it aside for a day to make bargains in, because he would not spare the time on the week days. Nor have there (that I know of) been greater profaners of that day, than were those very persons that appeared against me. But what? Did Nicholas Spencer see these men at Stabbal? Why had not he complained of them upon oath? He could have informed of his own knowledge, I only on hearsay as from him; and (whatsoever the practice of these Commissioners were) I knew that our justices were so worthy, as that they would not look upon such an oath, as a sufficient ground for a conviction. And whereas he said that he complained to me of it; was I a magistrate to punish, or an officer to prosecute them? If he had complained to me of William Pinchin's parricide, of Obadiah Cheltenham's—chastity, of Cottle's profanations, &c. I must have given him the same answer as I did then, that it is the officers business to prosecute them, and none of mine. By Nicholas Spencer's own confession I acted as became one in my place, I often reprov'd and rebuked the parishioners for the same in my sermons. To which I shall add one thing more; I did (which I conceive to be most properly the minister's office in this business) publish the several acts and ordinances for the observation of that day: that neither the officers, nor any others might pretend ignorance of their duty in that case; but that the people might know what was forbidden them, and under what penalty it was forbidden them; and that the officers might know what they were to expect in case they neglected their duty: I say that these acts and ordinances I published oftener than the law required. Yea, I think, far more often than Mr. Byfield, or Dr. Chambers. But as touching the same Nicholas Spencer, I shall for present only desire thee to observe how he mends and makes some progress in his Depositions, how (William Pinchin-like) he fetcheth trip, in his second Deposition outgoing the first, and in this third overleaping all, as shall be certified unto thee by and by.

Sect. 35. I shall now put an end to the Transactions of this day. Being called in before them the next morning which was June 5. I perceived that the Marlborough men, together with Mr. Byfield, Dr. Chambers, and another minister of Marlborough, I think they called him Mr. Hughes, were very sharp set: they had dispatched two ministers before; and the Doctor by his big countenance seemed not to have digested it that Cottle should upon his oath before such a company deny and yet acknowledge it, that he should say that your parsons were greedy, that he would trust none of them all, no not Mr. Chambers, for he had left Claverton, and was gone to Pewsee; and therefore I was not to expect any kindnesses from him, because he might look upon me as the author of his exposal. And therefore I desired that I might have some further time granted for the examination of other witnesses; for I told them that the witnesses which were produced and encouraged against me, I could prove to be men neither of honesty, nor of credit, or truth. Which if I made appear; then their testimony (be it what it would) fell to the ground and became void of itself; for their Ordinance allows of none but of credible witnesses; and the old rule is, 'Recriminatio valet ad tollendum Testimonium;' that a recrimination is of force to take away a testimony. But to these words of mine, that I should prove these witnesses to be men of neither credit nor truth, Mr. Blisset replies to this purpose, that it were strange if there should be found such men that were of no credit or truth, for that the devil spake truth some time. To which words for the present I shall ask of Mr. Blisset, first, what he thinks of those words, 'He (the devil) abode not in the truth, because there was no truth in him?' I shall ask him, secondly, whether or no if the devil should depose a truth, his doctors or himself would look upon it as a sufficient testimony? I shall give the reader my present judgment touching these particulars in the Transactions of the next day. Only let me observe thus much unto thee now, that it seemeth to me that ordinary witnesses, be they whatsoever, come they from wheresoever, swear they what or howsoever, yet if serving Mr. Blisset's turn, they should have been welcome to him. Yet upon this my motion, to have further time granted me for the examination of other witnesses; I was bid to withdraw, and being soon called in again, my request was granted. But now whether it were because my suit was equal, or whether or no it were because Mr. Byfield and the Doctor had not there a full Quorum of fitting Commissioners (for although all their friends of Marlborough were there, yet I remember not that any of Sarum were) I cannot judge.

The Transactions at my Fifth time of appearing before them, at the White-Hart at Marlborough, July 1, 2.

Sect. 1. Having (as I told thee but now) a liberty granted to me to bring in my Exceptions both against the persons and the Evidence given in against me at that time at Caln, I had notice by word of mouth from the Commissioners Clerk, Mr. Blisset's son, that I was to appear before them at the White-Hart in Marlborough, July 1, next following. And thither I repair accordingly with such along with me, whose Testimonies (had they been equally heard, or duly considered of) would, with uninterested men, or such who had not been afore-hand resolved which way it should go, right or wrong) doubtless have so far prevailed, that it would have appeared that the Doctor's, Mr. Byfield's, and Mr. Blisset's witnesses had been indeed such as I had formerly represented them to be, men of neither truth nor credit. Nor can these men have any just cause to distaste me that I call them their witnesses, when I have given my reasons of it. I have told thee already, that I believe that many a one which hath appeared before them, and have been sworn against me, had never so done, had it not been for their invitation and countenance; which as before, so at this time appeared most visible: for (besides others which I shall name by and by) at this time there appear for the Commonwealth William Pinchin, Obadiah Cheltenham, and John Travers, not as Witnesses, but as Solicitors or Promoters: and in their addresses (neglecting the gentleman to whom alone of right this business did belong) their applications were to Mr. Chambers and Mr. Byfield, John Travers and William Pinchin, at the upper end of the table, standing at the elbow of the Doctor, and Obadiah Cheltenham towards the lower end, waiting upon Mr. Byfield; and this I conceive to be reason enough wherfore I call them their witnesses. There appear at this time beside these Nicholas Spenser, lately mentioned, and Nicholas Nowell, and Joan his wife: nor could I have any liberty to produce any Witnesses for mine own vindication, till the Depositions of the Witnesses for the Commonwealth were first taken.

Sect. 2. Of which (as I take it) the first was the Deposition of Nicholas Spenser in these words;

Nicholas Spenser of Box being sworn, saith that he being at church when Thrift was killed, observed that he was overtaken in beer by his countenance and absurd carriage.

Sect. 3. Touching which Deposition I shall offer to thy consideration these things:

1. That this Deposition as it is under their Clerk's hand, is not entered as a distinct Deposition by itself, but it is shuffled up together with that Deposition which he took at Marlborough, May 8, of which I have spoken already.

2. Whereas the Clerk puts this in the first place, as if it were the first that ever Nicholas Spenser took, yet that this was the last, and that his Depositions of May 8, and of June 4, of which I have spoken before, were both before this, to which I am now to speak. Now who or what should move the Clerk (in this and many other places beside) to this ~~order~~, to invert and confound the order wherein these testimonies were delivered or taken (whether it were design thereby to confound my counsel and us; that we should have a confused as well as an unperfect paper to answer to; that so having but a little time to answer unto it, by this inversion of order we might be the more perplexed; or whether or no they therefore placed the Depositions of their most gigantic swearers in the front, as the Indians set their elephants to face their enemies, that the world might think that all the rest were like the first: or whether it were from neglect or oversight) I cannot judge. Observe,

3. That ~~this~~ Nicholas Spenser had (as I have said) been twice before them before, that he had been twice sworn, and examined upon all the Articles, and could not remember any such thing. Now I have heard that it hath been deemed an undue course for a witness to be twice examined against a man. This being given as a reason, because that this is to draw him on by degrees to swear home, and to mend in his second Deposition what he fell short in the first. Nor is it unlikely but that such who have been once or twice called in upon Examination, and cannot remember any thing, may, if called in the third time, have so much aim given them, that they may remember somewhat amiss, but more of this by and by.

Sect. 3. But pass we to the Deposition itself.

1. He swears that he was at Church when John Thrift was killed. Now there are many others that are confident that he was not in the church when John Thrift came in and rang; but might come in afterward, when as it was reported that he was slain. But now,

2. Observe with me what a notable argument the man hath got, or what reasons he hath to persuade him to believe it; he observed that he was overtaken in beer by his countenance and absurd carriage. I have seen this Nicholas Spenser as fantastic and ridiculous in his carriage as I have seen any man: turning himself half round upon his toe or his heel, casting out his legs, throwing abroad his arms; and for his countenance I have seen him (as our proverb goes) as red as the roost cock, and yet I believe at that time he hath been as far from distemperature, as he was at this time from truth or charity.

We have had often mention of the death of John Thrift, as likewise in what condition he was in when he was slain. I shall here once for all give thee a brief of the story as it was. This John Thrift living in the parish of Box, and being my near kinsman, together with his wife, and some others of our neighbouring kindred, agreed among themselves (as I have since heard) to meet all together at Church at Box, and afterward to dine with me: there was neither feast prepared, nor any invitation made by me, as many of them yet living did depose before these Commissioners. Soon after dinner (I retiring to my chamber) this John Thrift speaks to some others to go along with him to the house of one John Hedges who was to be buried that afternoon; with a purpose to attend the corpse to church. But in the way thitherward, understanding that the company there expected were not as yet come together, they turn into the church, where there were some ringing; where this John Thrift takes a rope from one that was ringing, and soon after delivers it to him again, as you have it in Richard Cottle's Deposition, to which I refer you. Now soon after this he espying the Tower door open, arises from the seat to which he had retired himself after his ringing, and beckoning to one to follow him, goes up the stairs, as it is thought, to see how they tolled the great bell in the Tower, and being (in all likelihood) utterly unacquainted with the place, as he who followed him likewise was, going up a ladder about 12 rounds, whether by a blow from the trap door, or from the bell, or from the wheel, or by what other sad accident it is not known, he fell from the ladder as it is thought upon a piece of timber lying in a nether loft, and was taken up dead. This as to the manner of his death. Now as touching the condition he was then in, (beside the opinion of William Love, and the testimony of Richard Cottle) take the following Depositions.

Sect. 5. The first in these words,

VOL. V.

John Jones being sworn, saith, That at the time mentioned, when Thrift was killed, this deponent dined with him at Mr. Bushnell's, when he came there by accident, and drank no more than might do him good: and went thence to the church where he came by his death: but saith that he was not distempered with beer. And saith that the said Mr. Bushnell then went forthwith from dinner to his study, as this deponent conceived.

Sect. 6. Take another, given at the same time and place, and taken in these words:

Richard Pinchin of Box, being sworn, saith, That he was then also at Mr. Bushnell's at dinner, and speaks fully to the same purpose as doth John Jones, and says that there was no drinking after dinner.

Sect. 7. Take a third, given at the same time and place, and taken in these words;

June Hendy being sworn, saith, That at the time last mentioned, the said guests came all to Mr. Bushnell's by accident without invitation, as Mr. Bushnell told her, she being his servant.

Sect. 8. Let us now take a short view of these contradictory depositions, and see in which of them there lieth the greater likelihood of the truth; which will be done if we look on,

1. The quality of the persons who thus informed. And,

2. If we consider whether of them had the more likely means to know the truth in this particular. In brief, whether of these were more likely to know; and which of these were more likely to speak the truth. Touching William Pinchin, and William Cottle; and of their creditableness, you have heard something already; and more you shall hear anon; and as touching Nicholas Spenser, I have told thee but now that he had been twice sworn before, and could remember no such thing, as likewise what may be thought of such who have been at several times admitted to swear against the same person. I have told thee likewise what encouragement the witnesses had to swear any thing against me, and such most made of that would swear most desperately. So that Nicholas Spenser having been twice before them before, and now called in the third time, might by this understand their minds, and prepare accordingly, as I have heard of some juries, who having been often turned back, at last find as the Judge would have it; besides, William Pinchin's and Nicholas Spenser's intimacy grew daily more and more: it is not unlikely but that he might be then designed sequestrator in case that I were ejected, and that he might know as much. I am sure that afterward it so fell out, and this place of sequestrator he executes with great port and complacency; and who but William Pinchin to be his assistant in the business; and his house (William Pinchin knew how to bring him in a reckoning) appointed for the entertainment of their minister: and so might William Pinchin bid him call himself to mind, and persuade him that he was at church at that time so long, that at length Nicholas Spenser might persuade himself that he was there indeed. As the confident cheater in the dialogue fancying that he saw a fearful fiery dragon in the sky, and reporting it to his companions, (what with pointing to the place, what with calling on them to look stedfastly, what with wondering at them that they were so dull-sighted as not to see a thing which was so obvious) at length so prevails with them, that they are persuaded that they see it likewise. The ground of this my conjecture is, because I have heard that William Pinchin hath practised with several other persons in the like kind. Nay more, the influence which William Pinchin hath upon this same Nicholas Spenser is so great, that even their own man and associate Mr. Stern hath observed it: and hath (as I have been told) reported it, That William Pinchin did lead Nicholas Spenser about the parish by the nose. Further yet, and perchance most especially, it must be remembered that Nicholas Spenser and William Pinchin are both tenants to the same landlord, a gentleman as yet under age, who (if at all) hath been but seldom in those parts amongst them himself, and I think but few others in his behalf. Now there go several reports that William Pinchin and Nicholas Spenser have both been very bold with their landlord's wood and timber, felling when and where they had no license, and such woods and timber, of which by their good wills they would never give account, so that Nicholas Spenser knowing William Pinchin to be so dangerous a man to swear, might think it good for himself to strain himself somewhat to gratify so good a fellow tenant, lest otherwise William Pinchin should fetch trip, and in another place remember something against Nicholas Spenser which he would not be willing to hear of.

Sect. 9. But now as touching the second thing, the means which the persons swearing these contradictions had to know the truth in this particular. It is out of doubt that William Pinchin and William Cottle were not in sight, and it is doubted whether Nicholas Spenser were then in the church, and yet these charge us. But now it is out of doubt that both William Love and Richard Cottle were then in the church, and both saw and observed all passages, and yet these acquit us. Again, William Pinchin, William Cottle, and Nicholas Spenser, who charge him with being overtaken in beer, did not see him, nor any of the company beside on that day drink so much as a drop of beer, and yet we have others who dined with him, who kept him company afterward, who came along with him into the church, and saw him go to the Tower-stairs, deposing that he drank no more than might do him good, and that he was not distempered with beer. There is no question that had John Thrift escaped that fatal accident, Nicholas Spenser would never have remembered his absurd carriage, or sworn that he had been overtaken in beer: But now his untimely end hath encouraged Nicholas Spenser to be far more uncharitable towards him than were the Jews towards those Galileans, whose blood Pilate mingled with their sacrifices. John Thrift must be distempered, he must be a sinner above other men, because such a thing befel him. I could beside these witnesses have produced more witnesses of as unquestionable credit, who were then at my house likewise: but I cast with myself that if two or three were not enough, then were twenty too few.

Sect. 10. There was not then any profanation of the Lord's day at my house by excessive drinking.

I add, 2, no nor by feasting neither: for the Commissioners have the testimony of some, and might have had of more, that (as to me) they all came by accident, and without any invitation, and some of them were such who had been on the Lord's day many a time with Mr. Chambers at a greater distance on the like occasion.

Sect. 11. Next after the deposition of Nicholas Spenser, the deposition of Nicholas Nowell and Joan his wife was taken in these words;

Nicholas Nowell and Joan his wife being sworn, say, That Mr. Bushnell with col. Eyre and his man came to their house (an alehouse at the foot of Box-hill) and there remained about an hour and an half, where they drank nine jugs of beer, for which Mr. Bushnell paid 18d. and then drank Mr. Speke's and other gentlemen's healths, and say that col. Eyre's man drank one of the nine jugs, and they two drank now and then a glass of the rest, and no person else.

Sect. 12. This deposition I must tell thee, although the youngest of all, as being the 21st, yet in their clerk's copy it hath gotten the pre-eminence of place before many of his fellows. Now before I come to speak to the deposition itself, I shall premise a few things to thee which moved these deponents thus to swear, as it was at this time there testified upon oath before these deponents' faces, and confessed by these persons themselves. I had at that time several witnesses with me for my vindication, whereof some were wholly rejected, the depositions of others never entered, and of some their depositions entered, and yet left out of the clerk's copy, and of others their depositions entered by halves, as I have already told thee, and shall tell thee more in due time. But (although with much ado) I then got the deposition of Henry Sheyler to be both heard and taken; part whereof relating to this business was in these words:

"And this deponent farther saith,

"That Nicholas Nowell before sworn told this deponent on Saturday morning last, that Mr. Travers offered to take off his bonds, that he might sell ale again, if he would appear and swear against Mr. Bushnell; and that yesterday he said he would not have appeared and been sworn, had not Mr. Bushnell at the time mentioned in Nowell's deposition, told col. Eyre of his gun, and said that therewith he used to kill hares and pigeons."

Sect. 13. Here I must tell thee first, That Index Expurgatorius hath been here with his pruning knife again; for Henry Sheyler then deposed;

"That William Pinchin was at the same time with John Travers, and made Nowell the same proffer and promises."

I must tell thee further, that soon after this Deposition of Henry Sheyler was taken, Nowell's wife, being before at a window and hearing what had passed, comes towards the Doctor, (for unto him were the most especial addresses made) and after a long and a low curtesy, adds,

"Yea, surely, if Mr. Bushnell had not, to pick a thank with col. Eyre, told him of my husband's gun, and said that therewith he used to kill hares and pigeons, we would not have been here to-day to have sworn against him."—And still continuing curtesying to Mr. Chambers, who then turned his head about, and looked towards her, she adds farther, That he had known her of a long time.

Now if it be true what the country reports of her, she hath in her time been a very virtuous woman, and of very credible acquaintance. Now when I heard these words so unexpectedly spoken, and that there was as much or more confessed than we desired to prove, I could not choose but smile. Which Mr. Byfield noting, was much displeased with, adding withal to this purpose, That it was not, or, that I should not find it a laughing matter. Indeed, it is true, it was no laughing matter. Christians ought to be sorry for others' offences, and such an offence I shall prove this to be, that it is no less than perjury. And yet thus much let me tell Mr. Byfield's friends, that if I were to blame for laughing at it, then certainly he and his Commissioners deserved no commendation for making use of this testimony; it is enough to make the evidence suspected, yea, and be it what it will, rejected too by equal judges. If it shall appear to them, and it was evident enough here, That the witnesses depose out of malice, or for hopes of reward. Now more, such informers are looked upon as guilty of falshood, although they spake nothing but what was true. I wish that his surviving friends would take notice of the marginal quotations [1 Sam. xxii. 6, 9. xxii. 10. Psalm lii. 2, 3, 4.] and practise accordingly, where they may see, that notwithstanding Doeg spake no more than what was true, and nothing but what he had seen and heard; yet David charged him for telling of lies, and with having a false tongue for it; giving us to know thus much, that it is all one to speak the untruth or the truth, if the truth be spoken in an undue manner. Proportionably say I, in case it had been true what they informed, yet (since the impulsive which incited them unto it, was spleen and revenge, for a conceived injury which I had done them some seven years before, and their aim some hopes that they might sell ale again,) may they be as justly taxed of falshood and lying as Doeg was. Nay farther, Doeg's was a bare information, and no more, and therefore David chargeth him only with lying and falshood, but doubtless he would have had another name for it, if he had thus spoken upon oath. Nor can any deny it, but that if he who speaks a truth after that undue manner, speaks falsely; then those who swear a truth after that undue manner swear falsely. And could Mr. Byfield countenance, encourage and serve his turn with such vile practices as these, and yet thunder against me for smiling at them? Could he strain at this gnat, and swallow the other camel? I shall desire them to observe it, that our Saviour speaks the words to the Scribes and Pharisees, whom he calls there hypocrites; the Scribes went for the knowing, the Pharisees for the just, holy, or godly of the times, yet both these our blessed Saviour chargeth with blindness and hypocrisy, to give us to know thus much, that in case we be Scribes, never so knowing, yet if our eyes are always on others, and never on ourselves, we are no better than blind: or in case we be Pharisees, and of never so much pretended sanctity, yet (in case we should be rigid against others, if we be indulgent to ourselves, quick to observe and aggravate, and multiply and judge anothers' inote, and wholly in the mean time to forget our own beam,) we are no better than hypocrites; 'Ye blind guides which strain at a gnat, and swallow a camel.'

Sect. 14. But to return to the Depositions. Henry Sheyler hath deposed,

That William Pinchin and John Travers proffered to take up their bond, That they might sell ale again, in case they would appear and swear against me.

Now I must tell thee that (beside this hope, and their quarrel against me about the gun) I believe that Nowell and his wife, had another thing to incite them to appear against me, which was, that they looked upon me as one who had been a cause that their former license was taken away. For I must tell thee that (beside many disorders which I had heard of from this Nowell's house, lying not at the foot of Box hill, as it is in the Deposition, but in a remote place both of the parish and the county) there was a complaint made to me by the wife of one John Pitcher, living not far from this Nowell's house, which (as far as I can remember) was to this purpose: That her husband John Pitcher did usually haunt this Nowell's house, and that for whole days and nights together; that he there most wastefully spent his money which he earned at his hard labour; she his wife, and many small children, in the mean time wanting necessities. I think she then told me that her husband had pawned some of his household goods (as platters or the like) for beer: but this I am sure she then told me, that (what for some money in hand, what for the satisfaction of an old score) he was making over a small parcel of sheep which they had, to this Nowell, which if he did she says that she and her children must go naked. She told me further, That her husband coming thence in his distemperature, was very outrageous and unnatural towards his wife and children : that he had been there the last night, that he came home but that morning, which was the Lord's day, and that she had left him at home asleep. I (hearing this sad story from her, and guessing both by her countenance and habit, that her condition was very lamentable, and knowing that she had many small children) bade my servants to take her in, to relieve her, and withal commanded that they should give her somewhat to carry home for her children, she having told me, before, that she had at home no sustenance for those small children, nor money to buy ; but before she went away, I asked her what her husband's carriage was towards her, and her children, when he was himself and sober ? she told me that it was both loving and careful, and that he was never so outrageous as when he was set on by this Joan Nowell ; whereupon I (considering the perishing condition which her poor small children were then in, as likewise doubting what might happen in case her husband should awake, and find her missing, having such a woman as this Joan Nowell at his elbow) advised her for the present to repair to her home, to relieve her children, and not by any means to speak to her husband until he were sober : but then in a friendly manner to acquaint him where she had been, and what she had done : assuring her further, that if this were the order of Nowell's house, there should be a course taken with them without her further trouble. Now so it was, that sometime after this Nowell's license was taken away, and he forced to give bond to sell no more. The consideration of these things make me to have a strong conjecture, that Nowell's wife conceived that I had acquainted col. Eyre with their profanations and disorders, as well as with her husband's gun, and that now (having this opportunity, and the countenance of the Doctor her ancient acquaintance) they were resolved to be revenged on us both, (I mean the colonel and myself) both for the one and the other.

Sect. 15. But let us now come to the Deposition itself. To which I shall say, 1. That it is true that col. Eyre, his man William Daniel and myself, coming from Bath one evening alighted at this house standing near to the highway. The reason why we alighted was, because the colonel complained that he was a cold, the season being frosty, and the time about the 20th of Dec. 1649, and having a very good fire there made, we sat down for some time and warmed ourselves, col. Eyre's man, and another (I take it he was a son of this Joan Nowell, which she bore in the time of her former husband) in the mean time walking our horses without. I very well remember it, that we drank there. I very well remember it (for I entered it upon my book of disbursements as soon as I came home) that I delivered to this Joan Nowell 18d. which I did at the motion of col. Eyre, he having at that time no silver about him : which we looked not upon as reckoning, as if in beer we had spent so much, but in regard that we had there a very good fire, that there was one all the time without with our horses ; as also for that we looked upon them as poor people, we made light of it, and paid it. Touching drinking healths, I am confident they swear at random ; if any thing, it might be remembrances, which (I know not the reason of it) is both a name and thing, which passed among these Commissioners, with better acceptance ; but if one or other, then certainly must the latter part of their Deposition, That they two drank now and then a glass, be false ; for in such cases William Pinchin hath told us the use is to put the healths or remembrances round : and if so, then there is no doubt but that they had their portion likewise ; and I must tell thee that I have since heard (for at the time mentioned in the Deposition, I had very little acquaintance there, this being the first time that I ever was in the house since I came to Box, and indeed the only time, excepting that I was once there since, when I went about from door to door to beg for Mr. Blisset, Mr. Hunt, and Mr. Bayly, and the rest of Marlborough) that this Joan Nowell will not refuse her cup when it comes to her turn. Nay, as I have heard, she will rather be on the fore hand, taking two for the other's one, which she hath done at Corsham so long, till she hath made herself worse than a beast, and not able to go but by the support of her neighbours, whereof one carried her basket, and the other hauled along the woman, the worse luggage of the twain. I have been told too, that she then fell into a pool with her head forward, and it is like enough, had not her neighbours, William Westbury at whose house she lodged that night, and Thomas Druet, sen. with much trouble and labour, brought her to Box, she might at that time have made an end, and so the Doctor had lost both her testimony and curtesy.

Sect. 16. And by their own confession our stay there was but short [about an hour and an half] and our discourse such as did not in any wise savour of excessive drinking. I remember that I told col. Eyre of the gun, it stood then in sight in the chimney. I told him likewise, that therewith he used to kill hares and pigeons ; but they seem to have forgotten it (a willing ignorance no doubt) that I then told the Colonel, that therewith he usually killed hares and pigeons on the Lord's-day ; it having been (as I have been told) a common practice with this Nowell so to do ; and being met on a time with his gun by one who was going to church, and admonished by him to go along with him : this Nicholas Nowell gave him this answer, That he got not his living by going to church. And I assure thee what I told the Colonel, I therefore did it that Nicholas Nowell might by this private complaint to a justice of peace take warning, and that he without any further trouble to the magistrate, or charge or punishment to himself, would for the future without any more ado have become a new man. And whereas they cite this gentleman Col.

Eyre, as one that was with me at the same time at their house; I shall acquaint thee with somewhat which col. Eyre had formerly deposed as with reference to myself before these Commissioners, in these words:

"And this Deponent saith further,

"That he hath known Mr. Bushnell this thirty years, and hath frequently kept him company, but never saw him drink to excess, and in his opinion have ever walked as circumspectly as might become a minister."

So far that part of his Deposition. Now if col. Eyre never saw me drink to excess, then certainly not now at Nowell's. And (if they say that this our being at Nowell's might be at the time that he so deposed have slipt his memory) I shall acquaint thee, That even touching this our being at Nowell's he was ready shortly after to depose to every one of the particulars in charge against us, according as I have presented the particulars unto thee; but Mr. Byfield and his friends had before they parted at this time from Marlborough taken a course to prevent that, for they made an Order, conceived to be on purpose to leave col. Eyre and myself under the infamy of Nowell's Deposition, without remedy or hopes of vindication of ourselves, That no witnesses which I should produce, should be heard or admitted of, of which I shall tell thee more in the close of the transactions of this day.

Sect. 17. I am yet behind with the Deposition of William Sanders, which I told thee because it did much refer to the transactions of this day, I should defer it till then. The Deposition is in these words:

William Sanders of Chippenham, shoemaker, deposeth, That about four years since he saw Mr. Bushnell come from the Bell in Box reeling to and fro three or four foot at a time; and saith that he believes that he was then drunk, for that he fell down, having been at the Bell four or five hours in the company of Mr. Cannings, and Mr. Edward Long of the Moor, and saith, that after he fell in the street he rose again, and so reeled home.

Sect. 18. Touching which Deposition, I shall offer to thy consideration,

1. The thing itself as it is reported.

2. The repute or quality of the person who thus deposeth. As

3. Some inducements which might encourage him to appear and swear any thing.

As touching the first, 'That I came from the Bell reeling three or four foot at a time; that I had been there four or five hours; that I fell down, that I rose again and so reeled home.'

To this I shall answer, That if this were true, it is almost impossible but that others should see it as well as William Sanders. For,

1. It must be in the day time, else he could not see it, and if in the day time, others must needs see it beside, for the distance betwixt the Bell and my house is at least a furlong, and there are many houses and cross ways between them; and I believe that you shall hardly go between those two houses from sun-rising to sun set, but you shall see and be seen of many; and can he quote no body, not William Pinchin, or Nowell, or Cottle, or Nicholas Spenser, or Obadiah Cheltenham, or some such like, which saw it beside himself? It was at Caln that William Rawlin's wife appeared according to a summons procured by the information of William Sanders, he affirming that she had seen it as well as himself; but when as the woman came to depose, she could testify no such thing, but all on the contrary, and to my vindication and their infamy, if she might have been permitted to go on: But her name is not at all in the Depositions, it being the use to take those Depositions which imported matter of charge against me, but nothing which might represent either them or their witnesses in their colours. And

2. Whereas he says, that I had been there three or four hours, he must needs intimate to us thus much, that he himself had been at that house so long. But now considering the conditions of the woman which then kept that house, this is as impossible to be true as the other; for she hath often told me of it since, and I am confident that she will depose it, that she would be so far from entertaining this William Sanders in her house for four or five hours, as that by her good will she would not have admitted him to come within her doors.

Sect. 19. And therefore in the next place let us come to enquire into the conditions and qualities of this William Sanders; and see whether he were a person of such credit as the Ordinance requires. I shall first represent him unto thee as he was upon oath represented unto these Commissioners: and after give thee a short story of his infamies, every particular whereof, had the Commissioners been so just as to have given us leave, should have been proved upon oath likewise.

Sect. 20. The first in these words;

June 4. William Eyre, esq.; being sworn, saith that some time since, divers persons being impeached for committing divers robberies about Sandy-lane, William Sanders, before sworn, was accused to be one of them, and was at the assizes arraigned for the same, and found guilty by the grand jury, but in favour of life was acquitted by the petty jury.

The next in these words;

July 1. Reynald Arlet deposeth, That 15 years since, Sanders before sworn, committed sacrilege by cutting and stealing the church leads.

The third in these words;

July 1. William Morley deposeth, That under the pretence of a soldier, the said Sanders in the wars broke up this Deponent's brother's house, and took goods thence to a good value.

A fourth in these words;

July 1. Michael Baylie deposeth, That about eight years since, without provocation the said Sanders fell on his own father, and beat him, and said that he would make an end of the old rogue.

These are the very words of the Depositions as they are under the clerk's hand; although either not taken, or not copied out so fully as the witnesses deposed in very many remarkable circumstances.

Sect. 21. It must not be forgotten, that before these three last depositions were taken at Marlborough, the Doctor, belike having before either instructed William Pinchin what was to be done, or else having been informed by William Pinchin what he had done, beckons to William Pinchin with his hands and twinkling of his eyes, it seems as doubting that William Pinchin had forgotten himself. Whereupon William Pinchin approacheth, and with a low congee delivers to the Doctor a piece of paper, which the Doctor conveys to Mr. Blisset with some such words, There is a testimony of this man's, meaning Sanders, behaviour; which was by Mr. Blisset read accordingly. The business was but short, and my thoughts so much upon this Doctor, that I little noted it; only I remember that there were the names of some whom I knew, set to it, and the names of others which I have heard of; of which (as likewise the false pretences by which this certificate was gotten) more anon.

Sect. 22. I shall tell thee here that William Sanders being questioned for the sacrilege mentioned but now, fled; and sheltered himself from prosecution, as the report goeth, in one or both of the armies; and that he stands answerable for this sacrilege even to this hour; and was it not an handsome thing in the Doctor to countenance this man against the minister, that had robbed the church? That instead of bringing him to condign punishment for sacrilege which he was then proved guilty of, he should then endeavour to bear him out in his perjury likewise? But there were men heretofore of such principles, I shall say more of them hereafter, that regarded not who they were they made use of, if serviceable to their ends; that could saint, and anathematize, the same person accordingly as he stood with reference to their interest; if for them, then had they good words enough for him; if not, then he was none of the godly.

But to return to the present business; William Morley's deposition tells us, that Sanders brake open his brother's house under the pretence of a soldier; belike conceiving that as that pretence had sheltered him for breaking God's house, so it might encourage him to break open and rob his neighbour's. I must tell thee further, that Sanders doth as yet stand guilty of this felony likewise. And this was conceived to be the reason why his certificate was at this time delivered in by his proxy William Pinchin, it being thought that Sanders himself was then in town;) for they thought that if Sanders himself had appeared in person he should have been apprehended for his former felonies, and so sent to a place where he should have been secured from starting.

Sect. 23. I love not to trouble myself or thee with the whole story of his infamies; let
